Now at the outset I should like to ask you one petulant question. Why is it that, when we are separated by so great an interval of land and sea, you have sent me so short a letter? Is it that I have deserved no better treatment, not having first written to you? I cannot believe that paper can have failed you while Egypt continues to supply its wares. Even if a Ptolemy had closed the seas, King Attalus would still have sent you parchments from Pergamum, and so by his skins you could have made up for the want of paper. The very name parchment is derived from a historical incident of the kind which occurred generations ago.³ What then? Am I to suppose the messenger to have been in haste? No matter how long a letter may be, it can be written in the course of a night. Or had you some business to attend to which prevented you from writing? No claim is prior to that of affection. Two suppositions remain, either that you felt disinclined to write or else that I did not deserve a letter. Of the two I prefer to charge you with sloth than to condemn myself as undeserving. For it is easier to mend neglect than to quicken love.

3. You tell me that Bonosus, like a true son of the Fish, has taken to the water.⁴ As for me who am still foul with my old stains, like the basilisk and the scorpion I haunt the dry places. [Deut. 8:15] Bonosus has his heel already on the serpent's head, whilst I am still as food to the same serpent which by divine appointment devours the earth. [Gen. 3:14] He can scale already that ladder of which the psalms of degrees⁵ are a type; whilst I, still weeping on its first step, hardly know whether I shall ever be able to say: "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." [Ps. 121:1] Amid the threatening billows of the world he is sitting in the safe shelter of his island,⁶ that is, of the church's pale, and it may be that even now, like John, he is being called to eat God's book; [Rev. 10:9, Rev. 10:10] whilst I, still lying in the sepulchre of my sins and bound with the chains of my iniquities, wait for the Lord's command in the Gospel: "Jerome, come forth." [John 11:43] But Bonosus has done more than this. Like the prophet [Jer. 13:4, Jer. 13:5] he has carried his girdle across the Euphrates (for all the devil's strength is in the loins⁷), and has hidden it there in a hole of the rock. Then, afterwards finding it rent, he has sung: "O Lord, thou hast possessed my reins. [Ps. 139:13] Thou hast broken my bonds in sunder. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving." [Ps. 116:14, Ps. 116:15, P.B.V] But as for me, Nebuchadnezzar has brought me in chains to Babylon, to the babel that is of a distracted mind. There he has laid upon me the yoke of captivity; there inserting in my nostrils a ring of iron, [Cf. 2 K. 19:28] he has commanded me to sing one of the songs of Zion. To whom I have said, "The Lord looseth the prisoners; the Lord openeth the eyes of the blind." [Pss. 137:3, Pss. 146:7, Pss. 146:8] To complete my contrast in a single sentence, whilst I pray for mercy Bonosus looks for a crown.

4. My sister's conversion is the fruit of the efforts of the saintly Julian. He has planted, it is for you to water, and the Lord will give the increase. [1 Cor. 3:6] Jesus Christ has given her to me to console me for the wound which the devil has inflicted on her. He has restored her from death to life. But in the words of the pagan poet, for her there is no safety that I do not fear. [Virg. A. 4:298]

You know yourselves how slippery is the path of youth—a path on which I have myself fallen,⁸ and which you are now traversing not without fear. She, as she enters upon it, must have the advice and the encouragement of all, she must be aided by frequent letters from you, my reverend brothers. And—for "charity endureth all things," [1 Cor. 13:7]—I beg you to get from Pope⁹ Valerian¹⁰ a letter to confirm her resolution. A girl's courage, as you know, is strengthened when she realizes that persons in high place are interested in her.

5. The fact is that my native land is a prey to barbarism, that in it men's only God is their belly, [Phi. 3:19] that they live only for the present, and that the richer a man is the holier he is held to be. Moreover, to use a well-worn proverb, the dish has a cover worthy of it; for Lupicinus is their priest.¹¹ Like lips like lettuce, as the saying goes—the only one, as Lucilius tells us, [Cic. de Fin. 5:30] at which Crassus ever laughed—the reference being to a donkey eating thistles. What I mean is that an unstable pilot steers a leaking ship, and that the blind is leading the blind straight to the pit. The ruler is like the ruled.

6. I salute your mother and mine with the respect which, as you know, I feel towards her. Associated with you as she is in a holy life, she has the start of you, her holy children, in that she is your mother. Her womb may thus be truly called golden. With her I salute your sisters, who ought all to be welcomed wherever they go, for they have triumphed over their sex and the world, and await the Bridegroom's coming, [Matt. 25:4] their lamps replenished with oil. O happy the house which is a home of a widowed Anna, of virgins that are prophetesses, and of twin Samuels bred in the Temple! [Luke 2:36, Acts 21:9, 1 Sam. 2:18] Fortunate the roof which shelters the martyr-mother of the Maccabees, with her sons around her, each and all wearing the martyr's crown!¹² For although you confess Christ every day by keeping His commandments, yet to this private glory you have added the public one of an open confession; for it was through you that the poison of the Arian heresy was formerly banished from your city.

You are surprised perhaps at my thus making a fresh beginning quite at the close of my letter. But what am I to do? I cannot refuse expression to my feelings. The brief limits of a letter compel me to be silent; my affection for you urges me to speak. I write in haste, my language is confused and ill-arranged; but love knows nothing of order.

1:

Chromatius and Eusebius were brothers

2: Philem. 12 3: See Pliny, H. N. 13:21

4: The Greek word ΙΧΘΥΣ represented to the early Christians the sentence 'Ihsouj Xristoj Qeou Uwj Swthr. Hence the fish became a favorite emblem of Christ. Tertullian connects the symbol with the water of baptism, saying: "We little fishes are born by our Fish, Jesus Christ, in water and can thrive only by continuing in the water." The allusion in the text is to the baptism of Bonosus. See Schaff, "Ante-Nicene Christianity," p. 279 5: Viz., Pss. cxx.-cxxxiv 6: See Letter III 7: Job 40:16 (said of Behemoth); cf. Letter XXII 8: Jerome again refers to his own frailty in Letters XIV. XVIII. and XLVIII

9: Papa. The word "pope" was at this time used as a name of respect ("father in God") for bishops generally. Only by degrees did it come to be restricted to the bishop of Rome. Similarly the word "imperator," originally applied to any Roman general, came to be used of the Emperor alone 10: Bishop of Aquileia 11: Sacerdos. In the letters this word generally denotes a bishop. Lupicinus held the see of Stridon

12:

2 Macc. vii

Letters - letter_008

Letter 8. To Niceas, Sub-Deacon of Aquileia.

Niceas, the sub-deacon, had accompanied Jerome to the East but had now returned home. In after-years he became bishop of Aquileia in succession to Chromatius. The date of the letter is 374 a.d. The comic poet Turpilius¹ says of the exchange of letters that it alone makes the absent present. The remark, though occurring in a work of fiction, is not untrue. For what more real presence-if I may so speak-can there be between absent friends than speaking to those whom they love in letters, and in letters hearing their reply? Even those Italian savages, the Cascans of Ennius, who-as Cicero tells us in his books on rhetoric-hunted their food like beasts of prey, were wont, before paper and parchment came into use, to exchange letters written on tablets of wood roughly planed, or on strips of bark torn from the trees. For this reason men called letter-carriers tablet-bearers,² and letter-writers bark-users,³ because they used the bark of trees. How much more then are we, who live in a civilized age, bound not to omit a social duty performed by men who lived in a state of gross savagery, and were in some respects entirely ignorant of the refinements of life. The saintly Chromatius, look you, and the reverend Eusebius, brothers as much by compatibility of disposition as by the ties of nature, have challenged me to diligence by the letters which they have showered upon me. You, however, who have but just left me, have not merely unknit our new-made friendship; you have torn it asunder-a process which Laelius, in Cicero's treatise,⁴ wisely forbids. Can it be that the East is so hateful to you that you dread the thought of even your letters coming hither? Wake up, wake up, arouse yourself from sleep, give to affection at least one sheet of paper. Amid the pleasures of life at home sometimes heave a sigh over the journeys which we have made together. If you love me, write in answer to my prayer. If you are angry with me, though angry still write. I find my longing soul much comforted when I receive a letter from a friend, even though that friend be out of temper with me.

1: Turpilius, who appears to have been a dramatist of some note, died in 101 b.c. He is mentioned by Jerome in his edition of the Eusebian Chronicle 2: Tabellarii, from tabella, a small tablet 3: Librarii, from liber, bark 4: Cic. Laelius, 76

Letters - letter_009

Letter 9. To Chrysogonus, a Monk of Aquileia. A bantering letter to an indifferent correspondent. The date of the letter is 374 a.d.

Heliodorus,¹ who is so dear to us both, and who loves you with an affection no less deep than my own, may have given you a faithful account of my feelings towards you; how your name is always on my lips, and how in every conversation which I have with him I begin by recalling my pleasant intercourse with you, and go on to marvel at your lowliness, to extol your virtue, and to proclaim your holy love.

Lynxes, they say, when they look behind them, forget what they have just seen, and lose all thought of what their eyes have ceased to behold. And so it seems to be with you. For so entirely have you forgotten our joint attachment that you have not merely blurred but erased the writing of that epistle which, as the apostle tells us, [2 Cor. 3:2] is written in the hearts of Christians. The creatures that I have mentioned lurk on branches of leafy trees and pounce on fleet roes or frightened stags. In vain their victims fly, for they carry their tormentors with them, and these rend their flesh as they run. Lynxes, however, only hunt when an empty belly makes their mouths dry. When they have satisfied their thirst for blood, and have filled their stomachs with food, satiety induces forgetfulness, and they bestow no thought on future prey till hunger recalls them to a sense of their need.

Now in your case it cannot be that you have already had enough of me. Why then do you bring to a premature close a friendship which is but just begun? Why do you let slip what you have hardly as yet fully grasped? But as such remissness as yours is never at a loss for an excuse, you will perhaps declare that you had nothing to write. Had this been so, you should still have written to inform me of the fact.

1:

See introd. to Letter XIV

Letters - letter_010

Letter 10. To Paul, an Old Man of Concordia.

Jerome writes to Paul of Concordia, a centenarian (§2), and the owner of a good theological library (§, to lend him some commentaries. In return he sends him his life (newly written) of Paul the hermit. The date of the letter is 374 a.d.

1. The shortness of man's life is the punishment for man's sin; and the fact that even on the very threshold of the light death constantly overtakes the new-born child proves that the times are continually sinking into deeper depravity. For when the first tiller of paradise had been entangled by the serpent in his snaky coils, and had been forced in consequence to migrate earthwards, although his deathless state was changed for a mortal one, yet the sentence¹ of man's curse was put off for nine hundred years, or even more, a period so long that it may be called a second immortality. Afterwards sin gradually grew more and more virulent, till the ungodliness of the giants [Gen. 6:4] brought in its train the shipwreck of the whole world. Then when the world had been cleansed by the baptism-if I may so call it-of the deluge, human life was contracted to a short span. Yet even this we have almost altogether wasted, so continually do our iniquities fight against the divine purposes. For how few there are, either who go beyond their hundredth year, or who, going beyond it, do not regret that they have done so; according to that which the Scripture witnesses in the book of Psalms: "the days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow." [Ps. 90:10]

2. Why, say you, these opening reflections so remote and so far fetched that one might use against them the Horatian witticism:

"back to the eggs which leda laid for zeus, the bard is fain to trace the war of troy?"²

Simply that I may describe in fitting terms your great age and hoary head as white as Christ's. [Rev. 1:14] For see, the hundredth circling year is already passing over you, and yet, always keeping the commandments of the Lord, amid the circumstances of your present life you think over the blessedness of that which is to come. Your eyes are bright and keen, your steps steady, your hearing good, your teeth are white, your voice musical, your flesh firm and full of sap; your ruddy cheeks belie your white hairs, your strength is not that of your age. Advancing years have not, as we too often see them do, impaired the tenacity of your memory; the coldness of your blood has not blunted an intellect at once warm and wary.³ Your face is not wrinkled nor your brow furrowed. Lastly, no tremors palsy your hand or cause it to travel in crooked pathways over the wax on which you write. The Lord shows us in you the bloom of the resurrection that is to be ours; so that whereas in others who die by inches whilst yet living, we recognize the results of sin, in your case we ascribe it to righteousness that you still simulate youth at an age to which it is foreign. And although we see the like haleness of body in many even of those who are sinners, in their case it is a grant of the devil to lead them into sin, whilst in yours it is a gift of God to make you rejoice.

3. Tully in his brilliant speech on behalf of Flaccus⁴ describes the learning of the Greeks as "innate frivolity and accomplished vanity."

Certainly their ablest literary men used to receive money for pronouncing eulogies upon their kings or princes. Following their example, I set a price upon my praise. Nor must you suppose my demand a small one. You are asked to give me the pearl of the Gospel, [Matt. 13:46] "the words of the Lord," "pure words, even as the silver which from the earth is tried, and purified seven times in the fire," [Ps. 12:7, P. B. V] I mean the commentaries of Fortunatian⁵ and-for its account of the persecutors-the History of Aurelius Victor,⁶ and with these the Letters of Novatian;⁷ so that, learning the poison set forth by this schismatic, we may the more gladly drink of the antidote supplied by the holy martyr Cyprian. In the mean time I have sent to you, that is to say, to Paul the aged, a Paul that is older still.⁸ I have taken great pains to bring my language down to the level of the simpler sort. But, somehow or other, though you fill it with water, the jar retains the odor which it acquired when first used.⁹ If my little gift should please you, I have others also in store which (if the Holy Spirit shall breathe favorably), shall sail across the sea to you with all kinds of eastern merchandise.

1:

Elogium

2: Hor. A. P. 147. Zeus having visited Leda in the form of a swan, she produced two eggs, from one of which came Castor and Pollux, and from the other Helen, who was the cause of the Trojan war 3: A play on words: callidus, "wary," is indistinguishable in sound from calidus, "warm.

4: The words quoted do not occur in the extant portion of Cicero's speech 5: For some account of this writer see Jerome, De V. 3:c. xcvi 6: A Roman annalist some of whose works are still extant. He was contemporary with but probably older than Jerome 7: A puritan of the third century who seceded from the Roman church because of the laxity of its discipline 8: I.e. the life of Paul the Hermit, translated in this vol 9: Hor. Ep. I. 2:69; cf. T. Moore

Letters - letter_011

Letter 11. To the Virgins of Aemona.

Aemona was a Roman colony not far from Stridon, Jerome's birthplace. The virgins to whom the note is addressed had omitted to answer his letters, and he now writes to upbraid them for their remissness. The date of the letter is 374 a.d. This scanty sheet of paper shows in what a wilderness I live, and because of it I have to say much in few words. For, desirous though I am to speak to you more fully, this miserable scrap compels me to leave much unsaid. Still ingenuity makes up for lack of means, and by writing small I can say a great deal. Observe, I beseech you, how I love you, even in the midst of my difficulties, since even the want of materials does not stop me from writing to you.

Pardon, I beseech you, an aggrieved man: if I speak in tears and in anger it is because I have been injured. For in return for my regular letters you have not sent me a single syllable. Light, I know, has no communion with darkness, [2 Cor. 6:14] and God's handmaidens no fellowship with a sinner, yet a harlot was allowed to wash the Lord's feet with her tears, [Luke 7:37 sqq] and dogs are permitted to eat of their masters' crumbs. [Matt. 15:27] It was the Saviour's mission to call sinners and not the righteous; for, as He said Himself, "they that be whole need not a physician. [Matt. 9:12, Matt. 9:13] He wills the repentance of a sinner rather than his death, [Ezek. 33:11] and carries home the poor stray sheep on His own shoulders. [Luke 15:5] So, too, when the prodigal son returns, his father receives him with joy. [Luke 15:20] Nay more, the apostle says: "Judge nothing before the time." [1 Cor. 4:5] For "who art thou that judgest another man's servant? To his own master he standeth or falleth." [Rom. 14:4] And "let him that standeth take heed lest he fall." [1 Cor. 10:12] "Bear ye one another's burdens." [Gal. 6:2]

Dear sisters, man's envy judges in one way, Christ in another; and the whisper of a corner is not the same as the sentence of His tribunal. Many ways seem right to men which are afterwards found to be wrong. [Cf. Prov. 14:12] And a treasure is often stowed in earthen vessels. [2 Cor. 4:7] Peter thrice denied his Lord, yet his bitter tears restored him to his place. "To whom much is forgiven, the same loveth much." [Luke 7:47] No word is said of the flock as a whole, yet the angels joy in heaven over the safety of one sick ewe. [Luke 15:7, Luke 15:10] And if any one demurs to this reasoning, the Lord Himself has said: "Friend, is thine eye evil because I am good?" [Matt. 20:15]

Letters - letter_012

Letter 12. To Antony, Monk. The subject of this letter is similar to that of the preceding. Of Antony nothing is known except that some mss. describe him as "of Aemona." The date of the letter is 374 a.d.

While the disciples were disputing concerning precedence our Lord, the teacher of humility, took a little child and said: "Except ye be converted and become as little children ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." [Matt. 18:3] And lest He should seem to preach more than he practised, He fulfilled His own precept in His life. For He washed His disciples' feet, [John. 13:5] he received the traitor with a kiss, [Luke 22:47] He conversed with the woman of Samaria, [John. 4:7] He spoke of the kingdom of heaven with Mary at His feet,¹ and when He rose again from the dead He showed Himself first to some poor women. [Matt. 28:1, Matt. 28:9] Pride is opposed to humility, and through it Satan lost his eminence as an archangel. The Jewish people perished in their pride, for while they claimed the chief seats and salutations in the market place, [Matt. 23:6, Matt. 23:7] they were superseded by the Gentiles, who had before been counted as "a drop of a bucket." [Isa. 40:15] Two poor fishermen, Peter and James, were sent to confute the sophists and the wise men of the world. As the Scripture says: "God resisteth the proud and giveth grace to the humble." [1 Pet. 5:5] Think, brother, what a sin it must be which has God for its opponent. In the Gospel the Pharisee is rejected because of his pride, and the publican is accepted because of his humility. [Luke 18:9 sqq]

Now, unless I am mistaken, I have already sent you ten letters, affectionate and earnest, whilst you have not deigned to give me even a single line. The Lord speaks to His servants, but you, my brother servant, refuse to speak to me. Believe me, if reserve did not check my pen, I could show my annoyance in such invective that you would have to reply-even though it might be in anger. But since anger is human, and a Christian must not act injuriously, I fall back once more on entreaty, and beg you to love one who loves you, and to write to him as a servant should to his fellow-servant. Farewell in the Lord.

1:

Luke 7:40 sqq.: the heroine of this story is identified by Jerome with Mary Magdalene

Letters - letter_013

Letter 13. To Castorina, His Maternal Aunt. An interesting letter, as throwing some light on Jerome's family relations. Castorina, his maternal aunt, had, for some reason, become estranged from him, and he now writes to her to effect a reconciliation. Whether he succeeded in doing so, we do not know. The date of the letter is 374 a.d. The apostle and evangelist John rightly says, in his first epistle, that "whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer." [1 John. 3:15] For, since murder often springs from hate, the hater, even though he has not yet slain his victim, is at heart a murderer. Why, you ask, do I begin in this style? Simply that you and I may both lay aside past ill feeling and cleanse our hearts to be a habitation for God. "Be ye angry," David says, "and sin not," or, as the apostle more fully expresses it, "let not the sun go down upon your wrath." [Ps. 4:4, LXX.: Eph. 4:26] What then shall we do in the day of judgment, upon whose wrath the sun has gone down not one day but many years? The Lord says in the Gospel: "If thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." [Matt. 5:23, Matt. 5:24] Woe to me, wretch that I am; woe, I had almost said, to you also. This long time past we have either offered no gift at the altar or have offered it whilst cherishing anger "without a cause." How have we been able in our daily prayers to say "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," [Matt. 6:12] whilst our feelings have been at variance with our words, and our petition inconsistent with our conduct? Therefore I renew the prayer which I made a year ago in a previous letter,¹ that the Lord's legacy of peace [John 14:27] may be indeed ours, and that my desires and your feelings may find favor in His sight. Soon we shall stand before His judgment seat to receive the reward of harmony restored or to pay the penalty for harmony broken. In case you shall prove unwilling-I hope that it may not be so-to accept my advances, I for my part shall be free. For this letter, when it is read, will insure my acquittal.

1:

This is no longer extant

Letters - letter_014

Letter 14. To Heliodorus, Monk.

Heliodorus, originally a soldier, but now a presbyter of the Church, had accompanied Jerome to the East, but, not feeling called to the solitary life of the desert, had returned to Aquileia. Here he resumed his clerical duties, and in course of time was raised to the episcopate as bishop of Altinum. The letter was written in the first bitterness of separation and reproaches Heliodorus for having gone back from the perfect way of the ascetic life. The description given of this is highly colored and seems to have produced a great impression in the West. Fabiola was so much enchanted by it that she learned the letter by heart. [See Ep. 77:9] The date is 373 or 374 a.d.

1. So conscious are you of the affection which exists between us that you cannot but recognize the love and passion with which I strove to prolong our common sojourn in the desert. This very letter-blotted, as you see, with tears-gives evidence of the lamentation and weeping with which I accompanied your departure. With the pretty ways of a child you then softened your refusal by soothing words, and I, being off my guard, knew not what to do. Was I to hold my peace? I could not conceal my eagerness by a show of indifference. Or was I to entreat you yet more earnestly? You would have refused to listen, for your love was not like mine. Despised affection has taken the one course open to it. Unable to keep you when present, it goes in search of you when absent. You asked me yourself, when you were going away, to invite you to the desert when I took up my quarters there, and I for my part promised to do so. Accordingly I invite you now; come, and come quickly. Do not call to mind old ties; the desert is for those who have left all. Nor let the hardships of our former travels deter you. You believe in Christ, believe also in His words: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and all these things shall be added unto you." [Matt. 6:33] Take neither scrip nor staff. He is rich enough who is poor-with Christ.

2. But what is this, and why do I foolishly importune you again? Away with entreaties, an end to coaxing words. Offended love does well to be angry. You have spurned my petition; perhaps you will listen to my remonstrance. What keeps you, effeminate soldier, in your father's house? Where are your ramparts and trenches? When have you spent a winter in the field? Lo, the trumpet sounds from heaven! Lo, the Leader comes with clouds! [Rev. 1:7] He is armed to subdue the world, and out of His mouth proceeds a two-edged sword [Rev. 1:16] to mow down all that encounters it. But as for you, what will you do? Pass straight from your chamber to the battle-field, and from the cool shade into the burning sun? Nay, a body used to a tunic cannot endure a buckler; a head that has worn a cap refuses a helmet; a hand made tender by disuse is galled by a sword-hilt.¹ Hear the proclamation of your King: "He that is not with me is against me, and he that gathereth not with me scattereth." [Matt. 12:30] Remember the day on which you enlisted, when, buried with Christ in baptism, you swore fealty to Him, declaring that for His sake you would spare neither father nor mother. Lo, the enemy is striving to slay Christ in your breast. Lo, the ranks of the foe sigh over that bounty which you received when you entered His service. Should your little nephew² hang on your neck, pay no regard to him; should your mother with ashes on her hair and garments rent show you the breasts at which she nursed you, heed her not; should your father prostrate himself on the threshold, trample him under foot and go your way. With dry eyes fly to the standard of the cross. In such cases cruelty is the only true affection.

3. Hereafter there shall come-yes, there shall come-a day when you will return a victor to your true country, and will walk through the heavenly Jerusalem crowned with the crown of valor. Then will you receive the citizenship thereof with Paul. [Phi. 3:20, R.V] Then will you seek the like privilege for your parents. Then will you intercede for me who have urged you forward on the path of victory.

I am not ignorant of the fetters which you may plead as hindrances. My breast is not of iron nor my heart of stone. I was not born of flint or suckled by a tigress. [Virg. A. 4:367] I have passed through troubles like yours myself. Now it is a widowed sister who throws her caressing arms around you. Now it is the slaves, your foster-brothers, who cry, "To what master are you leaving us?" Now it is a nurse bowed with age, and a body-servant loved only less than a father, who exclaim: "Only wait till we die and follow us to our graves." Perhaps, too, an aged mother, with sunken bosom and furrowed brow, recalling the lullaby [Pers. 3:18] with which she once soothed you, adds her entreaties to theirs. The learned may call you, if they please, "The sole support and pillar of your house." [Virg. A. 12:59] The love of God and the fear of hell will easily break such bonds.

Scripture, you will argue, bids us obey our parents. [Eph. 6:1] Yes, but whoso loves them more than Christ loses his own soul. [Matt. 10:37] The enemy takes sword in hand to slay me, and shall I think of a mother's tears? Or shall I desert the service of Christ for the sake of a father to whom, if I am Christ's servant, I owe no rites of burial, [Luke 9:59, Luke 9:60] albeit if I am Christ's true servant I owe these to all? Peter with his cowardly advice was an offence to the Lord on the eve of His passion; [Matt. 16:23] and to the brethren who strove to restrain him from going up to Jerusalem, Paul's one answer was: "What mean ye to weep and to break my heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus." [Acts 21:13] The batteringram of natural affection which so often shatters faith must recoil powerless from the wall of the Gospel. "My mother and my brethren are these whosoever do the will of my Father which is in heaven." [Luke 8:21, Matt. 12:50] If they believe in Christ let them bid me God-speed, for I go to fight in His name. And if they do not believe, "let the dead bury their dead." [Matt. 8:22]

4. But all this, you argue, only touches the case of martyrs. Ah! my brother, you are mistaken, you are mistaken, if you suppose that there is ever a time when the Christian does not suffer persecution. Then are you most hardly beset when you know not that you are beset at all. "Our adversary as a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour," [1 Pet. 5:8] and do you think of peace? "He sitteth in the lurking-places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent; his eyes are privily set against the poor. He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den; he lieth in wait to catch the poor;" [Ps. 10:8, Ps. 10:9] and do you slumber under a shady tree, so as to fall an easy prey? On one side self-indulgence presses me hard; on another covetousness strives to make an inroad; my belly wishes to be a God to me, in place of Christ, [Phi. 3:19] and lust would fain drive away the Holy Spirit that dwells in me and defile His temple. [1 Cor 3:17] I am pursued, I say, by an enemy and, hapless wretch that I am, how shall I hold myself a victor when I am being led away a captive?"

"Whose name is Legion and his wiles untold; [Virg. A. 7:337]

5. My dear brother, weigh well the various forms of transgression, and think not that the sins which I have mentioned are less flagrant than that of idolatry. Nay, hear the apostle's view of the matter. "For this ye know," he writes, "that no whore-monger or unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God." [Eph. 5:5] In a general way all that is of the devil savors of enmity to God, and what is of the devil is idolatry, since all idols are subject to him. Yet Paul elsewhere lays down the law in express and unmistakable terms, saying: "Mortify your members, which are upon the earth, laying aside fornication, uncleanness, evil concupiscence and covetousness, which are³ idolatry, for which things' sake the wrath of God cometh." [Col. 3:5, Col. 3:6]

Idolatry is not confined to casting incense upon an altar with finger and thumb, or to pouring libations of wine out of a cup into a bowl. Covetousness is idolatry, or else the selling of the Lord for thirty pieces of silver was a righteous act. [Matt. 26:15] Lust involves profanation, or else men may defile with common harlots⁴ those members of Christ which should be "a living sacrifice acceptable to God." [Rom. 12:1] Fraud is idolatry, or else they are worthy of imitation who, in the Acts of the Apostles, sold their inheritance, and because they kept back part of the price, perished by an instant doom. [Acts 5] Consider well, my brother; nothing is yours to keep. "Whosoever he be of you," the Lord says, "that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." [Luke 14:33] Why are you such a half-hearted Christian?

6. See how Peter left his net; [Matt. 4:18-20] see how the publican rose from the receipt of custom. [Matt. 9:9] In a moment he became an apostle. "The Son of man hath not where to lay his head," [Matt. 8:20] and do you plan wide porticos and spacious halls? If you look to inherit the good things of the world you can no longer be a joint-heir with Christ. [Rom. 8:17] You are called a monk, and has the name no meaning? What brings you, a solitary, into the throng of men? The advice that I give is that of no inexperienced mariner who has never lost either ship or cargo, and has never known a gale. Lately shipwrecked as I have been myself, my warnings to other voyagers spring from my own fears. On one side, like Charybdis, self-indulgence sucks into its vortex the soul's salvation. On the other, like Scylla, lust, with a smile on her girl's face, lures it on to wreck its chastity. The coast is savage, and the devil with a crew of pirates carries irons to fetter his captives. Be not credulous, be not over-confident. The sea may be as smooth and smiling as a pond, its quiet surface may be scarcely ruffled by a breath of air, yet sometimes its waves are as high as mountains. There is danger in its depths, the foe is lurking there. Ease your sheets, spread your sails, fasten the cross as an ensign on your prow. The calm that you speak of is itself a tempest. "Why so?" you will perhaps argue; "are not all my fellow-townsmen Christians?" Your case, I reply, is not that of others. Listen to the words of the Lord: "If thou wilt be perfect go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and come and follow me." [Matt. 19:21] You have already promised to be perfect. For when you forsook the army and made yourself an eunuch for the kingdom of heaven's sake, [Matt. 19:12] you did so that you might follow the perfect life. Now the perfect servant of Christ has nothing beside Christ. Or if he have anything beside Christ he is not perfect. And if he be not perfect when he has promised God to be so, his profession is a lie. But "the mouth that lieth slayeth the soul." [Wisd. 1:11] To conclude, then, if you are perfect you will not set your heart on your father's goods; and if you are not perfect you have deceived the Lord.

The Gospel thunders forth its divine warning: "Ye cannot serve two masters," [Luke 16:13] and does any one dare to make Christ a liar by serving at once both God and Mammon? Repeatedly does He proclaim, "If any one will come after me let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." [Luke 9:23] If I load myself with gold can I think that I am following Christ? Surely not. "He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also so to walk even as He walked." [1 John. 2:6]

7. I know you will rejoin that you possess nothing. Why, then, if you are so well prepared for battle, do you not take the field? Perhaps you think that you can wage war in your own country, although the Lord could do no signs in His? [Matt. 13:58] Why not? you ask. Take the answer which comes to you with his authority: "No prophet is accepted in his own country." [Luke 4:24] But, you will say, I do not seek honor; the approval of my conscience is enough for me. Neither did the Lord seek it; for when the multitudes would have made Him a king he fled from them. [John. 6:15] But where there is no honor there is contempt; and where there is contempt there is frequent rudeness; and where there is rudeness there is vexation; and where there is vexation there is no rest; and where there is no rest the mind is apt to be diverted from its purpose. Again, where, through restlessness, earnestness loses any of its force, it is lessened by what it loses, and that which is lessened cannot be called perfect. The upshot of all which is that a monk cannot be perfect in his own country. Now, not to aim at perfection is itself a sin.

8. Driven from this line of defence you will appeal to the example of the clergy. These, you will say, remain in their cities, and yet they are surely above criticism. Far be it from me to censure the successors of the apostles, who with holy words consecrate the body of Christ, and who make us Christians.⁵ Having the keys of the kingdom of heaven, they judge men to some extent before the day of judgment, and guard the chastity of the bride of Christ. But, as I have before hinted, the case of monks is different from that of the clergy. The clergy feed Christ's sheep; I as a monk am fed by them. They live of the altar: [1 Cor. 9:13, 1 Cor. 9:14] I, if I bring no gift to it, have the axe laid to my root as to that of a barren tree. [Matt. 3:10] Nor can I plead poverty as an excuse, for the Lord in the gospel has praised an aged widow for casting into the treasury the last two coins that she had. [Luke 21:1-4] I may not sit in the presence of a presbyter;⁶ he, if I sin, may deliver me to Satan, "for the destruction of the flesh that the spirit may be saved." [1 Cor. 5:5] Under the old law he who disobeyed the priests was put outside the camp and stoned by the people, or else he was beheaded and expiated his contempt with his blood. [Deut. 17:5, Deut. 17:12] But now the disobedient person is cut down with the spiritual sword, or he is expelled from the church and torn to pieces by ravening demons. Should the entreaties of your brethren induce you to take orders, I shall rejoice that you are lifted up, and fear lest you may be cast down. You will say: "If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work." [1 Tim. 3:1] I know that; but you should add what follows: such an one "must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, chaste, of good behavior, given to hospitality, apt to teach, not given to wine, no striker but patient." [1 Tim. 3:2, 1 Tim. 3:3] After fully explaining the qualifications of a bishop the apostle speaks of ministers of the third degree with equal care. "Likewise must the deacons be grave," he writes, "not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre, holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And let these also first be proved; then, let them minister, being found blameless." [1 Tim. 3:8-10] Woe to the man who goes in to the supper without a wedding garment. Nothing remains for him but the stern question, "Friend, how camest thou in hither?" And when he is speechless the order will be given, "Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." [Matt. 22:11-13] Woe to him who, when he has received a talent, has bound it in a napkin; and, whilst others make profits, only preserves what he has received. His angry lord shall rebuke him in a moment. "Thou wicked servant," he will say, "wherefore gavest thou not my money into the bank that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury?" [Luke 19:23] That is to say, you should have laid before the altar what you were not able to bear. For whilst you, a slothful trader, keep a penny in your hands, you occupy the place of another who might double the money. Wherefore, as he who ministers well purchases to himself a good degree, [1 Tim. 3:13] so he who approaches the cup of the Lord unworthily shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. [1 Cor. 11:27]

9. Not all bishops are bishops indeed. You consider Peter; mark Judas as well. You notice Stephen; look also on Nicolas, sentenced in the Apocalypse by the Lord's own lips, [Rev. 2:6] whose shameful imaginations gave rise to the heresy of the Nicolaitans. "Let a man examine himself and so let him come." [1 Cor. 11:28] For it is not ecclesiastical rank that makes a man a Christian. The centurion Cornelius was still a heathen when he was cleansed by the gift of the Holy Spirit. Daniel was but a child when he judged the elders.⁷ Amos was stripping mulberry bushes when, in a moment, he was made a prophet. [Amos 7:14] David was only a shepherd when he was chosen to be king. [1 Sam. 16:11-13] And the least of His disciples was the one whom Jesus loved the most. My brother, sit down in the lower room, that when one less honorable comes you may be bidden to go up higher. [Luke 14:10] Upon whom does the Lord rest but upon him that is lowly and of a contrite spirit, and that trembleth at His word? [Isa. 66:2] To whom God has committed much, of him He will ask the more. [Luke 12:48] "Mighty men shall be mightily tormented." [Wisd. 6:6] No man need pride himself in the day of judgment on merely physical chastity, for then shall men give account for every idle word, [Matt. 12:36] and the reviling of a brother shall be counted as the sin of murder. [Matt. 5:21, Matt. 5:22] Paul and Peter now reign with Christ, and it is not easy to take the place of the one or to hold the office of the other. There may come an angel to rend the veil of your temple, [Matt. 27:51] and to remove your candlestick out of its place. [Rev. 2:5] If you intend to build the tower, first count the cost. [Luke 14:28] Salt that has lost its savor is good for nothing but to be cast out and to be trodden under foot of swine. [Matt. 5:13] If a monk fall, a priest shall intercede for him; but who shall intercede for a fallen priest?

10. At last my discourse is clear of the reefs: at last this frail bark has passed from the breakers into deep water. I may now spread my sails to the breeze; and, as I leave the rocks of controversy astern, my epilogue will be like the joyful shout of mariners. O desert, bright with the flowers of Christ! O solitude whence come the stones of which, in the Apocalypse, the city of the great king is built! [Rev. 21:19, Rev. 21:20] O wilderness, gladdened with God's especial presence! What keeps you in the world, my brother, yon who are above the world?⁸ How long shall gloomy roofs oppress you? How long shall smoky cities immure you? Believe me, I have more light than you. Sweet it is to lay aside the weight of the body and to soar into the pure bright ether. Do you dread poverty? Christ calls the poor blessed. [Luke 6:20] Does toil frighten you? No athlete is crowned but in the sweat of his brow. Are you anxious as regards food? Faith fears no famine. Do you dread the bare ground for limbs wasted with fasting? The Lord lies there beside you. Do you recoil from an unwashed head and uncombed hair? Christ is your true head.⁹ Does the boundless solitude of the desert terrify you? In the spirit you may walk always in paradise. Do but turn your thoughts thither and you will be no more in the desert. Is your skin rough and scaly because you no longer bathe? He that is once washed in Christ needeth not to wash again. [John. 13:10] To all your objections the apostle gives this one brief answer: "The sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory" which shall come after them, "which shall be revealed in us." [Rom. 8:18] You are too greedy of enjoyment, my brother, if you wish to rejoice with the world here, and to reign with Christ hereafter.

11. it shall come, it shall come, that day when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal shall put on immortality. [1 Cor. 15:53] Then shall that servant be blessed whom the Lord shall find watching. [Matt. 24:46] Then at the sound of the trumpet [1 Thess. 4:16] the earth and its peoples shall tremble, but you shall rejoice. The world shall howl at the Lord who comes to judge it, and the tribes of the earth shall smite the breast. Once mighty kings shall tremble in their nakedness. Venus shall be exposed, and her son too Jupiter with his fiery bolts will be brought to trial; and Plato, with his disciples, will be but a fool. Aristotle's arguments shall be of no avail. You may seem a poor man and country bred, but then you shall exult and laugh, and say: Behold my crucified Lord behold my judge. This is He who was once an infant wrapped in swaddling clothes and crying in a manger. [Luke 2:7] This is He whose parents were a workingman and a working-woman.¹⁰ This is He, who, carried into Egypt in His mother's bosom, though He was God, fled before the face of man. This is He who was clothed in a scarlet robe and crowned with thorns. [Matt. 27:28, Matt. 27:29] This is He who was called a sorcerer and a man with a devil and a Samaritan. [John. 8:48] Jew, behold the hands which you nailed to the cross. Roman, behold the side which you pierced with the spear. See both of you whether it was this body that the disciples stole secretly and by night. [Matt. 27:64] For this you profess to believe. My brother, it is affection which has urged me to speak thus; that you who now find the Christian life so hard may have your reward in that day.

1: A reminiscence of Tertullian 2: Nepotian, afterwards famous as the recipient of Letter LII., and the subject of Letter LX 3: So Jerome, although the Vulg. has "is."

4: Publicarum libidinum victimae; words borrowed from Tertullian, de C. F. II. 12 5: In the sacrament of baptism 6: Cf. Letter CXLVI 7: Susannah 45 sqq 8: From Cyprian, Letter I. 14 (to Donatus) 9: From Cyprian, Letter LXXVII. 2 (to Nemesianus) 10: From Tertullian, de Spect. xxx

Letters - letter_015

Letter 15. To Pope Damasus. This letter, written in 376 or 377 a.d., illustrates Jerome's attitude towards the see of Rome at this time held by Damasus, afterwards his warm friend and admirer. Referring to Rome as the scene of his own baptism and as a church where the true faith has remained unimpaired (§1), and laying down the strict doctrine of salvation only within the pale of the church (§2), Jerome asks "the successor of the fisherman" two questions, viz.: (1) who is the true bishop of the three claimants of the see of Antioch, and (2) which is the correct terminology, to speak of three "hypostases" in the Godhead, or of one? On the latter question he expresses fully his own opinion.

1. Since the East, shattered as it is by the long-standing feuds, subsisting between its peoples, is bit by bit tearing into shreds the seamless vest of the Lord, "woven from the top throughout," [John. 19:23] since the foxes are destroying the vineyard of Christ, [Cant. 2:15] and since among the broken cisterns that hold no water it is hard to discover "the sealed fountain" and "the garden inclosed," [Cant. 4:12] I think it my duty to consult the chair of Peter, and to turn to a church whose faith has been praised by Paul. [Rom. 1:8] I appeal for spiritual food to the church whence I have received the garb of Christ.¹ The wide space of sea and land that lies between us cannot deter me from searching for "the pearl of great price." [Matt. 13:46] "Wheresoever the body is, there will the eagles be gathered together." [Matt. 24:28] Evil children have squandered their patrimony; you alone keep your heritage intact. The fruitful soil of Rome, when it receives the pure seed of the Lord, bears fruit an hundredfold; but here the seed corn is choked in the furrows and nothing grows but darnel or oats. [Matt. 13:22, Matt. 13:23] In the West the Sun of righteousness [Mal. 4:2] is even now rising; in the East, Lucifer, who fell from heaven, [Luke 10:18] has once more set his throne above the stars. [Isa. 14:12] "Ye are the light of the world," [Matt. 5:14] "ye are the salt of the earth," [Matt. 5:13] ye are "vessels of gold and of silver." Here are vessels of wood or of earth, [2 Tim. 2:20] which wait for the rod of iron, [Rev. 2:27] and eternal fire.

2. Yet, though your greatness terrifies me, your kindness attracts me. From the priest I demand the safe-keeping of the victim, from the shepherd the protection due to the sheep. Away with all that is overweening; let the state of Roman majesty withdraw. My words are spoken to the successor of the fisherman, to the disciple of the cross. As I follow no leader save Christ, so I communicate with none but your blessedness, that is with the chair of Peter. For this, I know, is the rock on which the church is built! [Matt. 16:18] This is the house where alone the paschal lamb can be rightly eaten. [Ex. 12:22] This is the ark of Noah, and he who is not found in it shall perish when the flood prevails. [Gen. 7:23] But since by reason of my sins I have betaken myself to this desert which lies between Syria and the uncivilized waste, I cannot, owing to the great distance between us, always ask of your sanctity the holy thing of the Lord.² Consequently I here follow the Egyptian confessors³ who share your faith, and anchor my frail craft under the shadow of their great argosies. I know nothing of Vitalis; I reject Meletius; I have nothing to do with Paulinus.⁴ He that gathers not with you scatters; [Matt. 12:30] he that is not of Christ is of Antichrist.

3. Just now, I am sorry to say, those Arians, the Campenses,⁵ are trying to extort from me, a Roman Christian, their unheard-of formula of three hypostases.⁶ And this, too, after the definition of Nicaea⁷ and the decree of Alexandria,⁸ in which the West has joined. Where, I should like to know, are the apostles of these doctrines? Where is their Paul, their new doctor of the Gentiles? I ask them what three hypostases are supposed to mean. They reply three persons subsisting. I rejoin that this is my belief. They are not satisfied with the meaning, they demand the term. Surely some secret venom lurks in the words. "If any man refuse," I cry, "to acknowledge three hypostases in the sense of three things hypostatized, that is three persons subsisting, let him be anathema." Yet, because I do not learn their words, I am counted a heretic. "But, if any one, understanding by hypostasis essence,⁹ deny that in the three persons there is one hypostasis, he has no part in Christ." Because this is my confession I, like you, am branded with the stigma of Sabellianism.¹⁰

4. If you think fit enact a decree; and then I shall not hesitate to speak of three hypostases. Order a new creed to supersede the Nicene; and then, whether we are Arians or orthodox, one confession will do for us all. In the whole range of secular learning hypostasis never means anything but essence. And can any one, I ask, be so profane as to speak of three essences or substances in the Godhead? There is one nature of God and one only; and this, and this alone, truly is. For absolute being is derived from no other source but is all its own. All things besides, that is all things created, although they appear to be, are not. For there was a time when they were not, and that which once was not may again cease to be. God alone who is eternal, that is to say, who has no beginning, really deserves to be called an essence. Therefore also He says to Moses from the bush, "I am that I am," and Moses says of Him, "I am hath sent me." [Ex. 3:14] As the angels, the sky, the earth, the seas, all existed at the time, it must have been as the absolute being that God claimed for himself that name of essence, which apparently was common to all. But because His nature alone is perfect, and because in the three persons there subsists but one Godhead, which truly is and is one nature; whosoever in the name of religion declares that there are in the Godhead three elements, three hypostases, that is, or essences, is striving really to predicate three natures of God. And if this is true, why are we severed by walls from Arius, when in dishonesty we are one with him? Let Ursicinus be made the colleague of your blessedness; let Auxentius be associated with Ambrose.¹¹ But may the faith of Rome never come to such a pass! May the devout hearts of your people never be infected with such unholy doctrines! Let us be satisfied to speak of one substance and of three subsisting persons-perfect, equal, coeternal. Let us keep to one hypostasis, if such be your pleasure, and say nothing of three. It is a bad sign when those who mean the same thing use different words. Let us be satisfied with the form of creed which we have hitherto used. Or, if you think it right that I should speak of three hypostases, explaining what I mean by them, I am ready to submit. But, believe me, there is poison hidden under their honey; the angel of Satan has transformed himself into an angel of light. [2 Cor. 11:14] They give a plausible explanation of the term hypostasis; yet when I profess to hold it in the same sense they count me a heretic. Why are they so tenacious of a word? Why do they shelter themselves under ambiguous language? If their belief corresponds to their explanation of it, I do not condemn them for keeping it. On the other hand, if my belief corresponds to their expressed opinions, they should allow me to set forth their meaning in my own words.

5. I implore your blessedness, therefore, by the crucified Saviour of the world, and by the consubstantial trinity, to authorize me by letter either to use or to refuse this formula of three hypostases. And lest the obscurity of my present abode may baffle the bearers of your letter, I pray you to address it to Evagrius, the presbyter, with whom you are well acquainted. I beg you also to signify with whom I am to communicate at Antioch. Not, I hope, with the Campenses;¹² for they-with their allies the heretics of Tarsus¹³ -only desire communion with you to preach with greater authority their traditional doctrine of three hypostases.

1:

I.e. holy baptism; cf. Gal. 3:27

2:

I.e. the bread of the Eucharist, at this time sent by one bishop to another in token of communion; or possibly the allusion is different, and what Jerome means to say is: "You are the oracle of God, but owing to my present situation I cannot consult you.

3: Certain bishops banished from their sees by Valens. See Letter III 4: The three rival claimants of the see of Antioch. See note on Letter XVI

5:

I.e. the field party. The Meletians were so called because, denied access to the churches of the city, they had to worship in the open air outside the walls

6: upostasij=substantia. It is the word used in Heb. 1:3, "The express image of his person [R. V. substance]." Except at Alexandria it was usual to speak of one hypostasis as of one ousia in the Divine Nature. But at Alexandria from Origen downwards three hypostases had been ascribed to the Deity. Two explanations are given of the latter formula: (1) That at Alexandria upostasij was taken in the sense of proswpon, so that by "three hypostases" was meant only "three persons." (2) That "three hypostases" was an inexact expression standing for "three hypostatic persons" or "a threefold hypostasis." This latter seems to be the true account of the matter. See an interesting note in Newman, Arians of the Fourth Century, Appendix IV 7: In the Nicene Creed the Son is declared to be "of one substance [ousia] with the Father.

8:

This decree allowed the formula of "three hypostases" to be susceptible of an orthodox interpretation. It did not, however, encourage its use

9:

ousia

10: Cauterio unionis inurimur. Sabellius recognized three "aspects" in the Godhead but denied "three persons," at least in the Catholic sense 11: Ursicinus, at this time anti-pope; Auxentius, Arian bishop of Milan

12: I.e. the followers of the orthodox Bishop Meletius, who, as they had no church in Antioch, were compelled to meet for worship outside the city 13: These appear to have been semi-Arians or

Macedonians. Silvanus of Tarsus was their recognized leader

Letters - letter_016

Letter 16. To Pope Damasus. This letter, written a few months after the preceding, is another appeal to Damasus to solve the writer's doubts. Jerome once more refers to his baptism at Rome, and declares that his one answer to the factions at Antioch is, "He who clings to the chair of Peter is accepted by me." Written from the desert in the year 377 or 378.

1. By her importunity the widow in the gospel at last gained a hearing, [Matt. 15:28] and by the same means one friend induced another to give him bread at midnight, when his door was shut and his servants were in bed. [Luke 11:7, Luke 11:8] The publican's prayers overcame God, [Luke 18:10-14] although God is invincible. Nineveh was saved by its tears from the impending ruin caused by its sin. [Jon. 3:5, Jon. 3:10] To what end, you ask, these far-fetched references? To this end, I make answer; that you in your greatness should look upon me in my littleness; that you, the rich shepherd, should not despise me, the ailing sheep. Christ Himself brought the robber from the cross to paradise, [Luke 23:43] and, to show that repentance is never too late, He turned a murderer's death into a martyrdom. Gladly does Christ embrace the prodigal son when he returns to Him; [Luke 15:20] and, leaving the ninety and nine, the good shepherd carries home on His shoulders the one poor sheep that is left. [Luke 15:5] From a persecutor Paul becomes a preacher. His bodily eyes are blinded to clear the eyes of his soul, [Acts 9:8] and he who once haled Christ's servants in chains before the council of the Jews, [Acts 8:3] lives afterwards to glory in the bonds of Christ. [2 Cor. 12:10]

2. As I have already written to you,¹ I, who have received Christ's garb in Rome, am now detained in the waste that borders Syria. No sentence of banishment, however, has been passed upon me; the punishment which I am undergoing is self-inflicted. But, as the heathen poet says:

"They change not mind but sky who cross the sea." [Hor. Epist. 1:11, 27] The untiring foe follows me closely, and the assaults that I suffer in the desert are severer than ever. For the Arian frenzy raves, and the powers of the world support it. The church is rent into three factions, and each of these is eager to seize me for its own. The influence of the monks is of long standing, and it is directed against me. I meantime keep crying: "He who clings to the chair of Peter is accepted by me." Meletius, Vitalis, and Paulinus² all profess to cleave to you, and I could believe the assertion if it were made by one of them only. As it is, either two of them or else all three are guilty of falsehood. Therefore I implore your blessedness, by our Lord's cross and passion, those necessary glories of our faith, as you hold an apostolic office, to give an apostolic decision. Only tell me by letter with whom I am to communicate in Syria, and I will pray for you that you may sit in judgment enthroned with the twelve; [Matt. 19:28] that when you grow old, like Peter, you may be girded not by yourself but by another, [John. 21:18] and that, like Paul, you may be made a citizen of the heavenly kingdom. [Phi. 3:20, R.V] Do not despise a soul for which Christ died.

1:

See Letter XV

2:

The three rival claimants of the see of Antioch. Paulinus and Meletius were both orthodox, but Meletius derived his orders from the Arians and was consequently not recognized in the West. In the East, however, he was so highly esteemed that some years after this he was chosen to preside over the Council of Constantinople (a.d. 391). Vitalis, the remaining claimant, a follower of Apollinaris, but much respected by the orthodox on account of his high character

Letters - letter_017

Letter 17. To the Presbyter Marcus. In this letter, addressed to one who seems to have had some pre-eminence among the monks of the Chalcidian desert, Jerome complains of the hard treatment meted out to him because of his refusal to take any part in the great theological dispute then raging in Syria. He protests his own orthodoxy, and begs permission to remain where he is until the return of spring, when he will retire from "the inhospitable desert," Written in a.d. 378 or 379.

1. I had made up my mind to use the words of the psalmist: "While the wicked was before me I was dumb with silence; I was humbled, and I held my peace even from good " [Ps. 39:1, 2 Vulg] and "I, as a deaf man, heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth. Thus I was as a man that heareth not." [Ps. 38:13, Ps. 38:14] But charity overcomes all things, [Cf. 1 Cor. 13:7] and my regard for you defeats my determination. I am, indeed, less careful to retaliate upon my assailants than to comply with your request. For among Christians, as one has said,¹ not he who endures an outrage is unhappy, but he who commits it.

2. And first, before I speak to you of my belief (which you know full well), I am forced to cry out against the inhumanity of this country. A hackneyed quotation best expresses my meaning:

"What savages are these who will not grant

A rest to strangers, even on their sands!

They threaten war and drive us from their coasts." [Virg. A. 1:539-541]

I take this from a Gentile poet that one who disregards the peace of Christ may at least learn its meaning from a heathen. I am called a heretic, although I preach the consubstantial trinity. I am accused of the Sabellian impiety although I proclaim with unwearied voice that in the Godhead there are three distinct,² real, whole, and perfect persons. The Arians do right to accuse me, but the orthodox forfeit their orthodoxy when they assail a faith like mine. They may, if they like, condemn me as a heretic; but if they do they must also condemn Egypt and the West, Damasus and Peter.³ Why do they fasten the guilt on one and leave his companions uncensured? If there is but little water in the stream, it is the fault, not of the channel, but of the source. I blush to say it, but from the caves which serve us for cells we monks of the desert condemn the world. Rolling in sack-cloth and ashes,⁴ we pass sentence on bishops. What use is the robe of a penitent if it covers the pride of a king? Chains, squalor, and long hair are by right tokens of sorrow, and not ensigns of royalty. I merely ask leave to remain silent. Why do they torment a man who does not deserve their ill-will? I am a heretic, you say. What is it to you if I am? Stay quiet, and all is said. You are afraid, I suppose, that, with my fluent knowledge of Syriac and Greek, I shall make a tour of the churches, lead the people into error, and form a schism! I have robbed no man of anything; neither have I taken what I have not earned. With my own hand [1 Cor. 4:12] daily and in the sweat of my brow [Gen. 3:19] I labor for my food, knowing that it is written by the apostle: "If any will not work, neither shall he eat." [2 Thess. 3:10]

3. Reverend and holy father, Jesus is my witness with what groans and tears I have written all this. "I have kept silence, saith the Lord, but shall I always keep silence? Surely not." [Isa. 42:14, LXX] I cannot have so much as a corner of the desert. Every day I am asked for my confession of faith; as though when I was regenerated in baptism I had made none. I accept their formulas, but they are still dissatisfied. I sign my name to them, but they still refuse to believe me. One thing only will content them, that I should leave the country. I am on the point of departure. They have already torn away from me my dear brothers, who are a part of my very life. They are, as you see, anxious to depart-nay, they are actually departing; it is preferable, they say, to live among wild beasts rather than with Christians such as these. I myself, too, would be at this moment a fugitive were I not withheld by physical infirmity and by the severity of the winter. I ask to be allowed the shelter of the desert for a few months till spring returns; or if this seems too long a delay, I am ready to depart now. "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." [Ps. 24:1] Let them climb up to heaven alone;⁵ for them alone Christ died; they possess all things and glory in all. Be it so. "But God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world." [Gal. 6:14]

4. As regards the questions which you have thought fit to put to me concerning the faith, I have given to the reverend Cyril⁶ a written confession which sufficiently answers them. He who does not so believe has no part in Christ. My faith is attested both by your ears and by those of your blessed brother, Zenobius, to whom, as well as to yourself, we all of us here send our best greeting.

1:

Cyprian, Letter LV. Cf. Cic. T. Q. 5: accipere quam facere praestat injuriam

2: Subsistenets 3: The contemporary bishops of Rome and Alexandria 4: Tert. Apol. 40, s. f

5:

Was Jerome thinking of Constantine's rebuke to the Novatian bishop at Nicaea, "Plant a ladder for thyself, Acesius, and mount alone to heaven"

6:

Who this was is unknown. The extant document purporting to contain this confession is not genuine

Letters - letter_018

Letter 18. To Pope Damasus This (written from Constantinople in a.d. 381) is the earliest of Jerome's expository letters. In it he explains at length the vision recorded in the sixth chapter of Isaiah, and enlarges upon its mystical meaning. "Some of my predecessors," he writes, "make 'the Lord sitting upon a throne' God the Father, and suppose the seraphim to represent the Son and the Holy Spirit. I do not agree with them, for John expressly tells us [John 12:41] that it was Christ and not the Father whom the prophet saw." And again, "The word seraphim means either 'glow' or 'beginning of speech,' and the two seraphim thus stand for the Old and New Testaments. 'Did not our heart burn within us,' said the disciples, 'while he opened to us the Scriptures?' [Luke 24:32] Moreover, the Old Testament is written in Hebrew, and this unquestionably was man's original language." Jerome then speaks of the unity of the sacred books. "Whatever," he asserts, "we read in the Old Testament we find also in the Gospel; and what we read in the Gospel is deduced from the Old Testament. There is no discord between them, no disagreement. In both Testaments the Trinity is preached." The letter is noticeable for the evidence it affords of the thoroughness of Jerome's studies. Not only does he cite the several Greek versions of Isaiah in support of his argument, but he also reverts to the Hebrew original. So far as the West was concerned he may be said to have discovered this anew. Even educated men like Augustine had ceased to look beyond the LXX., and were more or less aghast at the boldness with which Jerome rejected its time-honored renderings. The letter also shows that independence of judgment which always marked Jerome's work. At the time when he wrote it he was much under the sway of Origen. But great as was his admiration for the master, he was not afraid to discard his exegesis when, as in the case of the seraphim, he believed it to be erroneous. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text. The prophet explains the vision of the sixth chapter of Isaiah, and after some things about the history and death of King Uzziah, he expertly deals with the Seraphim and Trisagion according to his custom.

"And it came to pass in the year that king Uzziah died, I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple" (Isaiah 6:1). Before we speak of the vision, it seems necessary to discuss who Uzziah was, how long he reigned, and who were his contemporaries in other nations. As for his character, as we read in the books of Kings and Chronicles, he was a just man who did what was right in the sight of the Lord by building the Temple, constructing aqueducts, offering vessels, and defeating his adversaries, and the greatest testament of his piety was having many prophets in his kingdom. As long as the priest Zechariah, also known as Understanding, lived, he pleased God and entered his temple with great reverence. But after Zechariah died, Uzziah, desiring to offer gifts himself, usurped the priestly order not so much piously as audaciously. And when the other Levites and priests objected, saying, "Are you not Uzziah the king and not a priest?", he would not listen and was immediately covered in leprosy on his forehead, according to the word of the prophet, who said, "Fill their faces with shame, Lord" (Psalm 83:17). The part of the body that the priest covered with a gold plate, which the Lord commanded to be marked with the letter Tau in the book of Ezekiel (Ezekiel 9), on which David exults, saying, "The light of your countenance has shone upon us, Lord" (Psalm 4:7), where an insolent foreigner was killed by a sling stone. Uzziah reigned for fifty-two years (2 Kings 17), during which time Amulius ruled the Latins and Agamestor the Athenians. After Uzziah's death, the prophet Isaiah saw this vision, which we now try to explain, that is, in the year when Romulus, the founder of the Roman Empire, was born, as can be seen by those who wish to read the Book of Times, which we have translated into Latin from the Greek language. "And it came to pass in the year that king Uzziah died, I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne high and lifted up" (Isaiah 6). The aforementioned history is followed by spiritual understanding, for which reason the history itself is repeated. While the leprous king, and as far as he himself was concerned, dissipated the priesthood, Isaiah could not see the vision. As long as he held the kingdom in Judah, the prophet did not lift up his eyes to the heavens (Isaiah 6). Heavenly things were not revealed to him, the Lord of hosts did not appear to him, nor was the holy name heard in the mystery of faith. But when he died, everything that the following discourse will reveal was manifested in the light. Something like this is also written in Exodus (Chapter 2), when Pharaoh lived, the Israelites, oppressed by mud, bricks, and straw, did not sigh unto the Lord, and as long as he reigned, no one sought the God of their fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But when he died, the children of Israel sighed, as the Scripture says, "And their cry went up to the Lord" (Exodus 2:23). They should have rejoiced more according to the history, and sighed less while he was alive. Likewise, when Ezekiel prophesied, "Phaltias the son of Banaia died, and after the wicked leader's death, 'I fell upon my face, and cried with a loud voice, and said, 'Ah, Lord God, will you make a full end of the remnant of Israel?'" (Ezekiel 11:13). Therefore, if you understand in Uzziah, and Pharaoh, and Phaltia, and other such opposing powers, you will see how, while they lived, none of us saw and sighed, and repented. "For sin shall not have dominion over you: for ye are not under the law, but under grace." (Romans 6:14). While sin reigns, we build cities for the Egyptians; we are covered in ashes and dirt; we follow bandages for wheat, and mud works for solid rock.

3. It follows: I saw the Lord seated on a high and lofty throne (Dan. 7). Even Daniel saw the Lord seated, but not on a high and lofty throne. Elsewhere, the divine voice promises, saying: 'I will come and sit in judgment on the people in the valley of Jehoshaphat, which means the Lord's judgment' (Joel 3:12). The sinner, who is like me, sees the Lord seated in the valley of Jehoshaphat, not on a hill or a mountain, but in the valley of judgment. But the righteous, like Isaiah, sees Him seated on a high and lofty throne. Moreover, when I consider with my mind how He reigns over Thrones, Dominations, Angels, and all other Virtues, I see His lofty throne. But when I consider how He governs the human race and often descends to earth for our salvation, I see His humble throne, near the earth.

4. It follows: I saw the Lord sitting on a high and lofty throne; and the house was full of his majesty, and seraphim stood around him (according to the Septuagint). Some, both Greeks and Latins, explaining this passage, say that the Lord sitting on the throne is God the Father; and the two seraphim, which are said to stand on either side, are interpreted as referring to our Lord Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit. However, I do not agree with their authority, though they are very learned. For it is much better to speak the truth simply than to express falsehood eloquently, especially since in this same vision, John the Evangelist wrote that it was not God the Father who was seen, but Christ. For when he spoke of the unbelief of the Jews, he immediately explained the causes of their unbelief, saying, "Therefore they could not believe, because Isaiah said: 'You will indeed listen, but never understand, and you will indeed look, but never perceive.' For this people's heart has grown dull, and their ears are hard of hearing, and they have shut their eyes; so that they might not look with their eyes, and listen with their ears, and understand with their heart and turn - and I would heal them" (Isaiah 6:9-10; John 12:40-41). Therefore, in the present volume of Isaiah, the one who sits on the throne commands that he should say, "You will indeed listen, but never understand." But as the Evangelist understands it, the one who commands this is Christ. From this it is now inferred that the seraphim cannot refer to Christ, since Christ is the one who sits. And although in the Acts of the Apostles, in opposition to the Jews who dispute among themselves, Paul says: "The Holy Spirit rightly spoke through Isaiah the prophet to our fathers, saying: 'Go to this people and say, You will indeed listen, but never understand, and you will indeed look, but never perceive. For this people's heart has grown dull, and their ears are hard of hearing, and their eyes they have closed; so that they might not look with their eyes, and listen with their ears, and understand with their heart and turn - and I would heal them'" (Acts 28:25 and following), for me, however, it does not raise any question of different persons, since I know that both Christ and the Holy Spirit are of one substance; nor are the words of the Spirit different from those of the Son, nor did the Son command anything different from the Spirit.

5. It follows: "And the house was filled with his majesty. The house of God, which is above, is seen in full glory; but as for this one which is below, I do not know whether it is full of glory unless, perhaps, according to the sense of the Psalmist who says: 'The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof' (Ps. 23:1). Let us also say that those who can say, 'We have all received from his fullness' (John 1:16), are full of glory on earth. Wise women build this house, and foolish ones tear it down with their own hands (Prov. 14). Isaiah also speaks of this house: 'And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be prepared on the top of mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills' (Isa. 2:2). This is the house of which Paul testifies elsewhere with sacred words: 'But Moses indeed was faithful in all his house as a servant for a testimony of those things which were to be said. But Christ as the Son over his own house, which house we are, if we hold fast the confidence and glorying of hope firm unto the end' (Heb. 3:5-6). He also speaks of this house to Timothy: 'But these things I write to thee, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to comport thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God' (1 Tim. 3:14-15)."

6. It follows: And the seraphim stood round about him, each one had six wings: and with two they covered his face, and with two they covered his feet, and with two they flew, and they cried one to another, and said: Holy, holy, holy, the Lord God of hosts, all the earth is full of his glory." We want to know what the seraphim are, standing in a circle around God, with six wings attached to one another; how with two wings they cover their face, with two their feet, and with two they fly, when they are said to be standing above God in a circle; or how they can stand in a circle when there are only two of them and they fly elsewhere. What is it that they shout to each other, repeating the name Holy three times? How can the house above be full of glory, and now the earth is said to be full of it?

It is necessary to pray for the interpretation of Scriptures. As they raise a considerable amount of dust and immediately present difficulties in interpretation, let us pray to the Lord that I will also be sent coal from the altar so that, cleansed of all filth of sin, I may first be able to see God's sacraments and then describe what I see. As we find in the interpretation of Hebrew names, seraphim are interpreted as ardor, fire, or the beginning of their speech. We ask, what is this fire? The Savior says, 'I have come to cast fire on the earth, and how I wish it were already kindled' (Luke 12:49). Two disciples, to whom the Lord had opened the Scriptures on the way, beginning with Moses and all the prophets, after their eyes were opened and they recognized him, said to each other, 'Was not our heart burning within us while he spoke to us on the way and opened the Scriptures to us?' (Luke 24:32). In Deuteronomy (chapter 4), God himself is written as a consuming fire, and in Ezekiel (chapter 8), he is seen to be fiery from his kidneys to his feet; 'the words of the Lord are pure words, like silver refined in a furnace on the ground, purified seven times' (Psalm 12:6). And many other things that, if I wanted to repeat them about all of the Scriptures, it would be too long. Therefore, we ask where this saving fire can be found? There can be no doubt that it is in the sacred books, through the reading of which all human vices are purged. However, I am afraid that when we begin to say this, we may be seen not so much as interpreting but as imposing meaning on the Scriptures. The Hebrew language is the first and most common language. Victorinus the Latin author said, 'The beginning of speech and common language, and all the words we speak, were handed down by ancient times in the Hebrew language in which the Old Testament is written. But when the diversity of languages was attributed to the tower of Babel by offending God, the variety of speech was dispersed among all nations. Therefore, the beginning of speech and the fire are observed in two Testaments, which are not surprising since the Lord himself is learned through them. Six wings belong to one [cherubim], and six wings to the other. Our Victorinus interpreted the twelve apostles. We can also accept the twelve altar stones that have not touched iron, and the twelve gems from which the priest's insignia is constructed (Exodus 28:51), which Ezekiel (chapter 28) mentions and Revelation (chapter 21) does not hide the truth of, but God knows what is true. As for what is likely, we will explain in the following.

7. It follows: And two covered their face, and two covered their feet, and two flew. They covered not their own face or feet, but God's. For who can know His beginning, what was in eternity before He created this world, when He founded the Throne, the Dominions, the Powers, the Angels, and all the heavenly ministry? It follows: And two covered their feet, not their own, but God's. For who can know His end? What will happen after the end of the age, after the judgment of the human race, what will follow in life? Will another earth come again, and after the transition, will other elements or another world and sun be created? Tell me the past and the future, and I will say that you are gods, says Isaiah (chapter 41 verse 23), indicating that no one can declare what was before the world and what will happen after the world. And two flew. We only know what is revealed to us through the reading of the Scriptures, when the world was created, when man was formed, when the flood came, when the law was given: that from one man all the earth was populated: and in the end times, the Son of God took on flesh for our salvation. But these two Seraphim covered, that which we have said, over their faces and feet. And they cried out to one another. It is beautifully arranged, one to the other.

There is nothing discordant between the Old and New Testaments. For whatever we read in the Old Testament, we find the same thing in the Gospel. And what is read in the Gospel is derived from the authority of the Old Testament. There is nothing in them that is discordant, nothing different. And they said, Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God of Hosts. The Trinity is preached in both Testaments. And what is said to be the Lord of Hosts and our Savior, take the example in the 23rd Psalm verse 52. The powers that minister to the Lord proclaim to other heavenly fortitudes to open the door to the Lord returning. Lift up your gates, O ye princes; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in. Again, those who see him clothed in flesh marvel at the new mystery and ask, Who is this king of glory (Psalm 23:9)? And they receive the answer, "The Lord of hosts is the king of glory," which is written in Hebrew as "The Lord Sabaoth." And it should be known that wherever the Seventy Interpreters express the Lord of Hosts and the Lord Almighty, it is written in Hebrew as "The Lord Sabaoth," which is interpreted by Aquila as "The Lord of armies." The Lord himself is also here with four letters, which are properly placed in God, Yod He, Yod He, which makes up the ineffable and glorious name of God. "The whole earth is full of his glory." This is still said by the Seraphim about the advent of the Lord Savior, how his preaching will spread throughout the earth, and the sound of the Apostles will penetrate the boundaries of the world.

8. It follows: "And the threshold shook at the voice of those who cried out." We read in the Old Testament that the Lord always spoke to Moses and Aaron at the door of the Tabernacle (Leviticus 1 and 4, Numbers 10), as if before the Gospel had not yet introduced them into the Holy of Holies: just as the Church of God was later introduced, saying, "The king has brought me into his chambers" (Song of Solomon 1:3). Therefore, when our Lord descended to the earth, that threshold, which was like an obstacle to those who wanted to enter, was lifted up, and the whole world was filled with smoke, that is, with the glory of God. And where in Latin we read "elevatum," in Greek it is "ἐπ' ἄρθῃ," which means removed. But since this ambiguity can be interpreted in either way, our interpreters have understood it to mean "removed" instead of "lifted up." "And the house was filled with smoke." God, as we have said above, is a fire. When He descended on Mount Sinai to Moses, at His coming, lamps appeared to run and the whole mountain was covered with smoke. Hence in the Psalms it is said: "Who touches the mountains and they smoke" (Psalm 103:32). Therefore, from the fire, since we cannot grasp its entire substance, a somewhat lighter and (so to speak) more rarefied nature of smoke is dispersed throughout the whole world, which, as we receive, we say: "We know in part and we prophesy in part" (1 Corinthians 13:9). And: "Now we see through a mirror in a dark manner" (1 Corinthians 13:12).

9. And the seraphim stood around him, each one with six wings: and with two they covered his face, and with two they covered his feet, and with two they flew. A certain Greek, highly learned in the Scriptures, explained that the seraphim are certain virtues in heaven who stand before the tribunal of God, praising Him, and are sent on different ministries, especially to those who need purification and deserve to be partly purified by punishment for their past sins. As for the lifting up of the threshold and the house being filled with smoke, it is a sign of the destruction of the Jewish temple and the burning of all Jerusalem, which we now see destroyed. However, some agree on the former points, but disagree on the latter. For they claim that the lifting of the threshold occurred when the veil of the temple was torn and the whole house of Israel was confused by a cloud of error (Matthew 17; Mark 15; Luke 23): and when Josephus reports that the priests heard a voice of heavenly virtues from the innermost part of the temple, saying, 'Let us depart from these seats.'

10. There is a man from whom I am glad to have learned many things, and who has mastered the Hebrew language to such an extent that he is considered a Chaldean among their scribes. He has taken a far different path; for he says that no prophet has seen Seraphim standing around God except for Isaiah, and that not even Seraphim are mentioned elsewhere. Then he says that the destruction and captivity of Jerusalem under Nebuchadnezzar was a prefiguring sign. For there were eleven kings from Uzziah, under whom he began to prophesy, to Zedekiah, who was the last to reign and who was led blindfolded to Babylon, and twelfth was Gedaliah, whom the king of Babylon had made ruler over the land, but who was killed by Ishmael son of Nethaniah in the midst of a feast, a parricide of the remnants of his country (4 Kings 25; 2 Chronicles 36; and Jeremiah 41); and there are twelve wings, four of which cover their face, as is found in some versions, four cover their body, and four cover their feet. Of these twelve kings, only four were just: Uzziah, Jotham, Hezekiah, and Josiah, who, in each captivity, dared to glorify God, Holy, Holy, Holy Lord God of Hosts, with lofty words. The others, however, covered their faces because of their sins, and others who were led into captivity covered their footprints. Indeed, the removal of the lintel and the house filled with smoke, as we have said above, indicated the destruction of Jerusalem and the burning of the temple.

11. And since I have begun to relate his opinion, let us touch on those things which I have not yet mentioned. The forceps with which the coal from the altar was taken, and the lips purified, he claimed as an allusion to Isaiah's own suffering and death, when he was killed under King Manasseh, and then, with his lips truly purified, he said to the Lord: 'Here I am, send me', and I said, 'Woe is me, for I am cut off' (according to the LXX)! As long as Uzziah lived, Isaiah, you did not realize that you were miserable; you were not moved to contrition; but when he died, you recognized that your lips were not clean, and then you realized that you were unworthy to see God. But may I also be contrite, and after contrition become worthy to see God, even though I am human and have unclean lips, and even though I dwell among a people who also have unclean lips. Isaiah had only sinned with his speech, for he was just; that is why only his lips were unclean, not his conscience. But I, since I also look with my eyes to lust, and am scandalized by hand and foot, and sin in every part of my body, have all things unclean; and since I have been baptized with the spirit once, I need to be purified again by a second baptism, that is, by fire (Matt. 3:11).

12. In Scriptures, words are not simple. There is much hidden in them. One thing is meant by the letter, another by mystical speech. Behold, in the Gospel the Lord is girded with a towel, prepares a basin to wash the disciples' feet, and performs the service of a servant (John 13) to teach us humility and to minister to one another. I do not deny, I do not refuse. What does he say to Peter, who refuses: "Unless I wash your feet, you have no part with me"? And he answered, "Lord, not only my feet, but also my hands and my head" (John 13:8-9). Therefore, when the Lord ascends into heaven (because the apostles, as earthly men, still had feet polluted by the filth of sin), he wants to free them completely from their sins so that the prophetic word may apply to them: "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him who brings good news, who publishes peace" (Isaiah 52:7). And they may be able to imitate the words of the Church, saying, "I have washed my feet; how can I soil them?" (Song of Solomon 5:3). So that even if someone adheres to this dust after the resurrection, they may be driven out of the impious city as a testimony of their labor, which they have contended for the salvation of all, becoming Jews to Jews and Gentiles to Gentiles, so that they may have in part also polluted their own footsteps. Therefore, returning to the point, just as the apostles needed to have their feet cleansed, so Isaiah, who had sinned only in speech, had unclean lips. And as far as I can tell, because he did not rebuke Oziah when he entered the Temple, nor, following the example of Elijah, did he openly call out the wicked, he had unclean lips. I live in the midst of a people who have unclean lips. Isaiah, who is remorseful and testifies that he is wretched, becomes worthy of purification. But the people not only do not repent, but they do not even know that they have unclean lips, and therefore do not deserve the remedy of purification. We must, therefore, take this example and not only be just ourselves but not dwell with sinners, because the Prophet leads us also in the part of sin and misery.¹³ How God is seen. The following follows: And I saw the Master, the Lord of hosts 56. The Jews say that Isaiah was killed by their elders because, whereas Moses saw the latter things of God, this man has written that he saw the Lord of hosts with his bodily eyes. On this point God says: "No man shall see my face and live." (Exodus 33:20) If they are asked how God in the Law and in other Prophets says that he showed himself in visions and dreams, but spoke to Moses face to face, and how this statement, "No man shall see my face and live," stands when He admits that he spoke to Moses face to face, they will answer that God appeared as a vision that was possible for man to see, not as He truly is, but as He wished to be seen. We say that Isaiah was seen in the same way, always provided that Moses saw God or did not see Him. If he saw God, then Isaiah also saw Him, and it was impious of you to slay him, since God can be seen. If he did not see Him, kill Moses and Isaiah both for lying when they said they saw Him who cannot be seen. Whatever interpretation they give of this passage concerning Moses, we also relate to Isaiah's vision.

13. How God is seen. — It follows: And I saw the Lord of hosts, the king. The Jews say that Isaiah was killed by their forefathers because, whereas Moses had seen the latter things of God, this man claimed that he had seen the Lord of hosts with his bodily eyes, in spite of the fact that God says: No one shall see My face and live. If we ask them how it is that God in the Law declares that He has appeared to other prophets in visions and dreams, but to Moses face to face, and how that saying, No one shall see My face and live, can be true when He admits to speaking to Moses face to face, they will answer, according to human possibility, that God was seen, not as He is, but as He wished to appear. And we say the same about Isaiah, leaving the question open whether Moses actually saw God or not. If he did, then Isaiah also saw Him when he claimed that he did, and was wrongly put to death by you, for God can be seen. But if he did not, then kill Moses as well as Isaiah, since he too is guilty of lying, claiming to have seen the One who cannot be seen. Whoever has understood the account of Moses in that passage must apply the same interpretation to Isaiah's vision.

14. It follows: And one of the Seraphim was sent to me, and in his hand he held a coal that he had taken with tongs from the altar, and he touched my mouth, and said: "Behold, this has touched your lips, and your iniquities shall be taken away, and your sins shall be purged." According to all the editions that we have presented above, whether you wish to understand two Testaments, or some angels in heavenly powers acting as intermediaries, or in a sign of future captivity, a certain shadow prefigured by future truth, now receive the Seraphim. Because we follow the first sentence, we assert that the Gospel was sent to the Prophet: which having both in itself, that is, its own and the Old Testament, the fiery word of God, comprehends with a double edge of commandments; and having touched our lips, whatever ignorance there was, this, indeed, we interpret as unclean lips, it banished by the truth of its cleansing. Jacob saw this tong on a ladder (Gen. 28): this is the double-edged sword: this is the two mites that the widow woman gives as a gift to God (Mark 12): this is the stater having two coins, which are found in the fish's mouth, and are given for the Lord and for Peter. (Matthew 17); with this double tong which is held by the power of unity, the coal is sent to the Prophet, whom in the 119th Psalm, when the Prophet asked God, said: "Deliver my soul, O Lord, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue," and after the question of the Holy Ghost: "What shall be given to you or what shall be added to you for a deceitful tongue?" it is said: "Sharp arrows of the mighty with coals of desolation" (Ps. 119.2 ff.), we know that they belong to the Prophet. Truly, it is the desolating coal, which makes the pure tongue free from sin, that is the divine word, of which it is said in Isaiah: "You have coals of fire, sit upon them, they will be your help." (Isaiah 47.14, 15, according to the LXX).

15. It follows: And I heard the voice of the Lord saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then I said, Here am I; send me. And He said, Go and tell this people: "Be ever hearing, but never understanding; be ever seeing, but never perceiving." The Prophet easily responds to the questioning of the Lord's words, not commanding whom to send and who will go for the people, saying: Here am I; send me. After the promise, he is ordered to say, Go and tell this people: "Be ever hearing, but never understanding; be ever seeing, but never perceiving;" and the rest of what his prophecy contained. I heard in this place a not insignificant dispute among my Hebrew people, of which I will mention a few things so that you may understand the human perspective. He said, let us ask who did better between Moses and Isaiah. Did not Moses, who was sent by God to the people, say: "Please, Lord, I am not worthy; please, send someone else" (Exod. 4:13)? Or Isaiah, who, not having been chosen, offered himself, saying, "Here am I; send me." "I do not ignore," he said, "that it is dangerous to discuss the merits of the saints, and to want to say something more or less about the one whom the Lord has crowned; but because He Himself said, "Seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you" (Matth. 7 and Luke 11), we too, not to detract from anyone, but as those who understand the sense of Scripture, should inquire into what can raise the question. He who advocates for Moses, he says, preaches his humility and meekness, that he, considering himself unworthy of God's ministry, became greater: but Isaiah, who offered himself, began to prophesy, and began with curses: "Be ever hearing, but never understanding; be ever seeing, but never perceiving." Therefore, having suffered many evils from that, and having been considered insane by all the people, when the divine voice spoke to him again, "Cry out," knowing what he had endured by offering himself with previous ease, he did not say, "Here I am, send me," but he asked what he should cry out, and said, "What shall I cry?" Similar to that in Jeremiah: "Take the cup of wine from my hand and make all the nations to whom I send you drink it. They will drink, vomit, go insane, and fall by the sword, which I will send among them" (Jeremiah 25:15-16). When the Prophet heard this, he did not refuse. He did not say, as Moses did: "Please, Lord, I am not worthy. Send someone else" (Exodus 4:13), but as a lover of his people, and thinking that the enemies of the people would be killed and destroyed by the cup of wine, he accepted the cup willingly, understanding that even Jerusalem was included among all the nations. Finally, among other nations: "So I took the cup from the Lord's hand and made all the nations drink to whom the Lord sent me, including Jerusalem, the towns of Judah, its kings and officials, to make them a ruin and a desolation, an object of scorn and cursing" (Jeremiah 25:17-18). Regarding this prophecy, although the order is reversed in most codices, listen to what he says in another place: "You have deceived me, Lord, and I was deceived; you seized me and prevailed. I have become a laughingstock all day long; everyone mocks me" (Jeremiah 20:7). And on the other hand, he who is an advocate for Isaiah (said) he will say this: the prophet, relying not so much on his own merit as on God's mercy, after he heard from the Seraphim, "Behold, this has touched your lips, and your iniquities shall be taken away, and your sins shall be cleansed," did not want to become idle, but voluntarily offered himself to God's ministry, as if freed from sins by zeal for the faith. But because Moses had been educated in secular disciplines and his conscience had been somewhat sullied by the killing of the Egyptian (Exod. 2), and he knew that there would be a fierce struggle against the magicians and the wicked king Pharaoh, he excused himself, saying, "I pray thee, Lord, I am not worthy"; for which, in the Hebrew, it is written "I have uncircumcised lips," the Seventy Interpreters rendering the sense rather than the word for word. From which it can be clearly understood that Isaiah rightly offered himself for God's ministry after having his lips circumcised, whereas Moses, with still uncircumcised lips, refused such a great ministry.

16. You will hear but not understand; you will look but never see. The whole place, as the Savior says in the Gospel, refers to the time when he chose to descend to the earth and perform miracles for the Jews who did not understand. And since there follow many diverse explanations to the end of the Chapter; and we have already explained the receiver of the candles, let this suffice in this place. For a prayer, which is not polished by one's own hand, both when it is uncultivated in itself and when it is repeated at inordinate length, becomes much more wearisome, so that, tormented by the pain of my eyes, we may devote ourselves only to our ears and tongue.

17. Septuagint: And one of the Seraphim was sent to me; Aquila, and Theodotion, And one of the Seraphim flew to me; Symmachus, And one of the Seraphim flew to me. Every day a Seraphim is sent to us, and every day those who groan and say: Woe is me, for I am pricked, are purged, and when they have been freed from sins, they prepare themselves for the service of God. But as for the other interpreters, when they say 'was sent,' understand the speedy arrival of the divine word upon those who are judged worthy of his fellowship. There is also a difference in gender. Septuagint, Aquila, and Theodotion translated "Seraphim" in the neuter gender, while Symmachus used the masculine gender. And it should not be thought that there is gender in the Virtues of God, since even the Holy Spirit itself is presented in the Hebrew language properties as feminine gender, Ruha: in Greek, in the neuter gender, πνεῦμα; in Latin, in the masculine gender, Spiritus. From which it is to be understood that when discussing superior beings and something is presented in masculine or feminine gender, it signifies the language rather than sex. For God Himself, invisible and incorruptible, is presented in almost all languages in the masculine gender, although sex does not apply to Him. Those who dare to say in their prayers and offerings, "Who sits upon the Cherubim and Seraphim," should also be rebuked, even if they are pious. For it is written that God sits upon the Cherubim, as it says, "Thou that sittest upon the Cherubim, shine forth" (Psalm 80:1). However, Scripture does not mention anywhere that God sits upon the Seraphim, nor do we find any reference to the Seraphim standing around God, except in the present passage in all the Holy Scriptures.

18. Septuagint: "And he had in his hand a coal, which he had taken from the altar with tongs, and he touched my mouth." Aquila and Theodotion: "And in his hand was a stone in tongs, which he had taken from the altar, and he touched my mouth." Symmachus: "And in his hand was a stone in tongs, which he had taken from the altar, and he brought it to my mouth." As for the history, it seems that God is sitting in the Temple of Jerusalem, and before him a coal is brought from the altar, according to the Septuagint to Isaiah: but from the altar of incense or burnt offerings. But as for mystical understanding, that fire is sent to us, which Jeremiah could not bear: so when it penetrates the secrets of our souls, it dissolves us, so that we are cooked from the old man into the new, that we may be able to break out into that voice: "And I live, now not I; but Christ lives in me." (Galatians 2:20) Tongs, too, although they were always in the priestly equipment, according to the other Interpreters, we owe various graces, by which God spoke in many ways and in many ways to our fathers in the prophets of old. Because in Hebrew the word for coal is read as "calculus," it seems to me that the divine speech is signified by the appellation of "stone". For just as a calculus is a type of stone, the hardest and roundest, and smoothest of all purity, so the word of God, which cannot yield to the contradictions of heretics or any adversaries, is called a calculus. Sephora circumcised her son with this stone, and Jesus purges the people of their sins, and in the Apocalypse the Lord promises to those who overcome that they shall receive a stone and on it a new name written. And it seems to me that the Septuagint, in translating it as ■νθράκx, meant the same thing as the others. For ■νθράξ, which we interpret as a carbuncle, is a type of shining and glittering stone, which we also find among the twelve stones. Therefore, whether we accept it as a calculus or a carbuncle stone, in the calculus of divine discourse there is truth and rigor, and in the shining carbuncle, doctrine is shown and revealed. "The words of the Lord are pure words, like silver tried in a furnace on the earth, purified seven times" (Ps. 12:6). And elsewhere: "The commandment of the Lord is clear, enlightening the eyes" (Ps. 19:8). As for what is said, "He had a coal in his hand," we should understand the work of his hands, as in "In the hand of the tongue is death and life" (Prov. 18:21); and in the Psalm: "They will fall by the sword in their hands" (Ps. 63:10). Or indeed, a hand appeared truly, so that the Prophet would not be afraid, by the likeness of a human form, when he sees the hand reaching out: in the same way we have seen God himself and the Angels change into human forms, so that fear would be removed from those who saw them.

19. Septuagint: And he said, behold your lips have touched this, and your iniquities shall be taken away, and your sins shall be cleansed. Aquila: Behold, these lips have touched you, and your iniquity shall depart, and your sin shall be propitiated. Other translators agree with Aquila's words. First, it is necessary for our lips to be touched; then, when they have been touched, iniquity is driven away; and when iniquity has been driven away, the Lord will be propitiated, because there is forgiveness with Him, and according to the Apostle: He himself is the propitiation for our sins. But with our sins having been cleansed, we will hear the voice of the Lord saying: Whom shall I send? And we will answer: Here I am, send me.

20. Septuagint: And I heard the voice of the Lord saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go to this people? Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus: And I heard the voice of the Lord saying, Whom shall I send? and who will go for us? We have discussed elsewhere the comparison between Isaiah and Moses, how one refused the ministry and the other offered himself voluntarily and endured hardships. But lest we seem to have omitted anything from those which the Jews call the "second books" and in which they place all knowledge, we will briefly touch upon why it is written in Hebrew, "who will go for us?" For just as it is said in Genesis, "Let us make man in our image and likeness" (Gen. 1:26), so here, I think, it is said, "who will go for us?" But for whom else should we consider ourselves, if not for the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, to whom everyone goes who follows their will? And in this, in that the voice of one speaker is proposed, there is a unity of divinity. But in that which is said 'to us,' a diversity of persons is indicated. We read in the Song of Songs the voice of the bridegroom saying to the bride: Arise, come, my love, my fair one, my dove: for winter is now past, the rain is over and gone. (Cant. 5.2). For when the soul feels tranquility in thought, when it is founded upon a rock, and its faith is fixed with deep roots, all the waves of temptation pass over it, and do not pass over him who is tempted. Note, however, how the Prophet responded in part to what the Lord had said, "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" Behold, I, send me," and was silent about the following, understanding that no man was worthy to go to God and make all his way his own, who sent him. The Lord, observing this humility, that he regarded himself as unworthy of the second place, commanded the following, saying: Go.

21. Septuagint: And he said, "Here I am, send me." Aquila and Theodotion: "Here I am, send me." Symmachus: Behold, send me. God, who calls those things that are not as though they were, and who said, "I am who I am"; and elsewhere, "He who is sent me" (Exodus 3.14), whoever he calls, he immediately causes to exist. This is sufficiently clear from the examples in the living Matthew the Evangelist and in Lazarus, who was dead for four days: as soon as they are called by the Lord, he left the tomb of greed, and the latter left his death (Mark 2, Luke 5, and John 11). For everything that is not with him is not. Wherefore, the Prophet, having been purged of faults, dared to say, "Behold, I am"; although in Latin codices, because of the variation of interpreters, "I am" is not added. Some think it should be noted to whom the speech of the sender or the sent is directed, which in Greek is called "Apostle." And they want this to be the difference: that whoever is sent is equally a Prophet and an Apostle; but those to whom the sender's speech is not given are only Prophets: which I think is superfluous. And because we once came to treat of this word, it should be known that Silas, a colleague of Paul, is called an Apostle in the Hebrew language, who writes some Epistles with him. And it is mistakenly read Silvanus for Silas, since we do not read Silvanus in the Acts of the Apostles.

Letters - letter_019

Letter 19. From Pope Damasus. A letter from Damasus to Jerome, in which he asks for an explanation of the word "Hosanna" (a.d. 383). The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

What does Hosanna signify among the Hebrews, he asks to be clearly explained to himself. To his most beloved son Hieronymus, Damasus the bishop wishes health in the Lord. When I read the commentaries of our orthodox men, in Greek or Latin, on the interpretation of the Gospel, and recently written on that which is read, Hosanna to the Son of David (Matth. 21. 9); they not only differ, but also contradict each other. It is your desire that with that fervent zeal of yours, with opinions cut off and ambiguities removed, you write with a living sense what is meant among the Hebrews; that, as well as many others, you may give thanks in Christ Jesus on our behalf.

Letters - letter_020

Letter 20. To Pope Damasus.

Jerome's reply to the foregoing. Exposing the error of Hilary of Poitiers, who supposed the expression to signify "redemption of the house of David," he goes on to show that in the gospels it is a quotation from cxviii. 25 and that its true meaning is "save now" (so A.V.). "Let us," he writes, "leave the streamlets of conjecture and return to the fountain-head. It is from the Hebrew writings that the truth is to be drawn." Written at Rome a.d. 383. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

What the voice of Hosanna signifies according to the Hebrew source, and why this Hebrew word, as it is among the Hebrews, has been left among all languages, it teaches.

1. Various interpretations.— Many have invented different meanings for this phrase, of which our Hilary in his Commentary on Matthew (c. 21. n. 3) stated as follows: Hosanna is expressed in Hebrew and means "redemption of the house of David." First, redemption in the Hebrew language is interpreted as Pheduth: then, the house of David has not been omitted in this place, as is clear to everyone. Others have thought that Hosanna signifies "glory." This glory is called Chabod; but some call it grace, since grace is called Thoda or Anna.

2. It is necessary to go back to the Hebrew source. Therefore, omitting the streams of opinions, we must return to the source from which the Evangelists took it. For, just as we cannot find this in any Greek or Latin codices: "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets: He shall be called a Nazarene" (Matt. 2:23), and this: "Out of Egypt I have called My son" (Ibid. v. 15); so also now the truth must be expressed from the Hebrew codices, from which the common people and especially a concordance of children broke forth into this cry, as Matthew says: "And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying: Hosanna to the son of David: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest" (Matt. 21:9). But Mark put it thus: "And they cried out, saying: Hosanna; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Blessed be the kingdom of our father David that cometh: Hosanna in the highest" (Mark 11:9). But John agrees with the other two in the same voice: "And they cried out, saying: Hosanna: Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, the King of Israel" (John 12:13). Only Luke did not use the word "Hosanna," but in the rest of the interpretation part he agrees: "Blessed be the king who cometh in the name of the Lord: peace in heaven, and glory on high" (Luke 19:38). Therefore, as we have said, the very Hebrew words must be given, and the opinion of all interpreters must be set forth, so that the reader may find for himself, by the reconsideration of all, what he is to think concerning this matter.

3. The opinion of Hebrew interpreters of the text. In the 117th Psalm, where we read "O Lord save me, O Lord cause me to prosper", and "Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord", in Hebrew it is read "Anna Adonai, Osianna, Anna Adonai Aslianna; Baruch Abba Basem Adonai". Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, and the Fifth Edition express it thus, lest we appear to change anything in Latin: "O Lord indeed, save me indeed, O Lord indeed, cause me to prosper indeed, blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord". Only the Sixth Edition with the Septuagint interpreters agrees in such a way that where others have placed "O Lord indeed", they have written "O". And because "Osianna", which we incorrectly say as "Osanna" due to ignorance, is signified by all interpretation as saving or cause to be saved, now it is a concern what "Anna" alone signifies without the added "saving". And it should be known that in this place "Anna" is said three times; and the first and second are written with the same letters, Aleph, Nun, He, but the third is written He, Nun, He. Therefore Symmachus, who had agreed with all the interpretations in the 117th Psalm, in order to give us a clearer understanding, interpreted the 114th Psalm, where it says: "O Lord, deliver my soul," thus: "I beseech you, Lord, deliver my soul." But where the Seventy translated "O" and "he" as "I beseech you," and Aquila and other editions translate as "O indeed," in Hebrew it is written "Anna," but so that it has Aleph at the beginning, not He. From which we realize that if "Anna" is written from Aleph, it means "I beseech"; but if it is written from He, it means a conjunction or interjection which the Greeks put as "indeed" in "soston dè," whose Latin expression does not convey the meaning.

4. But since these minutiae and secrets of this kind of dispute, due to the barbarism of the language as well as the letters, give trouble to the reader, I come to a summary of the explanation, so as to speak of the one hundred and seventeenth Psalm, which manifestly prophesies of Christ and was most frequently read in the synagogues of the Jews, whence it was also better known to the peoples, that these verses are assumed: that he who was promised from the lineage of David, should come to save Israel, with David saying, 'The stone which the builders rejected, has become the head of the corner. It is from the Lord. This is marvelous in our eyes. This is the day which the Lord has made; let us exult and be glad in it. O Lord, save me: O Lord, make me prosper well: Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord. We have blessed you from the house of the Lord: the Lord is God and he has shone upon us ' (Psal. 117. 22. etc.). Therefore, the Scripture of the Evangelists mentions the Pharisees and Scribes being moved by this indignation, that they would see the people understand the prophecy of the Psalm regarding Christ as fulfilled and crying out with Osianna, the son of David, and saying to him: "Do you hear what they are saying?" and Jesus replied to them: "Have you never read: 'Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise?'" (Matthew 21, Luke 19, John 12) confirming the 117th Psalm with the testimony of the 8th Psalm. And as for that which could be easily expressed, "Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord," the Scripture of all the Evangelists agrees. But as for the word "Osianna," since they could not translate it into Greek, as we see happened with "Alleluia" and "Amen," among others, they put the Hebrew word itself, saying "Osianna." Therefore, Luke, who was the most learned in the Greek language of them all, as he was a physician and who wrote his Gospel in Greek for the Greeks, since he saw that he could not convey the sense of the original, received the better course to keep silence on the matter, lest he should raise a question in the mind of the reader.

5. In summary, just as we have in the Latin language certain interjections, such as 'vah' for insulting, and 'heu' for grieving, and when we wish to impose silence, we restrain our breath with clenched teeth and produce only a hiss, sounding 'sith'; so the Hebrews have among other characteristics of their language an interjection, when they want to implore the Lord they put the verb expressing their emotional state and say 'Anna, Domine' which the Septuagint translated as

'o Lord'. Therefore, 'Osi' means 'save us'; 'Anna' is the interjection of the suppliant. If you want to make a compound word from these two, you will say 'Osianna', or as we say, 'Osanna', with the middle vowel letter removed; as we usually do in the verses of Virgil, when we climb up for a fallen attempt on the spirit and say 'men incoepto'. For Aleph, the first letter of the following word, coming after the final letter of the preceding word Ain, excludes it. Therefore, if we return to the question's origin, where we read in Latin, "O Lord, save me; O Lord, please me well: blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord", according to the Hebrew sense, we can read: "I pray, Lord, save me; I pray, Lord, prosper, I pray: Blessed is he who comes in the name of the Lord." Now "Save", it is said, so that we may understand your people Israel, or the world in general. Finally Matthew, who wrote the Gospel in Hebrew, put it thus, "Osanna Barrama", which means "Hosanna in the highest": which, when the Savior is born, salvation reaches up to heaven, that is, peace is made not only on earth but also in heaven, so that it may finally be said: "My sword has been drunk in heaven" (Isaiah 34.5).

6. I have briefly and succinctly described these things, in accordance with the mediocrity of my understanding. However, let your Grace know that no annoyance should arise in reading these types of discussions; for we could easily have made up something that would solve the question with one word, as we have shown others have done. Rather, it is more appropriate to labor for the sake of truth and to attune our ears to a foreign language, than to give a fictitious opinion from another language.

Letters - letter_021

Letter 21. To Damasus In this letter Jerome, at the request of Damasus, gives a minutely detailed explanation of the parable of the prodigal son. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. The questioning of your blessedness was a debate: and by asking questions, seeking the way was to give to the questions asked. Indeed, to the one who questions wisely, wisdom will be thought. You ask, "Who is this father in the Gospel who divides substance between two sons (Luke 15)? Who are the two sons? Who is older? Who is younger? How does the younger son waste the substance received with harlots? When he was hungry, he is appointed to the pigs and eats carob pods; he returns to his father: he receives a ring and a robe; and a fatted calf is sacrificed to him? Who the elder brother is, and how he envies his brother's acceptance? and other things which are more fully explained in the Gospel. You add moreover: I know that many have said different things on this reading: and have believed that the elder brother was a Jew and the younger brother a Gentile. But I ask, how can it be applied to the Jewish people: Behold, I have served you for so many years, and have never transgressed your commandment, and you have never given me a kid, that I might feast with my friends. And that: Son, you are always with me, and all that is mine is yours. But, as you say, if we wish to make a parable about the just and the sinner, the just one cannot agree, that he would be saddened by the salvation of another, and especially of a brother. For if by the envy of the devil, death entered into the world; and those who are on his side imitate him, will the person of the just one be able to be adapted by such an enormous envy, that he stood outside, and obstinately resisted to the most merciful Father; and he alone, tormented by bitterness, did not want to participate in the joy of the house?

2. Therefore, just as in other parables which are not explained by the Savior, for what reason they were said, we are accustomed to inquire, so we must do in this one, why the Lord broke forth into words of this kind, and for what reason the likeness of an answer was offered. The scribes and the Pharisees murmured, saying, "Why does he receive sinners and eat with them?" (Luke 15:2) For the previous discourse had said, "Now the tax collectors and sinners were all gathering around to hear Jesus." Thus from this comes all their envy because the Lord did not avoid the company and banquet of those whom the precepts of the Law would condemn. And this is what Luke writes. Moreover, Matthew speaks thus: "While Jesus was having dinner at Matthew's house, many tax collectors and sinners came and ate with him and his disciples." (Matthew 9:10) When the Pharisees saw this, they said to his disciples, "Why does your teacher eat with tax collectors and sinners?" On hearing this, Jesus said, "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. But go and learn what this means: 'I desire mercy, not sacrifice.' For I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners." Mark also agrees in the same words. Therefore, as we said, every question arose from the Law. For the Law, in fact, was tenacious of justice, but had no mercy: But whoever was an adulterer, a murderer, a fraudster, and, to briefly say, was held by a mortal crime, was not released from the crime, he was ordered to pay an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, a life for a life (Exod. 21). Therefore, all had turned away, at the same time they became useless: there was no one who did good, there was not even one (Psal. 13). "Where sin abounded, grace abounded even more." (Rom. 3:20). And, "God sent his son made of a woman" (Gal. 4:4), who, destroying the middle wall, made both one (Ephes. 2:2), and the severity of the Law was tempered by the grace of the Gospel. Hence Paul, writing to the Churches: "Grace to you," he said, "and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 1): grace which was not recompensed according to merit, but granted by the giver. But peace, by which we are reconciled to God, having the propitiator, our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave us our debts; and he erased the handwriting of death, which was against us, affixing it to the cross; and made a show of the principalities and powers, triumphing over them on the wood. But what greater mercy can there be, than for the Son of God, the Son of Man to be born? that He should endure the annoyances of ten months, (that) He should expect His birth, be wrapped in swaddling-clothes, be subject to (His) parents, pass through all ages, (and) after reproaches of words and blows and lashes, should also be made a curse for us upon the cross, so that He might absolve us from the curse of the law; (that) having become obedient to the Father even to death, He might accomplish in His works, what He had before besought as mediator, saying: "Father, I will that where I am, they also whom Thou hast given Me may be with Me; that they may see My glory which Thou hast given Me, because Thou hast loved Me before the foundation of the world" (John 17:24). Therefore, because He had come to accomplish what was impossible to the Law, since no one was justified by it, (oh) unpseakable mercy!, He called publicans and sinners to repentance, even seeking their company, so that they would be taught in their company; as anyone can understand who reads the Gospels with a careful mind, how His food and drink, His walking and His actions in His body brought about the salvation of mankind. Seeing this, the Scribes and Pharisees accused Him of breaking the Law: "Behold, a gluttonous man and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners" (Matthew 11:19). For before this, they reprimanded Him as to why He cared about (the healing) on the Sabbath. Therefore, the Lord, in order to overcome their accusation with a merciful argument, proposed three parables, one of which, there were ninety-nine sheep that were left in the mountains, and one that was lost, was carried back on the shoulders of the shepherd; another, of a drachma, which a woman searched for with a lighted lamp, and having found it, she invited her neighbors to rejoice, saying: "Rejoice with me, for I have found the drachma which I had lost" (Luke 15:9). And the third, of the two sons, about which you ordered me to say a few words.

3. And indeed, concerning the sheep and the drachma, although they may be understood as referring to one thing, there is not a debate about this of the time; it suffices to say only this, that these parables were proposed because, just as the joy of the angels is in the recovery of the sheep and the drachma and those who live nearby, so in the repentance of the tax collectors and sinners, there ought to be joy for all those for whom repentance is not necessary. Hence, I greatly wonder about Tertullian in that book that he wrote against repentance titled "On Purity," and he dissolves an old opinion with a novel perspective, as if he wanted to mean that the tax collectors and sinners who dined with the Lord were gentiles, the Scripture stating, "There shall be no tribute taken from Israelites" (Deut. 23:18, according to the LXX). [He acts] as if Matthew was not himself a Jewish tax collector, and that the one who, while praying with the Pharisee in the temple, dared not raise his eyes to heaven, was not a Jewish tax collector. [He acts] as if Luke did not state, "And all the people hearing, and the publicans, justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John" (Luke 7:29), or as if it could not be believed that he entered a gentile temple or had a banquet with gentiles, especially since that would have appeared to violate the law. Indeed, he first went to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and he also answered a Canaanite woman praying for her daughter's health: "It is not fair to take the children's bread and throw it to the dogs." And elsewhere, he commanded his disciples not to enter into the way of the gentiles or into the cities of the Samaritans (Matthew 10:5). We are taught from all these that in publicans, not only of the Gentiles, but generally of all sins, that is, those who were both from the Gentiles and from the Jews, persons can be accepted. However, he who defended the insanity and blasphemy of his women, with that doctrine by which he would not receive repentant Christians, argued in vain that the publicans were not Jews, so that only the Gentile people could be understood in their person. Therefore, lest I make it long, I will present the words of the Gospel itself; and in the manner of a commentary, I will append to each individual thing what seems to me.

4. A certain man had two sons (Luke 15:11). That God is called man is approved by many testimonies, such as: "The testimony of two men is true. I testify about myself, and the Father who sent me testifies about me" (John 10:17-18). In one parable, he is called a shepherd, in another a head of a household; in another he leases a vineyard; in another he invites to a wedding feast, and by different similitudes, he signifies the same thing, to reprove the pride of the Jews and to approve the penance of all sinners, whether Gentiles or Israelites in common. The fact that he says, "two sons," nearly all the Scriptures are full of the sacraments of the calling of two peoples.

5. "And the younger of them said to his father: Father, give me the portion of substance that falleth to me. " The substance of God is everything that we live, understand, think, and speak. God has equally given all of these things to all and in general, the Evangelist says: "There was a true light, which enlighteneth every man that cometh into this world" (John 1:9). This is the right eye, which must be observed against scandals: this is the lamp of the body: this is the talent that is not to be collected in a shroud, that is, handled delicately and idly; nor buried in the earth, that is, obscured by earthly thoughts.

6. He who divided their substance. In Greek it is read more significantly as 'divided life among them', that is, he gave them free will, gave them the freedom of their own minds, and so that each one might live not by the command of God but by his own obedience, that is, not by necessity, but by choice, that virtue might have a place, that we might differ from the other animals, and, as an example to us from God, we are permitted to do what we wish. Thus fair judgement is rendered on sinners, and just reward on the holy and just.

7. How are we with God, or depart from Him. - And not many days after, having gathered all things together, the younger son went abroad into a far country. If God holds the heavens in the palm, and the earth in a fist; and Jeremiah says, God is coming close: and not a God from afar (Jerem. 23): also through David, because no place exists without him, is proclaimed; how does a son go abroad and depart from his father? Therefore it must be understood, not by distance of places, but by affection, whether we are with God, or depart from Him. For even as He speaks to His disciples: Behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world (Matth. 28.20): so He says to those who prefer their own boasting and do not merit being with the Lord. Depart from me, I never knew you, who operate iniquity (Ibid. 7. 23).

8. Therefore, the younger son departed with all his substance from his father, and went abroad. And Cain, departing from the face of the Lord, dwelt in the land of Nod, which is interpreted as shaking. Whoever departs from God is immediately shaken by the waves of the world, and his feet are moved. For after men from the east were moved and departed from the true light, then they, against God, built the tower of impiety; then they fabricated the arrogance of dogmas, desiring to penetrate the heights of heaven without lawful curiosity. And that place was called Babel, meaning confusion.

9. And there he squandered his wealth, living in luxury. Lust is hostile to God, hostile to virtues, it destroys all the substance of the father; and now gratifying the senses, it does not allow him to consider future poverty.

10. And when he had spent everything, a severe famine arose in that country. He had received the faculties from his father that he might apprehend by the visible things the invisible things of God, and consequently apprehend the Creator by the beauty of creatures; but he who holds the truth captive in injustice and worships idols in place of the Creator consumed all those goods of nature: And when he had consumed all these things, he began to lack virtues, having abandoned the fountain of virtues. A severe famine arose in that region. Every place that we inhabit without our Father is a place of hunger, scarcity, and want. But this region in particular is characterized by extreme famine, of which the Prophet says: "You who dwell in the region of the shadow of death, a light shall shine upon you" (Isaiah 9:2). But there is another region, which we will possess if we live with a pure heart in the world, which Saint David desires, saying: "I believe I shall see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living" (Psalm 26:13).

11. And he began to lack [necessities], and went away, and joined himself to one of the rulers of that region. Deserting the nurse, who at the first call had lavished all good things upon him, he joined the ruler of this world, that is, the Devil, the master of darkness. Whom Scripture now terms an enemy of men, now a judge of iniquity, now a dragon, now Satan, now a hammer, now a partridge, now Belial, now a roaring lion, now Leviathan, now Thannin, now Behemoth, and by many other names. But when it is said he joined himself to one of the rulers, it is to be understood that there are many, who fly through the air by his agency and bring human beings under their dominion through the vice he inspires in them.

12. Who sent him into his field to feed swine. The pigs are unclean animals, which delight in filth and dirt. Such is the multitude of demons, which is nourished through idols made by the blood of the cattle and victims; and at last, being fattened by some sort of offering, it is satiated by the death of a man himself. He sent him therefore into his possession, that is, he made him his servant, to feed swine, sacrificing his own soul to him.

13. And he desired to fill his stomach with the husks that the swine did eat; and no man gave unto him. In this, we see fulfilled what is said with reproach to Jerusalem in Ezekiel: And it is come to pass in thee, beyond the sins of thy youth, and beyond thy fornications which thou hast committed with the Egyptians, thou hast prostituted thyself to another, and wast not satisfied with this. In the parable of the prodigal son, he lost his substance in a far country and, after squandering his possessions, was sent to feed swine and fell into destitution. The food of demons is drunkenness, lust, fornication, and all vices. These are pleasing and sensual, and soothe the senses with pleasure; and as soon as they appear, they provoke the desire for them. Therefore, the lustful youth could not be satisfied, because pleasure always has hunger; and once it is fulfilled, it does not satisfy. And when Satan deceives someone by his cunning and imposes his own yoke upon him, he does not seek to increase the abundance of his vices, knowing that he is already dead, just as we see many idolaters who are exhausted by misery and destitution. Here is where the prophetic saying is fulfilled: "All prostitutes receive payment, but you have given your gifts to all your lovers, bribing them to come to you from everywhere for your sexual favors. So in your prostitution, you are the opposite of others; no one runs after you for your favors. You are the very opposite, for you give payment and none is given to you." (Ezekiel 16:33) But we can also interpret these things in another way. The food of demons is the poems of the poets, secular wisdom, the showy speech of rhetoricians. All these things delight with their own charm, and while the ears are captivated by versified sweetness, they also penetrate the soul and subdue the innermost heart. However, once they have been read with the utmost zeal and labor, they give their readers nothing other than empty sound and the noise of words. No satiety of truth is found there, no refreshment of righteousness. Those who study them persist in a hunger for truth and a dearth of virtues. This wisdom is portrayed in Deuteronomy under the image of a captive woman, who, if she is to become the wife of an Israelite, must have her hair shaved, her nails pared, and her clothes exchanged, and must mourn for her parents for a month, after which she belongs to the captor. If we understand these things according to the letter, are they not ridiculous? And so we also do, when we read the philosophers, when books of secular wisdom come into our hands, if we find anything useful in them, we convert it to our dogma: but if anything is superfluous, about idols, about love, about the care of secular things, we weed them out, we induce baldness from them, we treat them like we would our fingernails with a sharp iron. Whence also the Apostle prohibits that someone should recline at the table with idols, saying: "But take heed lest perhaps this your liberty become a stumbling block to the weak. For if a man see him that hath knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not his conscience, being weak, be emboldened to eat those things which are sacrificed to idols? And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ hath died." (1 Cor. 8: 9) Does it not seem to you to say in other words, do not read the philosophers, orators, poets; nor do we delight when we read what is written, if we do not believe it, since it wounds the conscience of others, and we are thought to approve of what we do not reject as we read it? Otherwise what will it be, that we may think that his Apostle, who ate in the idol's temple, approved his conscience, and called perfect the one who knew to eat of things immolated to idols? It is unlikely that a Christian mouth will utter, "Almighty Jupiter; and me, Hercules, and me, Castor," or any more monstrous thing than deity. But now we already see the priests of God, ignoring the Gospels and the Prophets, read comedies, sing the words of amorous Bucolics, embrace Virgil. And that which is a necessity in children, let it not become a source of pleasure and a sin in ourselves. Therefore, we must beware that, if we want to have a captive wife, we do not recline in the idol's temple; or if we are surely deceived by her love, we purify her and cleanse her of every error of filth, so that a brother for whom Christ died does not suffer scandal when he hears hymns composed in praise of idols being sung by a Christian mouth.

14. The hired workers - 'And he said, I will arise and go to my father, and will say to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee; I am not worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants.' We understand the hired workers, according to another interpretation, to be the Jews who keep the precepts of the Law for only the sake of present blessings. These are just and merciful not because of justice itself or the very goodness of mercy, but to obtain from God earthly happiness and a long life. Whoever desires these things is deservedly compelled to obey precepts, lest by disregarding what is commanded, he be deprived of what he desires. Moreover, where there is fear, there is no love. Perfect love, indeed, casts out fear. For he who loves obeys not because he is compelled by fear of punishment or by the desire for reward, but because what is commanded by God is itself the best. Therefore, the meaning is this: 'How many of the Jews do not depart from the service of God for only present blessings, and I am worn out by poverty.'

15. "Rising, I will go to my father." He said beautifully, rising: indeed, he had not remained with his father absent. To lie down is for sinners, to stand is for the righteous. It is said to Moses, "But you stand here with me" (Deut. 5:31). And in the hundred and thirty-third Psalm: "Behold, now bless the Lord, all you servants of the Lord, who stand in the house of the Lord," the Prophet exhorts those standing for the blessing of the Lord in the house of the Lord.

16. "And I will say to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, I am not worthy to be called thy son." He had sinned against heaven who had abandoned his heavenly mother Jerusalem. He had sinned before the Father who, in the desert where the Creator had been worshiped with wood, had shown reverence. He was not worthy to be called the Son of God who had preferred to be a servant of idols. "For every one that doth evil, hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, that his works may not be reprov'd." (1 John 3:20)

17. Make me as one of your hired servants," he said. "Make me," he continued, "as one of the Jews, who revere you only for the sake of present things promised to them. Receive the repentant son, whom you have often spared, though he has sinned like your other hired servants.

18. "And he came to his own father." We come to the father, when we depart from the feeding of swine, according to: "As soon as you turn back and lament, you will be saved." (Ezekiel 18).

19. And when he was still far away, his father saw him and was moved with compassion. Before he returned to his old father with worthy deeds and true repentance, God, with whom all things are already done in the future, and who knows all future things, anticipates his coming with his Word, who took on flesh from the Virgin, and anticipates the return of his younger son.

20. "And he ran before and laid himself upon his neck." He came to the ground before he entered the house of confession. He laid himself upon his neck, that is, took on a human body. And just as John was reclining on the chest of Jesus (John 13), who was a partaker of his secrets, so he placed his light yoke, that is, his easy precepts of commandments, more by grace than by merit, upon the younger son.

21. "And he kissed him;" according to that which the Church prays for in the advent of the bridegroom in the Song of Songs: "Let him kiss me with the kiss of his mouth" (Song of Solomon 1:1). I do not want, he says, that through Moses, I do not want him to speak through the prophets: let him take my body, let him kiss me in the flesh: so that we may also adhere to this idea which is written in Isaiah: "If you seek, seek: and come and dwell with me in the grove" (Isaiah 21:12, according to LXX). And there, indeed, the Church is commanded to cry out, weeping from Seir; for Seir is interpreted as shaggy and hairy: to represent the ancient horror of the Gentiles, with a like similitude answering: "I am black, but comely, ye daughters of Jerusalem" (Song of Solomon 1:4).

22. "But the son said to him: Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee, I am not worthy to be called thy son." He says he is not worthy to be called a son, and yet from the voice of nature, from that substance which the father had once bestowed upon him, he bursts forth trembling with the truth, saying, "Father, I have sinned against heaven." Therefore, some argue in vain that the name "Father" only applies to saints; for here he even calls God Father, who confesses himself unworthy of the name of son, unless, perchance, he dares to call him father because he is turned around in his mind.

23. But the father said to his servants: Bring forth quickly the first robe, and put it on him; the robe, which Adam lost by sinning, the robe which in another parable is called the wedding garment (Matthew 22), that is, the clothing of the Holy Spirit, which he who does not have, cannot attend the banquet of the king.

24. "And give the ring in his hand; the signet-ring of the likeness of Christ, according to that: In whom believing, you were signed with the Holy Spirit of promise. (Ephes. 1: 13). And to the prince of Tyre, who had lost the likeness of the Creator, it is said: You are the signet-ring of likeness, and the crown of beauty, born in the delights of the paradise of God. (Ezech. 28. 12-13) . Isaiah also speaks of this signet-ring: Then they shall manifest who are signed. This signet-ring is given in hand when the Scripture signifies the works of justice. For there: The word of the Lord was made into the hand of the prophet Haggai, saying to Jerusalem: I adorned you, says he, with ornaments, and I put bracelets around your hands. (Ezech. 16. 11). Again, to him who is clothed in a field, another place of the signet-ring is shown: Walk through the midst of Jerusalem, and give the signet-ring on the foreheads of the men who groan and mourn over all the iniquities that are committed in the midst of them. (Ibid. 9. 4) . Why? So that they may then say: The light of thy face, Lord, is signed upon us." (Psal. 4. 7).

25. "And his footwear on his feet. For the bridegroom had lost his dignity, and he could not celebrate Easter without shoes on his bare feet. These are the shoes that the Lord speaks of: 'And I clothed you with embroidered work, and shod you with seal skin, ... and shod your feet with shoes of badgers' skin' (Ezek. 16:10). so that He could be prepared for the Gospel of peace, no longer walking according to the flesh, but according to the spirit. And the prophetic word would come true about him: 'How beautiful are the feet of those announcing good news, of those announcing peace.'" (Isaiah 52:7)

26. And bring a fatted calf, and kill it, and let us eat and make merry: Because this my son was dead, and is come to life again: was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry. The fatted calf which is sacrificed for the penitent's health is the very Savior Himself, whose flesh we feed on daily, and whose blood we drink. You will understand, O faithful reader, how in our very fullness we burst forth in praise, saying: 'My heart hath uttered a good word, I speak my works to the King' (Ps. xlv. 1); although some, with more superstition than truth, apply these words to the Father's person. Now when it is said, 'Let us eat and make merry, because this my son was dead,' etc., this is connected with the meaning of the above parable, where it is said: 'I say to you, there shall be joy before the angels of God upon one sinner doing penance.'

27. "And they began to feast." This banquet is celebrated daily, and every day the father receives his son; Christ is always offered to believers.

28. Moreover, the elder son was in the field. » Up to now, the debate has been concerning the younger son, whom, in accordance with the present parable, we should take to represent publicans and sinners who were called to repentance by the Lord; but, according to the mystical meaning, the parable also prophesies of the calling of the Gentiles in the future. Now we pass to the elder son, whom many interpret simply as representing all the saints and others more specifically as referring to the Jews. The interpretation is not difficult regarding the saints in the statement, "Never have I disobeyed your command," although this seems to conflict with his unwillingness to welcome back his brother. However, in relation to the Jews, his envy over his brother's salvation conflicts with the statement, "I have never disobeyed your command." We shall try to explain what we think concerning the Jews in its proper place. "Moreover, the elder son was in the field," toiling in earthly works, far from the grace of the Holy Spirit, and banished from his father's counsel. This is the one who says, "I have purchased a field, and must needs go out and see it: I pray thee, have me excused" (Luke 14:18). This is the one who buys five yoke of oxen and, weighed down by the burden of the Law, is enjoying the pleasures of earthly desires. This is the one who, though married, cannot go to the wedding feast, and whose fleshly state cannot be one with the Spirit. In his person, the laborers in that parable also fit, wherein the ones who were called at the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours, that is, through various callings, are sent to the vineyard, and the ones called at the eleventh hour are indignant at being made equal to them.

29. "And when he came near to the house, he heard music and singing." This phrase which is written as the heading of one of the Psalms (Psalm 46), fits this meaning. For Meleth is said to mean chorus singing together. But some Latins mistakenly believe that symphony is a type of instrument, when in fact it signifies a harmonious agreement in the praises of God, expressed in the Latin word, "consonance".

30. "And he called one of the boys and asked what these things were." And now Israel asks why God rejoices in the assumption of the Gentiles, and in envy he cannot know the will of the Father.

31. And he said to him: 'Because thy brother is come, and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe.' The cause of joy, that is sung in the praises of God throughout the whole world, is the salvation of the Gentiles, the salvation of sinners: the angels rejoice: every creature agrees in joy; and of Israel alone it is said:

32. However, he did not want to enter, being angry. He is angry that his brother was received in his absence, he is angry that the one whom he thought was dead is alive. And now Israel stands outside, and now while the disciples listen to the Gospel in the church, his mother and brothers stand outside seeking him (Matthew 12).

33. "But the father of him, having gone out, began to beg him." How kind and gentle the father is; he begs his son to become a partaker of the joy of the house: moreover, the father begs through the Apostles, he begs through the preachers of the Gospel. Among whom Paul says, "For Christ, we urge you to be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:20). And elsewhere, "But because you have rejected it, and judged yourselves unworthy of eternal life, behold, we turn to the Gentiles" (Acts 13:46).

34. But he answering, said to his father: Behold, for many years do I serve thee, and I have never transgressed thy commandment, and yet thou hast never given me a kid to make merry with my friends. The suppliant father entreats for concord, but he who follows the justice which is in the law, is not subject to the justice of God, which is greater than to forgive the penitent, and to receive the returning son. "Behold, for many years do I serve thee, and I have never transgressed thy commandment," as if it were not a transgression of the commandment to envy the salvation of another, to boast of justice before God, when no one is clean before Him. For who will rejoice in having a pure heart even if it is for only one day? David confesses: "Behold I was conceived in iniquities; and in sins did my mother conceive me" (Ps. 50.7). And elsewhere: "If thou, O Lord, wilt mark iniquities, Lord, who shall stand it?" (Ps. 129.3). And here he says that he has never transgressed the commandment, even though he had been delivered to captivity many times for idolatry. "Behold, for many years do I serve thee, and I have never transgressed thy commandment." This is what the Apostle Paul speaks of: "What shall we say then? That the Gentiles, who followed not after justice, have attained to justice, even the justice that is of faith." But Israel, by pursuing the law of righteousness, has not attained to the law of righteousness. Why? Because they did not pursue it by faith, but as if it were based on works of the law. It can therefore be said of someone who, according to the same Apostle, has lived without censure in the righteousness that comes from the law; although it seems to me that the Jew boasts more than speaks the truth, following the example of the Pharisee who said, 'I thank thee that I am not like other men, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even like this tax collector' (Luke 18.11). Do you not think that what he said of the publican, this one says of his brother? This is the one who eats up all his living with prostitutes. But what he says, 'I have never disobeyed your commandment,' does not agree with what the father said. For he did not confirm as true what the son had said, but restrained him as a person who was angry in another way by saying, 'Son, you are always with me.' 'You are indeed with me,' he said, 'but have you really said all that is good and done all that I have ordered?' But you are with me always. You are with me in the law that you are bound by: you are with me, while you are taught to me both in captivity: you are with me not because you have fulfilled my precepts, but because I have not allowed you to go away into distant lands: you are with me until the very end, according to that which I spoke to David: "If his sons forsake My law, and they do not walk in my judgments; if they profane my justifications and do not keep my commandments, I will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their unjust deeds with stripes. But my mercy will not take away from them" (Ps. 88:31 et seq.). By this testimony, and that in which the elder son boasts, is proven false, when he does not walk in the judgments of God and does not keep His commandments. And how can he not keep them, since he is always said to have been with the Father? While sinning, he is corrected with a rod, and mercy is not denied when he is corrected. Nor is it surprising that he dared to lie to his father, who could envy his brother, especially since on the day of judgment some will lie more shamelessly, saying: "Have we not eaten and drunk in your name, and done many wonderful works, and driven out demons?" (Matt. 7:22) What is proper and relevant to its place will be explained.

35. "And you never gave me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends." "So great," he says, "has been the shedding of Israel's blood, so many thousands of men have been slain, and not one of them has arisen to redeem us. Even Josiah, who pleased you--(2 Kings 22)--and, more recently, the Maccabees, who fought for your inheritance, were slain by the swords of our enemies, and no man's blood restores our freedom to us. Behold we are still subject to the Roman power: not Prophet, nor Priest, nor righteous man has been sacrificed for us. And for the prodigal son, that is, for the Gentiles, for sinners, the glorious blood of the whole creation has been shed. And when you have not given smaller blessings to those who have deserved them, You have bestowed greater ones undeservedly. 'And you never gave me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends.' Israel, you err; say rather, that I might make merry with thee. Or can you have any enjoyment, unless your father celebrate the feast with you? At least learn from his present example. Upon receiving his younger son, both father and son are happy. "Let us eat and feast," he says, "Do not eat and feast." But with the same mind in which you envy your brother, in which you turn away from your father's sight, and are always in the field, even now you want to enter a banquet in his absence. "You never gave me a goat." His father never gives worse gifts: you have a fattened calf: come in, eat with your brother. Why do you seek a goat for which a lamb has been sent? And don't pretend not to know what has been sent, John showed you in the desert: "Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sins of the world" (John 1:29). And the father, as if merciful and giving penance, urges you to the calf, not sacrificing the goat that he knows to be standing to the left. But you in the end of the world, Antichrist himself will immolate you, and with your friends, unclean spirits, you will feast on his flesh, the prophecy fulfilled: "You have broken the head of the great dragon: you have given him food for the people of Ethiopia" (Psalm 73:14).

36. But when your son, who has devoured his substance with harlots, came, you killed the fatted calf for him." Now also Israel confesses that the calf that was slaughtered was fat; they understand that Christ has come, but they are tormented by envy and do not want to be saved after his death.

37. But he said to him, 'Son, you are always with me, and all that is mine is yours.' The son was angry, though not wishing to go in. But how are all things of God the Jews'? Are the angels, thrones, dominations, and other powers? Therefore let us understand all of God's law, prophets, and divine words. These were given to them so that they would meditate on his law day and night, according to that canon which we have often expounded the Scriptures, that all things are not to be referred to the whole, but to the greatest part, as it is said: 'All have turned aside; together they have become worthless' (Ps.13). And elsewhere: 'All who came before me are thieves and robbers' (John 10:8). And Paul to the Corinthians says: 'I have become all things to all people, that by all means I might save some' (1 Cor. 9:22). And to the Philippians: 'For they all seek their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ' (Philippians 2:21). Although we must believe that he never denied anything, who urges the eating of the calf.

38. We should feast and be glad, for this brother of yours was dead, and has come back to life. He was lost, and has been found.' So we too should confidently expect to live by repenting from our dead works, as it were, in the Parable of the Son himself, as well as in the earlier Parables of the Lost Sheep and the Lost Coin, all of which end with illustrations of the same kind. 'For this your brother,' it says, 'was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found.' We are to understand that under different figures, but with the same meaning, is marked the reception of sinners, whether considered as heathen or as Jews.

39. Let us see, however, how this parable can be understood in general about the super saint and the sinner. And it is not disputed that it pertains not only to the just, but also to the non-just. This is what worries the reader who is disturbed, why the just should envy the salvation of the sinner: and to the extent that he is filled with anger, he is not overcome by his brother's mercy, his father's prayers, or the joy of his whole house. To which we will answer briefly: all the justice of this world is not justice compared to God. For just as from the sins of Jerusalem, Sodom is justified, not because it is just, but because greater delinquencies become smaller delinquencies: so also the universal justice of all people is not justice compared to God. Finally, Paul who said, "Therefore, as many as are perfect, let us think this" (Philippians 3:15), confesses and cries out elsewhere: "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and of the knowledge of God! How incomprehensible are His judgments, and how unsearchable His ways!" (Romans 11:33)? And elsewhere, "We know in part, and we prophesy in part"; and, "Now we see through a glass, in an obscure manner" (1 Corinthians 13:9 and 12). And to the Romans, "Miserable man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Romans 7:24) From all of which we are taught that only God is perfect in justice, who causes His sun to rise on the just and the unjust: He gives rain equally to the deserving and the undeserving; who invites to the wedding guests from the byways, lanes, and plazas, and from them expels some who were seemingly safe; and seeks, finds, and brings back on His shoulders the sheep that could not or would not return itself after the example of the penitent son (Luke 15) for it had greatly erred.

40. But that we may be taught that envy may also fall upon the Saints and that pure godliness alone is left to God, let us consider the example of the sons of Zebedee: for when their mother moved by a feeling of piety, had made too lofty a request, the other ten disciples were indignant. And Jesus calling them, said: "You know that the princes of the Gentiles lord it over them; and they that are the greater, exercise power upon them. It shall not be so among you: but whosoever will be the greater among you, let him be your minister: and he that will be first among you, shall be your servant. Even as the Son of man is not come to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life for the redemption of many." (Matthew 20:25 and following). Let nothing be dangerous, let nothing seem blasphemous, what we said could have crept to the evil in the widow, even about the angels we think this is said. "For even the stars are not pure in his sight, and how much less man, who is but a maggot— a son of man, who is only a worm!" (Job 15:15, 25. 6) And in the Psalms it is said: "No living person will be justified in your presence." It does not say, "no person", but "living person", that is, not Evangelist, not Apostle, not a Prophet. As I ascend to greater things, not angels, thrones, dominions, powers and other virtues. Only God is, in whom sin does not fall: since they are of free will, according to which man is made in the image and likeness of God, they can turn their will in either direction. If you are not led by this sentence, at least be moved by its authority in the parable in which workers are sent to the vineyard throughout the day (Matthew 20); and in the first hour Adam, Abel, Seth are called upon; in the third, Noah; in the sixth, Abraham; in the ninth, Moses; and in the eleventh, the Gentile people to whom it is said: "Why do you stand here all day idle?" And they answered, "Because no one has hired us." But John the Apostle bears witness that the last hour of our Savior's coming is at hand, saying, 'Brethren, it is the last hour; and as you have heard that Antichrist cometh, even now there are become many Antichrists: whereby we know that it is the last hour' (1 John 2:18). If this interpretation is displeasing to you, I will follow wherever you lead, provided only that you acknowledge those who were called first to be just. And when I have obtained that point, I will bring forward what the just themselves have murmured against the householder, saying, 'These last have worked but one hour, and thou hast made them equal to us, who have borne the burden of the day and the heat.' They are, indeed, just in saying that they ought to receive equal wages with him who has labored from the first hour even to the end; and should also receive the same pay as he who has been engaged in toil for one hour only. But this very justice is engendered by envy, which repines at another's happiness. And the Lord rebukes the eye of envy, saying, 'Friend, is your eye evil because mine is good?' Hence, too, while all the angels are said to be just, and all are immortal and free from sin, yet the apostle speaks of One only as being Just and Immortal—not because the angels are unjust or mortal, but because He alone is immortal and just, to whom, when we compare all justice, we find that iniquity itself is injustice.

41. But in this same parable that we have just presented, for you to understand the injustice of the hirelings, pay attention for a moment. He who was hired in the first hour deserves more from him who was sent to the vineyard in the third hour; again, the worker of the third hour precedes the worker of the sixth hour, and the worker of the sixth hour outdoes the worker of the ninth hour. How, then, do they all envy the last one and do not seek the same justice among themselves? You, who were hired in the ninth hour, why do you envy him who was sent into the vineyard in the eleventh hour? Whatever you answer, even if you assert that the work was different so that you may deserve a greater reward for a different work, you will still be subject to the same judgment as the one who worked the sixth hour. And you who were hired at the sixth hour, why do you envy the last? Why does he receive a denarius, that is, an equal salvation with you, even though the glory of salvation may differ for different labor? The same thing can be said of you by the third worker, and of the third by the first. But because of the unequal labor and different periods of calling, they willingly accept the same reward among themselves. Only in the case of the last worker, that is, in the salvation of the Gentiles, do they differ and show disrespect to the Lord, and they are convicted of envy in all the parables.

42. I do not doubt that my speech seems unpolished to you, due to the smallness of my abilities; but I have often given the excuse that words cannot be refined unless one's own hand has polished them. Therefore, forgive my pained eyes, that is, forgive the one dictating, especially since, in matters of the church, meaning is sought, not words; that is, life is to be sustained by bread, not by beanpods.

Letters - letter_022

Letter 22. To Eustochium.

Perhaps the most famous of all the letters. In it Jerome lays down at great length (1) the motives which ought to actuate those who devote themselves to a life of virginity, and (2) the rules by which they ought to regulate their daily conduct. The letter contains a vivid picture of Roman society as it then was—the luxury, profligacy, and hypocrisy prevalent among both men and women, besides some graphic autobiographical details (§§7, 30), and concludes with a full account of the three kinds of monasticism then practised in Egypt (§§34-36). Thirty years later Jerome wrote a similar letter to Demetrias (CXXX.), with which this ought to be compared. Written at Rome 384 a.d.

1. "Hear, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people and thy father's house, and the king shall desire thy beauty." [Ps. 45:10, Ps. 45:11] In this forty-fourth psalm God speaks to the human soul that, following the example of Abraham, [Gen. 11:31; Gen. 12:1] it should go out from its own land and from its kindred, and should leave the Chaldeans, that is the demons, and should dwell in the country of the living, for which elsewhere the prophet sighs: "I think to see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living." [Ps. 27:13] But it is not enough for you to go out from your own land unless you forget your people and your father's house; unless you scorn the flesh and cling to the bridegroom in a close embrace. "Look not behind thee," he says, "neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain lest thou be consumed." [Gen. 19:17] He who has grasped the plough must not look behind him [Luke 9:62] or return home from the field, or having Christ's garment, descend from the roof to fetch other raiment. [Matt. 24:17, Matt. 24:18] Truly a marvellous thing, a father charges his daughter not to remember her father. "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father it is your will to do." [John. 8:44, R.V.] So it was said to the Jews. And in another place, "He that committeth sin is of the devil." [1 John. 3:8] Born, in the first instance, of such parentage we are naturally black, and even when we have repented, so long as we have not scaled the heights of virtue, we may still say: "I am black but comely, O ye daughters of Jerusalem." [Cant. 1:5] But you will say to me, "I have left the home of my childhood; I have forgotten my father, I am born anew in Christ. What reward do I receive for this?" The context shows—"The king shall desire thy beauty." This, then, is the great mystery. "For this cause shall a man leave his father and his mother and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be" not as is there said, "of one flesh," [Eph. 5:31, Eph. 5:32] but "of one spirit." Your bridegroom is not haughty or disdainful; He has "married an Ethiopian woman." [Nu. 12:1] When once you desire the wisdom of the true Solomon and come to Him, He will avow all His knowledge to you; He will lead you into His chamber with His royal hand; [Cant. 1:4] He will miraculously change your complexion so that it shall be said of you, "Who is this that goeth up and hath been made white?" [Cant. 8:5, LXX]

2. I write to you thus, Lady Eustochium (I am bound to call my Lord's bride "lady"), to show you by my opening words that my object is not to praise the virginity which you follow, and of which you have proved the value, or yet to recount the drawbacks of marriage, such as pregnancy, the crying of infants, the torture caused by a rival, the cares of household management, and all those fancied blessings which death at last cuts short. Not that married women are as such outside the pale; they have their own place, the marriage that is honorable and the bed undefiled. [Heb. 13:4] My purpose is to show you that you are fleeing from Sodom and should take warning by Lot's wife. [Gen. 19:26] There is no flattery, I can tell you, in these pages. A flatterer's words are fair, but for all that he is an enemy. You need expect no rhetorical flourishes setting you among the angels, and while they extol virginity as blessed, putting the world at your feet.

3. I would have you draw from your monastic vow not pride but fear. [Rom. 11:20] You walk laden with gold; you must keep out of the robber's way. To us men this life is a race-course we contend here, we are crowned elsewhere. No man can lay aside fear while serpents and scorpions beset his path. The Lord says: "My sword hath drunk its fill in heaven," [Isa. 34:5, R.V] and do you expect to find peace on the earth? No, the earth yields only thorns and thistles, and its dust is food for the serpent. [Gen. 3:14, Gen. 3:18] "For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against the principalities, against the powers, against the world-rulers of this darkness, against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places." [Eph. 6:12, R.V] We are hemmed in by hosts of foes, our enemies are upon every side. The weak flesh will soon be ashes: one against many, it fights against tremendous odds. Not till it has been dissolved, not till the Prince of this world has come and found no sin therein,² not till then may you safely listen to the prophet's words: "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the trouble which haunteth thee in darkness; nor for the demon and his attacks at noonday. A thousand shall fall at thy side and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee." [Ps. 91:5-7, Vulg] When the hosts of the enemy distress you, when your frame is fevered and your passions roused, when you say in your heart, "What shall I do?" Elisha's words shall give you your answer, "Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." [2 K. 6:16] He shall pray, "Lord, open the eyes of thine handmaid that she may see." And then when your eyes have been opened you shall see a fiery chariot like Elijah's waiting to carry you to heaven, [2 K. 2:11; 2 K. 6:17] and shall joyfully sing: "Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken and we are escaped." [Ps. 124:7]

4. So long as we are held down by this frail body, so long as we have our treasure in earthen vessels; [2 Cor. 4:7] so long as the flesh lusteth against the spirit and the spirit against the flesh, [Gal. 5:17] there can be no sure victory. "Our adversary the devil goeth about as a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour." [1 Pet. 5:8] "Thou makest darkness," David says, "and it is night: wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth. The young lions roar after their prey and seek their meat from God." [Ps. 104:20, Ps. 104:21] The devil looks not for unbelievers, for those who are without, whose flesh the Assyrian king roasted in the furnace. [Jer. 29:22] It is the church of Christ that he "makes haste to spoil."³ According to Habakkuk, "His food is of the choicest." [Hab. 1:16, LXX] A Job is the victim of his machinations, and after devouring Judas he seeks power to sift the [other] apostles. [Luke 22:31] The Saviour came not to send peace upon the earth but a sword. [Matt. 10:34] Lucifer fell, Lucifer who used to rise at dawn; [Isa. 14:12] and he who was bred up in a paradise of delight had the well-earned sentence passed upon him, "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle, and though thou set thy nest among the stars, thence will I bring thee down, saith the Lord."⁴ For he had said in his heart, "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God," and "I will be like the Most High." [Isa. 14:13, Isa. 14:14] Wherefore God says every day to the angels, as they descend the ladder that Jacob saw in his dream, [Gen. 28:12] "I have said ye are Gods and all of you are children of the Most High. But ye shall die like men and fall like one of the princes." [Ps. 82:6, Ps. 82:7] The devil fell first, and since "God standeth in the congregation of the Gods and judgeth among the Gods," [Ps. 82:1] the apostle writes to those who are ceasing to be Gods-"Whereas there is among you envying and strife, are ye not carnal and walk as men?" [1 Cor. 3:3]

5. If, then, the apostle, who was a chosen vessel [Acts 9:15] separated unto the gospel of Christ, [Gal. 1:15] by reason of the pricks of the flesh and the allurements of vice keeps under his body and brings it into subjection, lest when he has preached to others he may himself be a castaway; [1 Cor. 9:27] and yet, for all that, sees another law in his members warring against the law of his mind, and bringing him into captivity to the law of sin; [Rom. 7:23] if after nakedness, fasting, hunger, imprisonment, scourging and other torments, he turns back to himself and cries "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" [Rom. 7:24] do you fancy that you ought to lay aside apprehension? See to it that God say not some day of you: "The virgin of Israel is fallen and there is none to raise her up." [Am. 5:2] I will say it boldly, though God can do all things He cannot raise up a virgin when once she has fallen. He may indeed relieve one who is defiled from the penalty of her sin, but He will not give her a crown. Let us fear lest in us also the prophecy be fulfilled, "Good virgins shall faint." [Am. 8:13] Notice that it is good virgins who are spoken of, for there are bad ones as well. "Whosoever looketh on a woman," the Lord says, "to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." [Matt. 5:28] So that virginity may be lost even by a thought. Such are evil virgins, virgins in the flesh, not in the spirit; foolish virgins, who, having no oil, are shut out by the Bridegroom. [Matt. 25:3, Matt. 25:10]

6. But if even real virgins, when they have other failings, are not saved by their physical virginity, what shall become of those who have prostituted the members of Christ, and have changed the temple of the Holy Ghost into a brothel? Straightway shall they hear the words: "Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon, sit on the ground; there is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans: for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate. Take the millstone and grind meal; uncover thy locks, make bare the legs, pass over the rivers; thy nakedness shall be uncovered, yea, thy shame shall be seen." [Isa. 47:1-3] And shall she come to this after the bridal-chamber of God the Son, after the kisses of Him who is to her both kinsman and spouse? [Cant. 5:2, LXX] Yes, she of whom the prophetic utterance once sang, "Upon thy right hand did stand the queen in a vesture of gold wrought about with divers colours," [Ps. 45:10, P.B.V] shall be made naked, and her skirts shall be discovered upon her face. [Jer. 13:26] She shall sit by the waters of loneliness, her pitcher laid aside; and shall open her feet to every one that passeth by, and shall be polluted to the crown of her head. [Ezek. 16:25] Better had it been for her to have submitted to the yoke of marriage, to have walked in level places, than thus, aspiring to loftier heights, to fall into the deep of hell. I pray you, let not Zion the faithful city become a harlot: [Isa. 1:21] let it not be that where the Trinity has been entertained, there demons shall dance and owls make their nests, and jackals build. [Isa. 34:15; Isa. 13:22, R.V] Let us not loose the belt that binds the breast. When lust tickles the sense mad the soft fire of sensual pleasure sheds over us its pleasing glow, let us immediately break forth and cry: "The Lord is on my side: I will not fear what the flesh can do unto me." [Pss. 118:6; Pss. 56:4] When the inner man shows signs for a time of wavering between vice and virtue, say: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him who is the health of my countenance and my God." [Ps. 42:11] You must never let suggestions of evil grow on you, or a babel of disorder win strength in your breast. Slay the enemy while he is small; and, that you may not have a crop of tares, nip the evil in the bud. Bear in mind the warning words of the Psalmist: "Hapless daughter of Babylon, happy shall he be that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us. Happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones." [Ps. 137:9] Because natural heat inevitably kindles in a man sensual passion, he is praised and accounted happy who, when foul suggestions arise in his mind, gives them no quarter, but dashes them instantly against the rock. "Now the Rock is Christ." [1 Cor. 10:4]

7. How often, when I was living in the desert, in the vast solitude which gives to hermits a savage dwelling-place, parched by a burning sun, how often did I fancy myself among the pleasures of Rome! I used to sit alone because I was filled with bitterness. Sackcloth disfigured my unshapely limbs and my skin from long neglect had become as black as an Ethiopian's. Tears and groans were every day my portion; and if drowsiness chanced to overcome my struggles against it, my bare bones, which hardly held together, clashed against the ground. Of my food and drink I say nothing: for, even in sickness, the solitaries have nothing but cold water, and to eat one's food cooked is looked upon as self-indulgence. Now, although in my fear of hell I had consigned myself to this prison, where I had no companions but scorpions and wild beasts, I often found myself amid bebies of girls. My face was pale and my frame chilled with fasting; yet my mind was burning with desire, and the fires of lust kept bubbling up before me when my flesh was as good as dead. Helpless, I cast myself at the feet of Jesus, I watered them with my tears, I wiped them with my hair: and then I subdued my rebellious body with weeks of abstinence. I do not blush to avow my abject misery; rather I lament that I am not now what once I was. I remember how I often cried aloud all night till the break of day and ceased not from beating my breast till tranquillity returned at the chiding of the Lord. I used to dread my very cell as though it knew my thoughts; and, stern and angry with myself, I used to make my way alone into the desert. Wherever I saw hollow valleys, craggy mountains, steep cliffs, there I made my oratory, there the house of correction for my unhappy flesh. There, also-the Lord Himself is my witness-when I had shed copious tears and had strained my eyes towards heaven, I sometimes felt myself among angelic hosts, and for joy and gladness sang: "because of the savour of thy good ointments we will run after thee." [Cant. 1:3, Cant. 1:4]

8. Now, if such are the temptations of men who, since their bodies are emaciated with fasting, have only evil thoughts to fear, how must it fare with a girl whose surroundings are those of luxury and ease? Surely, to use the apostle's words, "She is dead while she liveth." [1 Tim. 5:6] Therefore, if experience gives me a right to advise, or clothes my words with credit, I would begin by urging you and warning you as Christ's spouse to avoid wine as you would avoid poison. For wine is the first weapon used by demons against the young. Greed does not shake, nor pride puff up, nor ambition infatuate so much as this. Other vices we easily escape, but this enemy is shut up within us, and wherever we go we carry him with us. Wine and youth between them kindle the fire of sensual pleasure. Why do we throw oil on the flame-why do we add fresh fuel to a miserable body which is already ablaze. Paul, it is true, says to Timothy "drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake, and for thine often infirmities." [1 Tim. 5:23] But notice the reasons for which the permission is given, to cure an aching stomach and a frequent infirmity. And lest we should indulge ourselves too much on the score of our ailments, he commands that but little shall be taken; advising rather as a physician than as an apostle (though, indeed, an apostle is a spiritual physician). He evidently feared that Timothy might succumb to weakness, and might prove unequal to the constant moving to and fro involved in preaching the Gospel. Besides, he remembered that he had spoken of "wine wherein is excess," [Eph. 5:18] and had said, "it is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine." [Rom. 14:21] Noah drank wine and became intoxicated; but living as he did in the rude age after the flood, when the vine was first planted, perhaps he did not know its power of inebriation. And to let you see the hidden meaning of Scripture in all its fulness (for the word of God is a pearl and may be pierced on every side) after his drunkenness came the uncovering of his body; self-indulgence culminated in lust. [Gen. 9:20, Gen. 9:21] First the belly is crammed; then the other members are roused. Similarly, at a later period, "The people sat down to eat and to drink and rose up to play." [Ex. 32:6] Lot also, God's friend, whom He saved upon the mountain, who was the only one found righteous out of so many thousands, was intoxicated by his daughters. And, although they may have acted as they did more from a desire of offspring than from love of sinful pleasure-for the human race seemed in danger of extinction-yet they were well aware that the righteous man would not abet their design unless intoxicated. In fact he did not know what he was doing, and his sin was not wilful. Still his error was a grave one, for it made him the father of Moab and Ammon, [Gen. 19:30-38] Israel's enemies, of whom it is said: "Even to the fourteenth generation they shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord forever."⁵

9. When Elijah, in his flight from Jezebel, lay weary and desolate beneath the oak, there came an angel who raised him up and said, "Arise and eat." And he looked, and behold there was a cake and a cruse of water at his head. [1 K. 19:4-6] Had God willed it, might He not have sent His prophet spiced wines and dainty dishes and flesh basted into tenderness? When Elisha invited the sons of the prophets to dinner, he only gave them field-herbs to eat; and when all cried out with one voice: "There is death in the pot," the man of God did not storm at the cooks (for he was not used to very sumptuous fare), but caused meal to be brought, and casting it in, sweetened the bitter mess [2 K. 4:38-41] with spiritual strength as Moses had once sweetened the waters of Mara. [Exod. 15:23-25] Again, when men were sent to arrest the prophet, and were smitten with physical and mental blindness, that he might bring them without their own knowledge to Samaria, notice the food with which Elisha ordered them to be refreshed. "Set bread and water," he said, "before them, that they may eat and drink and go to their master." [2 K. 6:18-23] And Daniel, who might have had rich food from the king's table, [Dan. 1:8] preferred the mower's breakfast, brought to him by Habakkuk,⁶ which must have been but country fare. He was called "a man of desires," [Dan. 9:23, A.V. marg] because he would not eat the bread of desire or drink the wine of concupiscence.

10. There are, in the Scriptures, countless divine answers condemning gluttony and approving simple food. But as fasting is not my present theme and an adequate discussion of it would require a treatise to itself, these few observations must suffice of the many which the subject suggests. By them you will understand why the first man, obeying his belly and not God, was cast down from paradise into this vale of tears; [Ps. 84:6, R.V] and why Satan used hunger to tempt the Lord Himself in the wilderness; [Matt. 4:2, Matt. 4:3] and why the apostle cries: "Meats for the belly and the belly for meats, but God shall destroy both it and them;" [1 Cor. 6:13] and why he speaks of the self-indulgent as men "whose God is their belly." [Phil. 3:19] For men invariably worship what they like best. Care must be taken, therefore, that abstinence may bring back to Paradise those whom satiety once drove out.

11. You will tell me, perhaps, that, high-born as you are, reared in luxury and used to lie softly, you cannot do without wine and dainties, and would find a stricter rule of life unendurable. If so, I can only say: "Live, then, by your own rule, since God's rule is too hard for you." Not that the Creator and Lord of all takes pleasure in a rumbling and empty stomach, or in fevered lungs; but that these are indispensable as means to the preservation of chastity. Job was dear to God, perfect and upright before Him; [Job 2:3] yet hear what he says of the devil: "His strength is in the loins, and his force is in the navel." [Job 40:16, of behemoth] The terms are chosen for decency's sake, but the reproductive organs of the two sexes are meant. Thus, the descendant of David, who, according to the promise is to sit upon his throne, is said to come from his loins. [Ps. 132:11] And the seventy-five souls descended from Jacob who entered Egypt are said to come out of his thigh. [Gen. 46:26] So, also, when his thigh shrank after the Lord had wrestled with him, [Gen. 32:24, Gen. 32:25] he ceased to beget children. The Israelites, again, are told to celebrate the passover with loins girded and mortified. [Exod. 12:11] God says to Job: "Gird up thy loins as a man." [Job. 38:3] John wears a leathern girdle. [Matt. 3:4] The apostles must gird their loins to carry the lamps of the Gospel. [Luke 12:35] When Ezekiel tells us how Jerusalem is found in the plain of wandering, covered with blood, he uses the words: "Thy navel has not been cut." [Ezek. 16:4-6] In his assaults on men, therefore, the devil's strength is in the loins; in his attacks on women his force is in the navel.

12. Do you wish for proof of my assertions? Take examples. Sampson was braver than a lion and tougher than a rock; alone and unprotected he pursued a thousand armed men; and yet, in Delilah's embrace, his resolution melted away. David was a man after God's own heart, and his lips had often sung of the Holy One, the future Christ; and yet as he walked upon his housetop he was fascinated by Bathsheba's nudity, and added murder to adultery.⁷ Notice here how, even in his own house, a man cannot use his eyes without danger. Then repenting, he says to the Lord: "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned and done this evil in Thy sight." [Ps. 51:4] Being a king he feared no one else. So, too, with Solomon. Wisdom used him to sing her praise,⁸ and he treated of all plants "from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall;" [1 K. 4:33] and yet he went back from God because he was a lover of women.⁹ And, as if to show that near relationship is no safeguard, Amnon burned with illicit passion for his sister Tamar.¹⁰

13. I cannot bring myself to speak of the many virgins who daily fall and are lost to the bosom of the church, their mother: stars over which the proud foe sets up his throne, [Isa. 14:13] and rocks hollowed by the serpent that he may dwell in their fissures. You may see many women widows before wedded, who try to conceal their miserable fall by a lying garb. Unless they are betrayed by swelling wombs or by the crying of their infants, they walk abroad with tripping feet and heads in the air. Some go so far as to take potions, that they may insure barrenness, and thus murder human beings almost before their conception. Some, when they find themselves with child through their sin, use drugs to procure abortion, and when (as often happens) they die with their offspring, they enter the lower world laden with the guilt not only of adultery against Christ but also of suicide and child murder. Yet it is these who say: "'Unto the pure all things are pure;" [Tit. 1:15] my conscience is sufficient guide for me. A pure heart is what God looks for. Why should I abstain from meats which God has created to be received with thanksgiving?" [1 Tim. 4:3] And when they wish to appear agreeable and entertaining they first drench themselves with wine, and then joining the grossest profanity to intoxication, they say "Far be it from me to abstain from the blood of Christ." And when they see another pale or sad they call her "wretch" or "manichaeian;"¹¹ quite logically, indeed, for on their principles fasting involves heresy. When they go out they do their best to attract notice, and with nods and winks encourage troops of young fellows to follow them. Of each and all of these the prophet's words are true: "Thou hast a whore's forehead; thou refusest to be ashamed." [Jer. 3:3] Their robes have but a narrow purple stripe,¹² it is true; and their head-dress is somewhat loose, so as to leave the hair free. From their shoulders flutters the lilac mantle which they call "maforte;" they have their feet in cheap slippers and their arms tucked up tight-fitting sleeves. Add to these marks of their profession an easy gait, and you have all the virginity that they possess. Such may have eulogizers of their own, and may fetch a higher price in the market of perdition, merely because they are called virgins. But to such virgins as these I prefer to be displeasing.

14. I blush to speak of it, it is so shocking; yet though sad, it is true. How comes this plague of the agapetae¹³ to be in the church? Whence come these unwedded wives, these novel concubines, these harlots, so I will call them, though they cling to a single partner? One house holds them and one chamber. They often occupy the same bed, and yet they call us suspicious if we fancy anything amiss. A brother leaves his virgin sister; a virgin, slighting her unmarried brother, seeks a brother in a stranger. Both alike profess to have but one object, to find spiritual consolation from those not of their kin; but their real aim is to indulge in sexual intercourse. It is on such that Solomon in the book of proverbs heaps his scorn. "Can a man take fire in his bosom," he says, "and his clothes not be burned? Can one go upon hot coals and his feet not be burned?" [Prov. 6:27, Prov. 6:28]

15. We cast out, then, and banish from our sight those who only wish to seem and not to be virgins. Henceforward I may bring all my speech to bear upon you who, as it is your lot to be the first virgin of noble birth in Rome, have to labor the more diligently not to lose good things to come, as well as those that are present. You have at least learned from a case in your own family the troubles of wedded life and the uncertainties of marriage. Your sister, Blaesilla, before you in age but behind you in declining the vow of virginity, has become a widow but seven months after she has taken a husband. Hapless plight of us mortals who know not what is before us! She has lost, at once, the crown of virginity and the pleasures of wedlock. And, although, as a widow, the second degree of chastity is hers, still can you not imagine the continual crosses which she has to bear, daily seeing in her sister what she has lost herself; and, while she finds it hard to go without the pleasures of wedlock, having a less reward for her present continence? Still she, too, may take heart and rejoice. The fruit which is an hundredfold and that which is sixtyfold both spring from one seed, and that seed is chastity. [Matt. 13:8]

16. Do not court the company of married ladies or visit the houses of the high-born. Do not look too often on the life which you despised to become a virgin. Women of the world, you know, plume themselves because their husbands are on the bench or in other high positions. And the wife of the emperor always has an eager throng of visitors at her door. Why do you, then, wrong your husband? Why do you, God's bride, hasten to visit the wife of a mere man? Learn in this respect a holy pride; know that you are better than they. And not only must you avoid intercourse with those who are puffed up by their husbands' honors, who are hedged in with troops of eunuchs, and who wear robes inwrought with threads of gold. You must also shun those who are widows from necessity and not from choice. Not that they ought to have desired the death of their husbands; but that they have not welcomed the opportunity of continence when it has come. As it is, they only change their garb; their old self-seeking remains unchanged. To see them in their capacious litters, with red cloaks and plump bodies, a row of eunuchs walking in front of them, you would fancy them not to have lost husbands but to be seeking them. Their houses are filled with flatterers and with guests. The very clergy, who ought to inspire them with respect by their teaching and authority, kiss these ladies on the forehead, and putting forth their hands (so that, if you knew no better, you might suppose them in the act of blessing), take wages for their visits. They, meanwhile, seeing that priests cannot do without them, are lifted up into pride; and as, having had experience of both, they prefer the license of widowhood to the restraints of marriage, they call themselves chaste livers and nuns. After an immoderate supper they retire to rest to dream of the apostles.¹⁴

17. Let your companions be women pale and thin with fasting, and approved by their years and conduct; such as daily sing in their hearts: "Tell me where thou feedest thy flock, where thou makest it to rest at noon," [Cant. 1:7, R.V] and say, with true earnestness, "I have a desire to depart and to be with Christ." [Phil. 1:23] Be subject to your parents, imitating the example of your spouse. [Luke 2:51] Rarely go abroad, and if you wish to seek, the aid of the martyrs seek it in your own chamber. For you will never need a pretext for going out if you always go out when there is need. Take food in moderation, and never overload your stomach. For many women, while temperate as regards wine, are intemperate in the use of food. When you rise at night to pray, let your breath be that of an empty and not that of an overfull stomach. Read often, learn all that you can. Let sleep overcome you, the roll still in your hands; when your head falls, let it be on the sacred page. Let your fasts be of daily occurrence and your refreshment such as avoids satiety. It is idle to carry an empty stomach if, in two or three days' time, the fast is to be made up for by repletion. When cloyed the mind immediately grows sluggish, and when the ground is watered it puts forth the thorns of lust. If ever you feel the outward man sighing for the flower of youth, and if, as you lie on your couch after a meal, you are excited by the alluring train of sensual desires; then seize the shield of faith, for it alone can quench the fiery darts of the devil. [Eph. 6:16] "They are all adulterers," says the prophet; "they have made ready their heart like an oven." [Hos. 7:4, Hos. 7:6, R.V] But do you keep close to the footsteps of Christ, and, intent upon His words, say: "Did not our heart burn within us by the way while Jesus opened to us the Scriptures?" [Luke 24:32] and again: "Thy word is tried to the uttermost, and thy servant loveth it." [Ps. 119:140, P.B.V] It is hard for the human soul to avoid loving something, and our mind must of necessity give way to affection of one kind or another. The love of the flesh is overcome by the love of the spirit. Desire is quenched by desire. What is taken from the one increases the other. Therefore, as you lie on your couch, say again and again: "By night have I sought Him whom my soul loveth." [Cant. 3:1] "Mortify, therefore," says the apostle, "your members which are upon the earth." [Col. 3:5] Because he himself did so, he could afterwards say with confidence: "I live, yet not I, but Christ, liveth in me." [Gal. 2:20] He who mortifies his members, and feels that he is walking in a vain show,¹⁵ is not afraid to say: "I am become like a bottle in the frost. [Ps. 119:83 Vulg] Whatever there was in me of the moisture of lust has been dried out of me." And again: "My knees are weak through fasting; I forget to eat my bread. By reason of the voice of my groaning my bones cleave to my skin." [Ps. 109:24; 102:5]

18. Be like the grasshopper and make night musical. Nightly wash your bed and water your couch with your tears. [Ps. 6:6, P.B.V] Watch and be like the sparrow alone upon the housetop. [Ps. 102:7] Sing with the spirit, but sing with the understanding also. [1 Cor. 14:15] And let your song be that of the psalmist: "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and forget not all his benefits; who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction." [Ps. 103:2-4] Can we, any of us, honestly make his words our own: "I have eaten ashes like bread and mingled my drink with weeping?" [Ps. 102:9] Yet, should we not weep and groan when the serpent invites us, as he invited our first parents, to eat forbidden fruit, and when after expelling us from the paradise of virginity he desires to clothe us with mantles of skins such as that which Elijah, on his return to paradise, left behind him on earth? [2 K. 2:13] Say to yourself: "What have I to do with the pleasures of sense that so soon come to an end? What have I to do with the song of the sirens so sweet and so fatal to those who hear it?" I would not have you subject to that sentence whereby condemnation has been passed upon mankind. When God says to Eve, "In pain and in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children," say to yourself, "That is a law for a married woman, not for me." And when He continues, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband," [Gen. 3:16] say again: "Let her desire be to her husband who has not Christ for her spouse." And when, last of all, He says, "Thou shalt surely die," [Gen. 2:17] once more, say, "Marriage indeed must end in death; but the life on which I have resolved is independent of sex. Let those who are wives keep the place and the time that properly belong to them. For me, virginity is consecrated in the persons of Mary and of Christ."

19. Some one may say, "Do you dare detract from wedlock, which is a state blessed by God?" I do not detract from wedlock when I set virginity before it. No one compares a bad thing with a good. Wedded women may congratulate themselves that they come next to virgins. "Be fruitful," God says, "and multiply, and replenish the earth." [Gen. 1:28] He who desires to replenish the earth may increase and multiply if he will. But the train to which you belong is not on earth, but in heaven. The command to increase and multiply first finds fulfilment after the expulsion from paradise, after the nakedness and the fig-leaves which speak of sexual passion. Let them marry and be given in marriage who eat their bread in the sweat of their brow; whose land brings forth to them thorns and thistles, [Gen. 3:18, Gen. 3:19] and whose crops are choked with briars. My seed produces fruit a hundredfold.¹⁶ "All men cannot receive God's saying, but they to whom it is given."

Some people may be eunuchs from necessity; I am one of free will. [Matt. 19:11, Matt. 19:12] "There is a time to embrace and a time to refrain from embracing. There is a time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together." [Eccles. 3:5] Now that out of the hard stones of the Gentiles God has raised up children unto Abraham, [Matt. 3:9] they begin to be "holy stones rolling upon the earth." [Zech. 9:16, LXX] They pass through the whirlwinds of the world, and roll on in God's chariot on rapid wheels. Let those stitch coats to themselves who have lost the coat woven from the top throughout; [John. 19:23] who delight in the cries of infants which, as soon as they see the light, lament that they are born. In paradise Eve was a virgin, and it was only after the coats of skins that she began her married life. Now paradise is your home too. Keep therefore your birthright and say: "Return unto thy rest, O my soul." [Ps. 116:7] To show that virginity is natural while wedlock only follows guilt, what is born of wedlock is virgin flesh, and it gives back in fruit what in root it has lost. "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a flower shall grow out of his roots." [Isa. 11:1, LXX] The rod¹⁷ is the mother of the Lord-simple, pure, unsullied; drawing no germ of life from without but fruitful in singleness like God Himself. The flower of the rod is Christ, who says of Himself: "I am the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valleys." [Cant. 2:1] In another place He is foretold to be "a stone cut out of the mountain without hands," [Dan. 2:45] a figure by which the prophet signifies that He is to be born a virgin of a virgin. For the hands are here a figure of wedlock as in the passage: "His left hand is under my head and his right hand doth embrace me." [Cant. 2:6] It agrees, also, with this interpretation that the unclean animals are led into Noah's ark in pairs, while of the clean an uneven number is taken. [Gen. 7:2] Similarly, when Moses and Joshua were bidden to remove their shoes because the ground on which they stood was holy, [Ex. 3:5, Josh. 5:15] the command had a mystical meaning. So, too, when the disciples were appointed to preach the gospel they were told to take with them neither shoe nor shoe-latchet;¹⁸ and when the soldiers came to cast lots for the garments of Jesus [John. 19:23, John. 19:24] they found no boots that they could take away. For the Lord could not Himself possess what He had forbidden to His servants.

20. I praise wedlock, I praise marriage, but it is because they give me virgins. I gather the rose from the thorns, the gold from the earth, the pearl from the shell. "Doth the plowman plow all day to sow?" [Isa. 28:24] Shall he not also enjoy the fruit of his labor? Wedlock is the more honored, the more what is born of it is loved. Why, mother, do you grudge your daughter her virginity? She has been reared on your milk, she has come from your womb, she has grown up in your bosom. Your watchful affection has kept her a virgin. Are you angry with her because she chooses to be a king's wife and not a soldier's? She has conferred on you a high privilege; you are now the mother-in-law of God. "Concerning virgins," says the apostle, "I have no commandment of the Lord." [1 Cor. 7:25] Why was this? Because his own virginity was due, not to a command, but to his free choice. For they are not to be heard who feign him to have had a wife; for, when he is discussing continence and commending perpetual chastity, he uses the words, "I would that all men were even as I myself." And farther on, "I say, therefore, to the unmarried and widows, it is good for them if they abide even as I." [1 Cor. 7:7, 1 Cor. 7:8] And in another place, "have we not power to lead about wives even as the rest of the apostles?" [1 Cor. 9:5] Why then has he no commandment from the Lord concerning virginity? Because what is freely offered is worth more than what is extorted by force, and to command virginity would have been to abrogate wedlock. It would have been a hard enactment to compel opposition to nature and to extort from men the angelic life; and not only so, it would have been to condemn what is a divine ordinance.

21. The old law had a different ideal of blessedness, for therein it is said: "Blessed is he who hath seed in Zion and a family in Jerusalem:" [Isa. 31:9, LXX] and "Cursed is the barren who beareth not:" [Isa. 54:1, LXX. (?) and "Thy children shall be like olive-plants round about thy table." [Ps. 128:3] Riches too are promised to the faithful and we are told that "there was not one feeble person among their tribes." [Ps. 105:37] But now even to eunuchs it is said, "Say not, behold I am a dry tree," [Isa. 56:3] for instead of sons and daughters you have a place forever in heaven. Now the poor are blessed, now Lazarus is set before Dives in his purple. [Cf. Luke 16:19 sqq] Now he who is weak is counted strong. But in those days the world was still unpeopled: accordingly, to pass over instances of childlessness meant only to serve as types, those only were considered happy who could boast of children. It was for this reason that Abraham in his old age married

Keturah; [Gen. 25:1] that Leah hired Jacob with her son's mandrakes, [Gen. 30:14-16] and that fair Rachel-a type of the church-complained of the closing of her womb. [Gen. 30:1, Gen. 30:2] But gradually the crop grew up and then the reaper was sent forth with his sickle. Elijah lived a virgin life, so also did Elisha and many of the sons of the prophets. To Jeremiah the command came: "Thou shalt not take thee a wife." [Jer. 16:2] He had been sanctified in his mother's womb, [Jer. 1:5] and now he was forbidden to take a wife because the captivity was near. The apostle gives the same counsel in different words. "I think, therefore, that this is good by reason of the present distress, namely that it is good for a man to be as he is." [1 Cor. 7:26, R.V] What is this distress which does away with the joys of wedlock? The apostle tells us, in a later verse: "The time is short: it remaineth that those who have wives be as though they had none." [1 Cor. 7:29] Nebuchadnezzar is hard at hand. The lion is bestirring himself from his lair. What good will marriage be to me if it is to end in slavery to the haughtiest of kings? What good will little ones be to me if their lot is to be that which the prophet sadly describes: "The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst; the young children ask for bread and no man breaketh it unto them"? [Lam. 4:4] In those days, as I have said, the virtue of continence was found only in men: Eve still continued to travail with children. But now that a virgin has conceived [Isa. 7:14] in the womb and has borne to us a child of which the prophet says that "Government shall be upon his shoulder, and his name shall be called the mighty God, the everlasting Father," [Isa. 9:6] now the chain of the curse is broken. Death came through Eve, but life has come through Mary. And thus the gift of virginity has been bestowed most richly upon women, seeing that it has had its beginning from a woman. As soon as the Son of God set foot upon the earth, He formed for Himself a new household there; that, as He was adored by angels in heaven, angels might serve Him also on earth. Then chaste Judith once more cut off the head of Holofernes.¹⁹ Then Haman-whose name means iniquity-was once more burned in fire of his own kindling. [Esther 7:10] Then James and John forsook father and net and ship and followed the Saviour: neither kinship nor the world's ties, nor the care of their home could hold them back. Then were the words heard: "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." [Mark 8:34] For no soldier goes with a wife to battle. Even when a disciple would have buried his father, the Lord forbade him, and said: "Foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay His head." [Matt. 8:20-22] So you must not complain if you have but scanty house-room. In the same strain, the apostle writes: "He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: but he that is married careth for the things that are of the world how he may please his wife. There is difference also between a wife and a virgin. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord that she may be holy both in body and in spirit. But she that is married careth for the things of the world how she may please her husband." [1 Cor. 7:32-34]

22. How great inconveniences are involved in wedlock and how many anxieties encompass it I have, I think, described shortly in my treatise-published against Helvidius²⁰ -on the perpetual virginity of the blessed Mary. It would be tedious to go over the same ground now; and any one who pleases may draw from that fountain. But lest I should seem wholly to have passed over the matter, I will just say now that the apostle bids us pray without ceasing, [1 Thess. 5:17] and that he who in the married state renders his wife her due [1 Cor. 7:3, R.V] cannot so pray. Either we pray always and are virgins, or we cease to pray that we may fulfil the claims of marriage. Still he says: "If a virgin marry she hath not sinned. Nevertheless such shall have trouble in the flesh." [1 Cor.

7:28] At the outset I promised that I should say little or nothing of the embarrassments of wedlock, and now I give you notice to the same effect. If you want to know from how many vexations a virgin is free and by how many a wife is fettered you should read Tertullian "to a philosophic friend,"²¹ and his other treatises on virginity, the blessed Cyprian's noble volume, the writings of Pope Damasus²² in prose and verse, and the treatises recently written for his sister by our own Ambrose.²³ In these he has poured forth his soul with such a flood of eloquence that he has sought out, set forth, and put in order all that bears on the praise of virgins.

23. We must proceed by a different path, for our purpose is not the praise of virginity but its preservation. To know that it is a good thing is not enough: when we have chosen it we must guard it with jealous care. The first only requires judgment, and we share it with many; the second calls for toil, and few compete with us in it. "He that shall endure unto the end," the Lord says, "the same shall be saved," [Matt. 24:13] and "many are called but few are chosen." [Matt. 20:16; Matt. 22:14] Therefore I conjure you before God and Jesus Christ and His elect angels to guard that which you have received, not readily exposing to the public gaze the vessels of the Lord's temple (which only the priests are by right allowed to see), that no profane person may look upon God's sanctuary. Uzzah, when he touched the ark which it was not lawful to touch, was struck down suddenly by death. [2 Sam. 6:6, 2 Sam. 6:7] And assuredly no gold or silver vessel was ever so dear to God as is the temple of a virgin's body. The shadow went before, but now the reality is come. You indeed may speak in all simplicity, and from motives of amiability may treat with courtesy the veriest strangers, but unchaste eyes see nothing aright. They fail to appreciate the beauty of the soul, and only value that of the body. Hezekiah showed God's treasure to the Assyrians, [2 Kings 20:12, 2 Kings 20:13] who ought never to have seen what they were sure to covet. The consequence was that Judaea was torn by continual wars, and that the very first things carried away to Babylon were these vessels of the Lord. We find Belshazzar at his feast and among his concubines (vice always glories in defiling what is noble) drinking out of these sacred cups. [Dan. 5:1-3]

24. Never incline your ear to words of mischief. For men often say an improper word to make trial of a virgin's steadfastness, to see if she hears it with pleasure, and if she is ready to unbend at every silly jest. Such persons applaud whatever you affirm and deny whatever you deny; they speak of you as not only holy but accomplished, and say that in you there is no guile. "Behold," say they, "a true hand-maid of Christ; behold entire singleness of heart. How different from that rough, unsightly, countrified fright, who most likely never married because she could never find a husband." Our natural weakness induces us readily to listen to such flatterers; but, though we may blush and reply that such praise is more than our due, the soul within us rejoices to hear itself praised.

Like the ark of the covenant Christ's spouse should be overlaid with gold within and without; [Ex. 25:11] she should be the guardian of the law of the Lord. Just as the ark contained nothing but the tables of the covenant, [1 K. 8:9] so in you there should be no thought of anything that is outside. For it pleases the Lord to sit in your mind as He once sat on the mercy-seat and the cherubims. [Ex. 25:22] As He sent His disciples to loose Him the foal of an ass that he might ride on it, so He sends them to release you from the cares of the world, that leaving the bricks and straw of Egypt, you may follow Him, the true Moses, through the wilderness and may enter the land of promise. Let no one dare to forbid you, neither mother nor sister nor kinswoman nor brother: "The Lord hath need of you." [Matt. 21:1-3] Should they seek to hinder you, let them fear the scourges that fell on Pharaoh, who, because he would not let God's people go that they might serve Him, [Ex. 7:16] suffered the plagues described in Scripture. Jesus entering into the temple cast out those things which belonged not to the temple. For God is jealous and will not allow the father's house to be made a den of robbers. [Matt. 21:12, Matt. 21:13, R.V.] Where money is counted, where doves are sold, where simplicity is stifled where, that is, a virgin's breast glows with cares of this world; straightway the veil of the temple is rent, [Matt. 27:51] the bridegroom rises in anger, he says: "Your house is left unto you desolate." [Matt. 23:38] Read the gospel and see how Mary sitting at the feet of the Lord is set before the zealous Martha. In her anxiety to be hospitable Martha was preparing a meal for the Lord and His disciples; yet Jesus said to her: "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things. But few things are needful or one.²⁴ And Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her." [Luke 10:41, Luke 10:42] Be then like Mary; prefer the food of the soul to that of the body. Leave it to your sisters to run to and fro and to seek how they may fitly welcome Christ. But do you, having once for all cast away the burden of the world, sit at the Lord's feet and say: "I have found him whom my soul loveth; I will hold him, I will not let him go." [Cant. 3:4] And He will answer: "My dove, my undefiled is but one; she is the only one of her mother, she is the choice one of her that bare her." [Cant. 6:9] Now the mother of whom this is said is the heavenly Jerusalem. [Gal. 4:26]

25. Ever let the privacy of your chamber guard you; ever let the Bridegroom sport with you within. [Cf. Gen. 26:8] Do you pray? You speak to the Bridegroom. Do you read? He speaks to you. When sleep overtakes you He will come behind and put His hand through the hole of the door, and your heart²⁵ shall be moved for Him; and you will awake and rise up and say: "I am sick of love." [Cant. 5:2, Cant. 5:4, Cant. 5:8] Then He will reply: "A garden inclosed is my sister, my spouse; a spring shut up, a fountain sealed." [Cant. 4:12]

Go not from home nor visit the daughters of a strange land, though you have patriarchs for brothers and Israel for a father. Dinah went out and was seduced.²⁶ Do not seek the Bridegroom in the streets; do not go round the corners of the city. For though you may say: "I will rise now and go about the city: in the streets and in the broad ways I will seek Him whom my soul loveth," and though you may ask the watchmen: "Saw ye Him whom my soul loveth?" [Cant. 3:2, Cant. 3:3] no one will deign to answer you. The Bridegroom cannot be found in the streets: "Strait and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life." [Matt. 7:14] So the Song goes on: "I sought him but I could not find him: I called him but he gave me no answer." [Cant. 3:2; Cant. 5:6] And would that failure to find Him were all. You will be wounded and stripped, you will lament and say: "The watchmen that went about the city found me: they smote me, they wounded me, they took away my veil from me." [Cant. 5:7] Now if one who could say: "I sleep but my heart waketh," [Cant. 5:2] and "A bundle of myrrh is my well beloved unto me; he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts"; [Cant. 1:13] if one who could speak thus suffered so much because she went abroad, what shall become of us who are but young girls; of us who, when the bride goes in with the Bridegroom, still remain without? Jesus is jealous. He does not choose that your face should be seen of others. You may excuse yourself and say: "I have drawn close my veil, I have covered my face and I have sought Thee there and have said: 'Tell me, O Thou whom my soul loveth, where Thou feedest Thy flock, where Thou makest it to rest at noon. For why should I be as one that is veiled beside the flocks of Thy companions?'" [Cant. 1:7, R.V.] Yet in spite of your excuses He will be wroth, He will swell with anger and say: "If thou know not thyself, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock and feed thy goats beside the shepherd's tents." [Cant. 1:8, LXX] You may be fair, and of all faces yours may be the dearest to the Bridegroom; yet, unless you know yourself, and keep your heart with all diligence, [Prov. 4:23] unless also you avoid the eyes of the young men, you will be turned out of My bride-chamber to feed the goats, which shall be set on the left hand. [Matt. 25:33]

26. These things being so, my Eustochium, daughter, lady, fellow-servant, sister-these names refer the first to your age, the second to your rank, the third to your religious vocation, the last to the place which you hold in my affection-hear the words of Isaiah: "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation" of the Lord "be overpast." [Isa. 26:20] Let foolish virgins stray abroad, but for your part stay at home with the Bridegroom; for if you shut your door, and, according to the precept of the Gospel, [Matt. 6:6] pray to your Father in secret, He will come and knock, saying: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man ...open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me." [Rev. 3:20] Then straightway you will eagerly reply: "It is the voice of my beloved that knocketh, saying, Open to me, my sister, my love, my dove, my undefiled." It is impossible that you should refuse, and say: "I have put off my coat how shall I put it on? I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?" [Cant. 5:2, Cant. 5:3] Arise forthwith and open. Otherwise while you linger He may pass on and you may have mournfully to say: "I opened to my beloved, but my beloved was gone." [Cant. 5:6] Why need the doors of your heart be closed to the Bridegroom? Let them be open to Christ but closed to the devil according to the saying: "If the spirit of him who hath power rise up against thee, leave not thy place." 27 Daniel, in that upper story to which he withdrew when he could no longer continue below, had his windows open toward Jerusalem. [Dan. 6:10, LXX] Do you too keep your windows open, but only on the side where light may enter and whence you may see the eye of the Lord. Open not those other windows of which the prophet says: "Death is come up into our windows." [Jer. 9:21]

27. You must also be careful to avoid the snare of a passion for vainglory. "How," Jesus says, "can ye believe which receive glory one from another?" [John. 5:44, R.V.] What an evil that must be the victim of which cannot believe! Let us rather say: "Thou art my glorying," [Jer. 9:24] and "He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord," [1 Cor. 1:31] and "If I yet pleased men I should not be the servant of Christ," [Gal. 1:10] and "Far be it from me to glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom the world hath been crucified unto me and I unto the world;" [Gal. 6:14, R.V. marg] and once more: "In God we boast all the day long; my soul shall make her boast in the Lord." [Pss. 44:8; Pss. 34:2] When you do alms, let God alone see you. When you fast, be of a cheerful countenance. [Matt. 6:3, Matt. 6:16-18] Let your dress be neither too neat nor too slovenly; neither let it be so remarkable as to draw the attention of passers-by, and to make men point their fingers at you. Is a brother dead? Has the body of a sister to be carried to its burial? Take care lest in too often performing such offices you die yourself. Do not wish to seem very devout nor more humble than need be, lest you seek glory by shunning it. For many, who screen from all men's sight their poverty, charity, and fasting, desire to excite admiration by their very disdain of it, and strangely seek for praise while they profess to keep out of its way. From the other disturbing influences which make men rejoice, despond, hope, and fear I find many free; but this is a defect which few are without, and he is best whose character, like a fair skin, is disfigured by the fewest blemishes. I do not think it necessary to warn you against boasting of your riches, or against priding yourself on your birth, or against setting yourself up as superior to others. I know your humility; I know that you can say with sincerity: "Lord, my heart is not haughty nor mine eyes lofty;" [Ps. 131:1] I know that in your breast as in that of your mother the pride through which the devil fell has no place. It would be time wasted to write to you about it; for there is no greater folly than to teach a pupil what he knows already. But now that you have despised the boastfulness of the world, do not let the fact inspire you with new boastfulness. Harbor not the secret thought that having ceased to court attention in garments of gold you may begin to do so in mean attire. And when you come into a room full of brothers and sisters, do not sit in too low a place or plead that you are unworthy of a footstool. Do not deliberately lower your voice as though worn out with fasting; nor, leaning on the shoulder of another, mimic the tottering gait of one who is faint. Some women, it is true, disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. [Matt. 6:16] As soon as they catch sight of any one they groan, they look down; they cover up their faces, all but one eye, which they keep free to see with. Their dress is sombre, their girdles are of sackcloth, their hands and feet are dirty; only their stomachs-which cannot be seen-are hot with food. Of these the psalm is sung daily: "The Lord will scatter the bones of them that please themselves."²⁸ Others change their garb and assume the mien of men, being ashamed of being what they were born to be-women. They cut off their hair and are not ashamed to look like eunuchs. Some clothe themselves in goat's hair, and, putting on hoods, think to become children again by making themselves look like so many owls.²⁹

28. But I will not speak only of women. Avoid men, also, when you see them loaded with chains and wearing their hair long like women, contrary to the apostle's precept, [1 Cor. 11:14] not to speak of beards like those of goats, black cloaks, and bare feet braving the cold. All these things are tokens of the devil. Such an one Rome groaned over some time back in Antimus; and Sophronius is a still more recent instance. Such persons, when they have once gained admission to the houses of the high-born, and have deceived "silly women laden with sins, ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth," [2 Tim. 3:6, 2 Tim. 3:7] feign a sad mien and pretend to make long fasts while at night they feast in secret. Shame forbids me to say more, for my language might appear more like invective than admonition. There are others-I speak of those of my own order-who seek the presbyterate and the diaconate simply that they may be able to see women with less restraint. Such men think of nothing but their dress; they use perfumes freely, and see that there are no creases in their leather shoes. Their curling hair shows traces of the tongs; their fingers glisten with rings; they walk on tiptoe across a damp road, not to splash their feet. When you see men acting in this way, think of them rather as bridegrooms than as clergymen. Certain persons have devoted the whole of their energies and life to the single object of knowing the names, houses, and characters of married ladies. I will here briefly describe the head of the profession, that from the master's likeness you may recognize the disciples. He rises and goes forth with the sun; he has the order of his visits duly arranged; he takes the shortest road; and, troublesome old man that he is, forces his way almost into the bedchambers of ladies yet asleep. If he sees a pillow that takes his fancy or an elegant table-cover-or indeed any article of household furniture-he praises it, looks admiringly at it, takes it into his hand, and, complaining that he has nothing of the kind, begs or rather extorts it from the owner. All the women, in fact, fear to cross the news-carrier of the town. Chastity and fasting are alike distasteful to him. What he likes is a savory breakfast-say off a plump young crane such as is commonly called a cheeper. In speech he is rude and forward, and is always ready to bandy reproaches. Wherever you turn he is the first man that you see before you. Whatever news is noised abroad he is either the originator of the rumor or its magnifier. He changes his horses every hour; and they are so sleek and spirited that you would take him for a brother of the Thracian king.³⁰

29. Many are the stratagems which the wily enemy employs against us. "The serpent," we are told, "was more subtile than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made." [Gen. 3:1] And the apostle says: "We are not ignorant of his devices." [2 Cor. 2:11] Neither an affected shabbiness nor a stylish smartness becomes a Christian. If there is anything of which you are ignorant, if you have any doubt about Scripture, ask one whose life commends him, whose age puts him above suspicion, whose reputation does not belie him; one who may be able to say: "I have espoused you to one husband that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ." Or if there should be none such able to explain, it is better to avoid danger at the price of ignorance than to court it for the sake of learning. Remember that you walk in the midst of snares, and that many veteran virgins, of a chastity never called in question, have, on the very threshold of death, let their crowns fall from their hands.

If any of your handmaids share your vocation, do not lift up yourself against them or pride yourself because you are their mistress. You have all chosen one Bridegroom; you all sing the same psalms; together you receive the Body of Christ. Why then should your thoughts be different?³¹ You must try to win others, and that you may attract the more readily you must treat the virgins in your train with the greatest respect. If you find one of them weak in the faith, be attentive to her, comfort her, caress her, and make her chastity your treasure. But if a girl pretends to have a vocation simply because she desires to escape from service, read aloud to her the words of the apostle: "It is better to marry than to burn." [1 Cor. 7:9]

Idle persons and busybodies, whether virgins or widows; such as go from house to house calling on married women and displaying an unblushing effrontery greater than that of a stage parasite, cast from you as you would the plague. For "evil communications corrupt good manners," [1 Cor. 15:33] and women like these care for nothing but their lowest appetites. They will often urge you, saying, "My dear creature, make the best of your advantages, and live while life is yours," and "Surely you are not laying up money for your children." Given to wine and wantonness, they instill all manner of mischief into people's minds, and induce even the most austere to indulge in enervating pleasures. And "when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ they will marry, having condemnation because they have rejected their first faith." [1 Tim. 5:11, 1 Tim. 5:12] Do not seek to appear over-eloquent, nor trifle with verse, nor make yourself gay with lyric songs. And do not, out of affectation, follow the sickly taste [Persius 1:104] of married ladies who, now pressing their teeth together, now keeping their lips wide apart, speak with a lisp, and purposely clip their words, because they fancy that to pronounce them naturally is a mark of country breeding. Accordingly they find pleasure in what I may call an adultery of the tongue. For "what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial?" [2 Cor. 6:14, 2 Cor. 6:15] How can Horace go with the psalter, Virgil with the gospels, Cicero with the apostle?³² Is not a brother made to stumble if he sees you sitting at meat in an idol's temple? [1 Cor. 8:10] Although "unto the pure all things are pure," [Tit. 1:15] and "nothing is to be refused if it be received with thanksgiving," [1 Tim. 4:4] still we ought not to drink the cup of Christ, and, at the same time, the cup of devils. [1 Cor. 10:21] Let me relate to you the story of my own miserable experience.

30. Many years ago, when for the kingdom of heaven's sake I had cut myself off from home, parents, sister, relations, and-harder still-from the dainty food to which I had been accustomed; and when I was on my way to Jerusalem to wage my warfare, I still could not bring myself to forego the library which I had formed for myself at Rome with great care and toil. And so, miserable man that I was, I would fast only that I might afterwards read Cicero. After many nights spent in vigil, after floods of tears called from my inmost heart, after the recollection of my past sins, I would once more take up Plautus. And when at times I returned to my right mind, and began to read the prophets, their style seemed rude and repellent. I failed to see the light with my blinded eyes; but I attributed the fault not to them, but to the sun. While the old serpent was thus making me his plaything, about the middle of Lent a deep-seated fever fell upon my weakened body, and while it destroyed my rest completely-the story seems hardly credible-it so wasted my unhappy frame that scarcely anything was left of me but skin and bone. Meantime preparations for my funeral went on; my body grew gradually colder, and the warmth of life lingered only in my throbbing breast. Suddenly I was caught up in the spirit and dragged before the judgment seat of the Judge; and here the light was so bright, and those who stood around were so radiant, that I cast myself upon the ground and did not dare to look up. Asked who and what I was I replied: "I am a Christian." But He who presided said: "Thou liest, thou art a follower of Cicero and not of Christ. For 'where thy treasure is, there will thy heart be also.'" [Matt. 6:21] Instantly I became dumb, and amid the strokes of the lash-for He had ordered me to be scourged-I was tortured more severely still by the fire of conscience, considering with myself that verse, "In the grave who shall give thee thanks?" [Ps. 6:5] Yet for all that I began to cry and to bewail myself, saying: "Have mercy upon me, O Lord: have mercy upon me." Amid the sound of the scourges this cry still made itself heard. At last the bystanders, failing down before the knees of Him who presided, prayed that He would have pity on my youth, and that He would give me space to repent of my error. He might still, they urged, inflict torture on me, should I ever again read the works of the Gentiles. Under the stress of that awful moment I should have been ready to make even still larger promises than these. Accordingly I made oath and called upon His name, saying: "Lord, if ever again I possess worldly books, or if ever again I read such, I have denied Thee." Dismissed, then, on taking this oath, I returned to the upper world, and, to the surprise of all, I opened upon them eyes so drenched with tears that my distress served to convince even the incredulous. And that this was no sleep nor idle dream, such as those by which we are often mocked, I call to witness the tribunal before which I lay, and the terrible judgment which I feared. May it never, hereafter, be my lot to fall under such an inquisition! I profess that my shoulders were black and blue, that I felt the bruises long after I awoke from my sleep, and that thenceforth I read the books of God with a zeal greater than I had previously given to the books of men.

31. You must also avoid the sin of covetousness, and this not merely by refusing to seize upon what belongs to others, for that is punished by the laws of the state, but also by not keeping your own property, which has now become no longer yours. "If have not been faithful," the Lord says, "in that which is another man's, who shall give you that which is your own?" [Luke 16:12] "That which is another man's" is a quantity of gold or of silver, while "that which is our own" is the spiritual heritage of which it is elsewhere said: "The ransom of a man's life is his riches." [Prov. 13:8, R.V] "No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." [Matt. 6:24] Riches, that is; for in the heathen tongue of the Syrians riches are called mammon. The "thorns" which choke our faith [Matt. 13:7, Matt. 13:22] are the taking thought for our life. [Matt. 6:25] Care for the things which the Gentiles seek after [Matt. 6:32] is the root of covetousness. But you will say: "I am a girl delicately reared, and I cannot labor with my hands. Suppose that I live to old age and then fall sick, who will take pity on me?" Hear Jesus speaking to the apostles: "Take no thought what ye shall eat; nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them." [Matt. 6:25, Matt. 6:26] Should clothing fail you, set the lilies before your eyes. Should hunger seize you, think of the words in which the poor and hungry are blessed. Should pain afflict you, read "Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities," and "There was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure." [2 Cor. 12:10, 2 Cor. 12:7] Rejoice in all God's judgments; for does not the psalmist say: "The daughters of Judah rejoiced because of thy judgments, O Lord"? [Ps. 97:8] Let the words be ever on your lips: "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither;" [Job 1:21] and "We brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out." [1 Tim. 6:7]

32. To-day you may see women cramming their wardrobes with dresses, changing their gowns from day to day, and for all that unable to vanquish the moths. Now and then one more scrupulous wears out a single dress; yet, while she appears in rags, her boxes are full. Parchments are dyed purple, gold is melted into lettering, manuscripts are decked with jewels, while Christ lies at the door naked and dying. When they hold out a hand to the needy they sound a trumpet; [Matt. 6:2] when they invite to a love-feast³³ they engage a crier. I lately saw the noblest lady in Rome-I suppress her name, for I am no satirist-with a band of eunuchs before her in the basilica of the blessed Peter. She was giving money to the poor, a coin apiece; and this with her own hand, that she might be accounted more religious. Hereupon a by no means uncommon incident occurred. An old woman, "full of years and rags,"³⁴ ran forward to get a second coin, but when her turn came she received not a penny but a blow hard enough to draw blood from her guilty veins.

"The love of money is the root of all evil," [1 Tim. 6:10] and the apostle speaks of covetousness as being idolatry. [Col. 3:5] "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and all these things shall be added unto you." [Matt. 6:33] The Lord will never allow a righteous soul to perish of hunger. "I have been young," the psalmist says, "and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread." [Ps. 37:25] Elijah is fed by ministering ravens. [1 Kings 17:4, 1 Kings 17:6] The widow of Zarephath, who with her sons expected to die the same night, went without food herself that she might feed the prophet. He who had come to be fed then turned feeder, for, by a miracle, he filled the empty barrel. [1 Kings 17:9-16] The apostle Peter says: "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee. In the name of Jesus Christ rise up and walk." [Acts 3:6] But now many, while they do not say it in words, by their deeds declare: "Faith and pity have I none; but such as I have, silver and gold, these I will not give thee." "Having food and raiment let us be therewith content." [1 Tim. 6:8] Hear the prayer of Jacob: "If God will be with me and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, then shall the Lord be my God." [Gen. 28:20, Gen. 28:21] He prayed only for things necessary; yet, twenty years afterwards, he returned to the land of Canaan rich in substance. and richer still in children. [Gen. 32:5, Gen. 32:10] Numberless are the instances in Scripture which teach men to "Beware of covetousness." [Luke 12:15]

33. As I have been led to touch to the subject-it shall have a treatise to itself if Christ permit-I will relate what took place not very many years ago at Nitria. A brother, more thrifty than covetous, and ignorant that the Lord had been sold for thirty pieces of silver, [Matt. 26:15] left behind him at his death a hundred pieces of money which he had earned by weaving linen. As there were about five thousand monks in the neighborhood, living in as many separate cells, a council was held as to what should be done. Some said that the coins should be distributed among the poor; others that they should be given to the church, while others were for sending them back to the relatives of the deceased. However, Macarius, Pambo, Isidore and the rest of those called fathers, speaking by the Spirit, decided that they should be interred with their owner, with the words: "Thy money perish with thee." [Acts 8:20] Nor was this too harsh a decision; for so great fear has fallen upon all throughout Egypt, that it is now a crime to leave after one a single shilling.

34. As I have mentioned the monks, and know that you like to hear about holy things, lend an ear to me for a few moments. There are in Egypt three classes of monks. First, there are the coenobites,³⁵ called in their Gentile language Sauses,³⁶ or, as we should say, men living in a community.³⁷ Secondly, there are the anchorites,³⁸ who live in the desert, each man by himself, and are so called because they have withdrawn from human society. Thirdly, there is the class called Remoboth,³⁹ a very inferior and little regarded type, peculiar to my own province,⁴⁰ or, at least, originating there. These live together in twos and threes, but seldom in larger numbers, and are bound by no rule; but do exactly as they choose. A portion of their earnings they contribute to a common fund, out of which food is provided for all. In most cases they reside in cities and strongholds; and, as though it were their workmanship which is holy, and not their life, all that they sell is extremely dear. They often quarrel because they are unwilling, while supplying their own food, to be subordinate to others. It is true that they compete with each other in fasting; they make what should be a private concern an occasion for a triumph. In everything they study effect: their sleeves are loose, their boots bulge, their garb is of the coarsest. They are always sighing, or visiting virgins, or sneering at the clergy; yet when a holiday comes, they make themselves sick-they eat so much.

35. Having then rid ourselves of these as of so many plagues, let us come to that more numerous class who live together, and who are, as we have said, called Coenobites. Among these the first principle of union is to obey superiors and to do whatever they command. They are divided into bodies of ten and of a hundred, so that each tenth man has authority over nine others, while the hundredth has ten of these officers under him. They live apart from each other, in separate cells. According to their rule, no monk may visit another before the ninth hour;⁴¹ except the deans⁴² above mentioned, whose office is to comfort, with soothing words, those whose thoughts disquiet them. After the ninth hour they meet together to sing psalms and read the Scriptures according to usage. Then when the prayers have ended and all have sat down, one called the father stands up among them and begins to expound the portion of the day. While he is speaking the silence is profound; no man ventures to look at his neighbor or to clear his throat. The speaker's praise is in the weeping of his hearers.⁴³ Silent tears roll down their cheeks, but not a sob escapes from their lips. Yet when he begins to speak of Christ's kingdom, and of future bliss, and of the glory which is to come, every one may be noticed saying to himself, with a gentle sigh and uplifted eyes: "Oh, that I had wings like a dove! For then would I fly away and be at rest." [Ps. 55:6] After this the meeting breaks up and each company of ten goes with its father to its own table. This they take in turns to serve each for a week at a time. No noise is made over the food; no one talks while eating. Bread, pulse and greens form their fare, and the only seasoning that they use is salt. Wine is given only to the old, who with the children often have a special meal prepared for them to repair the ravages of age and to save the young from premature decay. When the meal is over they all rise together, and, after singing a hymn, return to their dwellings. There each one talks till evening with his comrade thus: "Have you noticed so-and-so? What grace he has How silent he is! How soberly he walks!" If any one is weak they comfort him; or if he is fervent in love to God, they encourage him to fresh earnestness. And because at night, besides the public prayers, each man keeps vigil in his own chamber, they go round all the cells one by one, and putting their ears to the doors, carefully ascertain what their occupants are doing. If they find a monk slothful, they do not scold him; but, dissembling what they know, they visit him more frequently, and at first exhort rather than compel him to pray more. Each day has its allotted task, and this being given in to the dean, is by him brought to the steward. This latter, once a month, gives a scrupulous account to their common father. He also tastes the dishes when they are cooked, and, as no one is allowed to say, "I am without a tunic or a cloak or a couch of rushes," he so arranges that no one need ask for or go without what he wants. In case a monk falls ill, he is moved to a more spacious chamber, and there so attentively nursed by the old men, that he misses neither the luxury of cities nor a mother's kindness. Every Lord's day they spend their whole time in prayer and reading; indeed, when they have finished their tasks, these are their usual occupations. Every day they learn by heart a portion of Scripture. They keep the same fasts all the year round, but in Lent they are allowed to live more strictly. After Whitsuntide they exchange their evening meal for a midday one; both to satisfy the tradition of the church and to avoid overloading their stomachs with a double supply of food. A similar description is given of the Essenes by Philo,⁴⁴ Plato's imitator; also by Josephus, [Josephus, The Jewish War, 2:8] the Greek Livy, in his narrative of the Jewish captivity.

36. As my present subject is virgins, I have said rather too much about monks. I will pass on, therefore, to the third class, called anchorites, who go from the monasteries into the deserts, with nothing but bread and salt. Paul⁴⁵ introduced this way of life; Antony made it famous, and-to go farther back still-John the Baptist set the first example of it. The prophet Jeremiah describes one such in the words: "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him. He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him, he is filled full with reproach. For the Lord will not east off forever."⁴⁶ The struggle of the anchorites and their life-in the flesh, yet not of the flesh-I will, if you wish, explain to you at some other time. I must now return to the subject of covetousness, which I left to speak of the monks. With them before your eyes you will despise, not only gold and silver in general, but earth itself and heaven. United to Christ, you will sing, "The Lord is my portion." [Lam. 3:24]

37. Farther, although the apostle bids us to "pray without ceasing," [1 Thess. 5:17] and although to the saints their very sleep is a supplication, we ought to have fixed hours of prayer, that if we are detained by work, the time may remind us of our duty. Prayers, as every one knows, ought to be said at the third, sixth and ninth hours, at dawn and at evening.⁴⁷ No meal should be begun without prayer, and before leaving table thanks should be returned to the Creator. We should rise two or three times in the night, and go over the parts of Scripture which we know by heart. When we leave the roof which shelters us, prayer should be our armor; and when we return from the street we should pray before we sit down, and not give the frail body rest until the soul is fed. In every act we do, in every step we take, let our hand trace the Lord's cross. Speak against nobody, and do not slander your mother's son. [Ps. 50:20] "Who art thou that judgest the servant of another? To his own lord he standeth or falleth; yea, he shall be made to stand, for the Lord hath power to make him stand." [Rom. 14:4, R.V] If you have fasted two or three days, do not think yourself better than others who do not fast. You fast and are angry; another eats and wears a smiling face. You work off your irritation and hunger in quarrels. He uses food in moderation and gives God thanks. [Rom. 14:6, R.V] Daily Isaiah cries: "Is it such a fast that I have chosen, saith the Lord?" [Isa. 58:5] and again: "In the day of your fast ye find your own pleasure, and oppress all your laborers. Behold ye fast for strife and contention, and to smite with the fist of wickedness. How fast ye unto me?" [Isaiah 58:3, Isaiah 58:4, R.V. marg] What kind of fast can his be whose wrath is such that not only does the night go down upon it, but that even the moon's changes leave it unchanged?

38. Look to yourself and glory in your own success and not in others' failure. Some women care for the flesh and reckon up their income and daily expenditure: such are no fit models for you. Judas was a traitor, but the eleven apostles did not waver. Phygellus and Alexander made shipwreck; but the rest continued to run the race of faith. [1 Tim. 1:19, 1 Tim. 1:20; 2 Tim. 1:15] Say not: "So-and-so enjoys her own property, she is honored of men, her brothers and sisters come to see her. Has she then ceased to be a virgin?" In the first place, it is doubtful if she is a virgin. For "the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh upon the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." [1 Sam. 16:7] Again, she may be a virgin in body and not in spirit. According to the apostle, a true virgin is "holy both in body and in spirit." [1 Cor. 7:34] Lastly, let her glory in her own way. Let her override Paul's opinion and live in the enjoyment of her good things But you and I must follow better examples.

Set before you the blessed Mary, whose surpassing purity made her meet to be the mother of the Lord. When the angel Gabriel came down to her, in the form of a man, and said: "Hail, thou that art highly favored; the Lord is with thee," [Luke 1:28] she was terror-stricken and unable to reply, for she had never been saluted by a man before. But, on learning who he was, she spoke, and one who had been afraid of a man conversed fearlessly with an angel. Now you, too, may be the Lord's mother. "Take thee a great roll and write in it with a man's pen Maher-shalal-hash-baz."⁴⁸ And when you have gone to the prophetess, and have conceived in the womb, and have brought forth a son,⁴⁹ say: "Lord, we have been with child by thy fear, we have been in pain, we have brought forth the spirit of thy salvation, which we have wrought upon the earth." [Isa. 26:18, Vulg] Then shall your Son reply: "Behold my mother and my brethren." [Matt. 12:49] And He whose name you have so recently inscribed upon the table of your heart, and have written with a pen upon its renewed surface [Prov. 7:3; Jer. 31:33] -He, after He has recovered the spoil from the enemy, and has spoiled principalities and powers, nailing them to His cross [Col. 2:14, Col. 2:15] -having been miraculously conceived, grows up to manhood; and, as He becomes older, regards you no longer as His mother, but as His bride. To be as the martyrs, or as the apostles, or as Christ, involves a hard struggle, but brings with it a great reward.

All such efforts are only of use when they are made within the church's pale;⁵⁰ we must celebrate the passover in the one house, [Exod. 12:46] we must enter the ark with Noah, [1 Peter 3:20, 1 Peter 3:21] we must take refuge from the fall of Jericho with the justified harlot, Rahab. [James 2:25] Such virgins as there are said to be among the heretics and among the followers of the infamous Manes⁵¹ must be considered, not virgins, but prostitutes. For if-as they allege-the devil is the author of the body, how can they honor that which is fashioned by their foe? No; it is because they know that the name virgin brings glory with it, that they go about as wolves in sheep's clothing. [Matt. 7:15] As antichrist pretends to be Christ, such virgins assume an honorable name, that they may the better cloak a discreditable life. Rejoice, my sister; rejoice, my daughter; rejoice, my virgin; for you have resolved to be, in reality, that which others insincerely feign.

39. The things that I have here set forth will seem hard to her who loves not Christ. But one who has come to regard all the splendor of the world as off-scourings, and to hold all things under the sun as vain, that he may win Christ; [Phil. 3:8] one who has died with his Lord and risen again, and has crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts; [Rom. 6:4; Gal. 5:24] he will boldly cry out: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" and again: "I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor angels, nor principalities nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus, our Lord." [Rom. 8:35, Rom. 8:38, Rom. 8:39] For our salvation the Son of God is made the Son of Man.⁵² Nine months He awaits His birth in the womb, undergoes the most revolting conditions,⁵³ and comes forth covered with blood, to be swathed in rags and covered with caresses. He who shuts up the world in His fist [Cp. Ps. 95:4, Ps. 95:5; Isa. 40:12] is contained in the narrow limits of a manger. I say nothing of the thirty years during which he lives in obscurity, satisfied with the poverty of his parents. [Luke 2:51, Luke 2:52] When He is scourged He holds His peace; when He is crucified, He prays for His crucifiers. "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits towards me? I will take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." [Ps. 116:12, Ps. 116:13, Ps. 116:15] The only fitting return that we can make to Him is to give blood for blood; and, as we are redeemed by the blood of Christ, gladly to lay down our lives for our Redeemer. What saint has ever won his crown without first contending for it? Righteous Abel is murdered. Abraham is in danger of losing his wife. And, as I must not enlarge my book unduly, seek for yourself: you will find that all holy men have suffered adversity. Solomon alone lived in luxury and perhaps it was for this reason that he fell. For "whom the Lord loveth, He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." [Heb. 12:6] Which is best-for a short time to do battle, to carry stakes for the palisades, to bear arms, to faint under heavy bucklers, that ever afterwards we may rejoice as victors? or to become slaves forever, just because we cannot endure for a single hour? [Cp. Matt. 26:40]

40. Love finds nothing hard; no task is difficult to the eager. Think of all that Jacob bore for Rachel, the wife who had been promised to him. "Jacob," the Scripture says, "served seven years for Rachel. And they seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her." [Gen. 29:20] Afterwards he himself tells us what he had to undergo. "In the day the drought consumed me and the frost by night." [Gen. 31:40] So we must love Christ and always seek His embraces. Then everything difficult will seem easy; all things long we shall account short; and smitten with His arrows, [Ps. 38:2] we shall say every moment: "Woe is me that I have prolonged my pilgrimage." [Ps. 120:5, Vulg] For "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." [Rom. 8:18] For "tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope; and hope maketh not ashamed." [Rom. 5:3-5] When your lot seems hard to bear read Paul's second epistle to the Corinthians: "In labors more abundant; in stripes above measure; in prisons more frequent; in deaths oft. Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one; thrice was I beaten with rods; once was I stoned; thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep; in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren, in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness." [2 Cor. 11:23-27] Which of us can claim the veriest fraction of the virtues here enumerated? Yet it was these which afterwards made him bold to say: "I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day." [2 Tim. 4:7, 2 Tim. 4:8] But we, if our food is less appetizing than usual, get sullen, and fancy that we do God a favor by drinking watered wine. And if the water brought to us is a trifle too warm, we break the cup and overturn the table and scourge the servant in fault until blood comes. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force." [Matt. 11:12] Still, unless you use force you will never seize the kingdom of heaven. Unless you knock importunately you will never receive the sacramental bread. [Luke 11:5-8] Is it not truly violence, think you, when the flesh desires to be as God and ascends to the place whence angels have fallen [Is. 14:12, Is. 14:13] to judge angels?

41. Emerge, I pray you, for a while from your prison-house, and paint before your eyes the reward of your present toil, a reward which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man." [1 Cor. 2:9] What will be the glory of that day when Mary, the mother of the Lord, shall come to meet you, accompanied by her virgin choirs! When, the Red Sea past and Pharaoh drowned with his host, Miriam, Aaron's sister, her timbrel in her hand, shall chant to the answering women: "Sing ye unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." [Ex. 15:20, Ex. 15:21] Then shall Thecla⁵⁴ fly with joy to embrace you. Then shall your Spouse himself come forward and say: "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away, for lo! the winter is past, the rain is over and gone." [Cant. 2:10, Cant. 2:11] Then shall the angels say with wonder: "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun?" [Cant. 6:10] "The daughters shall see you and bless you; yea, the queens shall proclaim and the concubines shall praise you." [Cant. 6:9] And, after these, yet another company of chaste women will meet you. Sarah will come with the wedded; Anna, the daughter of Phanuel, with the widows. In the one band you will find your natural mother and in the other your spiritual.⁵⁵ The one will rejoice in having borne, the other will exult in having taught you. Then truly will the Lord ride upon his ass,⁵⁶ and thus enter the heavenly Jerusalem. Then the little ones (of whom, in Isaiah, the Saviour says: "Behold, I and the children whom the Lord hath given me" [Isa. 8:18]) shall lift up palms of victory and shall sing with one voice: "Hosanna in the highest, blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, hosanna in the highest." [Matt. 21:9] Then shall the "hundred and forty and four thousand" hold their harps before the throne and before the elders and shall sing the new song. And no man shall have power to learn that song save those for whom it is appointed. "These are they which were not defiled with women; for they are virgins. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." [Rev. 14:1-4] As often as this life's idle show tries to charm you; as often as you see in the world some vain pomp, transport yourself in mind to Paradise, essay to be now what you will be hereafter, and you will hear your Spouse say: "Set me as a sunshade in thine heart and as a seal upon thine arm."⁵⁷ And then, strengthened in body as well as in mind, you, too, will cry aloud and say: "Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it." [Cant. 8:7] 1: According to the Vulgate 2: John. 14:30. The variant is difficult to explain and may be only a slip 3: An allusion to "Maher-shalal-hash-baz," Isa. 8:1

4: Obad. 4 5: Deut. 23:3 - Jerome substitutes "fourteenth" for "tenth.

6:

Bel. 33-39

7: 2 Sam. xi 8: Solomon was the reputed author of the Book of Wisdom

9:

1 K. xi 1-4

10: 2 Sam. xiii 11: The Manichaeans believed evil to be inseparable from matter. Hence they inculcated a rigid asceticism 12: Plebeians wore a narrow stripe, patricians abroad one

13: Beloved ones, viz., women who lived with the unmarried clergy professedly as spiritual sisters, but really (in too many cases) as mistresses. The evil custom was widely prevalent and called forth many protests. The councils of Elvira, Ancyra, and Nicaea passed canons against it 14: Cena dubia. The allusion is to Terence, Phormio, 342 15: Ps. 39:6, Vulg. That is, who knows that the world is vanity 16: See Letter XLVIII. 3 17: In the Latin there is a play on words here between virga and virgo 18: Matt. 10:10. According to Letter XXIII. these typify dead works

19: Judith xiii 20: See the treatise Against Helvidius, in this volume 21: Not extant. Jerome alludes to it again in his treatise against Jovinian 22: See Migne's "Patrologia," xiii., col. 347-418 23: Ambrose de Virg. Migne's "Patrologia," xvi., col. 187

24:

R.V. marg

25:

R.V

26: Gen. xxxiv 27: Eccles. 10:4, A.V., "the spirit of the ruler.

28: Ps. 53:5, according to the Roman Psalter 29: Cucullis fabrefactis, ut ad infantiam redeant, imitantur noctuas et bubones 30: Diomede. See Lucretius, 5:31, and Virgil, A. 1:752 31: Cur mens diversa sit. The ordinary text has "menda.

32: Viz., the epistles of St. Paul. In like manner the Psalter was often called David 33: Terence, Eun. 236

34: "The eucharist was at first preceded, but at a later date was more usually followed, by the agape or love-feast. The materials of this were contributed by the members of the congregation, all of whatever station sat down to it as equals, and the meal was concluded with psalmody and prayer." (Robertson, C. H., 1:p. 235.) Scandals arose in connection with the practice, and it gradually fell into disuse, though even at a later date allusions to it are not infrequent 35: From koinoj bioj (koinos bios), a common life 36: Apparently an Egyptian word. It does not occur elsewhere 37: In commune viventes 38: From anaxwrein (anachorein), to withdraw

39:

These were monks who lived under no settled rule, but collected in little groups of two and three, generally in some populous place. They seem to have practised all the arts whereby a reputation for sanctity may be won, while they disparaged those who led more regular lives. Cassian (Collat. 18:7) draws an unfavorable picture of them. See Bingham, Antiquities, 7:ii. 4, and Dict. Xt. Ant., s. 5: Sarabaitae 40: Pannonia 41: I.e. three o'clock 42: Decani, "leaders of ten.

43: Cf. Letter LII 44: See Letter LXX. De Vir. LII. xi 45: I.e. the hermit of that name. See his Life in vol. 3: of this series 46: Lam. 3:27, Lam. 3:28, Lam. 3:30, Lam. 3:31

47: In Jerome's time the seven canonical hours of prayer had not yet been finally fixed. He mentions, however, six which correspond to the later, Mattins, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Nocturns. Cp. Letters CVII. CVIII. and CXXX 48: Isaiah 8:1, i.e. "the spoil speedeth, the prey hasteth;" or, in Jerome's rendering, "quickly carry away the spoils.

49: Isa. 8:3. Jerome should have substituted "prophet" for "prophetess." As it stands the quotation is meaningless 50: Cp. the maxim of Cyprian: Extra ecclesiam nulla salus, "Outside the church there is no salvation.

51: Founder of the widely prevalent sect of Manichaeans, which at one time numbered Augustine among its adherents. One of its leading tenets was that matter as such was essentially evil 52: An echo of the Nicene Creed 53: Cp. Virgil, Ecl. 4:61 54: A legendary virgin of Iconium said to have been converted by Paul 55: Viz. Paula, for whom see Letter CVIII., and Marcella, for whom see Letter CXXVII 56: Matt. 21:1-9, literally "she-ass.

57:

Cant. 8:6; the variant is peculiar to Jerome

Letters - letter_023

Letter 23. To Marcella.

Jerome writes to Marcella to console her for the loss of a friend who, like herself, was the head of a religious society at Rome. The news of Lea's death had first reached Marcella when she was engaged with Jerome in the study of the 73d psalm. Later in the day he writes this letter in which, after extolling Lea, he contrasts her end with that of the consul-elect, Vettius Agorius Praetextatus, a man of great ability and integrity, whom he declares to be now "in Tartarus." Written at Rome in 384 a.d.

1. To-day, about the third hour, just as I was beginning to read with you the seventy-second psalm¹ -the first, that is, of the third books-and to explain that its title belonged partly to the second book and partly to the third-the previous book, I mean, concluding with the words "the prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended," [Ps. 72:20] and the next commencing with the words "a psalm of Asaph"² -and just as I had come on the passage in which the righteous man declares: "If I say, I will speak thus; behold I should offend against the generation of thy children," [Ps. 73:15] a verse which is differently rendered in our Latin version:³ -suddenly the news came that our most saintly friend Lea had departed from the body. As was only natural, you turned deadly pale; for there are few persons, if any, who do not burst into tears when the earthen vessel breaks. [2 Cor. 4:7] But if you wept it was not from doubt as to her future lot, but only because you had not rendered to her the last sad offices which are due to the dead. Finally, as we were still conversing together, a second message informed us that her remains had been already conveyed to Ostia.

2. You may ask what is the use of repeating all this. I will reply in the apostle's words, "much every way."⁴ is now in Tartarus.⁵ Who can sufficiently eulogize our dear Lea's mode of living? So complete was her conversion to the Lord that, becoming the head of a monastery, she showed herself a true mother⁶ to the virgins in it, wore coarse sackcloth instead of soft raiment, passed sleepless nights in prayer, and instructed her companions even more by example than by precept. So great was her humility that she, who had once been the mistress of many, was accounted the servant of all; and certainly, the less she was reckoned an earthly mistress the more she became a servant of Christ. She was careless of her dress, neglected her hair, and ate only the coarsest food. Still, in all that she did, she avoided ostentation that she might not have her reward in this world. [Cf. Matt. 6:2]

3. Now, therefore, in return for her short toil, Lea enjoys everlasting felicity; she is welcomed into the choirs of the angels; she is comforted in Abraham's bosom. And, as once the beggar Lazarus saw the rich man, for all his purple, lying in torment, so does Lea see the consul, not now in his triumphal robe but clothed in mourning, and asking for a drop of water from her little finger. [Luke 16:19-24] How great a change have we here! A few days ago the highest dignitaries of the city walked before him as he ascended the ramparts of the capitol like a general celebrating a triumph; the Roman people leapt up to welcome and applaud him, and at the news of his death the whole city was moved. Now he is desolate and naked, a prisoner in the foulest darkness, and not, as his unhappy wife⁷ falsely asserts, set in the royal abode of the milky way.⁸ On the other hand Lea, who was always shut up in her one closet, who seemed poor and of little worth, and whose life was accounted madness, [Wisd. 5:4] now follows Christ and sings, "Like as we have heard, so have we seen in the city of our God." [Ps. 48:8]

4. And now for the moral of all this, which, with tears and groans, I conjure you to remember. While we run the way of this world, we must not clothe ourselves with two coats, that is, with a twofold faith, or burthen ourselves with leathern shoes, that is, with dead works; we must not allow scrips filled with money to weigh us down, or lean upon the staff of worldly power. [Matt. 10:10] We must not seek to possess both Christ and the world. No; things eternal must take the place of things transitory; [2 Cor. 4:18] and since, physically speaking, we daily anticipate death, if we wish for immortality we must realize that we are but mortal.

1:

In the English Version Ps. lxxiii

2: Ps. 73:title 3: I.e. the Old Latin Version superseded by Jerome's Vulgate 4: De suis saeculis detrahentem. The text is clearly corrupt, and no satisfactory emendation has yet been suggested 5: So the author of II. Peter speaks of God "tartartizing the angels that sinned" (ii. 4) 6: I.e. her conduct justified her official title 7: Paulina, chief priestess of Ceres 8: In the Roman mythology the abode of gods and heroes. Cf. Ovid, M. 1:175, 176

Letters - letter_024

Letter 24. To Marcella.

Concerning the virgin Asella. Dedicated to God before her birth, Marcella's sister had been made a church-virgin at the age of ten. From that time she had lived a life of the severest asceticism, first as a member and then as the head of Marcella's community upon the Aventine. Jerome, who subsequently wrote her a letter (XLV) on his departure from Rome, now holds her up as a model to be admired and imitated. Written at Rome a.d. 384.

1. Let no one blame my letters for the eulogies and censures which are contained in them. To arraign sinners is to admonish those in like case, and to praise the virtuous is to quicken the zeal of those who wish to do right. The day before yesterday I spoke to you concerning Lea of blessed memory,¹ and I had hardly done so, when I was pricked in my conscience. It would be wrong for me, I thought, to ignore a virgin after speaking of one who, as a widow, held a lower place. Accordingly, in my present letter, I mean to give you a brief sketch of the life of our dear Asella. Please do not read it to her; for she is sure to be displeased with eulogies of which she is herself the object. Show it rather to the young girls of your acquaintance, that they may guide themselves by her example, and may take her behavior as the pattern of a perfect life.

2. I pass over the facts that, before her birth, she was blessed while still in her mother's womb, and that, virgin-like, she was delivered to her father in a dream in a bowl of shining glass brighter than a mirror. And I say nothing of her consecration to the blessed life of virginity, a ceremony which took place when she was hardly more than ten years old, a mere babe still wrapped in swaddling clothes. For all that comes before works should be counted of grace; [Rom. 11:6] although, doubtless, God foreknew the future when He sanctified Jeremiah as yet unborn, [Jer. 1:5] when He made John to leap in his mother's womb, [Luke 1:41] and when, before the foundation of the world, He set apart Paul to preach the gospel of His son. [Eph. 1:4]

3. I come now to the life which after her twelfth year she, by her own exertion, chose, laid hold of, held fast to, entered upon, and fulfilled. Shut up in her narrow cell she roamed through paradise. Fasting was her recreation and hunger her refreshment. If she took food it was not from love of eating, but because of bodily exhaustion; and the bread and salt and cold water to which she restricted herself sharpened her appetite more than they appeased it. But I have almost forgotten to mention that of which I should have spoken first. When her resolution was still fresh she took her gold necklace made in the lamprey pattern (so called because bars of metal are linked together so as to form a flexible chain), and sold it without her parents' knowledge. Then putting on a dark dress such as her mother had never been willing that she should wear, she concluded her pious enterprise by consecrating herself forthwith to the Lord. She thus showed her relatives that they need hope to wring no farther concessions from one who, by her very dress, had condemned the world.

4. To go on with my story, her ways were quiet and she lived in great privacy. In fact, she rarely went abroad or spoke to a man. More wonderful still, much as she loved her virgin sister,² she did not care to see her. She worked with her own hands, for she knew that it was written: "If any will not work neither shall he eat." [2 Thess. 3:10] To the Bridegroom she spoke constantly in prayer and psalmody. She hurried to the martyrs' shrines unnoticed. Such visits gave her pleasure, and the more so because she was never recognized. All the year round she observed a continual fast, remaining without food for two or three days! at a time; but when Lent came she hoisted-if I may so speak-every stitch of canvas and fasted well-nigh from week's end to week's end with "a cheerful countenance." [Matt. 6:17] What would perhaps be incredible, were it not that "with God all things are possible," [Matt. 19:26] is that she lived this life until her fiftieth year without weakening her digestion or bringing on herself the pain of colic. Lying on the dry ground did not affect her limbs, and the rough sackcloth that she wore failed to make her skin either foul or rough. With a sound body and a still sounder soul [Cf. Juvenal, Sat. 10:356] she sought all her delight in solitude, and found for herself a monkish hermitage in the centre of busy Rome.

5. You are better acquainted with all this than I am, and the few details that I have given I have learned from you. So intimate are you with Asella that you have seen, with your own eyes, her holy knees hardened like those of a camel from the frequency of her prayers. I merely set forth what I can glean from you. She is alike pleasant in her serious moods and serious in her pleasant ones: her manner, while winning, is always grave, and while grave is always winning. Her pale face indicates continence but does not betoken ostentation. Her speech is silent and her silence is speech. Her pace is neither too fast nor too slow. Her demeanor is always the same. She disregards refinement and is careless about her dress. When she does attend to it it is without attending. So entirely consistent has her life been that here in Rome. the centre of vain shows, wanton license, and idle pleasure, where to be humble is to be held spiritless, the good praise her conduct and the bad do not venture to impugn it. Let widows and virgins imitate her, let wedded wives make much of her, let sinful women fear her, and let bishops³ look up to her.

1: Vide the preceding Letter 2: Probably Marcella before she was married

3:

Sacerdotes

Letters - letter_025

Letter 25. To Marcella. An explanation of the ten names given to God in the Hebrew Scriptures. The ten names are El, Elohim, Sabaoth, Elion, Asher yeheyeh (Ex. iii. 14), Adonai, Jah, the tetragram Jhvh, and Shaddai. Written at Rome 384 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

Ten names by which God is called among the Hebrews, explained by Marcella when asked by her.

Reading the ninetyeth Psalm, in the place where it is written: "He who dwells in the aid of the Most High, in the protection of the God of heaven will abide", I said among the Hebrews that it is attributed to the God of heaven, the Almighty, which is interpreted by Aquila as "sufficient", which we can accept as robust and sufficient for achieving all things: and he is one of the ten Names by which God is called among the Hebrews. Immediately you eagerly requested that I arrange for you all the names with their interpretations. I will do what you asked. The first name of God is El, which in the Septuagint is expressed by the word God, and Aquila as ■τυμολογ[■]αν, expressing ■σχυρ[■]ν, that is, strong.

Then Eloim and Eloie, which is also called God Himself. The fourth Sabaoth, which is translated in the Septuagint as the mighty, and Aquilas as the hosts, carried. The fifth Elion, which we call high. The sixth Eser Ieje, which is read in Exodus: "I AM has sent me."

Seventh Lord (Adonai), whom we generally call Lord. The eighth Ia, which is only used in God: and in Alleluia, the last syllable also sounds. The ninth ■τετρα[■]γραμματον, which is ■νεκρ[■]νητον, that is unspeakable, is written with these letters, Jod, He, Vav, He. Which some, not understanding because of the similarity of the letters, have been accustomed to read as ΙΙΙΙΙ when they found it in Greek books. The tenth, which was stated above, is Saddai, and it is not interpreted in Ezekiel. However, we ought to know that Elohim is of common number, so that one God is thus also called many, like heaven also is called the heavens, that is, Sanaim. Therefore, interpreters often differ, of which we have an example in our language: Athens, Thebes, Salonas.

Letters - letter_026

Letter 26. To Marcella. An explanation of certain Hebrew words which have been left untranslated in the versions. The words are Alleluia, Amen, Maran atha. Written at Rome 384 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. Recently when we were together, not through a letter as you used to do before, but you asked me in person, what those words mean in their own language which we do not have translated into Latin from Hebrew; and why they are put down without being interpreted, as is the case with Alleluia, Amen, Maran atha, Ephod, and others that you mentioned scattered throughout the Scriptures.
2. To which we briefly respond, because we are limited by the narrowness of dictation, that either the Seventy Interpreters or the Apostles took care that, since the first Church had been gathered from the Jews, they would not introduce anything new to the scandal of believers: but they would pass on what they had imbibed from the beginning. Later, when the preaching of the Gospel had spread to all nations, what had been once received could not be changed. Although even this, as Origen calls them in his explanatory books, cannot be pronounced among others as it was spoken among one's own people, because of the vernacular of each language, and that it is much better to leave it untranslated than to diminish their power through interpretation.
3. Therefore, Alleluia is expressed, "Praise the Lord," since it is one of the ten names of God amongst the Hebrews. And in that psalm, where we read, "Praise the Lord, for a psalm is good" (Ps. 146:1), it is read among the Hebrews, "Alleluia, Chi Tob Zammer."
4. But Amen, Aquila renders $\pi\epsilon\pi\iota\sigma\tau\omega\mu\epsilon\kappa\alpha\iota\ \nu\omicron\varsigma$, that which we, faithfully, can say, the adverb comes from the name of faith Amen of the Septuagint, that is, let it be done. Therefore, at the end of the books (since the Psalter is divided into five volumes among the Hebrews), they have translated it as "let it be done." In Hebrew, it is read as "Amen Amen," to confirm what has been said above. Hence, Paul asserts that no one can say "Amen" (i.e., confirm what has been preached) unless they understand the preaching. Maranatha is more Syriac than Hebrew, although it sounds somewhat Hebrew and is interpreted as "Our Lord has come"; the sense is, "If anyone does not love the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema" (1 Cor. 16:22), and with that accomplished, it follows: "Our Lord has come," which is unnecessary to argue against those who are stubbornly hostile, given that it is already clear that He has come.
5. I would like to write something to you about the Diapsalm, which is written among the Hebrews as Sela: and about the Ephod, and about that which is said in the title of a certain Psalm: For Aieleth, and other similar things; if I did not exceed the style of an epistle, and did not cause you to have an even greater desire for extended inquiries. For it is a well-known proverb: To think that rewards are self-obtained. Therefore, we intentionally keep silent about such things to make you more eager to hear what is not spoken.

Letters - letter_027

Letter 27. To Marcella. In this letter Jerome defends himself against the charge of having altered the text of Scripture, and shows that he has merely brought the Latin Version of the N.T. into agreement with the Greek original. Written at Rome 384 a.d.

1. After I had written my former letter,¹ containing a few remarks on some Hebrew words, a report suddenly reached me that certain contemptible creatures were deliberately assailing me with the charge that I had endeavored to correct passages in the gospels, against the authority of the ancients and the opinion of the whole world. Now, though I might-as far as strict right goes-treat these persons with contempt (it is idle to play the lyre for an ass²), yet, lest they should follow their usual habit and reproach me with superciliousness, let them take my answer as follows: I am not so dull-witted nor so coarsely ignorant (qualities which they take for holiness, calling themselves the disciples of fishermen as if men were made holy by knowing nothing)-I am not, I repeat, so ignorant as to suppose that any of the Lord's words is either in need of correction or is not divinely inspired; but the Latin manuscripts of the Scriptures are proved to be faulty by the variations which all of them exhibit, and my object has been to restore them to the form of the Greek original, from which my detractors do not deny that they have been translated. If they dislike water drawn from the clear spring, let them drink of the muddy streamlet, and when they come to read the Scriptures. let them lay aside³ the keen eye which they turn on woods frequented by game-birds and waters abounding in shellfish. Easily satisfied in this instance alone, let them, if they will, regard the words of Christ as rude sayings, albeit that over these so many great intellects have labored for so many ages rather to divine than to expound the meaning of each single word. Let them charge the great apostle with want of literary skill, although it is said of him that much learning made him mad. [Acts 26:24]

2. I know that as you read these words you will knit your brows, and fear that my freedom of speech is sowing the seeds of fresh quarrels; and that, if you could, you would gladly put your finger on my mouth to prevent me from even speaking of things which others do not blush to do. But, I ask you, wherein have I used too great license? Have I ever embellished my dinner plates with engravings of idols? Have I ever, at a Christian banquet, set before the eyes of virgins the polluting spectacle of Satyrs embracing bacchanals? or have I ever assailed any one in too bitter terms? Have I ever complained of beggars turned millionaires? Have I ever censured heirs for the funerals which they have given to their benefactors?⁴ The one thing that I have unfortunately said has been that virgins ought to live more in the company of women than of men,⁵ and by this I have made the whole city look scandalized and caused every one to point at me the finger of scorn. "They that hate me without a cause are more than the hairs of mine head," [Ps. 69:4] and I am become "a proverb to them." [Ps. 69:11] Do you suppose after this that I will now say anything rash?

3. But "when I set the wheel rolling I began to form a wine flagon; how comes it that a waterpot is the result?"⁶ Lest Horace laugh at me I come back to my two-legged asses, and din into their ears, not the music of the lute, but the blare of the trumpet.⁷ They may say if they will, "rejoicing in hope; serving the time," but we will say "rejoicing in hope; serving the Lord."⁸ They may see fit to receive an accusation against a presbyter unconditionally; but we will say in the words of Scripture, "Against an elder⁹ receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses. Them that sin rebuke before all." [1 Tim. 5:19, 1 Tim. 5:20] They may choose to read, "It is a man's saying, and worthy of all acceptance;" we are content to err with the Greeks, that is to say with the apostle himself, who spoke Greek. Our version, therefore, is, it is "a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance." [1 Tim. 1:15] Lastly, let them take as much pleasure as they please in their Gallican "geldings;"¹⁰ we will be satisfied with the simple "ass" of Zechariah, loosed from its halter and made ready for the Saviour's service, which received the Lord on its back, and so fulfilled Isaiah's prediction: "Blessed is he that soweth beside all waters, where the ox and the ass tread under foot." [Isa. 32:20, LXX]

1: XXVI 2: #Onw lura was a Greek proverb 3: Reading nec diligentiam instead of et 4: Haereditarias sepulturas 5: The reference is to Letter XXII 6: Hor. A. P. 21, 22

7:

Perhaps an allusion to the Greek proverb, onoj luraj hkouse kai salpiggoj uj. "The ass listened to the lyre, and the pig to the trumpet.

8: Rom. 12:11, Rom. 12:12. The reading kuriw "Lord" is probably correct. The R.V. says, "Some ancient authorities read the opportunity," (kairw) 9: I.e. a "presbyter.

10:

Jerome's detractors suggested this word instead of the simpler "ass" in Zech. 9:9 and Matt. 21:2-5. The phrase "Gallican geldings" appears to be a quotation from Plaut. Aul. 3:5, 21

Letters - letter_028

Letter 28. To Marcella. An explanation of the Hebrew word Selah (or Diapsalma). This word, rendered by the LXX "διψαλμα" and by Aquila "ε", was as much a crux in Jerome's day as it is in ours. "Some," he writes, "make it a 'change of metre,' others 'a pause for breath,' others 'the beginning of a new subject.' According to yet others it has something to do with rhythm or marks a burst of instrumental music." Jerome himself inclines to follow Aquila and Origen, who make the word mean "forever," and suggests that it betokens completion, like the "explicit" or "feliciter" in contemporary Latin mss. Written at Rome a.d. 384.

Jerome sets down in Latin word for word Origen's letter so that Marcella may more fully know what he meant on the proposed question. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. What you have received must be returned with interest, and a strong delay gives birth to usury. You asked for our opinion on the Diapsalmata; we have made the excuse of the brevity of the letter, and said that the matter cannot be explained in writing. But what good does it do for my hardworking self? Your desire is stimulated further by silence. Therefore, not to prolong things further, consider a few things as many.

2. Some have said that Diapsalma is a change of meter; others a pause of breath; some the beginning of another meaning. There are those who consider it a distinction of rhythm; and because the Psalms were then sung with joined voice to the organ of that certain musical variety, they consider it a silence. None of this seems to us; since the eagle, who is the most diligent expounder of Hebrew words, always renders "Sela," that is, "Diapsalma," which is written from Samech, Lamed, He: and we find "Diapsalma" placed at the end of the Psalms also, as it is in the third: "You have broken the teeth of sinners: salvation is from the Lord, and thy blessing is upon thy people, sela," that is, "always:" And in the twenty-third: "Who is this king of glory? The Lord of hosts himself is the king of glory, always." On the contrary, it is nowhere to be found in many verses of psalms, to wit, in the thirty-sixth, and seventy-seventh, and one hundred and eighteenth. Again the ninth Psalm is distinguished by a Diapsalmatic Song: for certainly if, as seems to some, the Diapsalma is the beginning of silence, it cannot be a Song of silence.

3. From which we observe that this word connects things both superior and inferior, or at least it teaches that things which have been said are eternal, as in the third (book): "Many say to my soul, there is no salvation for him in his God, forever." And again: "With my voice I cried to the Lord, and he heard me from his holy mountain, ever." And in the fourth: "Why do you love vanity and seek lies? forever." And again, "What you say in your hearts, and you are pricked in your beds, forever." And in Habakkuk: "God will come from the south, and the Holy One from mount Pharan, forever." And below: "Thou hast spoken oaths to the tribes, forever." [Hab. 3]

4. However, we should know that among the Hebrews, at the end of the books, it is customary for one of three things to be added, namely, Amen or Sela or Salom, which expresses peace. Hence

Solomon is called pacific. Therefore, just as we usually insert 'Explicit' or 'Feliciter' or something of this kind after completing a small work, for the purpose of marking the distinction with the following matter, so the Hebrews, in order to confirm what has been written, are accustomed to say Amen, or to signify that what is to be written is to be remembered for all time and put down Sela, or when they testify that something has been brought to a happy conclusion, they add peace at the end.

5. We have drawn these things from the depths of the Hebrew source, not pursuing streams of opinions, nor being frightened by the variety of errors with which the whole world is filled; but desiring both to know and to teach what is true. And if this does not seem burdensome to you, I will interpret the words of Origen on the Diapsalm in the very words themselves, so that if you disdain new wine, you may at least be led by the authority of old wine.

6. Often seeking reasons why in some Psalms a Diapsalm is interposed, I observed most diligently in Hebrew, and compared it with the Greek, and I found that where the Hebrew language has the word 'Sela', but the Greek always, or something of this kind, there the Seventy, and Theodotion, and Symmachus translated a Diapsalm. Nor does it hurt to affirm what we say with examples. In the seventy-fourth Psalm, whose beginning is: "We will confess to thee, O God, we will confess, and we will invoke thy name; after it," I confirmed his columns, "with Seventy and Theodotion, and Symmachus is Diapsalma; for which, with Aquila, "I weighed his columns always." In the Fifth Edition: "I am the one who prepared his columns, always." But in the Sixth: "I confirmed his columns continually." Moreover, in Hebrew, after Amuda, which is, his columns, Selah. And again in the seventy-fifth [psalm], the beginning of which is: "God is known in Judah; in Israel his name is great," we find according to the Septuagint and Theodotion, after "shield and sword, and war," [a musical term] "A Psalm." According to Symmachus, after "shield and sword and war" [the same musical term]. This is rendered by Aquila as "shield and sword and war forever." In the Fifth [Revised Greek] Edition, after "shield and javelin and war forever." In the Sixth, after "shield and sword and war to the end." And again in the Hebrew [original] after "Do not destroy," which is "A psalm" [follows]. And in the same psalm after that place, 'that he may make safe the meek of the earth,' a Diapsalm: the same at Symmachus' [version] Diapsalm; and always at the eagle's [version]; also at Quinta's [version]. But in the sixth [Psalm], to the end. And in the Hebrew [version], after "Anie Ares", which means "meek of the earth," is "Sela." And so when we came upon the opinion of each edition, we annotated this. However, I leave it to your judgment whether they meant some kind of musical chant or a change in rhythm, which they translated as Diapsalm.

7. Up to now Origen, whom we preferred to follow in this debate through ignorance rather than to be considered unwise by not following him.

Letters - letter_029

Letter 29. To Marcella. An explanation of the Hebrew words Ephod bad (1 Sam. 2:18) and Teraphim (Judges 17:5). Written at Rome to Marcella, also at Rome a.d. 384. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. The office of letter writing is to write about family matters or daily conversations, and in a way become present to each other while announcing what they want or what has been done: although sometimes such a conversation is seasoned with the salt of learning. But while you are entirely occupied with treatises, you write nothing to me except what torments me and compels me to read the Scriptures. Finally, yesterday you proposed a very famous question and demanded that I immediately write back what I thought. As if I hold the chair of the Pharisees, so that every time there is a dispute about Hebrew words, I am appointed as an arbiter and the sequestrator of the dispute. These are not pleasant letters which do not smell of cake, which Apicius does not preserve, in which there is nothing about the law of the masters of this time. But because our messenger and intermediary of our conversation is hurrying to return, I will say a great thing more quickly than I have it: When disputing about the Holy Scriptures, words are not as necessary as meaning. But if you seek (or we seek) eloquence, Demosthenes must be read, or Tully; if divine Sacraments, our codices are to be looked at, which do not resonate well from Hebrew into Latin.

2. In front of your letter you had placed 'What does it mean?' which is written in the first book of Kings. 'And Samuel was serving before the face of the Lord, girt with a linen ephod, and he had a little coat: and his mother made him a doublet, which she brought to him on the days of her going up with her husband to offer the solemn sacrifice.' And if a garment, how is it to be fastened? And why is a clasp added to the ephod itself? You also write that you have read in the following passages: 'A man of God came to Eli and said to him, "This is what the Lord says: I revealed myself to your father's family when they were in Egypt, subject to Pharaoh's house. I chose your father's family out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priests, to go up to my altar, to burn incense, and to wear an ephod."' (Ibid. 27-28). And following the order of the entire book, you have also taken an example from that place where Doeg the Edomite killed the priests at the command of the king. And turning, the Scripture says, Doec the Syrian himself killed the priests of the Lord: and he killed three hundred and five men on that day (ibid. c. 22. v. 18 and 19), or (as it is read in Hebrew) eighty-five, all who carried the ephod. And he killed the city of the priests of Nob with the edge of the sword, from man to woman, from infant to nursing child, and also the ox, and the donkey, and the sheep, all with the edge of the sword. And one son of Abimelech son of Achitob was saved; and his name was Abiathar, and he fled after David.

I do not hold myself back from expecting to anticipate the order of the problem in my response, where we read now, 'And all the bearers of the Ephod' (1 Kings 22): in Hebrew, it has 'bearers of the bad Ephod.' You will learn why I say this in what follows. You also added what follows: 'And it came to pass, when Abiathar the son of Abimelech fled to David, he went down with David to Keilah, having the Ephod in his hand: and it was told to Saul, that David came to Keilah' (Ibid. c.

23.6. and following): where when they feared the arrival of the king and the siege of the city, David said to Abiathar: 'Bring the Ephod of the Lord.' These are the things which, presenting the excerpts from the book of Kingdoms, you have surpassed into the volume of Judges, where it is written that Micha of Mount Ephraim returned one thousand, one hundred silver shekels to his mother, which she had vowed; and she made a sculpture and a cast from it. "And you add to this, after a short time, that it was called the Ephod and Teraphim—though, of course, if it were a girdle or a type of garment, it could not have been sculpted or molded. I recognize the error of nearly all Latins who believe that the Ephod and Teraphim, which are mentioned afterwards, were made of the silver that Micah had given to his mother; whereas Scripture records, 'And his mother took the money,' and it is clear that Micha gave the money to the skillful worker and had a graven and a molten image made, and it was in the house of Micah, and Micah and his house served God, and he made an Ephod and Teraphim, and filled the hand of one of his sons and made him a priest." (Judges 17:4-5) But if you think that the things which were previously called a carved and cast image, Ephod, and Teraphim are thereafter named, know that they are not the same. For after the idol of his mother, which is called a carved and cast image, Micha made the Ephod and Teraphim, as is proved by the following. "And the five men who went to explore the land answered and said to their brothers." "Behold, you know that there is an ephod and theraphim and an idol and a molten image in these houses" (Ibid. c. 18. 14. et seqq.). And after many things which thou hast passed over, "And five men went up," said he, "and rushed in thither, and took the idol and the molten image, the ephod and the theraphim. And six hundred men, all girt with weapons of war, entered into the house of Michas, and took away the idol and the molten image, the ephod also and the theraphim." Therefore he convicts the opinion of those who thought that the ephod was silver, by briefly observing that it is never mentioned except in connection with the priesthood. For Samuel who is referred to as girded with it, was a Levite, and the priests of Nob carried this distinctive badge of their office. And (which is not in Latin codices) when David, fleeing from Saul, came to Abimelech, and asked for a sword, saying: 'See if there is a spear or sword at hand, for I did not bring my sword or my other weapons with me', the priest replied, 'Here is the sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom you slew in the valley of Terebinth, and it is wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod; if you will take that, take it, for there is no other here'. (1 Samuel 21:8–9). Evidently the ephod was kept hidden. This also, which we have now set forth, where "graven" and "molten" is read, although it be an idol, yet because it was supposed, through error of religion, to be for veneration, an ornament is made of it, as it were for the service (or mystery) of God, Ephod and Theraphim.

4. We will now proceed to explain what Theraphim is, if there is time for dictation. Meanwhile, we must explain about the Ephod, as we have begun. In Exodus, where Moses is commanded to make priestly garments, it is written: "And these are the garments which they shall make; a breastplate, and an ephod, and a robe, and a broidered coat, a mitre, and a girdle" (Exod. 28: 4). But where we have put "epohod," the Septuagint interpreters translated "■πωμιδα" in Greek, meaning that such a garment would come over the shoulders. Then it is added: "And they shall take gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen. And they shall make the ephod of gold, of blue, and of purple, of scarlet, and fine twined linen, with cunning work." To put it briefly, the entire book of Exodus is filled with this kind of garment. For at the end of the same volume it is written: 'And every wise man made in the works the tunics of the saints, which are those of Aaron the priest, as the Lord commanded Moses. And they made a shoulder-piece of gold, and hyacinth, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twisted linen.' (Exodus 39:1-2). But because in Exodus this type of garment is only commanded to be made, and later it is reported as being made, however Aaron is not dressed in it, in Leviticus how he was dressed in priestly vestments is explained: 'And Moses brought Aaron and his sons, and washed them with water, and he put on him the tunic, and girded him with a girdle, and clothed him with a robe', which we can interpret as the undershirt, or tunic, with which he was dressed underneath. "And he put upon him the tunic, and girded him with the girdle, and put on him the robe, and also the rational, and put the mitre upon his head: and fastened the ephod upon him" (Lev. 8:6-7). You see, therefore, Aaron is girded with an ephod, just as for some reason Samuel was girded with a bad ephod. But lest I take you further, have this understanding. Wherever in the Seventy Interpreters, that is, in our books the 'epomis,' that is, the ephod, is read, in the Hebrew it is written ephod. Why they wanted to interpret this elsewhere and leave it uninterpreted elsewhere is not my judgement, since they have done this in several places: as they had expressed differently elsewhere, they exhausted the variety of translation by finally placing the very Hebrew words. But Aquila has said that which those others said as "subligaculum" and "superhumeralis," that is, vestment and garment. That the "vestment," which in Hebrew is called "mail," means the under-tunic; but the "garment," that is, ephod, which is called in Hebrew Ephod, indicates the superior cloak, by which the whole priestly ambit is covered.

5. You may ask, perhaps, if the priestly Ephod is a "pallium", why is it sometimes called "bar"? When I hear the word "bar", I cannot help laughing. For when it is said among the Hebrews "bad", it is also clear that the Seventy Interpreters have so translated it that instead of "bad" it was written "bar", an error having arisen. But "bad" in the Hebrew language means linen, although "phesta" more significantly expresses linen. Finally, where we read, "And thou shalt make them linen breeches to cover their nakedness from the loins even unto the thighs" (Exodus 28:42): in the Hebrew the word for linen is "bad". In what appearance that man who is shown to Daniel was dressed. "And I lifted up my eyes, and saw: and behold a man clothed in linen" (Dan. 10.5), for which plural number, linen garments are now called. Therefore, Samuel and eighty-five priestly men are said to have carried a linen Ephod, because the high priest alone had the right to dress in an Ephod that was not made of linen; but (as Scripture recalls) it was woven with gold, hyacinth, purple, scarlet, and fine linen. The others had an Ephod, not distinguished by that variety, and not decorated by twelve stones, which resided on each shoulder, but linen and simple, and pure with all whiteness.

6. However, because I promised earlier that if there was time for dictate, I would also briefly discuss the Theraphim: and no one interrupted in the meantime: know that Theraphim is interpreted as "shapes" or "figurations" by Aquila. For in that place, when Saul sent messengers to take David, and they responded that he was severely troubled, he sent again saying: "Bring him to me in bed, so that I may kill him." And the messengers came, and behold, the Theraphim were on the bed (1 Kings 19:15). Instead of cenotaphs, Theraphim is used in Hebrew, that is, "shapes" or "figurations". And they were not goat's livers as our codices have it, but a small pillow made from goat's skin, which, with shaved hairs and a head covered, deceived one into thinking it was a person in the bed. But, in order to equally explain the truth of each way of speaking, God threatens in Hosea to take away all grace from the fornicating people, saying that 'for many days the children of Israel will sit without a king, and prince, without sacrifice, without altar, and without priesthood, and revelations' (Hosea 3:4). Regarding priesthood and revelations, in Hebrew it is 'without ephod and without household gods,' as Theodotion and Symmachus translated. From this we understand that in the Ephod, according to the Septuagint as well, priestly offices are interpreted as meaning senses rather than words, but in the Theraphim, that is, in various works called Theraphim, they are understood as figures or images. For in Exodus and other places where feathered garments are described, Cherubim work, that is, varied and depicted, is described: yet with the letter Vau not having Cherubims, because wherever it is written with this letter, it signifies animals rather than works. Therefore, according to this interpretation, it is shown that Micha made the rest of the priestly ornaments through the Theraphim with the priestly robe.

7. I wish I could now explain to you the entire priestly habit, and through each type of clothing, reveal divine mysteries. But because we have exceeded the brevity of this letter itself, and Josephus and Philo, most learned men of the Jews, and many of our own have widely discussed this matter, whose voice, as they say, you will hear me: whatever else you want, ask now as an inquirer present, so that if we happen not to know something, without a witness, without a judge, we may die believing it in the hearing of a faithful ear. If the common mother is well, I am glad, and I pray the Lord that she may be well. We, as you know, detained by the reading of the Hebrews, have covered ourselves in the rust of the Latin language, to such an extent that even a certain non-Latin creaking occurs to us when we speak. Therefore, forgive our dryness: and if I am unskilled in speech, says the Apostle, but not in knowledge. Both were not lacking to him, and he humbly refused one. We lack both, since we have lost what we had as children, and we have not obtained the knowledge we wanted, according to Aesop's fable of the dog, while pursuing great things, losing even the smaller ones.

Letters - letter_030

Letter 30. To Paula

Some account of the so-called alphabetical psalms (XXXVII., CXI., CXII., CXIX., CXLV.). After explaining the mystical meaning of the alphabet, Jerome goes on thus: "What honey is sweeter than to know the wisdom of God? no others, if they will, may possess riches, drink from a jewelled cup, shine in silks, and try in vain to exhaust their wealth in the most varied pleasures. Our riches are to meditate in the law of the Lord day and night, [Ps. 1:2] to knock at the closed door, [Matt. 7:7] to receive the 'three loaves' of the Trinity, [Luke 11:5-8] and, when the Lord goes before us, to walk upon the water of the world." [Matt. 14:25-33] Written at Rome a.d. 384. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. On the third day, when I was trying to suggest to you the hundred and eighteenth Psalm and saying that every moral aspect was comprehended therein, and just as philosophers divide their discussions into natural philosophy, ethics, and logic, divine or nature discussions would also be divided, as in Genesis and Ecclesiastes, or about morals, as in Proverbs and all the scattered books, or about logic, which our Theorist claims for himself, as in Song of Solomon and in the Gospels (although the Apostle often sets out, assumes, confirms and concludes what properly belongs to the art of dialectic), you eagerly sought out what Hebrew letters, which seemed to be inserted in the Psalm we were reading, meant.

2. I replied according to the order of the letters that it was composed in such a way that, namely, from the first letter, which they call Aleph, eight verses would begin. Again from the following Beth they would take as many verses for the beginning; and afterwards the same number would be completed from Gemel; and thus, up to Thau, which is the last letter, the Psalm was written: and from each and every element, according to their interpretations, what would follow should be understood. Time and again you asked me to reveal the meanings of the individual letters. I admit that all we said slips from the memory because of the barbarity of the language. You want a little commentary made so that if ever you waver in any respect, reading it will console your forgetfulness.

3. The Alphabetical Psalms. - And before I discuss each one, you should know that the four Psalms begin with the one hundred tenth, one hundred eleventh, the one we are writing about now, and the one hundred forty-fourth elements in accordance with the Hebrew order. But you should know in the earlier Psalms, individual verses are joined to each letter, which consists of iambic trimeter. The lower ones, however, consist of iambic tetrameter, as is written in the Canticle of Deuteronomy. In the hundred eighteenth Psalm, eight verses follow each letter. In the hundred forty-fourth, twin verses are assigned to each letter. There are some who think to begin with others in this order, but their opinion is false. You also have in the Lamentations of Jeremiah four Alphabets, of which the first two are written in a Sapphic meter: the Heroic comma concludes because three verses connected to each other begin with only one letter. The third Alphabet, however, is written in trimeter, and three verses begin with the same three letters. The fourth Alphabet is similar to the first and second. Proverbs too closes the Alphabet, which is calculated in iambic tetrameter, from the point where it says: "Who shall find a valiant woman?" (Prov. 31:10).

4. But just as in these our letters no one can proceed to reading and composing words without first beginning from the elements, so in divine Scripture we cannot know the greater things unless we have had the beginning of Ethics, according to what the Prophet says: 'From your commandments I understood (Ps. 118:104)', that is, that one began to have knowledge of secrets after works. But now what you requested is to be fulfilled, that the interpretation of the meaning of each element be attached.

5. Aleph means doctrine. Beth, house. Gemel, fullness. Deleth, tablets. He, this. Vau, and Zai, these. Heth, life. Tet, good. Iod, beginning. Kaph, hand. Lamed, discipline or heart. Mem, from them. Nun, eternal. Samech, help. Ain, fountain or eye. Phe, mouth, understand that it is said from the mouth, not from the bone, lest you be deceived by the ambiguity of letters. Sade, justice. Koph, vocation. Resh, heads. Shin, teeth. Thau, signs.

6. After the interpretation of the elements of intelligence, the order must be said to be Aleph, Beth, Gimel, Daleth, the first connection is doctrine, house, fullness, tablets; namely that the doctrine of the Church, which is the house of God, should be found in the fullness of divine books.

7. The second connection is, He, Vau, Zai, Heth, this, and this, life. For what other life can there be without the knowledge of the Scriptures, through which even Christ himself is recognized, who is the life of believers?

8. The third connection has Tet, Iod, a good beginning: because although we now know all that is written, we only partly understand and partly prophesy, and now we see through a glass in an obscure manner. But when we are worthy to be with Christ and are made like unto the angels, then doctrine of books shall cease, and we shall see face to face the good beginning as it is.

9. The fourth connection is Caph, Lamed, hand, disciplines, or heart. The hands are understood in work. The heart and discipline are interpreted in meaning: because we can do nothing unless we first know what must be done.

10. The fifth connection is Mem, Nun, Samech themselves, eternal help. This needs no explanation but is made more manifest in every light, from the eternal supports supplied by the Scriptures.

11. The sixth combination has Ain, Phe, and Sade, a spring or fountain, the eye or mouth, and justice, according to what we explained in the third number.

12. The seventh connection is also the last, because it is a mystic understanding in the seven itself: Coph, Res, Sen, Thau, vocation, head, teeth, signs. By the articulated voice (that is) formed by the teeth, and through these signs reaches Christ, who is the head of all, through whom one comes to everlasting Kingdom.

13. I beg you, what is more sacred than this sacrament? What is more pleasant than this pleasure? What food or honey is sweeter than the knowledge of God's wisdom, and to enter into His secrets, and to inspect the intelligence of the Creator, and to learn the spiritual wisdom-filled sayings of the Lord your God, which are ridiculed by the wise men of this world? Let others have their riches if they wish, drink from their jewels, shine in silk, delight the crowds with applause; and through various pleasures they cannot conquer their wealth. Our wealth is to meditate on the law of the Lord day and night, to knock on the door that does not open, to receive the Bread of the Trinity, and to trample the waves of the world with the Lord leading the way.

14. Greet Blaesilla and our young Eustochium. Greet Feliciana, truly happy in both her flesh and her spirit's virginity. Greet the remaining choir of chastity and your household Church, which I fear for even in safe times lest an enemy oversow tares while the master of the house sleeps: even though they might dare to say, "I am a city unassailable, a city at peace" (Isaiah 27:3, LXX). No one is safe from an enemy besieging army. No one, as blessed Cyprian says, is safe enough, when in close proximity to danger. Send a copy of this letter to our most diligent Marcella if she wishes to receive it. And I beseech you, remember me, and that our Lord Jesus Christ may swiftly tread Satan under our feet.

Letters - letter_031

Letter 31. To Eustochium.

Jerome writes to thank Eustochium for some presents sent to him by her on the festival of St. Peter. He also moralizes on the mystical meaning of the articles sent. The letter should be compared with Letter 44., of which the theme is similar. Written at Rome in 384 a.d. (on St. Peter's Day).

1. Doves, bracelets, and a letter are outwardly but small gifts to receive from a virgin, but the action which has prompted them enhances their value. And since honey may not be offered in sacrifice to God, [Lev. 2:11] you have shown skill in taking off their overmuch sweetness and making them pungent-if I may so say-with a dash of pepper. For nothing that is simply pleasurable or merely sweet can please God. Everything must have in it a sharp seasoning of truth. Christ's passover must be eaten with bitter herbs. [Ex. 12:8]

2. It is true that a festival such as the birthday¹ of Saint Peter should be seasoned with more gladness than usual; still our merriment must not forget the limit set by Scripture, and we must not stray too far from the boundary of our wrestling-ground. Your presents, indeed, remind me of the sacred volume, for in it Ezekiel decks Jerusalem with bracelets, [Ezek. 16:11] Baruch receives letters from Jeremiah,² and the Holy Spirit descends in the form of a dove at the baptism of Christ. [Matt. 3:16] But to give you, too, a sprinkling of pepper and to remind you of my former letter,³ I send you to-day this three-fold warning. Cease not to adorn yourself with good works-the true bracelets of a Christian woman. [Tim. 2:10] Rend not the letter written on your heart [2 Cor. 3:2] as the profane king cut with his penknife that delivered to him by Baruch. [Jeremiah 36:23] Let not Hosea say to you as to Ephraim, "Thou art like a silly dove." [Hosea 7:11] My words are too harsh, you will say, and hardly suitable to a festival like the present. If so, you have provoked me to it by the nature of your own gifts. So long as you put bitter with sweet, you must expect the same from me, sharp words that is, as well as praise.

3. However, I do not wish to make light of your gifts, least of all the basket of fine cherries, blushing with such a virgin modesty that I can fancy them freshly gathered by Lucullus⁴ himself. For it was he who first introduced the fruit at Rome after his conquest of Pontus and Armenia; and the cherry tree is so called because he brought it from Cerasus. Now as the Scriptures do not mention cherries, but do speak of a basket of figs, [Jer. 24:1-3] I will use these instead to point my moral. May you be made of fruits such as those which grow before God's temple and of which He says, "Behold they are good, very good." [Jer. 24:3] The Saviour likes nothing that is half and half, and, while he welcomes the hot and does not shun the cold, he tells us in the Apocalypse that he will spew the lukewarm out of his mouth. [Rev. 3:15, Rev. 3:16] Wherefore we must be careful to celebrate our holy day not so much with abundance of food as with exultation of spirit. For it is altogether unreasonable to wish to honor a martyr by excess who himself, as you know, pleased God by fasting. When you take food always recollect that eating should be followed by reading, and also by prayer. And if, by taking this course, you displease some, repeat to yourself the words of the Apostle: "If I yet pleased men I should not be the servant of Christ" [Gal. 1:10] 1: I.e. the day of his martyrdom, his heavenly nativity 2: Jer. xxxvi.; Baruch vi

3: Letter XXII 4: Celebrated for his campaigns against Mithridates, and also as a prince of epicures

Letters - letter_032

Letter 32. To Marcella.

Jerome writes that he is busy collating Aquila's Greek version of the Old Testament with the Hebrew, inquires after Marcella's mother, and forwards the two preceding letters (XXX., XXXI.). Written at Rome in 384 a.d.

1. There are two reasons for the shortness of this letter, one that its bearer is impatient to start, and the other that I am too busy to waste time on trifles. You ask what business can be so urgent as to stop me from a chat on paper. Let me tell you, then, that for some time past I have been comparing Aquila's version¹ of the Old Testament with the scrolls of the Hebrew, to see if from hatred to Christ the synagogue has changed the text; and-to speak frankly to a friend-I have found several variations which confirm our faith. After having exactly revised the prophets, Solomon,² the psalter, and the books of Kings, I am now engaged on Exodus (called by the Jews, from its opening words, Eleh shemôth [Exod. 1:1, twmy hl]), and when I have finished this I shall go on to Leviticus. Now you see why I can let no claim for a letter withdraw me from my work. However, as I do not wish my friend Currentius³ to run altogether in vain, I have tacked on to this little talk two letters⁴ which I am sending to your sister Paula, and to her dear child Eustochium. Read these, and if you find them instructive or pleasant, take what I have said to them as meant for you also.

2. I hope that Albina, your mother and mine, is well. In bodily health, I mean, for I doubt not of her spiritual welfare. Pray salute her for me, and cherish her with double affection, both as a Christian and as a mother.

1: This version, made in the reign of Hadrian by a Jewish proselyte who is said by some to have been a renegade Christian, was marked by an exaggerated literalism and a close following of the Hebrew original. By the Church it was regarded with suspicion as being designedly anti-Christian. Jerome, however, here acquits Aquila of the charge brought against him 2: I.e. all the sapiential books, viz. Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom 3: The name means runner. Hence the allusion to Gal. 2:2

4:

XXX., XXXI

Letters - letter_033

The below is the partial translation from NPNF. A fuller translation can be found in _v2 of this file.

Letter 33. To Paula. A fragment of a letter in which Jerome institutes a comparison between the industry as writers of M. T. Varro and Origen. It is noteworthy as passing an unqualified eulogium upon Origen, which contrasts strongly with the tone adopted by the writer in subsequent years (see, e.g., Letter 84.). Its date is probably 384 a.d.

1. Antiquity marvels at Marcus Terentius Varro,¹ because of the countless books which he wrote for Latin readers; and Greek writers are extravagant in their praise of their man of brass,² because he has written more works than one of us could so much as copy. But since Latin ears would find a list of Greek writings tiresome, I shall confine myself to the Latin Varro. I shall try to show that we of to-day are sleeping the sleep of Epimenides,³ and devoting to the amassing of riches the energy which our predecessors gave to sound, if secular, learning.

2. Varro's writings include forty-five books of antiquities, four concerning the life of the Roman people.

3. But why, you ask me, have I thus mentioned Varro and the man of brass? Simply to bring to your notice our Christian man of brass, or, rather, man of adamant⁴ -Origen, I mean-whose zeal for the study of Scripture has fairly earned for him this latter name. Would you learn what monuments of his genius he has left us? The following list exhibits them. His writings comprise thirteen books on Genesis, two books of Mystical Homilies, notes on Exodus, notes on Leviticus, * * * also single books,⁵ four books on First Principles, two books on the Resurrection, two dialogues on the same subject.⁶

4. So, you see, the labors of this one man have surpassed those of all previous writers, Greek and Latin. Who has ever managed to read all that he has written? Yet what reward have his exertions brought him? He stands condemned by his bishop, Demetrius,⁷ only the bishops of Palestine, Arabia, Phenicia, and Achaia dissenting. Imperial Rome consents to his condemnation, and even convenes a senate to censure him,⁸ not-as the rabid hounds who now pursue him cry-because of the novelty or heterodoxy of his doctrines, but because men could not tolerate the incomparable eloquence and knowledge which, when once he opened his lips, made others seem dumb.

5. I have written the above quickly and incautiously, by the light of a poor lantern. You will see why, if you think of those who to-day represent Epicurus and Aristippus.⁹

1:

Of the 490 books composed by this voluminous writer only two are extant, a treatise on husbandry and an essay on the Latin language

2: The epithet xalkenteroj, "heart of brass," is applied by Suidas to the grammarian Didymus, who, according to Athenaeus, wrote 3,500 books. Of these not one is extant 3: Which lasted 57 years 4:

'Adamantioj-Origen is so called by Eusebius (H. E. 6:14, 10). It appears to have been his proper name 5: "They may have been detached essays on particular subjects."-Westcott

6:

All the works mentioned have perished except the treatise on First Principles, and this in its completeness is extant only in the Latin version of Rufinus. The version made by Jerome has perished

7:

Origen left Alexandria for good in 231 a.d., and it was in that or the following year that Demetrius convoked the synod which condemned not so much his writings as his conduct. He appears to have been excommunicated as a heretic

8:

For Origen's condemnation in a synod held at Rome this passage is the principal authority. It is more than doubtful whether such a synod ever met; if it did it must have been when Pontianus was pope, in 231 or 232 a.d. Jerome may only mean that the great men of Rome all agreed in this condemnation

9:

Both these philosophers were hedonists, and the latter was a sensualist as well. Jerome is probably satirizing the worldly clergy of Rome, just as in after-years he nicknames his opponent Jovinian "the Christian Epicurus.

Letters - letter_033_v2

The below is Roger Pearse's version from: roger-pearse.com

30. TO PAULA.

1. Antiquity marvels at Marcus Terentius Varro, because of the countless books which he wrote for Latin readers; and Greek writers are extravagant in their praise of their man of brass, because he has written more works than one of us could so much as copy. But since Latin ears would find a list of Greek writings tiresome, I shall confine myself to the Latin Varro. I shall try to show that we of today are sleeping the sleep of Epimenides, and devoting to the amassing of riches the energy which our predecessors gave to sound, if secular, learning.

2. Varro's writings include:

45 books of antiquities, 4 concerning the life of the Roman people, 15 on Images, 76 "Logistorikwn", 15 on the Latin Language, 9 of disciplines, 5 on Latin speech, 5 of Plautine questions, 3 of Annals, 3 on the origin of the Latin language, 3 of poetry, 3 on the origins of the stage, 3 on the actions of the stage, 3 on the acts on the stage, 3 on descriptions, 3 on the propriety of writers, 3 on libraries, 3 on readings, 3 on the similarity of words, 3 on embassies, 3 of "suasiones", 3 on Pompey, 10 "singulares", 3 on persons, 15 on the civil law, an epitome in 9 books from the 42 books of antiquities, an epitome in 4 books from the 15 books on Images, an epitome in 9 books from the 15 books on the Latin language, 9 books on the principles of numbers, 3 books on rustic matters, 1 book on preventative health, 3 books on his own life, 3 books on the form of philosophy, 3 books on urban matters, 150 books of Menippean satires, 10 books of poetry, 22 books of orations, 6 books of pseudo-tragedies, 4 books of satires and many others, which it would be wearisome to enumerate. I have barely listed half of the index, and it is overwhelming to the readers.

3. But by contrast our age has learned men, and they know in which waters fish were born, and on what shore an oyster grew. We have no doubts concerning the flavour of thrushes, Paxamus and Apicius are ever in our hands, our eyes on our possessions, our senses on the plates, and, if one of the philosophers or Christians, who are the true philosophers, with worn cloak and grubby tunic fails to pay attention to the reading, he is thrown out with a jeer as if mad.

4. But why, you ask me, have I thus mentioned Varro and the man of brass? Simply to bring to your notice our Christian man of brass, or, rather, man of adamant — Origen, I mean— whose zeal for the study of Scripture has fairly earned for him this latter name. Would you learn what monuments of his genius he has left us? The following list exhibits them. His writings comprise:

13 books on Genesis, 2 books of mystical homilies, excerpta[2] Exodus, excerpta on Leviticus, 10 books of "Stromata", 36 books on Isaiah, likewise excerpta on Isaiah, 1 book on Hosea concerning Ephraim, commentary on Hosea, 2 books on Joel, 6 books on Amos, 1 book on Jonah, 3 books on Micaiah, 2 books on Nahum, 3 books on Habakuk, 2 books on Wisdom, 1 book on Haggai, 2 books on the beginning of Zechariah, 2 books on Malachi, 28 books on Ezekiel, excerpta on the Psalms from the start to [Psalm] 15, again 1 book on Psalm 1, 1 book on Psalm 2, 1 book on Psalm 3, 1 book on Psalm 4, 1 book on Psalm 5, 1 book on Psalm 6, 1 book on Psalm 7, 1 book on Psalm 8, 1 book on Psalm 9, 1 book on Psalm 10, 1 book on Psalm 11, 1 book on Psalm 12, 1 book on Psalm 13, 1 book on Psalm 14, 1 book on Psalm 15, 1 book on Psalm 16, 1 book on Psalm 20, 1 book on Psalm 24, 1 book on Psalm 29, 1 book on Psalm 38, 1 book on Psalm 40, 2 books on Psalm 43, 3 books on Psalm 44, 1 book on Psalm 45, 1 book on Psalm 46, 2 books on Psalm 50, 1 book on Psalm 51, 1 book on Psalm 52, 1 book on Psalm 53, 1 book on Psalm 57, 1 book on Psalm 58, 1 book on Psalm 59, 1 book on Psalm 62, 1 book on Psalm 63, 1 book on Psalm 64, 1 book on Psalm 65, 1 book on Psalm 68, 1 book on Psalm 70, 1 book on Psalm 71, 1 book on the beginning of Psalm 70 part 2 (?), 2 books on Psalm 103. 3 books on Proverbs, excerpta on Ecclesiastes. 10 books on the Song of Songs, and 2 other books (tomos), which he wrote on this in his youth, 5 books (tomos) on the Lamentations of Jeremiah, likewise 4 books "Monobibia, Periarchon", 2 books on the resurrection and two other dialogues on the resurrection, 1 book on various questions on Proverbs, dialogue against Candidus the Valentinian, a book on martyrdom. On the New Testament: 25 books on Matthew, 32 books on John, 1 book of excerpta on various parts of John, 15 books on Luke, 15 books on the letter of the apostle Paul to the Romans, 25 books on the letter to the Galatians, 3 books on the letter to the Ephesians, 1 book on the letter to the Philippians, 2 books on the letter to the Colossians, 3 books on the 1st letter to the Thessalonians, 1 book on the 2nd letter to the Thessalonians, 1 book on the letter to Titus, 1 book on the letter to Philemon.

Again homilies on the Old Testament: 17 homilies on Genesis, 8 homilies on Exodus, 11 homilies on Leviticus, 28 homilies on Numbers, 13 homilies on Deuteronomy, 26 homilies on Joshua son of Nun, 9 homilies on the book of Judges, 8 homilies on the passover [=Easter?], 4 homilies on the 1st book of Kings, 22 homilies on Job, 7 homilies on Parables, 8 homilies on Ecclesiastes, 2 homilies on the Song of Songs, 32 homilies on Isaiah, 14 homilies on Jeremiah, 12 homilies on Ezekiel. On the Psalms: 1 homily on Psalm 3, 1 homily on Psalm 4, 1 homily on Psalm 8, 1 homily on Psalm 12, 3 homilies on Psalm 15, 1 homily on Psalm 16, 1 homily on Psalm 18, 1 homily on Psalm 22, 1 homily on Psalm 23, 1 homily on Psalm 24, 1 homily on Psalm 25, 1 homily on Psalm 26, 1 homily on Psalm 27, 5 homilies on Psalm 36, 2 homilies on Psalm 37, 2 homilies on Psalm 38, 2 homilies on Psalm 39, 1 homily on Psalm 49, 1 homily on Psalm 51, 2 homilies on Psalm 52, 1 homily on Psalm 54, 7 homilies on Psalm 67, 2 homilies on Psalm 71, 3 homilies on Psalm 72, 3 homilies on Psalm 73, 1 homily on Psalm 74, 1 homily on Psalm 75, 3 homilies on Psalm 76, 9 homilies on Psalm 77, 4 homilies on Psalm 79, 2 homilies on Psalm 80, 1 homily on Psalm 81, 3 homilies on Psalm 82, 1 homily on Psalm 83, 2 homilies on Psalm 84, 1 homily on Psalm 85, 1 homily on Psalm 87, 1 homily on Psalm 108, 1 homily on Psalm 110, 3 homilies on Psalm 118, 1 homily on Psalm 120, 2 homilies on Psalm 121, 2 homilies on Psalm 122, 2 homilies on Psalm 123, 2 homilies on Psalm 124, 1 homily on Psalm 125, 1 homily on Psalm 127, 1 homily on Psalm 128, 1 homily on Psalm 129, 1 homily on Psalm 131, 2 homilies on Psalm 132, 2 homilies on Psalm 133, 2 homilies on Psalm 134, 4 homilies on Psalm 135, 2 homilies on Psalm 137, 4 homilies on Psalm 138, 2 homilies on Psalm 139, 3 homilies on Psalm 144, 1 homily on Psalm 145, 1 homily on Psalm 146, 1 homily on Psalm 147, 1 homily on Psalm 148, excerpta on the whole psalter.

Homilies on the New Testament: 25 homilies on the gospel “kata Matqaion”, 39 homilies on the gospel “kata Loukan”, 17 homilies on the Acts of the Apostles, 11 homilies on the 2nd letter to the Corinthians, 2 homilies on the letter to the Thessalonians, 7 homilies on the letter to the Galatians, 1 homily on the letter to Titus, 18 homilies on the letter to the Hebrews.

1 homily on peace, an exhortation to Pionia, [a homily] on fasting, 2 homilies on monogamy and trigamy, 2 homilies on Tarsus, by Origen, Firmianus and Gregory, likewise 2 books of excerpts of letters by Origen and by others to him — the letter of Hesiphodorus on the case of Origen in 2 books — 9 books of his letters to various people, 2 books of other letters, likewise a letter in 2 books as an apologia for his works.

5. So, you see, the labors of this one man have surpassed those of all previous writers, Greek and Latin. Who has ever managed to read all that he has written? Yet what reward have his exertions brought him? He stands condemned by his bishop, Demetrius, only the bishops of Palestine, Arabia, Phenicia, and Achaia dissenting. Imperial Rome consents to his condemnation, and even convenes a senate to censure him, not— as the rabid hounds who now pursue him cry— because of the novelty or heterodoxy of his doctrines, but because men could not tolerate the incomparable eloquence and knowledge which, when once he opened his lips, made others seem dumb.

6. I have written the above quickly and incautiously, by the light of a poor lantern. You will see why, if you think of those who today represent Epicurus and Aristippus.

Letters - letter_034

Letter 34. To Marcella. In reply to a request from Marcella for information concerning two phrases in Ps. cxxvii. ("bread of sorrow," v. 2, and "children of the shaken off," A.V. "of the youth," v. 4). Jerome, after lamenting that Origen's notes on the psalm are no longer extant, gives the following explanations: The Hebrew phrase "bread of sorrow" is rendered by the LXX. "bread of idols"; by Aquila, "bread of troubles"; by Symmachus, "bread of misery." Theodotion follows the LXX. So does Origen's Fifth Version, The Sixth renders "bread of error." In support of the LXX. the word used here is in Ps. cxv. 4, translated "idols." Either the troubles of life are meant or else the tenets of heresy. With the second phrase he deals at greater length. After showing that Hilary of Poitiers's view (viz. that the persons meant are the apostles, who were told to shake the dust off their feet, Matt. x. 14) is untenable and would require "shakers off" to be substituted for "shaken off," Jerome reverts to the Hebrew as before and declares that the true rendering is that of Symmachus and Theodotion, viz. "children of youth." He points out that the LXX. (by whom the Latin translators had been misled) fall into the same mistake at Neh. iv. 16. Finally he corrects a slip of Hilary as to Ps. cxxviii. 2, where, through a misunderstanding of the LXX., the latter had substituted "the labors of thy fruits" for "the labors of thy hands." He speaks throughout with high respect of Hilary, and says that it was not the bishop's fault that he was ignorant of Hebrew. The date of the letter is probably a.d. 384. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. Blessed Martyr Pamphilus, whose life Eusebius of Caesarea, a bishop, explained in almost three volumes, when he wanted to equal Demetrius of Phalerum, and Pisistratus in sacred library studies, and peruse the images of minds which are true, and the eternal monuments, throughout the whole world, especially pursuing the books of Origen more fully, gave them to the Church of Caesarea: which Acacius and Euzoius, priests of the same Church, attempted to restore but it was partly corrupt. When he had found many things and left us an index of his discoveries, he confessed that he did not find the commentary on the 126th Psalm and the treatise on the letter Phe, because they were not labeled. Not because such a great man (whom we call 'Adamantius') left anything unexplored, but because the carelessness of later generations did not last to our memory. I said this to you because you asked me about the same Psalm, what was the bread of affliction, in the words: 'It is vain for you rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows;' to show that I do not have Origen's comments on the same.

2. Returning to Hebrew, I found, for the bread of sorrow, a writing: Leem Aasabim, which Aquila has translated as ἄρτον των διαπονημάτων; Symmachus as ἄρτον κακοπαθόμενον; the Fifth Edition and Theodotion, who follow the Septuagint in other things, as 'bread of idols'; the Sixth πλάνης, that is, of error. It is not surprising that Aquila puts διαπονηματα for idols, since they are the works of human hands, and prophetic people are accused of rising up in vain to the temple at daybreak, and hastening to the sanctuary after rest, when idols are honored instead of God. According to what Ezekiel wrote in the temple itself, priests sacrifice to idols. But so that you may be more fully persuaded, for idolatry in Hebrew, this same word, that is, Asabim, is also written in the one hundred and thirteenth Psalm, and the Septuagint also translated idols. For in that place where it is written, 'the idols of the gentiles, silver, and gold, the work of men's hands,' in Hebrew it is called 'Asareem,' which Aquila interprets as 'their elaborations.' Therefore, since truth presents itself in this way, certain individuals do not mistakenly understand the bread of sorrow as the sacraments of heretics, or interpret the toil of this miserable and afflicted life: among whom we eat our bread in the sweat of our faces, and amid thorns and thistles the sustenance of a brief life is born.

3. Also, you deemed it worthy to ask about the same Psalm: Who are the sons of those shaken off? I wonder why you did not read in the commentaries of Hilary that the sons of those shaken off are interpreted as the believing peoples, for the Apostles were believed to be called by that name, to whom it was commanded in the Gospels, that wherever they enter a city, and they were not received, they should shake off the dust from their feet as a testimony against the unbelieving (Matthew 10; and Mark 6). Although you may cleverly object, the apostles cannot be understood under the name of "excussorum," since "excussientes" means "those who shake out," while "excussi" means "those who are shaken out by others." Therefore, it would be inappropriate to accept that the apostles had been shaken out, as they should rather be called "shakers out." What then shall I do? I do not dare to criticize a man of such great influence and eloquence in his time, who was praised everywhere for his confession, hard work, and clarity of speech wherever the Roman name was known. However, it is not his fault that he was ignorant of the Hebrew language and had a certain knowledge of Greek literature, which he could understand only through his familiarity with Heliodorus the Presbyter, who sought to explain what he could not understand, such as what was said by Origen. He, because he was not able to find in this Psalm a Commentary of Origen, wanted to insinuate his own opinion more than he wanted to confess his ignorance. That view, which he took up, he discussed with clear language, and he expressed alien error more eloquently.

4. Therefore, it remains for us to return to the source of speech again, the Hebrew, and see how it is written. Where we have, "like sons of the shaken", there it is read, "Chen Bne Annaurim", which Aquila interpreted as "like sons of puberty". Symmachus and Theodotion, as "like sons of youth". Sexta ■κ■νεος νο■, which we can say means "sharp senses". From which it is clear that Christian people of adolescence are understood, according to that example, in which God is said to extend his holy ones like bows and arrows; as in the prophet Zachariah: "for I have bent Judah for me as a bow" (Zach. 9. 13). And the Savior from himself: 'I have set myself as an elect arrow. And he hid me in his quiver' (Isaiah 49:2). Finally, in the following verse, except for the Septuagint, who translated differently, it is found in Hebrew and in all editions: 'Blessed is the man who filled his quiver from them'; that because he had once taken the metaphor from arrows, the translation would also be preserved in the quiver. But the custom of human speech calls the vigorous, robust, and agile excussus; and the Seventy Interpreters themselves translated juveniles into Ezra's book, in which it is thus written: 'And it came to pass from that day forward, that half of the excussus did the work, and half of them held spears and shields and bows and coats of mail; and the rulers were behind all the house of Judah.' (Neh. 4. 16). From which we understand that, in the present passage, excussi are placed for adolescents and young men; not, as he thought, for the apostles, who are said to be shaken off from their feet. I have read in a certain book, and found an elegant sense in it, that the Jews expelled from the temple, the law, and the grace of the Lord, are called excussi because they are reprobates; and that the apostles who are born from their seed belong to them and are contained in the likeness of the arrows in the hand of the Lord.

5. In the following Psalm, Heliodorus erred more than our Hilary, who, having had various opinions about the place where it is written: "You will eat the fruit of your labors," asserted that the sentence would stand better if it were written: to eat some fruit of one's labors, and not labors of fruit: whence a spiritual understanding ought to be sought. And, taking advantage of this opportunity, he entered into a long discussion with such carefulness and industry, that he was desirous of being understood, as falsehood always needs to be, in order to appear as truth: whereas in this place the Latin translators, being misled by an ambiguity in the Greek word, have rendered καρπο■ς by "fruits", instead of "hands"; whereas καρπο■, also, signify "hands", thus corresponding with the Hebrew word, Chaphach. Symmachus and the Fifth Version have translated it "of thy hands", in order to avoid the ambiguity of the former translation.

6. When my quick hand, dictating my writing to a stealthy task, noted down these things for my bedtime reading, and I had many things I wished to say, already the fourth hour of the night had nearly passed, and suddenly, goaded by some pangs of my wretched stomach, I was forced to break off my speech, so that at least during the remaining hours, I might foil the weakness creeping on me by slipping into sleep unawares.

Letters - letter_035

Letter 35. From Pope Damasus.

Damasus addresses live questions to Jerome with a request for information concerning them. They are:

1. What is the meaning of the words "Whosoever slayeth Cain vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold"? (Gen. iv. 5.)
 2. If God has made all things good, how comes it that He gives charge to Noah concerning unclean animals, and says to Peter, "What God hath cleansed that call not thou common"? (Acts x. 15.)
 3. How is Gen. xv. 16, "in the fourth generation they shall come hither again," to be reconciled with Ex. xiii. 18, Ex. xiii LXX, "in the fifth generation the children of Israel went up out of the land of Egypt"?
 4. Why did Abraham receive circumcision as a seal of his faith? (Rom. iv. 11.)
 5. Why was Isaac, a righteous man and dear God, allowed by God to become the dupe of Jacob? (Gen. xxvii.)
- Written at Rome 384 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text. To his dearest son Hieronymus Damasus.

I intended to wake you, who are sleeping and reading, for a long time rather than writing, with the questions sent to you: not that you should not read, for this (reading) is fed and fattened, like our daily food, to the speech. But this is the benefit of reading if you write. Therefore, since yesterday you told the messenger sent to me that you have no letters except for those that you dictated in the desert, which I read and transcribed with complete eagerness. You offered to dictate a few (letters) yourself with secret nocturnal work, if I wanted to; I willingly accept from the one who offered what I had even wished to ask you to do even if you had refused. And truly, I think that there is no discussion more worthy of our conversation than if we talk among ourselves about the Scriptures: that is, I ask, you answer. In this life, I think nothing is more enjoyable than this nourishment for our souls, which surpasses all honey.» How sweet, says the Prophet, are your words to my throat, more than honey to my mouth (Ps. 118. 103). «For since, as a renowned speaker says, we differ from beasts in that we can speak: who is worthy of praise, who surpasses others in the manner in which men surpass beasts?

Therefore, prepare yourself, and discuss with me what is presented, maintaining moderation on both sides, so that the proposed may not desire a solution, nor the letter brevity. For indeed I confess to you, that I am not fond of reading the books of Lactantius which you gave me a long time ago, because many of his letters extend even to a thousand line-spaces, and they seldom have any discussion relating to our own teachings. This causes tedium to the reader due to length, and if there are any brief ones, they are more suitable for scholars than for us, discussing as they do things concerning meters, regions and philosophers.

1. "What does it mean that it is written in Genesis: 'Every one that findeth me shall slay me?'" (Genesis 4:15)
2. "If God made all things very good, why did he command Noah to take the unclean animals along with the clean, since no unclean thing can be good? And in the New Testament, after the vision which was shown to Peter, who said: 'Not so, Lord, for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean,' a voice responded from heaven: 'What God has cleansed, do not call common?'" (Acts 10:14-15)
3. Why God speaks to Abraham that the fourth generation of the sons of Israel would return from Egypt, and later Moses writes: But the fifth generation the sons of Israel came out of the land of Egypt." (Exodus 13:18 according to the Septuagint) "Which seems contradictory unless explained.
4. Why did Abraham receive the sign of faith in circumcision?
5. Why did the just and dear to God Isaac, deceived by error, bless the one he did not want to but the one he did not want?

Letters - letter_036

Letter 36. To Pope Damasus.

Jerome's reply to the foregoing. For the second and fourth questions he refers Damasus to the writings of Tertullian, Novatian, and Origen. The remaining three he deals with in detail.

Gen. iv. 15, he understands to mean "the slayer of Cain shall complete the sevenfold vengeance which is to be wreaked upon him." Exodus xiii. is, he proposes to reconcile with Gen. xv. 16, by supposing that in the one place the tribe of Levi is referred to, in the other the tribe of Judah. He suggests, however, that the words rendered by the LXX. "in the fifth generation" more probably mean "harnessed" (so A.V.) or "laden." In reply to the question about Isaac he says: "No man save Him who for our salvation has deigned to put on flesh has full knowledge and a complete grasp of the truth. Paul, Samuel, David, Elisha, all make mistakes, and holy men only know what God reveals to them." He then goes on to give a mystical interpretation of the passage suggested by the martyr Hippolytus. Written the day after the previous letter. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

Blessed Pope Damasus, Jerome.

1. After I received the letter from Your Holiness, I immediately summoned a notary to record it. As he was preparing to perform his duties, I was already imagining what I was going to say. At that moment, the notary and I were both preparing to speak when suddenly a Hebrew man interrupted us, carrying several volumes that he had apparently received from the Synagogue to read. 'Here you have what you requested,' he said. This surprised me and I didn't know what to do, so he scared me and I forgot everything else and immediately started writing. And that's what I've been doing ever since. Yesterday, since you sent a message to me as a deacon, stating that you were expecting commentary from me on the Epistle, as I understand it, and desiring a brief response to individual matters that necessitate the length of large volumes, I have outlined these things for you, leaving aside only two questions: not because I could not respond to them, but because they have been written in the Latin language by the most eloquent men, namely our Tertullian and Novatian; and if we want to introduce new material, there will be a broader discussion. Certainly, I am awaiting what you would prefer: whether you would like the thoughts to be sorted out in a brief letter, or whether you would like to prepare the books of individuals. For both Origen in his Commentary on the Fourth Epistle to the Romans discussed circumcision with great care, and treated of the clean and unclean animals under the Levitical law at length; so that even if I myself had been unable to find anything, I could still have borrowed from his sources. Moreover, to speak more truly, I have in my possession Didymus's book on the Holy Spirit, which I wish to dedicate to you in a translated form, lest you think that I am only sleeping, who find reading without writing to be a cure for sleeplessness. Therefore, having premised what you had proposed by way of inquiry, I will tell you what I think, asking your pardon for the tardiness and haste of my reply; for haste, because I have wished to write you an answer at one sitting, which is the work of many days; for tardiness, because being detained by other work, I have not immediately answered your questions.

2. What does it mean that it is written in Genesis: 'Everyone who kills Cain will pay sevenfold'?

Before we speak of the question, it seems right to arrange editions of individual interpreters, comparing them with the Hebrew language in order that the meaning of the scriptures can be more easily understood. Vaimor Lo Adonai Lochen Chol Orec Cain Sobathaim Joccoamo. Aquila. 'And the Lord said to him, Therefore, whoever kills Cain shall be avenged sevenfold.' Symmachus: 'And the Lord said to him: Not so, but whoever kills Cain shall be avenged seven times, or the seventh time.' Septuagint and Theodotion: And the Lord said to him: 'Not so, but whoever kills Cain shall pay seven vengeance.' After Cain had killed his brother, when asked by the Lord, 'Where is your brother Abel?' he insolently replied, 'I do not know: am I my brother's keeper?' Therefore, cursed with a groaning and trembling existence on earth, he was not willing to beg for forgiveness, but multiplying sin on sin, he thought it was such a great offense that it could not be pardoned by the Lord. Finally, he replied to the Lord, 'My cause is greater than to be forgiven,' that is, 'I have sinned more than I deserve to be absolved.' Behold, thou dost cast me forth this day from the face of the earth, and from thy face shall I be hidden, and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond upon the earth: every one, therefore, that findeth me, shall kill me. And Cain said to the Lord: My iniquity is greater than that I may deserve pardon. Behold thou dost cast me out this day from the face of the earth, and I shall be hidden from thy face, and I shall be a vagabond and a fugitive on the earth, and whosoever shall find me, shall kill me.

"Not so," that is, not as you perceive, will you die, and you will receive death as a remedy: rather you will live until the seventh generation, and you will be tormented by the fire of your conscience, so that whoever kills you, according to double understanding, will either free you in the seventh generation, or the seventh will free you from torture. It is not because Cain himself who killed will be subjected to seven revenge: but because the killer who killed him who had been left to punishment will pay seven revenges that ran for such a long time in Cain.

3. But in order that what we say may become more clear, let us set forth an example of daily custom. Let the servant speak amidst the beatings to his master: I have burned down your house and dissipated all your wealth, kill me. And let the master respond: Not as you wish, but you shall die and end in the punishment of death; instead, you shall be kept alive for a long time, and shall live so unhappily in this life that whoever kills you will provide a favor for the killed one, in freeing you from so many tortures. And according to the Septuagint version, this seems to be the sense to us.

4. But concerning what Aquila set forth, in sevenfold manner: And so the opinion of our elders is that Symmachus, the seventh or seventh generation, will avenge it, because they believe that in the seventh generation from Lamech Cain was killed. For Adam begot Cain, Cain begot Enoch, Enoch begot Irad, Irad begot Mehujael, Mehujael begot Methuselah, Methuselah begot Lamech, who was the seventh from Adam, and he did not kill Cain voluntarily (as it is written in a certain Hebrew book), as he himself confesses later on, "For I have slain a man to my wounding, and a youth to my hurt: for revenge is appointed sevenfold to Cain; but for Lamech seventy times sevenfold" (Gen. 4:23–24). Indeed, nothing obscure, of Cain, who in the seventh generation from Lamech was murdered, and according to another account, suffered the punishment of his crime, and he lived on the earth, groaning and trembling for so many generations.

5. Payment of 77 vengeancees to be made on Lamech. - Now that which you had not asked crept upon you while we were discussing something else. What are the seventy-seven vengeancees which are to be paid on Lamech? They say, from Adam to Christ there are 77 generations. Read Luke the Evangelist, and you will find it to be so, as we say. Therefore, just as in the seventh generation Cain's sin was obliterated, for God will not twice exact vengeance for the same thing, and whoever has once received afflictions in this life will not suffer the same torments after death, which they have suffered in life, so also should Lamech's sin, that is, the sin of the whole world and blood that was shed, be dissolved by Christ's coming, who has taken away the sins of the world, who has washed his garments in the blood of the grape, and who has trodden the winepress alone, who has ascended from Edom, red in his garments, (Isaiah 63.1-3); who performed a miracle to the angels crying out: "Lift up your gates, O princes, and be ye lifted up, O eternal gates, and the King of glory shall come in" (Psalm 24:7), and so on. A certain Hebrew was telling me that in the apocryphal books seventy-seven souls from the offspring of Lamech were found to have been destroyed by the deluge: and that in this number was made the vengeance on Lamech, in that his race persevered until the catastrophe.

6. Cain committed seven sins. Others suspect various revenges as the seven of Cain. The first they claim was a sin, that he did not divide correctly. The second, that he envied his brother. The third, that he acted deceitfully, saying: "Let us go into the field". Fourth, that he killed. Fifth, that he shamelessly denied, saying: "I know not, am I my brother's keeper?" (v. 9)? Sixth, that he condemned himself, saying: "Greater is my fault than to be forgiven" (v. 13). Seventh, because neither the condemned have repented, like Nineveh and King Hezekiah of Judah, that they lifted up tears for impending death, not to perish, but by doing penance, they obtained the mercy of God. For they say that god is merciful, therefore, he prolonged it to the seventh generation, until, compelled by his own misery and longevity of sorrow, he would do penance and deserved to be absolved at least from those evils themselves.

7. Some interpret the number seven as full and perfect, gathering testimonies from many places in the Scriptures, and this being the meaning which we have explained above, that whoever kills Cain shall be freed by a great affliction, passing through all punishments.

8. But there are also those who ask of the Gospel concerning the question from Peter: 'Lord, how often shall my brother sin against me and I forgive him? Up to seven times?' Jesus said to him, 'I do not say to you, up to seven times, but up to seventy times seven.' And they think that death and sin were sanctified on the seventh generation of the Sabbath when Enoch was taken, 'and he was not found because God had translated him' (Gen. 5:24). But on the seventy and seven, they follow this explanation: in the coming of Christ, the sting of death and sin was broken.

9. I will give another opinion, lest I should seem to have passed over something. Some interpret the seventh year of remission, the fiftieth of Jubilee, and the four hundred and ninetieth, which they would have to mean seventy-sevenfold, in many ways: asserting that for this reason the numbers fifty and five hundred were placed in the Gospel for the debtor; and the fiftieth Psalm of penitence; which is completed in seven weeks, and breaks forth at the beginning of the octad. But let our discussion not proceed farther: suffice it to say that we have spoken thus far on this subject, because from the things we have sprinkled, you can yourself make an entire forest of debate: knowing that Origen has spoken of this Question only in his twelfth and thirteenth book of Genesis.

10. Why did God speak to Abraham that in the fourth generation his descendants would return from Egypt, and yet Moses later writes that in the fifth generation the Israelites left Egypt? Unless this is explained, it appears to contradict. But when I read this problem, I began to boil silently within myself, and running through Genesis and Exodus step by step, I found places where things seem to be a matter of doubt. And at first I thought, comparing spiritual things with spiritual, that they were indissoluble, as are many other things. For it is written that Methuselah lived only fourteen years after the flood, yet he did not enter the ark with Noah. And although God Himself spoke to Abraham, saying, "Know for a certainty that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years" (Gen. xv. 13), yet Moses writes later in Exodus: "And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the selfsame day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt" (Exod. xii. 41). Moreover, Agar also carried Ishmael, as if he were a nursing and tender child on her shoulders, when he was almost eighteen years old; and it was ridiculous for such a great youth to have sat on his mother's neck. Now Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, began his reign in the forty-first year of his age, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem, while his father, starting to reign in his twelfth year, had reigned for forty-one years and had not been able to generate a son for eleven years.

11. "While I was turning over these and many such things, disturbed within me, he opened the door for me which is opened by the key of David, and entered with me into his chamber, and there placed me on the couch on which he himself was reclining" (St. Augustine, Confessions, Book VII, Chapter XVII, 27). For even though the Scripture may seem to contradict itself, both are true, since it is different. The sons of Israel went out of the land of Egypt in the fourth generation: Replicate the genealogy of Levi. Levi begot Caath, Caath begot Amram, Amram begot Aaron, Aaron begot Eleazar, Eleazar begot Finees. Caath entered Egypt with his father Levi. Again Eleazar, with his father Aaron, went out of Egypt. From Caath to Eleazar, four generations are counted: although some want to start from Amram and reach Finees, as we did in Eleazar. But if you want to show an uneven number, how the sons of Israel went out of the land of Egypt in the fifth generation according to Exodus, let it be counted for you by the tribe of Judah and the order. Judah begot Perez, Perez begot Hezron, Hezron begot Aram, Aram begot Amminadab, Amminadab begot Nahshon, Nahshon begot Salmon. Count from Perez to Nahshon, you will find five generations: although some (as we show in the tribe of Levi) make a beginning in Hezron and come down to Salmon.

12. I think the difficulty has been resolved: but if this is not satisfactory, I will come to the point and say in Hebrew that it does not make a difference. Aquila, who interpreted the text more diligently, as some think, rather than contentiously, translated the passage where the Septuagint had: 'Now the children of Israel went up, harnessed, out of the land of Egypt, in the fifth generation' (Exodus 13:18) as follows: Καὶ ἔνοπλισμένοι ἐβήσαν οὗτοι ἐκ τῆς γῆς Αἰγύπτου,' which means, 'And the children of Israel, having equipped themselves marched forth from the land of Egypt.' Although, according to the ambiguity of the Greek language, for the term 'having equipped themselves' which we used, it might be understood as 'having provided themselves with household goods, which they had taken from the Egyptians.'

13. To one who thinks curiosity has limits, a greater desire to seek arises: and I am dissolved on all sides, as Jeremiah (Jeremiah 20) [said]: why did the Seventy, and Aquila translate "armored" as a fifth generation? I repeat the Hebrew volume, which Paul calls "a palm tree" according to some, and examining the characters themselves carefully, I find it written: Vamusim Alu Bne Israel Mearez Mesraim. In the remaining part the interpretations do not differ: the entire battle is over the word "Amusim," which is written with these letters, Heth, Mem, Sin, Jod, Mem, whether it means "five" or "fortified. And indeed we cannot deny that this is said in fivefold number, not the fifth as some interpret it, in singular: but the word Dor, which in Hebrew means generation, is not found in it. So if it were the fifth generation, it would have been read in their language as Amesa Dor. But now the word Amusim, that is to say, five or rather the fifth, is written only so that it might mean: "And the children of Israel ascended the fifth time from the land of Egypt," which seemed less understood, and so the word generation was added. But in this place especially, all Judea proclaims that the eagle properly translated everything else, and the entire seating of the synagogues agrees with it, namely that the same language, written with the same letters, has different sounds and meanings among them. We present one example for the sake of clarity: the words "pastors" and "lovers" are written with the same letters, Res, Ain, Jod, Mem, but "pastors" are read as Roim and "lovers" are read as Reim. This is why, when Jerusalem in the Prophets is accused of the crime of fornication with its lovers, in our own codices, the name of the shepherds is substituted for that of the lovers.

14. I know that these things are vexatious to the reader, but one who discusses Hebrew letters should not seek Aristotle's arguments, nor should he who seeks to be eloquent be led by the Tullian river, nor should Quintilian's ears be soothed by flowers and school declamation. A simple and everyday speech, similar to that of ordinary people and smelling of no lucubration, is necessary, one that explains the matter, teaches the meaning, reveals the obscure, not one that flourishes with verbal composition. Let others be eloquent, let them be praised, they may pour out words from their inflated mouths, but for me it is sufficient to speak in such a way that I am understood, imitating the simplicity of the Scriptures themselves when discussing them.

15. "Why did the just man and beloved of God, Isaac, bless not him whom he wanted, but whom he did not want, deceived by error?" (Genesis 17)

I delay a little on the topic, and I pass over those things which our elders have interpreted about this place, not because I do not agree with their opinion, but because you only seek this: why did a just man not know something and act against his will? To which a concise answer is: No man, except for him who deigned to put on flesh for our salvation, had full knowledge and the most certain truth. Finally, Paul knows in part and prophesies in part (1 Corinthians 13:9) and now sees through a mirror in a riddle and says that we do not know how to pray as we ought (Romans 8:26) because when the perfect comes, then what is in part will be destroyed (1 Corinthians 13:10). The Prophet Samuel, consecrated to Moses in the Psalter, was sent to anoint the king. When he saw Eliab, one of Jesse's eldest sons, he said, "Surely the Lord's anointed is before him." But the Lord said to Samuel, "Do not consider his appearance or height, for I have rejected him. The Lord does not look at what man looks at. Man looks at the outward appearance, but the Lord looks at the heart." Samuel continued to search until he found David. Elisha, who was glorified in two spirits and whose bones gave life to a dead man, is also described as not understanding everything until he was visited by the Shunamite woman who fell weeping at his feet. When Gehazi tried to send her away, Elisha said, "Let her go, she is in bitter distress, and the Lord has hidden things from me and has not told me." There are many things that we ought not to teach from examples, holy men who are beloved by God knowing only those things which have been revealed to them by the Lord: to have been ignorant of those things which have not been revealed to them: and to question the angel at every vision, Zacharias and Daniel, and to implore him, that he may explain to him what those things are which they see. From whence it is no wonder, and to his own greatest usefulness, that Isaac did not know what he was doing, when he erred more at that time that he wanted to bring out his son dedicated to bloody pleasure, and he who could afterwards kill his brother, having passed over him who innocently dwelt at home, and wanted to do his own will more than God's. I think it was a divine dispensation, that he should be blinded in his eyes, and yet when he himself said, 'The voice indeed is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau' (Gen. 27. 22): he did not understand that the younger son, who had stood by, had stolen his brother's blessing.

16. The mystical interpretation of the martyr Hippolytus. But since we have promised to add what it signifies in figure, let us include the words of the martyr Hippolytus, about which our Victorinus does not differ much: not that he has accomplished everything more fully, but that he may give the reader an occasion for a more comprehensive understanding. "Isaac bears the image of God the Father, Rebecca of the Holy Spirit, Esau of the former people and the devil. Jacob [bears the image] of the Church or of Christ. Isaac's age symbolizes the completion of the world: his blindness indicates that faith in the world has perished and the light of religion has been neglected before him." That the elder son is called, is a Jewish legal custom. That his father loves his food and his catch, saves men from error, whom every righteous person hunts through doctrine. The word of God is a promise of blessing and hope of the future kingdom in which the saints will reign with Christ, and celebrate the true Sabbath. Rebecca, full of the Holy Spirit, knowing what she had heard before she gave birth, because the elder will serve the younger» (Gen. 25, 23); rather, it is the form of the Holy Spirit, which knew the future in Christ, that meditates beforehand in Jacob: he speaks to his younger son: Go to the flock, and bring me from there two goats» (Gen. 27. 9); "foreshadowing the coming of the fleshly Savior, in which he would especially liberate those who were held in bondage by sin: for in all the Scriptures, goats are taken for sinners. But the fact that he is ordered to bring two, signifies the adoption of two peoples: the tender and good, docile and innocent souls. The robe or clothing of Esau are the faith and Scriptures of the Hebrews, with which the people of the Gentiles are clothed. The skins that are wrapped around his arms are the sins of both peoples, which Christ affixed to the cross together with him in the extension of his hands. What Isaac asks of Jacob and why he came so quickly, marvels at the rapid faith of believers. The fact that delicious food is offered is a pleasing sacrifice to God, the salvation of sinners. After eating, a blessing follows, and one delights in its fragrance, announcing the power of the resurrection and the kingdom with an open voice: how his brothers should also adore him and serve him, believing from Israel. "Therefore, since injustice is an enemy of justice, Esau is stirred up to discord, and deceit devises death, saying in his heart: 'The days of my father's passion are approaching, and I will kill my brother Jacob.'" (Gen. 27:41) "Thus the devil, who premeditated fratricide in Cain, confesses it most clearly in Esau, also indicating the time of the murder: 'The days of my father's passion are approaching, so that I may kill my brother.' Therefore, Rebecca, that is, patience, informed her husband of the plot against her brother-in-law, and he called Jacob and instructed him to go to Mesopotamia and take a wife of the stock of Laban the Syrian, his mother's brother. So, fleeing his brother's trickery, Jacob went to Mesopotamia (Gen. 28); in the same way, Christ, compelled by the unbelief of the Jews, went to Galilee, from which he would take the Church for himself as a bride from the Gentiles.” These things were said by the man mentioned above.

17. But we say that the Lord did not come except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, nor did he desire to accept bread from the children and give it to the dogs, and that he brought the first blessing to the people of Judah, to whom the words of God (Romans 3:2) and the promise and legislation and completion of the Testament (Romans 9:4) were entrusted; but because they did not want to believe, the blessing was transferred to the lesser Jacobite people. Nor, however, was the elder son utterly despised, because when the fullness of the gentiles entered, then all Israel will be saved (Rom. 11:25 and 26).

Letters - letter_037

Letter 37. To Marcella.

Marcella had asked Jerome to lend her a copy of a commentary by Rhetitius, bishop of Augustodunum (Autun), on the Song of Songs. He now refuses to do so on the ground that the work abounds with errors, of which the two following are samples: (1) Rhetitius identifies Tharshish with Tarsus, and (2) he supposes that Uphaz (in the phrase "gold of Uphaz") is the same as Cephas. Written at Rome a.d. 384. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. Recently, when I had read through the commentary on the Song of Songs by Rheticius, the Bishop of Augustodunum, who was once sent to Rome by the Emperor Constantine, under Bishop Sylvester, on account of the Montanists, I was greatly surprised that an eloquent man should, among senseless interpretations of others, have thought that Tharsis was the city where the Apostle Paul was born, and that Ophaz referred to Peter, because Cephas is the same as Peter in the Gospel. He had of course encountered the same word in Ezekiel, where it is written of the four beasts, "And the appearance of the wheels was like the appearance of Tharsis," and in Daniel, where it is said of the Lord, "And his body was like that of Tharsis." That which the eagle and the chrysolite, and Symmachus the hyacinth, do mean. And in the Psalm: 'Thou shalt break the ships of Tharsis with a violent wind' (Ps. 47.8). And among the stones which were carved with the names of the tribes for the ornament of the high priest's ephod, the name of the same stone is included, and nearly the whole of Scripture is full of this name. But what shall I say of Ophaz, when the prophet Daniel aforesaid, in the third year of Cyrus, king of the Persians, after three weeks of fasting and mourning, saith: 'I lifted up my eyes, and behold a man clothed in linen, and his loins were girded with the finest gold of Ophaz' (Dan. 10.5)? For there are many kinds of gold among the Hebrews. Hence, for distinction, Ophaz is mentioned, lest any one should suppose that Zaab is meant, which is spoken of in Genesis as a precious stone (Gen. 2.12).

2. You ask whether the stone of Tharsis is a chrysolite or a hyacinth, as different interpreters want it, to whose color the image of God is written, why Jonah the prophet is said to want to go to Tharsis (Jonah 1), and Solomon and Jehoshaphat had ships in the books of the kingdoms, which were accustomed to engage in commerce from Tharsis (2 Kings 10). The easy answer is that the word is synonymous, which is so called both the region of India and the sea itself, because it is blue and often struck by the rays of the sun, it takes the color from the aforementioned stones and takes its name from the color. Although Josephus, with the letter tau changed, thinks that the Greeks called Tarsus instead of Tharsis.

3. Countless things seemed base to me in his commentaries. It is certainly a finished style, and flowing in the Gallican mode: but what of the interpreter, whose profession it is not that he himself should appear eloquent, but that he should facilitate understanding for the reader as to how the writer himself understood it. I ask, had he not possessed the ten volumes of Origen? not other interpreters? certainly not some Hebrews who were necessary so that he might either interrogate them or read what he did not understand? But he seems to have formed such a poor opinion of posterity, that no one could judge his mistakes.

4. Therefore, it is in vain that you demand commentaries from me about that man, because in them I find many things which displease me, rather than please me. And if you should say, 'Why then did you give them to others?' I should answer that I did not give them to all, but only to those who seemed to be able to understand them and to derive some benefit from reading them. Jesus fed many people in the desert with barley loaves, but fewer with wheat loaves. And the Corinthians, among whom was the sort of fornication that is not even named among the Gentiles, were as yet only able to receive milk, and not solid meat, i.e., a more advanced instruction. But the Ephesians, among whom there was no crime of this sort, but who lived in peace, were fed with heavenly Bread and received the Sacrament of the Lord. But you should not be guided by the age, or authority, or learning of the persons who have given you books to read, such as Daniel, who judged the elders, and Amos, who was a herdsman and not a chief priest.

Letters - letter_038

Letter 38. To Marcella.

Blaesilla, the daughter of Paula and sister of Eustochium, had lost her husband seven months after her marriage, A dangerous illness had then led to her conversion, and she was now famous throughout Rome for the length to which she carried her austerities. Many censured her for what they deemed her fanaticism, and Jerome, as her spiritual adviser, came in for some of the blame. In the present letter he defends her conduct, and declares that persons who cavil at lives like hers have no claim to be considered Christians. Written at Rome in 385 a.d.

1. When Abraham is tempted to slay his son the trial only serves to strengthen his faith.¹ When Joseph is sold into Egypt, his sojourn there enables him to support his father and his brothers.² When Hezekiah is panic-stricken at the near approach of death, his tears and prayers obtain for him a respite of fifteen years,³ If the faith of the apostle, Peter, is shaken by his Lord's passion, it is that, weeping bitterly, he may hear the soothing words: "Feed my sheep." [Luke 22:54-62; John. 21:16] If Paul, that ravening wolf, [Gen. 49:27] that little Benjamin, [Ps. 68:27] is blinded in a trance, it is that he may receive his sight, and may be led, by the sudden horror of surrounding darkness, to call Him Lord Whom before he persecuted as man. [Acts 9:3-18]

2. So is it now, my dear Marcella, with our beloved Blaesilla. The burning fever from which we have seen her suffering unceasingly for nearly thirty days has been sent to teach her to renounce her over-great attention to that body which the worms must shortly devour. The Lord Jesus has come to her in her sickness, and has taken her by the hand, and behold, she arises and ministers unto Him. [Cf. Mark 1:30, Mark 1:31] Formerly her life savored somewhat Of carelessness; and, fast bound in the bands of wealth, she lay as one dead in the tomb of the world. But Jesus was moved with indignation, [John 11:38, R.V. marg] and was troubled in spirit, and cried aloud and said, Blaesilla, come forth. [John. 11:38-44] She, at His call, has arisen and has come forth, and sits at meat with the Lord. [John. 12:2] The Jews, if they will, may threaten her in their wrath; they may seek to slay her, because Christ has raised her up. [John. 12:10] It is enough that the apostles give God the glory. Blaesilla knows that her life is due to Him who has given it back to her. She knows that now she can clasp the feet of Him whom but a little while ago she dreaded as her judge. [Luke 7:38] Then life had all but forsaken her body, and the approach of death made her gasp and shiver. What succour did she obtain in that hour from her kinsfolk? What comfort was there in their words lighter than smoke? She owes no debt to you, ye unkindly kindred, now that she is dead to the world and alive unto Christ. [Rom. 6:11] The Christian must rejoice that it is so, and he that is vexed must admit that he has no claim to be called a Christian.

3. A widow who is "loosed from the law of her husband" [Rom. 7:2] has, for her one duty, to continue a widow. But, you will say, a sombre dress vexes the world. In that case, John the Baptist would vex it, too; and yet, among those that are born of women, there has not been a greater than he. [Luke 7:28] He was called an angel;⁴ he baptized the Lord Himself, and yet he was clothed in raiment of camel's hair, and girded with a leathern girdle. [Matt. 3:4] Is the world displeased because a widow's food is coarse? Nothing can be coarser than locusts, and yet these were the food of John. The women who ought to scandalize Christians are those who paint their eyes and lips with rouge and cosmetics; whose chalked faces, unnaturally white, are like those of idols; upon whose cheeks every chance tear leaves a furrow; who fail to realize that years make them old; who heap their heads with hair not their own; who smooth their faces, and rub out the wrinkles of age; and who, in the presence of their grandsons, behave like trembling school-girls. A Christian woman should blush to do violence to nature, or to stimulate desire by bestowing care upon the flesh. "They that are in the flesh," the apostle tells us, "cannot please God." [Rom. 8:8]

4. In days gone by our dear widow was extremely fastidious in her dress, and spent whole days before her mirror to correct its deficiencies. Now she boldly says: "We all with unveiled face, beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the spirit of the Lord." [2 Cor. 3:18, R.V] In those days maids arranged her hair, and her head, which had done no harm, was forced into a waving head-dress. Now she leaves her hair alone, and her only head-dress is a veil. In those days the softest feather-bed seemed hard to her, and she could scarcely find rest on a pile of mattresses. Now she rises eager for prayer, her shrill voice cries Alleluia before every other, she is the first to praise her Lord. She kneels upon the bare ground, and with frequent tears cleanses a face once defiled with white lead. After prayer comes the singing of psalms, and it is only when her neck aches and her knees totter, and her eyes begin to close with weariness, that she gives them leave reluctantly to rest. As her dress is dark, lying on the ground does not soil it. Cheap shoes permit her to give to the poor the price of gilded ones. No gold and jewels adorn her girdle; it is made of wool, plain and scrupulously clean. It is intended to keep her clothes right, and not to cut her waist in two. Therefore, if the scorpion looks askance upon her purpose, and with alluring words tempts her once more to eat of the forbidden tree, she must crush him beneath her feet with a curse, and say, as he lies dying in his allotted dust: [Gen. 3:14] "Get thee behind me, Satan." [Matt. 16:23] Satan means adversary, [1 Pet. 5:8] and one who dislikes Christ's commandments, is more than Christ's adversary; he is anti-christ.

5. But what, I ask you, have we ever done that men should be offended at us? Have we ever imitated the apostles? We are told of the first disciples that they forsook their boat and their nets, and even their aged father. [Matt. 4:18-22] The publican stood up from the receipt of custom and followed the Saviour once for all. [Matt. 9:9] And when a disciple wished to return home, that he might take leave of his kinsfolk, the Master's voice refused consent. [Luke 9:61, Luke 9:62] A son was even forbidden to bury his father, [Matt. 8:21] as if to show that it is sometimes a religious duty to be undutiful for the Lord's sake. [Luke 14:26] With us it is different. We are held to be monks if we refuse to dress in silk. We are called sour and severe if we keep sober and refrain from excessive laughter. The mob salutes us as Greeks and impostors⁵ if our tunics are fresh and clean. They may deal in still severer witticisms if they please; they may parade every fat paunch⁶ they can lay hold of, to turn us into ridicule. Our Blaesilla will laugh at their efforts, and will bear with patience the taunts of all such croaking frogs, for she will remember that men called her Lord, Beelzebub. [Matt. 10:25]

1: Gen. xxii 2: Gen. xxxvii., Gen. xlvi 3: 2 K xx.; Isa. xxxviii 4: Luke 7:27. The word "angel" means "messenger."

5: Cf. Letter LIV 6: Pinguis aqualiculus-Pers. 1:57

Letters - letter_039

Letter 39. To Paula.

Blaesilla died within three months of her conversion, and Jerome now writes to Paula to offer her his sympathy and, if possible, to moderate her grief. He asks her to remember that Blaesilla is now in paradise, and so far to control herself as to prevent enemies of the faith from cavilling at her conduct. Then he concludes with the prophecy (since more than fulfilled) that in his writings Blaesilla's name shall never die. Written at Rome in 389 a.d.

1. "Oh that my head were waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears: that I might weep," not as Jeremiah says, "For the slain of my people," [Jer. 9:1] nor as Jesus, for the miserable fate of Jerusalem, [Luke 19:41] but for holiness, mercy, innocence, chastity, and all the virtues, for all are gone now that Blaesilla is dead. For her sake I do not grieve, but for myself I must; my loss is too great to be borne with resignation. Who can recall with dry eyes the glowing faith which induced a girl of twenty to raise the standard of the Cross, and to mourn the loss of her virginity more than the death of her husband? Who can recall without a sigh the earnestness of her prayers, the brilliancy of her conversation, the tenacity of her memory, and the quickness of her intellect? Had you heard her speak Greek you would have deemed her ignorant of Latin; yet when she used the tongue of Rome her words were free from a foreign accent. She even rivalled the great Origen in those acquirements which won for him the admiration of Greece. For in a few months, or rather days, she so completely mastered the difficulties of Hebrew as to emulate her mother's zeal in learning and singing the psalms. Her attire was plain, but this plainness was not, as it often is, a mark of pride. Indeed, her self-abasement was so perfect that she dressed no better than her maids, and was only distinguished from them by the greater ease of her walk. Her steps tottered with weakness, her face was pale and quivering, her slender neck scarcely upheld her head. Still she always had in her hand a prophet or a gospel. As I think of her my eyes fill with tears, sobs impede my voice, and such is my emotion that my tongue cleaves to the roof of my mouth. As she lay there dying, her poor frame parched with burning fever, and her relatives gathered round her bed, her last words were: "Pray to the Lord Jesus, that He may pardon me, because what I would have done I have not been able to do." Be at peace, dear Blaesilla, in full assurance that your garments are always white. [Eccles. 9:8] For yours is the purity of an everlasting virginity. I feel confident that my words are true: conversion can never be too late. The words to the dying robber are a pledge of this: "Verily I say unto thee, today shall thou be with me in paradise." [Luke 23:43] When at last her spirit was delivered from the burden of the flesh, and had returned to Him who gave it; [Cf. Eccles. 12:7] when, too, after her long pilgrimage, she had ascended up into her ancient heritage, her obsequies were celebrated with customary splendor. People of rank headed the procession, a pail made of cloth of gold covered her bier. But I seemed to hear a voice from heaven, saying: "I do not recognize these trappings; such is not the garb I used to wear; this magnificence is strange to me."

2. But what is this? I wish to check a mother's weeping, and I groan myself. I make no secret of my feelings; this entire letter is written in tears. Even Jesus wept for Lazarus because He loved him. [John 11:35, John 11:36] But he is a poor comforter who is overcome by his own sighs, and from whose afflicted heart tears are wrung as well as words. Dear Paula, my agony is as great as yours. Jesus knows it, whom Blaesilla now follows; the holy angels know it, whose company she now enjoys. I was her father in the spirit, her foster-father in affection. Sometimes I say: "Let the day perish wherein I was born," [Job 3:3, cf. Jer. 20:14] and again, "Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me a man of strife and a man of contention to the whole earth." [Jer. 15:10] I cry: "Righteous art thou, O Lord ...yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments. Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper?" [Jer. 12:1] and "as for me, my feet were almost gone, my steps had well-nigh slipped. For I was envious at the foolish when I saw the prosperity of the wicked, and I said: How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the most high? Behold these are the ungodly who prosper in the world; they increase in riches." [Ps. 73:2, 3, 11, 12, Vulg] But again I recall other words, "If I say I will speak thus, behold I should offend against the generation of thy children." [Ps. 73:15] Do not great waves of doubt surge up over my soul as over yours? How comes it, I ask, that godless men live to old age in the enjoyment of this world's riches? How comes it that untutored youth and innocent childhood are cut down while still in the bud? Why is it that children three years old or two, and even unweaned infants, are possessed with devils, covered with leprosy, and eaten up with jaundice, while godless men and profane, adulterers and murderers, have health and strength to blaspheme God? Are we not told that the unrighteousness of the father does not fall upon the son, [Ezek. 18:20] and that "the soul that sinneth it shall die?" [Ezek. 18:4] Or if the old doctrine holds good that the sins of the fathers must be visited upon the children, [Ex. 20:5] an old man's countless sins cannot fairly be avenged upon a harmless infant. And I have said: "Verily, I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. For all the day long have I been plagued." [Ps. 73:13, Ps. 73:14] Yet when I have thought of these things, like the prophet I have learned to say: "When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me; until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end." [Ps. 73:16, Ps. 73:17] Truly the judgments of the Lord are a great deep. [Ps. 36:6] "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out!" [Rom. 11:33] God is good, and all that He does must be good also. Does He decree that I must lose my husband? I mourn my loss, but because it is His will I bear it with resignation. Is an only son snatched from me? The blow is hard, yet it can be borne, for He who has taken away is He who gave. [Job 1:21] If I become blind a friend's reading will console me. If I become deaf I shall escape from sinful words, and my thoughts shall be of God alone. And if, besides such trials as these, poverty, cold, sickness, and nakedness oppress me, I shall wait for death, and regard them as passing evils, soon to give way to a better issue. Let us reflect on the words of the sapiential psalm: "Righteous art thou, O Lord, and upright are thy judgments." [Ps. 119:137] Only he can speak thus who in all his troubles magnifies the Lord, and, putting down his sufferings to his sins, thanks God for his clemency. The daughters of Judah, we are told, rejoiced, because of all the judgments of the Lord. [Ps. 97:8] Therefore, since Judah means confession, and since every believing soul confesses its faith, [Rom. 10:10] he who claims to believe in Christ must rejoice in all Christ's judgments. Am I in health? I thank my Creator. Am I sick? In this case, too, I praise God's will. For "when I am weak, then am I strong;" and the strength of the spirit is made perfect in the weakness of the flesh. Even an apostle must bear what he dislikes, that ailment for the removal of which he besought the Lord thrice. God's reply was: "My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness." [2 Cor. 12:8, 2 Cor. 12:9, 2 Cor. 12:10] Lest he should be unduly elated by his revelations, a reminder of his human weakness was given to him, just as in the triumphal car of the victorious general there was always a slave to whisper constantly, amid the cheerings of the multitude, "Remember that thou art but man."¹

3. But why should that be hard to bear which we must one day ourselves endure? And why do we grieve for the dead? We are not born to live forever. Abraham, Moses, and Isaiah, Peter, James, and John, Paul, the "chosen vessel," [Acts 9:15] and even the Son of God Himself have all died; and are we vexed when a soul leaves its earthly tenement? Perhaps he is taken away, "lest that wickedness should alter his understanding ...for his soul pleased the Lord: therefore hastened he to take him away from the people" [Wisd. 4:11, Wisd. 4:14] -lest in life's long journey he should lose his way in some trackless maze. We should indeed mourn for the dead, but only for him whom Gehenna receives, whom Tartarus devours, and for whose punishment the eternal fire burns. But we who, in departing, are accompanied by an escort of angels, and met by Christ Himself, should rather grieve that we have to tarry yet longer in this tabernacle of death. [2 Cor. 5:4] For "whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord." [2 Cor. 5:6] Our one longing should be that expressed by the psalmist: "Woe is me that my pilgrimage is prolonged, that I have dwelt with them that dwell in Kedar, that my soul hath made a far pilgrimage." [Ps. 120:5, 6, Vulg] Kedar means darkness, and darkness stands for this present world (for, we are told, "the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehendeth it not" [John. 1:5]). Therefore we should congratulate our dear Blaesilla that she has passed from darkness to light, [Eph. 5:8] and has in the first flush of her dawning faith received the crown of her completed work. Had she been cut off (as I pray that none may be) while her thoughts were full of worldly desires and passing pleasures, then mourning would indeed have been her due, and no tears shed for her would have been too many. As it is, by the mercy of Christ she, four months ago, renewed her baptism in her vow of widowhood, and for the rest of her days spurned the world, and thought only of the religious life. Have you no fear, then, lest the Saviour may say to you: "Are you angry, Paula, that your daughter has become my daughter? Are you vexed at my decree, and do you, with rebellious tears, grudge me the possession of Blaesilla? You ought to know what my purpose is both for you and for yours. You deny yourself food, not to fast but to gratify your grief; and such abstinence is displeasing to me. Such fasts are my enemies. I receive no soul which forsakes the body against my will. A foolish philosophy may boast of martyrs of this kind; it may boast of a Zeno² a Cleombrotus,³ or a Cato.⁴ My spirit rests only upon him "that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and that trembleth at my word. [Isa. 66:2] Is this the meaning of your vow to me that you would lead a religious life? Is it for this that you dress yourself differently from other matrons, and array yourself in the garb of a nun? Mourning is for those who wear silk dresses. In the midst of your tears the call will come, and you, too, must die; yet you flee from me as from a cruel judge, and fancy that you can avoid falling into my hands. Jonah, that headstrong prophet, once fled from me, yet in the depths of the sea he was still mine. [Jon. 2:2-7] If you really believed your daughter to be alive, you would not grieve that she had passed to a better world. This is the commandment that I have given you through my apostle, that you sorrow not for them that sleep, even as the Gentiles, which have no hope. [1 Thess. 4:13] Blush, for you are put to shame by the example of a heathen. The devil's handmaid⁵ is better than mine. For, while she imagines that her unbelieving husband has been translated to heaven, you either do not or will not believe that your daughter is at rest with me."

4. Why should I not mourn, you say? Jacob lint on sackcloth for Joseph, and when all his family gathered round him, refused to be comforted. "I will go down," he said, "into the grave unto my son mourning." [Gen. 37:35] David also mourned for Absalom, covering his face, and crying: "O my son, Absalom ...my son, Absalom! Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son!" [2 Sam. 18:33] Moses, [Deut. 34:8] too, and Aaron, [Nu. 20:29] and the rest of the saints were mourned for with a solemn mourning. The answer to your reasoning issimple. Jacob, it is true, mourned for Joseph, whom he fancied slain, and thought tomeet only in the grave (his words were: "I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning"), but he only did so because Christ had not yet broken open the door of paradise, nor quenched with his blood the flaming sword and the whirling of the guardian cherubim.⁶ (Hence in the story of Dives and Lazarus, Abraham and the beggar, though really in a place of refreshment, are described as being in hell. [Apud inferos-Luke 16:23]) And David, who, after interceding in vain for the life of his infant child, refused to weep for it, knowing that it had not sinned, did well to weep for a son who had been a parricide-in will, if not in deed. [2 Sam. 17:1-4] And when we read that, for Moses and Aaron, lamentation was made after ancient custom, this ought not to surprise us, for even in the Acts of the Apostles, in the full blaze of the gospel, we see that the brethren at Jerusalem made great lamentation for Stephen. [Acts 8:2] This great lamentation, however, refers not to the mourners, but to the funeral procession and to the crowds which accompanied it. This is what the Scripture says of Jacob: "Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, and all the house of Joseph and his brethren"; and a few lines farther on: "And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a great company." Finally, "they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation." [Gen. 1:7-10] This solemn lamentation does not impose prolonged weeping upon the Egyptians, but simply describes the funeral ceremony. In like manner, when we read of weeping made for Moses and Aaron, [Nu. 20:29; Deut. 34:6-8] this is all that is meant.

I cannot adequately extol the mysteries of Scripture, nor sufficiently admire the spiritual meaning conveyed in its most simple words. We are told, for instance, that lamentation was made for Moses; yet when the funeral of Joshua is described [Josh. 24:30] no mention at all is made of weeping. The reason, of course, is that under Moses-that is under the old Law-all men were bound by the sentence passed on Adam's sin, and when they descended into hell⁷ were rightly accompanied with tears. For, as the apostle says, "death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned." [Rom. 5:14] But under Jesus,⁸ that is, under the Gospel of Christ, who has unlocked for us the gate of paradise, death is accompanied, not with sorrow, but with joy. The Jews go on weeping to this day; they make bare their feet, they crouch in sackcloth, they roll in ashes. And to make their superstition complete, they follow a foolish custom of the Pharisees, and eat lentils,⁹ to show, it would seem, for what poor fare they have lost their birthright. [Gen. 25:34] Of course they are right to weep, for as they do not believe in the Lord's resurrection they are being made ready for the advent of antichrist. But we who have put on Christ [Gal. 3:27] and according to the apostle are a royal and priestly race, [1 Pet. 2:9] we ought not to grieve for the dead. "Moses," the Scripture tells us, "said unto Aaron and unto Eleazar, and unto Ithamar, his sons that were left: Uncover not your heads, neither rend your clothes; lest ye die, and lest wrath come upon all the people." [Lev. 10:6, Lev. 10:12] Rend not your clothes, he says, neither mourn as pagans, lest you die. For, for us sin is death. In this same book, Leviticus, there is a provision which may perhaps strike some as cruel, yet is necessary to faith: the high priest is forbidden to approach the dead bodies of his father and mother, of his brothers and of his children; [Lev. 21:10-12] to the end, that no grief may distract a soul engaged in offering sacrifice to God, and wholly devoted to the Divine mysteries. Are we not taught the same lesson in the Gospel in other words? Is not the disciple forbidden to say farewell to his home or to bury his dead father? [Luke 9:59-62] Of the high priest, again, it is said: "He shall not go out of the sanctuary, and the sanctification of his God shall not be contaminated, for the anointing oil of his God is upon him." [Lev. 21:12, Vulg] Certainly, now that we have believed in Christ, and bear Him within us, by reason of the oil of His anointing which we have received, [1 John. 2:27] we ought not to depart from His temple-that is, from our Christian profession-we ought not to go forth to mingle with the unbelieving Gentiles, but always to remain within, as servants obedient to the will of the Lord.

5. I have spoken plainly, lest you might ignorantly suppose that Scripture sanctions your grief; and that, if you err, you have reason on your side. And, so far, my words have been addressed to the average Christian woman. But now it will not be so. For in your case, as I well know, renunciation of the world has been complete; you have rejected and trampled on the delights of life, and you give yourself daily to fasting, to reading, and to prayer. Like Abraham, [Gen. 12:1-4] you desire to leave your country and kindred, to forsake Mesopotamia and the Chaldaeans, to enter into the promised land. Dead to the world before your death, you have spent all your mere worldly substance upon the poor, or have bestowed it upon your children. I am the more surprised, therefore, that you should act in a manner which in others would justly call for reprehension. You call to mind Blaesilla's companionship, her conversation, and her endearing ways; and you cannot endure the thought that you have lost them all. I pardon you the tears of a mother, but I ask you to restrain your grief. When I think of the parent I cannot blame you for weeping: but when I think of the Christian and the recluse, the mother disappears from my view. Your wound is still fresh, and ant touch of mine, however gentle, is more likely to inflame than to heal it. Yet why do you not try to overcome by reason a grief which time must inevitably assuage? Naomi, fleeing because of famine to the land of Moab, there lost her husband and her sons. Yet when she was thus deprived of her natural protectors, Ruth, a stranger, never left her side. [Ruth 1] And see what a great thing it is to comfort a lonely woman Ruth, for her reward, is made an ancestress of Christ. [Matt. 1:5] Consider the great trials which Job endured, and you will see that you are over-delicate. Amid the ruins of his house, the pains of his sores, his countless bereavements, and, last of all, the snares laid for him by his wife, he still lifted up his eyes to heaven, and maintained his patience unbroken. I know what you are going to say "All this befell him as a righteous man, to try his righteousness." Well, choose which alternative you please. Either you are holy, in which case God is putting your holiness to the proof; or else you are a sinner, in which case you have no right to complain. For if so, you endure far less than your deserts.

Why should I repeat old stories? Listen to a modern instance. The holy Melaniam, ¹⁰ eminent among Christians for her true nobility (may the Lord grant that you and I may have part with her in His day!), while the dead body of her husband was still unburied, still warm, had the misfortune to lose at one stroke two of her sons. The sequel seems incredible, but Christ is my witness that my words are true. Would you not suppose that in her frenzy she would have unbound her hair, and rent her clothes, and torn her breast? Yet not a tear fell from her eyes. Motionless she stood there; then casting herself at the feet of Christ, she smiled, as though she held Him with her hands. "Henceforth, Lord," she said, "I will serve Thee more readily, for Thou hast freed me from a great burden." But perhaps her remaining children overcame her determination. No, indeed; she set so little store by them that she gave up all that she had to her only son, and then, in spite of the approaching winter, took ship for Jerusalem.

6. Spare yourself, I beseech you, spare Blaesilla, who now reigns with Christ; at least spare Eustochium, whose tender years and inexperience depend on you for guidance and instruction. Now does the devil rage and complain that he is set at naught, because he sees one of your children exalted in triumph. The victory which he failed to win over her that is gone he hopes to obtain over her who still remains. Too great affection towards one's children is disaffection towards God. Abraham gladly prepares to slay his only son, and do you complain if one child out of several has received her crown? I cannot say what I am going to say without a groan. When you were carried fainting out of the funeral procession, whispers such as these were audible in the crowd. "Is not this what we have often said. She weeps for her daughter, killed with fasting. She wanted her to marry again, that she might have grandchildren. How long must we refrain from driving these detestable monks out of Rome? Why do we not stone them or hurl them into the Tiber? They have misled this unhappy lady; that she is not a nun from choice is clear. No heathen mother ever wept for her children as she does for Blaesilla." What sorrow, think you, must not Christ have endured when He listened to such words as these! And how triumphantly must Satan have exulted, eager as he is to snatch your soul! Luring you with the claims of a grief which seems natural and right, and always keeping before you the image of Blaesilla, his aim is to slay the mother of the victress, and then to fall upon her forsaken sister. I do not speak thus to terrify you. The Lord is my witness that I address you now as though I were standing at His judgment seat. Tears which have no meaning are an object of abhorrence. Yours are detestable tears, sacrilegious tears, unbelieving tears; for they know no limits, and bring you to the verge of death. You shriek and cry out as though on fire within, and do your best to put an end to yourself. But to you and others like you Jesus comes in His mercy and says: "Why weepest thou? the damsel is not dead but sleepeth." [Mark 5:39] The bystanders may laugh him to scorn; such unbelief is worthy of the Jews. If you prostrate yourself in grief at your daughter's tomb you too will hear the chiding of the angel, "Why seek ye the living among the dead?" [Luke 24:5] It was because Mary Magdalene had done this that when she recognized the Lord's voice calling her and fell at His feet, He said to her: "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father;" [John. 20:17] that is to say, you are not worthy to touch, as risen, one whom you suppose still in the tomb.

7. What crosses and tortures, think you, must not our Blaesilla endure to see Christ angry with you, though it be but a little! At this moment she cries to you as you weep: "If ever you loved me, mother, if I was nourished at your breast, if I was taught by your precepts, do not grudge me my exaltation, do not so act that we shall be separated forever. Do you fancy that I am alone? In place of you I now have Mary the mother of the Lord. Here I see many whom before I have not known. My companions are infinitely better than any that I had on earth. Here I have the company of Anna, the prophetess of the Gospel; [Luke 2:36, Luke 2:37] and-what should kindle in you more fervent joy-I have gained in three short months what cost her the labor of many years to win. Both of us widows indeed, we have been both rewarded with the palm of chastity. Do you pity me because I have left the world behind me? It is I who should, and do, pity you who, still immured in its prison, daily fight with. anger, with covetousness, with lust, with this or that temptation leading the soul to ruin. If you wish to be indeed my mother, you must please Christ. She is not my mother who displeases my Lord." Many other things does she say which here I pass over; she prays also to God for you. For me, too, I feel sure, she makes intercession and asks God to pardon my sins in return for the warnings and advice that I bestowed on her, when to secure her salvation I braved the ill will of her family.

8. Therefore, so long as breath animates my body, so long as I continue in the enjoyment of life, I engage, declare, and promise that Blaesilla's name shall be forever on my tongue, that my labors shall be dedicated to her honor, and that my talents shall be devoted to her praise. No page will I write in which Blaesilla's name shall not occur Wherever the records of my utterance shall find their way, thither she, too, will travel with my poor writings. Virgins, widows, monks and priests, as they read, will see how deeply her image is impressed upon my mind. Everlasting remembrance will make up for the shortness of her life. Living as she does with Christ in heaven, she will live also on the lips of men. The present will soon pass away and give place to the future, and that future will judge her without partiality and without prejudice. As a childless widow she will occupy a middle place between Paula, the mother of children, and Eustochium the virgin. In my writings she will never die. She will hear me conversing of her always, either with her sister or with her mother.

1: Cf. Tertullian, Apol. 33 2: A famous stoic who committed suicide in extreme old age. See Diogenes Laertius (vii. 1) for an account of his death 3: An academic philosopher of Ambracia, who is said to have killed himself after reading the Phaedo of Plato

4: Cato of Utica, who, after the battle of Thapsus (46 b.c.), committed suicide to avoid falling into the hands of Caesar 5: Viz. Paulina, wife of Praetextatus and priestess of Ceres. See Letter XXIII

6: Gen. 3:24, cf. Ezek. 1:15-20. Here as in his Comm. on Eccles. 3:16-22, Jerome follows Origen, who, in his homily de Engastrimytho, lays down that until Christ came to set them free the patriarchs, prophets, and saints of the Old Testament were all in hell 7: Ad inferos. Hades is meant, not Gehenna 8: The Greek form of Joshua. Cf. Acts 7:45, A. V

9:

I learn from Dr. Neubauer, of Oxford, that this is still a practice during mourning among the Jews of the East. He refers to Tur Joreh Deah. §378

10:

Or Melania. She went with Rufinus to the East, and settled with him on the Mt. of Olives; and incurred Jerome's resentment as Rufinus' friend. See Ep. 133:3. "She whose name of blackness attests the darkness of her perfidy.

Letters - letter_040

Letter 40. To Marcella.

Onasus, of Segesta, the subject of this letter, was among Jerome's Roman opponents. He is here held up to ridicule in a manner which reflects little credit on the writer's urbanity. The date of the letter is 385 a.d.

1. The medical men called surgeons pass for being cruel, but really deserve pity. For is it not pitiful to cut away the dead flesh of another man with merciless knives without being moved by his pangs? Is it not pitiful that the man who is curing the patient is callous to his sufferings, and has to appear as his enemy? Yet such is the order of nature. While truth is always bitter, pleasantness waits upon evil-doing. Isaiah goes naked without blushing as a type of captivity to come. [Isa. 20:2] Jeremiah is sent from Jerusalem to the Euphrates (a river in Mesopotamia), and leaves his girdle to be marred in the Chaldaean camp, among the Assyrians hostile to his people. [Jer. 13:6, Jer. 13:7] Ezekiel is told to eat bread made of mingled seeds and sprinkled with the dung of men and cattle. [Ezek. 4:9-16] He has to see his wife die without shedding a tear. [Ezek. 24:15-18] Amos is driven from Samaria. [Amos 7:12, Amos 7:13] Why is he driven from it? Surely in this case as in the others, because he was a spiritual surgeon, who cut away the parts diseased by sin and urged men to repentance. The apostle Paul says: "Am I therefore become your enemy because I tell you the truth?" [Gal. 4:16] And so the Saviour Himself found it, from whom many of the disciples went back because His sayings seemed hard. [John 6:60, John 6:66]

2. It is not surprising, then, that by exposing their faults I have offended many. I have arranged to operate on a cancerous nose;¹ let him who suffers from wens tremble. I wish to rebuke a chattering daw; let the crow realize that she is offensive.² Yet, after all, is there but one person in Rome

"Whose nostrils are disfigured by a scar?" [Virg. A. 6:497] Is Onasus of Segesta alone in puffing out his cheeks like bladders and balancing hollow phrases on his tongue?

I say that certain persons have, by crime, perjury, and false pretences, attained to this or that high position. How does it hurt you who know that the charge does not touch you? I laugh at a pleader who has no clients, and sneer at a penny-a-liner's eloquence. What does it matter to you who are such a refined speaker? It is my whim to inveigh against mercenary priests. You are rich already, why should you be angry? I wish to shut up Vulcan and burn him in his own flames. Are you his guest or his neighbor that you try to save an idol's shrine from the fire? I choose to make merry over ghosts and owls and monsters of the Nile; and whatever I say, you take it as aimed at you. At whatever fault I point my pen, you cry out that you are meant. You collar me and drag me into court and absurdly charge me with writing satires when I only write plain prose! So you really think yourself a pretty fellow just because you have a lucky name!³ Why it does not follow at all. A brake is called a brake just because the light does not break through it.⁴ The Fates are called "sparers,"⁵ just because they never spare. The Furies are spoken of as gracious,⁶ because they show no grace. And in common speech Ethiopians go by the name of silverlings. Still, if the showing up of faults always angers you, I will soothe you now with the words of Persius: "May you be a catch for my lord and lady's daughter! May the pretty ladies scramble for you! May the ground you walk on turn to a rose-bed!" [Pers. 2:37, 38]

3. All the same, I will give you a hint what features to hide if you want to look your best. Show no nose upon your face and keep your mouth shut. You will then stand some chance of being counted both handsome and eloquent.

1: Nasus. A play on the name Onasus 2: Cf. Persius, 50:33 3: Onasus means "lucky" or "profitable;" it is another form of Onesimus 4: Quoted from Quintilian 1:6, 34 (lucus a non lucendo) 5: Parcae, from parcere, to spare 6: Eumenides, the Greek name for the Furies

Letters - letter_041

Letter 41. To Marcella. An effort having been made to convert Marcella to Montanism, Jerome here summarizes for her its leading doctrines, which he contrasts with those of the Church. Written at Rome in 385 a.d.

1. As regards the passages brought together from the gospel of John with which a certain votary of Montanus has assailed you, passages in which our Saviour promises that He will go to the Father, and that He will send the Paraclete [John. 14:28; John. 15:26] -as regards these, the Acts of the Apostles inform us both for what time the promises were made, and at what time they were actually fulfilled. Ten days had elapsed, we are told, from the Lord's ascension and fifty from His resurrection, when the Holy Spirit came down, and the tongues of the believers were cloven, so that each spoke every language. Then it was that, when certain persons of those who as yet believed not declared that the disciples were drunk with new wine, Peter standing in the midst of the apostles, and of all the concourse said: "Ye men of Judaea and all ye that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you and hearken to my words: for these are not drunken as ye suppose, seeing it is but the third hour of the day. But this is that which was spoken of by the prophet Joel. And it shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh: and your sons and daughters shall prophesy, and your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams: and on my servants, and on my handmaidens will pour out ...of my spirit." [Acts 2:14-18]

2. If, then, the apostle Peter, upon whom the Lord has founded the Church, [Matt. 16:18] has expressly said that the prophecy and promise of the Lord were then and there fulfilled, how can we claim another fulfilment for ourselves? if the Montanists reply that Philip's four daughters prophesied [Acts 21:9] at a later date, and that a prophet is mentioned named Agabus, [Acts 11:28; Acts 21:10, Acts 21:11] and that in the partition of the spirit, prophets are spoken of as well as apostles, teachers and others, [1 Cor. 12:28; cf. Eph. 4:11] and that Paul himself prophesied many things concerning heresies still future, and the end of the world; we tell them that we do not so much reject prophecy-for this is attested by the passion of the Lord-as refuse to receive prophets whose utterances fail to accord with the Scriptures old and new.

3. In the first place we differ from the Montanists regarding the rule of faith. We distinguish the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit as three persons, but unite them as one substance. They, on the other hand, following the doctrine of Sabellius,¹ force the Trinity into the narrow limits of a single personality. We, while we do not encourage them, yet allow second marriages, since Paul bids the younger widows to marry. [1 Tim. 5:14] They suppose a repetition of marriage a sin so awful that he who has committed it is to be regarded as an adulterer. We, according to the apostolic tradition (in which the whole world is at one with us), fast through one Lent yearly; whereas they keep three in the year as though three saviours had suffered. I do not mean, of course, that it is unlawful to fast at other times through the year-always excepting Pentecost² -only that while in Lent it is a duty of obligation, at other seasons it is a matter of choice. With us, again, the bishops occupy the place of the apostles, but with them a bishop ranks not first but third. For while they put first the patriarchs of Pepusa³ in Phrygia, and place next to these the ministers called stewards,⁴ the bishops are relegated to the third or almost the lowest rank. No doubt their object is to make their religion more pretentious by putting that last which we put first. Again they close the doors of the Church to almost every fault, whilst we read daily, "I desire the repentance of a sinner rather than his death," [Ezek. 18:23] and "Shall they fall and not arise, saith the Lord," [Jer. 8:4] and once more "Return ye backsliding children and I will heal your backslidings." [Jer. 3:22] Their strictness does not prevent them from themselves committing grave sins, far from it; but there is this difference between us and them, that, whereas they in their self-righteousness blush to confess their faults, we do penance for ours, and so more readily gain pardon for them.

4. I pass over their sacraments⁵ of sin, made up as they are said to be, of sucking children subjected to a triumphant martyrdom.⁶ I prefer, I say, not to credit these; accusations of blood-shedding may well be false. But I must confute the open blasphemy of men who say that God first determined in the Old Testament to save the world by Moses and the prophets, but that finding Himself unable to fulfil His purpose He took to Himself a body of the Virgin, and preaching under the form of the Son in Christ, underwent death for our salvation. Moreover that, when by these two steps He was unable to save the world, He last of all descended by the Holy Spirit upon Montanus and those demented women Prisca and Maximilia; and that thus the mutilated and emasculate⁷ Montanus possessed a fulness of knowledge such as was never claimed by Paul; for he was content to say, "We know in part, and we prophesy in part," and again, "Now we see through a glass darkly." [1 Cor. 13:9, 1 Cor. 13:12]

These are statements which require no refutation. To expose the infidelity of the Montanists is to triumph over it. Nor is it necessary that in so short a letter as this I should overthrow the several absurdities which they bring forward. You are well acquainted with the Scriptures; and, as I take it, you have written, not because you have been disturbed by their cavils, but only to learn my opinion about them.

1: A presbyter of the Libyan Pentapolis who taught at Rome in the early years of the third century. He "confounded the persons" of the Trinity and was subsequently accounted a heretic. Cf. Letter XV 2: Viz. the period between Easter Day and Whitsunday 3: Called by the Montanists the New Jerusalem 4: Oeconomus-according to a probable emendation. The text has cenonas

5: Mysteria 6: Victuro martyre confarrata. The precise meaning of the words is obscure 7: Some suppose him to have been a priest of Cybele, but it would be a mistake to lay too much stress on Jerome's words

Letters - letter_042

Letter 42. To Marcella. At Marcella's request Jerome explains to her what is "the sin against the Holy Ghost" spoken of by Christ, and shows Novatian's explanation of it to be untenable. Written at Rome in 385 a.d.

1. The question you send is short and the answer is clear. There is this passage in the gospel: "Whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of Man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him neither in this world nor in the world to come." [Matt. 12:32] Now if Novatian affirms that none but Christian renegades can sin against the Holy Ghost, it is plain that the Jews who blasphemed Christ were not guilty of this sin. Yet they were wicked husbandmen, they had slain the prophets, they were then compassing the death of the Lord; [Matt. 21:33] and so utterly lost were they that the Son of God told them that it was they whom he had come to save. [Matt. 18:11] It must be proved to Novatian, therefore, that the sin which shall never be forgiven is not the blasphemy of men disembowelled by torture who in their agony deny their Lord, but is the captious clamor of those who, while they see that God's works are the fruit of virtue, ascribe the virtue to a demon and declare the signs wrought to belong not to the divine excellence but to the devil. And this is the whole gist of our Saviour's argument, when He teaches that Satan cannot be cast out by Satan, and that his kingdom is not divided against itself. [Matt. 12:25, Matt. 12:26] If it is the devil's object to injure God's creation, how can he wish to cure the sick and to expel himself from the bodies possessed by him? Let Novatian prove that of those who have been compelled to sacrifice before a judge's tribunal any has declared of the things written in the gospel that they were wrought not by the Son of God but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils; [Matt. 12:24] and then he will be able to make good his contention that this¹ is the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost which shall never be forgiven.

2. But to put a more searching question still: let Novatian tell us how he distinguishes speaking against the Son of Man from blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. For I maintain that on his principles men who have denied Christ under persecution have only spoken against the Son of Man, and have not blasphemed the Holy Ghost. For when a man is asked if he is a Christian, and declares that he is not; obviously in denying Christ, that is the Son of Man, he does no despite to the Holy Ghost. But if his denial of Christ involves a denial of the Holy Ghost, this heretic can perhaps tell us how the Son of Man can be denied without sinning against the Holy Ghost. If he thinks that we are here intended by the term Holy Ghost to understand the Father, no mention at all of the Father is made by the denier in his denial. When the apostle Peter, taken aback by a maid's question, denied the Lord, did he sin against the Son of Man or against the Holy Ghost? If Novatian absurdly twists Peter's words, "I know not the man," [Matt. 26:74] to mean a denial not of Christ's Messiahship but of His humanity, he will make the Saviour a liar, for He foretold [Matt. 26:33-35; John. 13:38] that He Himself, that is His divine Sonship, must be denied. Now, when Peter denied the Son of God, he wept bitterly and effaced his threefold denial by a threefold confession. [John. 21:15-17] His sin, therefore, was not the sin against the Holy Ghost which can never be forgiven. It is obvious, then, that this sin involves blasphemy, calling one Beelzebub for his actions, whose virtues prove him to be God. If Novatian can bring an instance of a renegade who has called Christ Beelzebub, I will at once give up my position and admit that after such a fall the denier can win no forgiveness. To give way under torture and to deny oneself to be a Christian is one thing, to say that Christ is the devil is another. And this you will yourself see if you read the passage [Viz. Matt. 12:32, quoted above] attentively.

3. I ought to have discussed the matter more fully, but some friends have visited my humble abode, and I cannot refuse to give myself up to them. Still, as it might seem arrogant not to answer you at once, I have compressed a wide subject into a few words, and have sent you not a letter but an explanatory note.² 1: Viz. denial of Christ by Christians 2: Commentariolum

Letters - letter_043

Letter 43. To Marcella.

Jerome draws a contrast between his daily life and that of Origen, and sorrowfully admits his own shortcomings. He then suggests to Marcella the advantages which life in the country offers over life in town, and hints that he is himself disposed to make trial of it. Written at Rome in 385 a.d.

1. Ambrose who supplied Origen, true man of adamant and of brass,¹ with money, materials and amanuenses to bring out his countless books-Ambrose, in a letter to his friend from Athens, states that they never took a meal together without something being read, and never went to bed till some portion of Scripture had been brought home to them by a brother's voice. Night and day, in fact, were so ordered that prayer only gave place to reading-and reading to prayer.

2. Have we, brute beasts that we are, ever hone the like? Why, we yawn if we read for over an hour; we rub our foreheads and vainly try to suppress our languor. And then, after this great feat, we plunge for relief into worldly business once more.

I say nothing of the meals with which we dull our faculties, and I would rather not estimate the time that we spend in paying and receiving visits. Next we fall into conversation; we waste our words, we attack people behind their backs, we detail their way of living, we carp at them and are carped at by them in turn. Such is the fare that engages our attention at dinner and afterwards. Then, when our guests have retired, we make up our accounts, and these are sure to cause us either anger or anxiety. The first makes us like raging lions, and the second seeks vainly to make provision for years to come. We do not recollect the words of the Gospel: "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee: then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided?" [Luke 12:20] The clothing which we buy is designed not merely for use but for display. Where there is a chance of saving money we quicken our pace, speak promptly, and keep our ears open. If we hear of household losses-such as often occur-our looks become dejected and gloomy. The gain of a penny² fills us with joy; the loss of a half-penny³ plunges us into sorrow. One man is of so many minds that the prophet's prayer is: "Lord, in thy city scatter their image." [Ps. 73:20, Vulg] For created as we are in the image of God and after His likeness, [Gen. 1:26] it is our own wickedness which makes us assume masks.⁴ Just as on the stage the same actor now figures as a brawny Hercules, now softens into a tender Venus, now shivers in the role of Cybele; so we-who, if we were not of the world, would be hated by the world [John. 15:19] -for every sin that we commit have a corresponding mask.

3. Wherefore, seeing that we have journeyed for much of our life through a troubled sea, and that our vessel has been in turn shaken by raging blasts and shattered upon treacherous reefs, let us, as soon as may be, make for the haven of rural quietude. There such country dainties as milk and household bread, and greens watered by our own hands, will supply us with coarse but harmless fare. So living, sleep will not call us away from prayer, nor satiety from reading. In summer the shade of a tree will afford us privacy. In autumn the quality of the air and the leaves strewn under foot will invite us to stop and rest. In springtime the fields will be bright with flowers, and our psalms will sound the sweeter for the twittering of the birds. When winter comes with its frost and snow, I shall not have to buy fuel, and, whether I sleep or keep vigil, shall be warmer than in town. At least, so far as I know, I shall keep off the cold at less expense. Let Rome keep to itself its noise and bustle, let the cruel shows of the arena go on, let the crowd rave at the circus, let the playgoers revel in the theatres and-for I must not altogether pass over our Christian friends-let the House of Ladies [Ps. 73:28] hold its daily sittings. It is good for us to cleave to the Lord,⁵ and to put our hope in the Lord God, so that when we have exchanged our present poverty for the kingdom of heaven, we may be able to exclaim: "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee." [Ps. 73:25] Surely if we can find such blessedness in heaven we may well grieve to have sought after pleasures poor and passing here upon earth. Farewell.

1: For the meaning of these epithets as applied to Origen see Letter XXXIII 2: Nummus. Sc. Sestertius = 4 cents = 2 pence 3: Obolus = 3 1-2 cents = 1 penny 3 farthings 4: These were worn by both Greek and Roman actors 5: Senatus Matronarum. Comp. Letter XXXIII. 4: "Rome calls together its senate to condemn him.

Letters - letter_044

Letter 44. To Marcella.

Marcella had sent some small articles as a present (probably to Paula and Eustochium) and Jerome now writes in their name to thank her for them. He notices the appropriateness of the gifts, not only to the ladies, but also to himself. Written at Rome in 385 a.d. When absent in body we are wont to converse together in spirit. [Cf. Col. 2:5] Each of us does what he or she can. You send us gifts, we send you back letters of thanks. And as we are virgins who have taken the veil,¹ it is our duty to show that hidden meanings lurk under your nice presents. Sackcloth, then, is a token of prayer and fasting, the chairs remind us that a virgin should never stir abroad, and the wax tapers that we should look for the bridegroom's coming with our lights burning. [Matt. 25:1] The cups also warn us to mortify the flesh and always to be ready for martyrdom. "How bright," says the psalmist, "is the cup of the Lord, intoxicating them that drink it!"² Moreover, when you offer to matrons little fly-flaps to brush away mosquitoes, it is a charming way of hinting that they should at once check voluptuous feelings, for "dying flies," we are told, "spoil sweet ointment." [Eccles. 10:1, Vulg] In such presents, then, as these, virgins can find a model, and matrons a pattern. To me, too, your gifts convey a lesson, although one of an opposite kind. For chairs suit idlers, sackcloth does for penitents, and cups are wanted for the thirsty. And I shall be glad to light your tapers, if only to banish the terrors of the night and the fears of an evil conscience.

1: Cf. Letter CXXX 2: Ps. 23:5, according to the Gallican psalter

Letters - letter_045

Letter 45. To Asella.

After leaving Rome for the East, Jerome writes to Asella to refute the calumnies by which he had been assailed, especially as regards his intimacy with Paula and Eustochium. Written on board ship at Ostia, in August, 385 a.d.

1. Were I to think myself able to requite your kindness I should be foolish. God is able in my stead to reward a soul which is consecrated to Him. So unworthy, indeed, am I of your regard that I have never ventured to estimate its value or even to wish that it might be given me for Christ's sake. Some consider me a wicked man, laden with iniquity; and such language is more than justified by my actual sins. Yet in dealing with the bad you do well to account them good. It is dangerous to judge another man's servant; [Rom. 14:4] and to speak evil of the righteous is a sin not easily pardoned. The day will surely come when you and I shall mourn for others; for not a few will be in the flames

2. I am said to be an infamous turncoat, a slippery knave, one who lies and deceives others by Satanic arts. Which is the safer course, I should like to know, to invent or credit these charges against innocent persons, or to refuse to believe them, even of the guilty? Some kissed my hands, yet attacked me with the tongues of vipers; sympathy was on their lips, but malignant joy in their hearts. The Lord saw them and had them in derision, [Ps. 2:4] reserving my poor self and them for judgment to come. One would attack my gait or my way of laughing; another would find something amiss in my looks; another would suspect the simplicity of my manner. Such is the company in which I have lived for almost three years.

It often happened that I found myself surrounded with virgins, and to some of these I expounded the divine books as best I could. Our studies brought about constant intercourse, this soon ripened into intimacy, and this, in turn, produced mutual confidence. If they have ever seen anything in my conduct unbecoming a Christian let them say so. Have I taken any one's money? Have I not disdained all gifts, whether small or great? Has the chink of any one's coin been heard in my hand? [Cf. 1 Sam. 12:3] Has my language been equivocal, or my eye wanton? No; my sex is my one crime, and even on this score I am not assailed, save when there is a talk of Paula going to Jerusalem. Very well, then. They believed my accuser when he lied; why do they not believe him when he retracts? He is the same man now that he was then, and yet he who before declared me guilty now confesses that I am innocent. Surely a man's words under torture are more trustworthy than in moments of gayety, except, indeed, that people are prone to believe falsehoods designed to gratify their ears, or, worse still, stories which, till then uninvented, they have urged others to invent.

3. Before I became acquainted with the family of the saintly Paula, all Rome resounded with my praises. Almost every one concurred in judging me worthy of the episcopate. Damasus, of blessed memory, spoke no words but mine.¹ Men called me holy, humble, eloquent. Did I ever cross the threshold of a light woman? Was I ever fascinated by silk dresses, or glowing gems, or rouged faces, or display of gold? Of all the ladies in Rome but one had power to subdue me, and that one was Paula. She mourned and fasted, she was squalid with dirt, her eyes were dim from weeping. For whole nights she would pray to the Lord for mercy, and often the rising sun found her still at her prayers. The psalms were her only songs, the Gospel her whole speech, continence her one indulgence, fasting the staple of her life. The only woman who took my fancy was one whom I had not so much as seen at table. But when I began to revere, respect, and venerate her as her conspicuous chastity deserved, all my former virtues forsook me on the spot.

4. Oh! envy, that dost begin by tearing thyself! Oh! cunning malignity of Satan, that dost always persecute things holy! Of all the ladies in Rome, the only ones that caused scandal were Paula and Melanium, who, despising their wealth and deserting their children, uplifted the cross of the Lord as a standard of religion. Had they frequented the baths, or chosen to use perfumes, or taken advantage of their wealth and position as widows to enjoy life and to be independent, they would have been saluted as ladies of high rank and saintliness. As it is, of course, it is in order to appear beautiful that they put on sackcloth and ashes, and they endure fasting and filth merely to go down into the Gehenna of fire! As if they could not perish with the crowd whom the mob applauds! If it were Gentiles or Jews who thus assailed their mode of life, they would at least have the consolation of failing to please only those whom Christ Himself has failed to please. But, shameful to say, it is Christians who thus neglect the care of their own households, and, disregarding the beams in their own eyes, look for motes in those of their neighbors. [Matt. 7:3] They pull to pieces every profession of religion, and think that they have found a remedy for their own doom, if they can disprove the holiness of others, if they can detract from every one, if they can show that those who perish are many, and sinners, a great multitude.

5. You bathe daily; another regards such over-niceness as defilement. You surfeit yourself on wild fowl and pride yourself on eating sturgeon; I, on the contrary, fill my belly with beans. You find pleasure in troops of laughing girls; I prefer Paula and Melanium who weep. You covet what belongs to others; they disdain what is their own. You like wines flavored with honey; they drink cold water, more delicious still. You count as lost what you cannot have, eat up, and devour on the moment; they believe in the Scriptures, and look for good things to come. And if they are wrong, and if the resurrection of the body on which they rely is a foolish delusion, what does it matter to you? We, on our side, look with disfavor on such a life as yours. You can fatten yourself on your good things as much as you please; I for my part prefer paleness and emaciation. You suppose that men like me are unhappy; we regard you as more unhappy still. Thus we reciprocate each other's thoughts, and appear to each other mutually insane.

6. I write this in haste, dear Lady Asella, as I go on board, overwhelmed with grief and tears; yet I thank my God that I am counted worthy of the world's hatred. [John. 15:18] Pray for me that, after Babylon, I may see Jerusalem once more; that Joshua, the son of Josedech, may have dominion over me, [Haggai 1:1] and not Nebuchadnezzar, that Ezra, whose name means helper, may come and restore me to my own country. I was a fool in wishing to sing the Lord's song in a strange land, [Ps. 137:4] and in leaving Mount Sinai, to seek the help of Egypt. I forgot that the Gospel warns us [Luke 10:30-35] that he who goes down from Jerusalem immediately falls among robbers, is spoiled, is wounded, is left for dead. But, although priest and Levite may disregard me, there is still the good Samaritan who, when men said to him, "Thou art a Samaritan and hast a devil," [John.

8:48] disclaimed having a devil, but did not disclaim being a Samaritan, [John. 8:49] this being the Hebrew equivalent for our word guardian. Men call me a mischief-maker, and I take the title as a recognition of my faith. For I am but a servant, and the Jews still call my master a magician. The apostle, [i.e. Paul. See 2. Cor. 6:9] likewise, is spoken of as a deceiver. There hath no temptation taken me but such as is common to man. [1 Cor. 10:13] How few distresses have I endured, I who am yet a soldier of the cross! Men have laid to my charge a crime of which I am not guilty;³ but I know that I must enter the kingdom of heaven through evil report as well as through good. [2 Cor. 6:8]

7. Salute Paula and Eustochium, who, whatever the world may think, are always mine in Christ. Salute Albina, your mother, and Marcella, your sister; Marcellina also, and the holy Felicitas; and say to them all: "We must all stand before the judgment seat of Christ, [Rom. 14:10] and there shall be revealed the principle by which each has lived." And now, illustrious model of chastity and virginity, remember me, I beseech you, in your prayers, and by your intercessions calm the waves of the sea.

1:

Damasus meus sermo erat, or "spoke of none but me.

2: Ironical 3: He means the sin of incontinence

Letters - letter_046

Letter 46. Paula and Eustochium to Marcella.

Jerome writes to Marcella in the name of Paula and Eustochium, describing the charms of the Holy Land. and urging her to leave Rome and to join her old companions at Bethlehem. Much of the letter is devoted to disposing of the objection that since the Passion of Christ the Holy Land has been under a curse. The date of the letter is a.d. 386. It is written from Bethlehem, which now becomes Jerome's home for the remainder of his life.

1. Love cannot be measured, impatience knows no bounds, and eagerness can brook no delay. Wherefore we, oblivious of our weakness, and relying more on our will than our capacity, desire-pupils though we be-to instruct our mistress. We are like the sow in the proverb,¹ which sets up to teach the goddess of invention. You were the first to set our tinder alight; the first, by precept and example, to urge us to adopt our present life. As a hen gathers her chickens, so did you take us under your wing. [2 Esdras. 1:30; Matt. 23:37] And will you now let us fly about at random with no mother near us? Will you leave us to dread the swoop of the hawk and the shadow of each passing bird of prey? Separated from you, we do what we can: we utter our mournful plaint, and more by sobs than by tears we adjure you to give back to us the Marcella whom we love. She is mild, she is suave, she is sweeter than the sweetest honey. She must not, therefore, be stern and morose to us, whom her winning ways have roused to adopt a life like her own.

2. Assuming that what we ask is for the best, our eagerness to obtain it is nothing to be ashamed of. And if all the Scriptures agree with our view, we are not too bold in urging you to a course to which you have yourself often urged us.

What are God's first words to Abraham? "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred unto a land that I will show thee." [Gen. 12:1] The patriarch-the first to receive a promise of Christ-is here told to leave the Chaldees, to leave the city of confusion [i.e. Babel-Gen. 11:9] and its rehovoth [Gen. 10:11] or broad places; to leave also the plain of Shinar, where the tower of pride had been raised to heaven. [Gen. 11:2, Gen. 11:4] He has to pass through the waves of this world, and to ford its rivers; those by which the saints sat down and wept when they remembered Zion, [Ps. 137:1] and Chebar's flood, whence Ezekiel was carried to Jerusalem by the hair of his head. [Ezek. 8:3] All this Abraham undergoes that he may dwell in a land of promise watered from above, and not like Egypt, from below, [Deut. 11:10] no producer of herbs for the weak and ailing, [Rom. 14:2] but a land that looks for the early and the latter rain from heaven. [Deut. 11:14] It is a land of hills and valleys, [Dt. 11:11] and stands high above the sea. The attractions of the world it entirely wants, but its spiritual attractions are for this all the greater. Mary, the mother of the Lord, left the lowlands and made her way to the hill country, when, after receiving the angel's message, she realized that she bore within her womb the Son of God. [Luke 1:26-31, Luke 1:39] When of old the Philistines had been overcome, when their devilish audacity had been smitten, when their champion had fallen on his face to the earth, [1 Sam. 17:49] it was from this city that there went forth a procession of jubilant souls, a harmonious choir to sing our David's victory over tens of thousands. [1 Sam. 18:6, 1 Sam. 18:7] Here, too, it was that the angel grasped his sword, and while he laid waste the whole of the ungodly city, marked out the temple of the Lord in the threshing floor of Ornan, king of the Jebusites. [1 Chron. 21:15, 1 Chron. 21:18; 2 Chron. 3:1] Thus early was it made plain that Christ's church would grow up, not in Israel, but among the Gentiles. Turn back to Genesis, [Gen. 14:18] and you will find that this was the city over which Melchizedek held sway, that king of Salem who, as a type of Christ, offered to Abraham bread and wine, and even then consecrated the mystery which Christians consecrate in the body and blood of the Saviour.²

3. Perhaps you will tacitly reprove us for deserting the order of Scripture, and letting our confused account ramble this way and that, as one thing or another strikes us. If so, we say once more what we said at the outset: love has no logic, and impatience knows no rule. In the Song of Songs the precept is given as a hard one: "Regulate your love towards me." [Cant. 2:4 b, Vulg. Hebrew = A.V] And so we plead that, if we err, we do so not from ignorance but from feeling.

Well, then, to bring forward something still more out of place, we must go back to yet remoter times. Tradition has it that in this city, nay, more, on this very spot, Adam lived and died. The place where our Lord was crucified is called Calvary,³ because the skull of the primitive man was buried there. So it came to pass that the second Adam, that is the blood⁴ of Christ, as it dropped from the cross, washed away the sins of the buried protoplast,⁵ the first Adam, and thus the words of the apostle were fulfilled: "Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." [Eph. 5:14]

It would be tedious to enumerate all the prophets and holy men who have been sent forth from this place. All that is strange and mysterious to us is familiar and natural to this city and country. By its very names, three in number, it proves the doctrine of the trinity. For it is called first Jebus, then Salem, then Jerusalem: names of which the first means "down-trodden," the second "peace," and the third "vision of peace."⁶ For it is only by slow stages that we reach our goal; it is only after we have been trodden down that we are lifted up to see the vision of peace. Because of this peace Solomon,⁷ the man of peace, was born there, and "in peace was his place made." [Ps. 76:2, LXX] King of kings, and lord of lords, his name and that of the city show him to be a type of Christ. Need we speak of David and his descendants, all of whom reigned here? As Judaea is exalted above all other provinces, so is this city exalted above all Judaea. To speak more tersely, the glory of the province is derived from its capital; and whatever fame the members possess is in every case due to the head.

4. You have long been anxious to break forth into speech; the very letters we have formed perceive it, and our paper already understands the question you are going to put. You will reply to us by saying: it was so of old, when "the Lord loved the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob," and when her foundations were in the holy mountains. [Ps. 87:1, Ps. 87:2] Even these verses, however, are susceptible of a deeper interpretation. But things are changed since then. The risen Lord has proclaimed intones of thunder: "Your house is left unto you desolate." With tears He has prophesied its downfall: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee; how often would I have gathered thy children together even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not. Behold your house is left unto you desolate." [Matt. 23:37, Matt. 23:38] The veil of the temple has been rent; [Matt.

27:51] an army has encompassed Jerusalem, it has been stained by the blood of the Lord. Now, therefore, its guardian angels have forsaken it and the grace of Christ has been withdrawn. Josephus, himself a Jewish writer, asserts [Bellum Judaicum, 6:5] that at the Lord's crucifixion there broke from the temple voices of heavenly powers, saying: "Let us depart hence." These and other considerations show that where grace abounded there did sin much more abound. [Rom. 5:20] Again, when the apostles received the command: "Go ye and teach all nations," [Matt. 28:19] and when they said themselves: "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you, but seeing ye put it from you ...lo we turn to the Gentiles," [Acts 13:46] then all the spiritual importance⁸ of Judaea and its old intimacy with God were transferred by the apostles to the nations.

5. The difficulty is strongly stated, and may well puzzle even those proficient in Scripture; but for all that, it admits of an easy solution. The Lord wept for the fall of Jerusalem, [Luke 19:41] and He would not have done so if He did not love it. He wept for Lazarus because He loved him. [John. 11:35, John. 11:36] The truth is that it was the people who sinned and not the place. The capture of a city is involved in the slaying of its inhabitants. If Jerusalem was destroyed, it was that its people might be punished; if the temple was overthrown, it was that its figurative sacrifices might be abolished. As regards its site, lapse of time has but invested it with fresh grandeur. The Jews of old revered the Holy of Holies, because of the things contained in it-the cherubim, the mercy-seat, the ark of the covenant, the manna, Aaron's rod, and the golden altar. [Heb. 9:3-5] Does the Lord's sepulchre seem less worthy of veneration? As often as we enter it we see the Saviour in His grave clothes, and if we linger we see again the angel sitting at His feet, and the napkin folded at His head. [John 20:6, John 20:7, John 20:12] Long before this sepulchre was hewn out by Joseph,⁹ its glory was foretold in Isaiah's prediction, "his rest shall be glorious," [Isa. 11:10] meaning that the place of the Lord's burial should be held in universal honor.

6. How, then, you will say, do we read in the apocalypse written by John: "The beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall ...kill them [that is, obviously, the prophets], and their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also their Lord was crucified?" [Rev. 11:7, Rev. 11:8, R.V] If the great city where the Lord was crucified is Jerusalem, and if the place of His crucifixion is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt; then as the Lord was crucified at Jerusalem, Jerusalem must be Sodom and Egypt. Holy Scripture, I reply first of all, cannot contradict itself. One book cannot invalidate the drift of the whole. A single verse cannot annul the meaning of a book. Ten lines earlier in the apocalypse it is written: "Rise and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein. But the court which is without the temple leave out and measure it not; for it is given unto the Gentiles; and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months." [Rev. 11:2] The apocalypse was written by John long after the Lord's passion, yet in it he speaks of Jerusalem as the holy city. But if so, how can he spiritually call it Sodom and Egypt? It is no answer to say that the Jerusalem which is called holy is the heavenly one which is to be, while that which is called Sodom is the earthly one tottering to its downfall. For it is the Jerusalem to come that is referred to in the description of the beast, "which shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and shall make war against the two prophets, and shall overcome them and kill them, and their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city." [Rev. 11:7, Rev. 11:8] At the close of the book it is farther described thus: "And the city lieth four-square, and the length of it and the breadth are the same as the height; and he measured the city with the golden reed twelve thousand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal. And he measured the walls thereof, an hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of the angel. And the building of the wall of it was of jasper; and the city was pure gold" [Rev. 21:16-18] -and so on. Now where there is a square there can be neither length nor breadth. And what kind of measurement is that which makes length and breadth equal to height? And how can there be walls of jasper, or a whole city of pure gold; its foundations and its streets of precious stones, and its twelve gates each glowing with pearls?

7. Evidently this description cannot be taken literally (in fact, it is absurd to suppose a city the length, breadth and height of which are all twelve thousand furlongs), and therefore the details of it must be mystically understood. The great city which Cain first built and called after his son [Gen. 4:17] must be taken to represent this world, which the devil, that accuser of his brethren, that fratricide who is doomed to perish, has built of vice cemented with crime, and filled with iniquity. Therefore it is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt. Thus it is written, "Sodom shall return to her former estate," [Ezek. 16:55] that is to say, the world must be restored as it has been before. For we cannot believe that Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim [Deut. 29:23] are to be built again: they must be left to lie in ashes forever. We never read of Egypt as put for Jerusalem: it always stands for this world. To collect from Scripture the countless proofs of this would be tedious: I shall adduce but one passage, a passage in which this world is most clearly called Egypt. The apostle Jude, the brother of James, writes thus in his catholic epistle: "I will, therefore, put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this how that Jesus,¹⁰ having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not." [Jude 5] And, lest you should fancy Joshua the son of Nun to be meant, the passage goes on thus: "And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." [Jude 6] Moreover, to convince you that in every place where Egypt, Sodom and Gomorrah are named together it is not these spots, but the present world, which is meant, he mentions them immediately in this sense. "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah," he writes, "and the cities about them, in like manner giving themselves over to fornication and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." [Jude 7] But what need is there to collect more proofs when, after the passion and the resurrection of the Lord, the evangelist Matthew tells us: "The rocks rent, and the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many"? [Matt. 27:51, Matt. 27:53] We must not interpret this passage straight off, as many people¹¹ absurdly do, of the heavenly Jerusalem: the apparition there of the bodies of the saints could be no sign to men of the Lord's rising. Since, therefore, the evangelists and all the Scriptures speak of Jerusalem as the holy city, and since the psalmist commands us to worship the Lord "at his footstool;" [Ps. 132:7] allow no one to call it Sodom and Egypt, for by it the Lord forbids men to swear because "it is the city of the great king." [Matt. 5:35]

8. The land is accursed, you say, because it has drunk in the blood of the Lord. On what grounds, then, do men regard as blessed those spots where Peter and Paul, the leaders of the Christian host, have shed their blood for Christ? If the confession of men and servants is glorious, must there not be glory likewise in the confession of their Lord and God? Everywhere we venerate the tombs of the martyrs; we apply their holy ashes to our eyes; we even touch them, if we may, with our lips. And yet some think that we should neglect the tomb in which the Lord Himself is buried. If we refuse to believe human testimony, let us at least credit the devil and his angels. [Matt. 25:41] For when in front of the Holy Sepulchre they are driven out of those bodies which they have possessed, they moan and tremble as if they stood before Christ's judgment-seat, and grieve, too late that they have crucified Him in whose presence they now cower. If-as a wicked theory maintains-this holy place has, since the Lord's passion, become an abomination, why was Paul in such haste to reach Jerusalem to keep Pentecost in it? [Acts 20:16] Yet to those who held him back he said: "What mean ye to weep and to break my heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem, for the name of the Lord Jesus." [Acts 21:13] Need I speak of those other holy and illustrious men who, after the preaching of Christ, brought their votive gifts and offerings to the brethren who were at Jerusalem?

9. Time forbids me to survey the period which has passed since the Lord's ascension, or to recount the bishops, the martyrs, the divines, who have come to Jerusalem from a feeling that their devotion and knowledge would be incomplete and their virtue without the finishing touch, unless they adored Christ in the very spot where the gospel first flashed from the gibbet. If a famous orator¹² blames a man for having learned Greek at Lilybaeum instead of at Athens, and Latin in Sicily instead of at Rome (on the ground, obviously, that each province has its own characteristics), can we suppose a Christian's education complete who has not visited the Christian Athens?

10. In speaking thus we do not mean to deny that the kingdom of God is within us, [Luke 17:21] or to say that there are no holy men elsewhere; we merely assert in the strongest manner that those who stand first throughout the world are here gathered side by side. We ourselves are among the last, not the first; yet we have come hither to see the first of all nations. Of all the ornaments of the Church our company of monks and virgins is one of the finest; it is like a fair flower or a priceless gem. Every man of note in Gaul hastens hither. The Briton, "sundered from our world,"¹³ no sooner makes progress in religion than he leaves the setting sun in quest of a spot of which he knows only through Scripture and common report. Need we recall the Armenians, the Persians, the peoples of India and Arabia? Or those of our neighbor, Egypt, so rich in monks; of Pontus and Cappadocia; of Caele-Syria and Mesopotamia and the teeming east? In fulfilment of the Saviour's words, "Wherever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together," [Luke 17:37] they all assemble here and exhibit in this one city the most varied virtues. Differing in speech, they are one in religion, and almost every nation has a choir of its own. Yet amid this great concourse there is no arrogance, no disdain of self-restraint; all strive after humility, that greatest of Christian virtues. Whosoever is last is here regarded as first. [Cf. Matt. 19:30] Their dress neither provokes remark nor calls for admiration. In whatever guise a man shows himself he is neither censured nor flattered. Long fasts help no one here. Starvation wins no deference, and the taking of food in moderation is not condemned. "To his own master" each one "standeth or falleth." [Rom. 14:4] No man judges another lest he be judged of the Lord. [Matt. 7:1] Backbiting, so common in other parts, is wholly unknown here. Sensuality and excess are far removed from us. And in the city there are so many places of prayer that a day would not be sufficient to go round them all.

11. But, as every one praises most what is within his reach, let us pass now to the cottage-inn which sheltered Christ and Mary. [Luke 2:7] With what expressions and what language can we set before you the cave of the Saviour? The stall where he cried as a babe can be best honored by silence; for words are inadequate to speak its praise. Where are the spacious porticoes? Where are the gilded ceilings? Where are the mansions furnished by the miserable toil of doomed wretches? Where are the costly halls raised by untitled opulence for man's vile body to walk in? Where are the roofs that intercept the sky, as if anything could be finer than the expanse of heaven? Behold, in this poor crevice of the earth the Creator of the heavens was born; here He was wrapped in swaddling clothes; here He was seen by the shepherds; here He was pointed out by the star; here He was adored by the wise men. This spot is holier, me-thinks, than that Tarpeian rock¹⁴ which has shown itself displeasing to God by the frequency with which it has been struck by lightning.

12. Read the apocalypse of John, and consider what is sung therein of the woman arrayed in purple, and of the blasphemy written upon her brow, of the seven mountains, of the many waters, and of the end of Babylon.¹⁵ "Come out of her, my people," so the Lord says, "that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." [Rev. 18:4] Turn back also to Jeremiah and pay heed to what he has written of like import: "Flee out of the midst of Babylon, and deliver every man his soul." [Jer. 51:6] For "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit." [Rev. 18:2] It is true that Rome has a holy church, trophies of apostles and martyrs, a true confession of Christ. The faith has been preached there by an apostle, heathenism has been trodden down, the name of Christian is daily exalted higher and higher. But the display, power, and size of the city, the seeing and the being seen, the paying and the receiving of visits, the alternate flattery and detraction, talking and listening, as well as the necessity of facing so great a throng even when one is least in the mood to do so—all these things are alike foreign to the principles and fatal to the repose of the monastic life. For when people come in our way we either see them coming and are compelled to speak, or we do not see them and lay ourselves open to the charge of haughtiness. Sometimes, also, in returning visits we are obliged to pass through proud portals and gilded doors and to face the clamor of carping lackeys. But, as we have said above, in the cottage of Christ all is simple and rustic: and except for the chanting of psalms there is complete silence. Wherever one turns the laborer at his plough sings alleluia, the toiling mower cheers himself with psalms, and the vine-dresser while he prunes his vine sings one of the lays of David. These are the songs of the country; these, in popular phrase, its love ditties: these the shepherd whistles; these the tiller uses to aid his toil.

13. But what are we doing? Forgetting what is required of us, we are taken up with what we wish. Will the time never come when a breathless messenger shall bring the news that our dear Marcella has reached the shores of Palestine, and when every band of monks and every troop of virgins shall unite in a song of welcome? In our excitement we are already hurrying to meet you: without waiting for a vehicle, we hasten off at once on foot. We shall clasp you by the hand, we shall look upon your face; and when, after long waiting, we at last embrace you, we shall find it hard to tear ourselves away. Will the day never come when we shall together enter the Saviour's cave, and together weep in the sepulchre of the Lord with His sister and with His mother? [John. 19:25] Then shall we touch with our lips the wood of the cross, and rise in prayer and resolve upon the Mount of Olives with the ascending Lord. [Acts 1:9, Acts 1:12] We shall see Lazarus come forth bound with grave clothes, [John. 11:43, John. 11:44] we shall look upon the waters of Jordan purified for the washing of the Lord. [Matt. 3:13] Thence we shall pass to the folds of the shepherds, [Luke 2:8] we shall pray together in the mausoleum of David. [1 K. 2:10] We shall see the prophet, Amos,¹⁶ upon his crag blowing his shepherd's horn. We shall hasten, if not to the tents, to the monuments of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and of their three illustrious wives.¹⁷ We shall see the fountain in which the eunuch was immersed by Philip. [Acts 8:36] We shall make a pilgrimage to Samaria, and side by side venerate the ashes of John the Baptist, of Elisha, [2 K. 13:21] and of Obadiah. We shall enter the very caves where in the time of persecution and famine the companies of the prophets were fed. [1 K. 18:3, 1 K. 18:4] If only you will come, we shall go to see Nazareth, as its name denotes, the flower¹⁸ of Galilee. Not far off Cana will be visible, where the water was turned into wine. [John. 2:1-11] We shall make our way to Tabor, [Matt. 17:1-9] and see the tabernacles there which the Saviour shares, not, as Peter once wished, with Moses and Elijah, but with the Father and with the Holy Ghost. Thence we shall come to the Sea of Gennesaret, and when there we shall see the spots where the five thousand were filled with five loaves, [Matt. 14:15, sqq] and the font thousand with seven. [Matt. 15:32, sqq] The town of Nain will meet our eyes, at the gate of which the widow's son was raised to life. [Luke 7:11, sqq] Hermon too will be visible, and the torrent of Endor, at which Sisera was vanquished. [Ps. 83:9, Ps. 83:10] Our eyes will look also on Capernaum, the scene of so many of our Lord's signs-yes, and on all Galilee besides. And when, accompanied by Christ, we shall have made our way back to our cave through Shiloh and Bethel, and those other places where churches are set up like standards to commemorate the Lord's victories, then we shall sing heartily, we shall weep copiously, we shall pray unceasingly. Wounded with the Saviour's shaft, we shall say one to another: "I have found Him whom my soul loveth; I will hold Him and will not let Him go." [Cant. 3:4, Vulg]

1: Sus Minervam 2: Mysterium christianum in salvatoris sanguine et corpore dedicavit 3: I.e. the place of a skull (Latin, Calvaria) 4: One of Jerome's fanciful ideas. Haddam sr 5: o prwtoplastoj = "the first-formed." The word is applied to Adam in Wisd. 7:1 6: Cf. Hymns Ancient and Modern, No. 235. "Truly Jerusalem name we that shore Vision of peace that brings joy evermore.

7:

Hebrew, Shelomoh, connected with shalem, peace

8: Sacramentum 9: I.e. Joseph of Arimathea.-John. 19:38 sqq 10: A.V. "the Lord."

11: E.g. Origen in his commentary on the passage 12: Cicero of Caecilius (in Q. Caec. xii.) 13: Virgil, E. 1:67

14: Otherwise called the capitol. Here stood the great temple of Jupiter, which was to the religion of Rome what the Parthenon was to that of Athens 15: Rev. 17:4, Rev. 17:5, Rev. 17:9; Rev. 1:15; Rev. xvii.; Rev. xviii 16: "Who was among the herdsmen of Tekoa"-Am. 1:1 17: Sarah, Rebekah, Leah-Gen. 49:31 18: Lit. "sprout." In Isa. 11:1 it is rendered by A.V. "branch.

Letters - letter_047

Letter 47. To Desiderius.

Jerome invites two of his old friends at Rome, Desiderius and his sister (or wife) Serenilla, to join him at Bethlehem. It is possible but not probable that this Desiderius is the same with Desiderius of Aquitaine, who afterwards induced Jerome to write against Vigilantius. An interval of seven years separates this letter (of which the date is 393 a.d.) from the preceding, and all the letters written during this period have wholly perished.

1. Surprised as I have been, my excellent friend, to read the language which your kindness has prompted you to hold concerning me, I have rejoiced that I possess the testimony of one both eloquent and sincere; but when I turn from you to myself I feel vexed that, owing to my unworthiness, your words of praise and eulogy rather weigh me down than lift me up. You know, of course, that I make it a principle to raise the standard of humility, and to prepare for scaling the heights by walking for the present in the lowest places. For what am I or what is my significance that I should have the voice of learning raised to bear witness of me, or that the palm of eloquence should be laid at my feet by one whose style is so charming that it has almost deterred me from writing a letter at all? I must, however, make the attempt in order that charity which seeks not her own [1 Cor. 13:5] but always her neighbor's good, may at least return a compliment, since it cannot convey a lesson.

2. I offer my congratulations to you and to your holy and revered sister, [i.e. his wife. Cf. 1 Cor. 9:5] Serenilla, who, true to her name,¹ has trodden down the troubled waves of the world, and has passed to Christ's calm haven: a happiness which-if we may trust the augury of your name-is in store for you also. For we read that the holy Daniel was called "a man of desires,"² and the friend of God, because he desired to know His mysteries. Therefore, I do with pleasure what the revered Paula has asked of me. I urge and implore you both by the charity of the Lord that you will give your presence to us, and that a visit to the holy places may induce you to enrich us with this great gift. Even supposing that you do not care for our society, it is still your duty as believers to worship on the spot where the Lord's feet once stood and to see for yourselves the still fresh traces of His birth, His cross, and His passion.

3. Several of my little pieces have flown away out of their nest, and have rashly sought for themselves the honor of publication. I have not sent you any lest I should send works which you already have. But if you care to borrow copies of them, you can do so either from our holy sister, Marcella, who has her abode upon the Aventine, or from that holy man, Domnio, who is the Lot of our times. [Cf. 2 Peter 2:7, 2 Peter 2:8] Meantime, I look for your arrival, and will give you all I have when you once come; or, if any hindrances prevent you from joining us, I will gladly send you such treatises as you shall desire. Following the example of Tranquillus³ and of Apollonius the Greek,⁴ I have written a book concerning illustrious men from the apostles [Cf. 1 Cor. 15:8, 1 Cor. 15:9] time to our own; and after enumerating a great number I have put myself down on the last page as one born out of due time, and the least of all Christians.⁵ Here I have found it necessary to give a short account of my writings down to the fourteenth year⁶ of the Emperor Theodosius. If you find, on procuring this treatise from the persons mentioned above, that there are any pieces mentioned which you have not already got, I will have them copied for you by degrees, if you wish it.

1:

Serenilla, "calm.

2:

Dan. 9:23, A.V. marg. Desiderius means "one who is an object of desire.

3: I.e. the historian Suetonius 4: Probably Apollonius of Tyre, who appears to have written an account of the principal philosophers who followed Zeno

5:

a.d. 392-3

6:

Marcus Antonius, a Roman orator spoken of by Cicero. Orator 100:5, De Oratore 1:100:21, 47, 48. His treatise "De ratione dicendi" is lost. See Quintil 3:1, 192

Letters - letter_048

Letter 48. To Pammachius. An "apology" for the two books "against Jovinian" which Jerome had written a short time previously, and of which he had sent copies to Rome. These Pammachius and his other friends had withheld from publication, thinking that Jerome had unduly exalted virginity at the expense of marriage. He now writes to make good his position, and to do this makes copious extracts from the obnoxious treatise. The date of the letter is 393 or 394 a.d.

1. Your own silence is my reason for not having written hitherto. For I feared that, if I were to write to you without first hearing from you, you would consider me not so much a conscientious as a troublesome correspondent. But, now that I have been challenged by your most delightful letter, a letter which calls upon me to defend my views by an appeal to first principles, I receive my old fellow-learner, companion, and friend with open arms, as the saying goes; and I look forward to having in you a champion of my poor writings; if, that is to say, I can first conciliate your judgment to give sentence in my favor, and can instruct my advocate in all those points on which I am assailed. For both your favorite, Cicero, and before him-in his one short treatise-Antonius,¹ write to this effect, that the chief requisite for victory is to acquaint one's self carefully with the case which one has to plead.

2. Certain persons find fault with me because in the books which I have written against Jovinian I have been excessive (so they say) in praise of virginity and in depreciation of marriage; and they affirm that to preach up chastity till no comparison is left between a wife and a virgin is equivalent to a condemnation of matrimony. If I remember aright the point of the dispute, the question at issue between myself and Jovinian is that he puts marriage on a level with virginity, while I make it inferior; he declares that there is little or no difference between the two states, I assert that there is a great deal. Finally-a result due under God to your agency-he has been condemned because he has dared to set matrimony on an equality with perpetual chastity. Or, if a virgin and a wife are to be looked on as the same, how comes it that Rome has refused to listen to this impious doctrine? A virgin owes her being to a man, but a man does not owe his to a virgin. There can be no middle course. Either my view of the matter must be embraced, or else that of Jovinian. If I am blamed for putting wedlock below virginity, he must be praised for putting the two states on a level. If, on the other hand, he is condemned for supposing them equal, his condemnation must be taken as testimony in favor of my treatise. If men of the world chafe under the notion that they occupy a position inferior to that of virgins, I wonder that clergymen and monks-who both live celibate lives-refrain from praising what they consistently practise. They cut themselves off from their wives to imitate the chastity of virgins, and yet they will have it that married women are as good as these. They should either be joined again to their wives whom they have renounced, or, if they persist in living apart from them, they will have to confess-by their lives if not by their words-that, in preferring virginity to marriage, they have chosen the better course, Am I then a mere novice in the Scriptures, reading the sacred volumes for the first time? And is the line there drawn between virginity and marriage so fine that I have been unable to observe it? I could know nothing, forsooth, of the saying, "Be not righteous overmuch!" [Eccl. 7:16, see Ag. Jov. 1:14] Thus, while I try to protect myself on one side, I am wounded on the other; to speak more plainly still, while I close with Jovinian in hand-to-hand combat, Manichaeus stabs me in the back. Have I not, I would ask, in the very forefront of my work set the following preface: [Against Jov. 1:3] "We are no disciples of Marcion² or of Manichaeus,³ to detract from marriage. Nor are we deceived by the error of Tatian,⁴ the chief of the Encratites,⁵ into supposing all cohabitation unclean. For he condemns and reprobates not marriage only, but foods also which God has created for us to enjoy. [1 Tim. 4:3] We know that in a large house there are vessels not only of silver and of gold, but of wood also and of earth. [2 Tim. 2:20] We know, too, that on the foundation of Christ which Paul the master builder has laid, some build up gold, silver, and precious stones; others, on the contrary, hay, wood, and stubble. [1 Cor. 3:10-12] We are not ignorant that 'marriage is honorable ...and the bed undefiled.' [Heb. 13:4] We have read the first decree of God: 'Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth.' [Gen. 1:28] But while we allow marriage, we prefer the virginity which springs from it. Gold is more precious than silver, but is silver on that account the less silver? Is it an insult to a tree to prefer its apples to its roots or its leaves? Is it an injury to corn to put the ear before the stalk and the blade? As apples come from the tree and grain from the straw, so virginity comes from wedlock. Yields of one hundredfold, of sixtyfold, and of thirtyfold [Matt. 13:8] may all come from one soil and from one sowing, yet they will differ widely in quantity. The yield thirtyfold signifies wedlock, for the joining together of the fingers to express that number, suggestive as it is of a loving gentle kiss or embracing, aptly represents the relation of husband and wife. The yield sixtyfold refers to widows who are placed in a position of distress and tribulation. Accordingly, they are typified by that finger which is placed under the other to express the number sixty; for, as it is extremely trying when one has once tasted pleasure to abstain from its enticements, so the reward of doing this is proportionately great. Moreover, a hundred-I ask the reader to give me his best attention-necessitates a change from the left hand to the right; but while the hand is different the fingers are the same as those which on the left hand signify married women and widows; only in this instance the circle formed by them indicates the crown of virginity."⁶

3. Does a man who speaks thus, I would ask you, condemn marriage? If I have called virginity gold, I have spoken of marriage as silver. I have set forth that the yields an hundredfold, sixtyfold, and thirtyfold-all spring from one soil and from one sowing, although in amount they differ widely. Will any of my readers be so unfair as to judge me, not by my words, but by his own opinion? At any rate, I have dealt much more gently with marriage than most Latin and Greek writers;⁷ who, by referring the hundredfold yield to martyrs, the sixtyfold to virgins, and the thirtyfold to widows, show that in their opinion married persons are excluded from the good ground and from the seed of the great Father.⁸ But, lest it might be supposed that, though cautious at the outset, I was imprudent in the remainder of my work, have I not, after marking out the divisions of it, on coming to the actual questions immediately introduced the following: [Ag. Jov. 1:4] "I ask all of you of both sexes, at once those who are virgins and continent and those who are married or twice married, to aid my efforts with your prayers." Jovinian is the foe of all indiscriminately, but can I condemn as Manichaean heretics persons whose prayers I need and whose assistance I entreat to help me in my work?

4. As the brief compass of a letter does not suffer us to delay too long on a single point, let us now pass to those which remain. In explaining the testimony of the apostle, "The wife hath not power of her own body, but the husband; and likewise, also, the husband hath not power of his own body, but the wife," [1 Cor. 7:4] we have subjoined the following: [Ag. Jov. 1:7] "The entire question relates to those who are living in wedlock, whether it is lawful for them to put away their wives, a thing which the Lord also has forbidden in the Gospel. [Matt. 19:9] Hence, also, the apostle says: 'It is good for a man not to touch' a wife or 'a woman,' [1 Cor. 7:1] as if there were danger in the contact which he who should so touch one could not escape. Accordingly, when the Egyptian woman desired to touch Joseph he flung away his cloak and fled from her hands. [Gen. 39:12, Gen. 39:13] But as he who has once married a wife cannot, except by consent, abstain from intercourse with her or repudiate her, so long as she does not sin, he must render unto his wife her due, [1 Cor. 7:3, R.V] because he has of his own free will bound himself to render it under compulsion." Can one who declares that it is a precept of the Lord that wives should not be put away, and that what God has joined together man must not, without consent, put asunder [Matt. 19:6] -can such an one be said to condemn marriage? Again, in the verses which follow, the apostle says: "But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that." [1 Cor. 7:7] In explanation of this saying we made the following remarks: [Ag. Jov. 1:8] "What I myself would wish, he says, is clear. But since there are diversities of gifts in the church, [1 Cor. 12:4] I allow marriage as well, that I may not appear to condemn nature. Reflect, too, that the gift of virginity is one thing, that of marriage another. For had there been one reward for married women and for virgins he would never, after giving the counsel of continence, have gone on to say: 'But every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner and another after that.' Where each class has its proper gift, there must be some distinction between the classes. I allow that marriage, as well as virginity, is the gift of God, but there is a great difference between gift and gift. Finally, the apostle himself says of one who had lived in incest and afterwards repented: 'Contrariwise ye ought rather to forgive him and comfort him,' [2 Cor. 2:7] and 'To whom ye forgive anything, I forgive also.' [2 Cor. 2:10] And, lest we might suppose a man's gift to be but a small thing, he has added: 'For if I forgave anything, to whom I forgave it, for your sakes forgave I it in the sight⁹ of Christ.' [2 Cor. 2:10] The gifts of Christ are different. Hence Joseph as a type of Him had a coat of many colors. [Gen. 37:23] So in the forty-fourth psalm¹⁰ we read of the Church: 'Upon thy right hand did stand the queen in a vesture of gold, wrought about with divers colors.' [Ps. 45:10, P.B.V] The apostle Peter, too, speaks (of husbands and wives) 'as being heirs together of the manifold grace of God.' [1 Pet. 3:7; 1 Pet. 4:10] In Greek the expression is still more striking, the word used being "ποικίλη", that is, 'many-colored.'"

5. I ask, then, what is the meaning of men's obstinate determination to shut their eyes and to refuse to look on what is as clear as day? I have said that there are diversities of gifts in the Church, and that virginity is one gift and wedlock another. And shortly after I have used the words: "I allow marriage also to be a gift of God, but there is a great difference between gift and gift." Can it be said that I condemn that which in the clearest terms I declare to be the gift of God? Moreover, if Joseph is taken as a type of the Lord, his coat of many colors is a type of virgins and widows, celibates and wedded. Can any one who has any part in Christ's tunic be regarded as an alien? Have we not spoken of the very queen herself-that is, the Church of the Saviour-as wearing a vesture of gold wrought about with divers colors? Moreover, when I came to discuss marriage in connection with the following verses, [1 Cor. 7:8-10] I still adhered to the same view. [Ag. Jov. 1:10] "This passage," I said, "has indeed no relation to the present controversy; for, following the decision of the Lord, the apostle teaches that a wife must not be put away saving for fornication, and that, if she has been put away, she cannot during the lifetime of her husband marry another man, or, at any rate, that she ought, if possible, to be reconciled to her husband. In another verse he speaks to the same effect: 'The wife is bound ...as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband; [Rom. 7:2] she is at liberty to be married to, whom she will; only in the Lord,' [1 Cor. 7:39] that is to a Christian. Thus the apostle, while he allows a second or a third marriage in the Lord, forbids even a first with a heathen."

6. I ask my detractors to open their ears and to realize the fact that I have allowed second and third marriages "in the Lord." If, then, I have not condemned second and third marriages, how can I have proscribed a first? Moreover, in the passage where I interpret the words of the apostle, "Is any man called being circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised. Is any called in uncircumcision? let him not be circumcised" [1 Cor. 7:18] (a passage, it is true, which some most careful interpreters of Scripture refer to the circumcision and slavery of the Law), do I not in the clearest terms stand up for the marriage-tie? My words are these: [Ag. Jov. 1:11] "'If any man is called in uncircumcision, let him not be circumcised.' You had a wife, the apostle says, when you believed. Do not fancy your faith in Christ to be a reason for parting from her. For 'God hath called us in peace.' [1 Cor. 7:15, R.V] 'Circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing but the keeping of the commandments of God.' [1 Cor. 7:19] Neither celibacy nor wedlock is of the slightest use without works, since even faith, the distinguishing mark of Christians, if it have not works, is said to be dead, [Jas. 2:17] and on such terms as these the virgins of Vesta or of Juno, who was constant to one¹¹ husband, might claim to be numbered among the saints. And a little further on he says: 'Art thou called being a servant, care not for it; but, if thou mayest be made free, use it rather;' [1 Cor. 7:21] that is to say, if you have a wife, and are bound to her, and render her her due, and have not power of your own body-or, to speak yet more plainly-if you are the slave of a wife, do not allow this to cause you sorrow, do not sigh over the loss of your virginity. Even if you can find pretexts for parting from her to enjoy the freedom of chastity, do not seek your own welfare at the price of another's ruin. Keep your wife for a little, and do not try too hastily to overcome her reluctance. Wait till she follows your example. If you only have patience, your wife will some day become your sister."

7. In another passage we have discussed the reasons which led Paul to say: "Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord: yet I give my judgment, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful." [1 Cor. 7:25] Here also, while we have ex-tolled virginity, we have been careful to give marriage its due. [Ag. Jov. 1:12] "Had the Lord commanded virginity," we said, "He would have seemed to condemn marriage and to do away with that seed-plot of humanity from which virginity itself springs. Had He cut away the root how could He have looked for fruit? Unless He had first laid the foundations, how could He have built the edifice or crowned it with a roof made to cover its whole extent?" If we have spoken of marriage as the root whose fruit is virginity, and if we have made wedlock the foundation on which the building or the roof of perpetual chastity is raised, which of my detractors can be so captious or so blind as to ignore the foundation on which the fabric and its roof are built, while he has before his eyes both the fabric and the roof themselves? Once more, in another place, we have brought forward the testimony of the apostle to this effect: "Art thou bound unto a wife? Seek not to be loosed. Art thou loosed from a wife? Seek not a wife." [1 Cor. 7:21] To this we have appended the following remarks: [Ag. Jov. 1:12] "Each of us has his own sphere allotted to him. Let me have mine, and do you keep yours. If you are bound to a wife, do not put her away. If I am loosed from a wife, let me not seek a wife."

Just as I do not loose marriage-ties when they are once made, so do you refrain from binding together what at present is loosed from such ties." Yet another passage bears unmistakable testimony to the view which we have taken of virginity and of wedlock: [Ag. Jov. 1:13] "The apostle casts no snare upon us, [1 Cor. 7:35] nor does he compel us to be what we do not wish. He only urges us to what is honorable and seemly, inciting us earnestly to serve the Lord, to be anxious always to please Him, and to took for His will which He has prepared for us to do. We are to be like alert and armed soldiers, who immediately execute the orders given to them and perform them without that travail of mind¹² which, according to the preacher, is given to the men of this world 'to be exercised therewith.'" [Eccles. 1:13; Eccles. 3:10] At the end, also, of our comparison of virgins and married women we have summed up the discussion thus: [Ag. Jov. 1:13] "When one thing is good and another thing is better; when that which is good has a different reward from that which is better; and when there are more rewards than one, then, obviously, there exists a diversity of gifts. The difference between marriage and virginity is as great as that between not doing evil and doing good-or, to speak more favorably still, as that between what is good and what is still better."

8. In the sequel we go on to Speak thus: [Ag. Jov. 1:14] "The apostle, in concluding his discussion of marriage and of virginity, is careful to observe a mean course in discriminating between them, and, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left, he keeps to the King's highway, [Nu. 20:17] and thus fulfils the injunction, 'Be not righteous overmuch.' [Eccles. 7:16] Moreover, when he goes on to compare monogamy with digamy, he puts digamy after monogamy, just as before he subordinated marriage to virginity." Do we not clearly show by this language what is typified in the Holy Scriptures by the terms right and left, and also what we take to be the meaning of the words "Be not righteous overmuch"? We turn to the left if, following the lust of Jews and Gentiles, we burn for sexual intercourse; we turn to the right if, following the error of the Manichaeans, we under a pretence of chastity entangle ourselves in the meshes of unchastity. But we keep to the King's highway if we aspire to virginity yet refrain from condemning marriage. Can any one, moreover, be so unfair in his criticism of my poor treatise as to allege that I condemn first marriages, when he reads my opinion on second ones as follows: [Ag. Jov. 1:14] "The apostle, it is true, allows second marriages, but only to such women as are bent upon them, to such as cannot contain, [1 Cor. 7:9] lest 'when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ they marry, having condemnation because they have rejected their first faith,' [1 Tim. 5:11, 1 Tim. 5:12, R.V] and he makes this concession because many 'are turned aside after Satan.' [1 Tim. 5:15] But they will be happier if they abide as widows. To this he immediately adds his apostolical authority, 'after my judgment.' Moreover, lest any should consider that authority, being human, to be of small weight, he goes on to say, 'and I think also that I have the spirit of God.' [1 Cor. 7:40] Thus, where he urges men to continence he appeals not to human authority, but to the Spirit of God; but when he gives them permission to marry he does not mention the Spirit of God, but allows prudential considerations to turn the balance, relaxing the strictness of his code in favor of individuals according to their several needs." Having thus brought forward proofs that second marriages are allowed by the apostle, we at once added the remarks which follow: [Ag. Jov. 1:14] "As marriage is permitted to virgins by reason of the danger of fornication, and as what in itself is not desirable is thus made excusable, so by reason of the same danger widows are permitted to marry a second time. For it is better that a woman should know one man (though he should be a second husband or a third) than that she should know several. In other words, it is preferable that she should prostitute herself to one rather than to many." Calumny may do its worst. We have spoken here not of a first marriage, but of a second, of a third, or (if you like) of a fourth. But lest any one should apply my words (that it is better for a woman to prostitute herself to one man than to several) to a first marriage when my whole argument dealt with digamy and trigamy, I marked my own view of these practices with the words: [Ag. Jov. 1:15] "'All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient.' [1 Cor. 6:12] I do not condemn digamists nor yet trigamists, nor even, to put an extreme, case, octogamists. I will make a still greater concession: I am ready to receive even a whore-monger, if penitent. In every case where fairness is possible, fair consideration must be shown."

9. My calumniator should blush at his assertion that I condemn first marriages when he reads my words just now quoted: "I do not condemn digamists or trigamists, or even, to put an extreme case, octogamists." Not to condemn is one thing, to commend is another. I may concede a practice as allowable and yet not praise it as meritorious. But if I seem severe in saying, "In every case where fairness is possible, fair consideration must be shown," no one, I fancy, will judge me either cruel or stern who reads that the places prepared for virgins and for wedded persons are different from those prepared for trigamists, octogamists, and penitents. That Christ Himself, although in the flesh a virgin, was in the spirit a monogamist, having one wife, even the Church, [Eph. 5:23, Eph. 5:24] I have shown in the latter part of my argument. [Ag. Jov. 1:9] And yet I am supposed to condemn marriage! I am said to condemn it, although I use such words as these: [Ag. Jov. 1:23] "It is an undoubted fact that the levitical priests were descended from the stock of Aaron, Eleazar, and Phinehas; and, as all these were married men, we might well be confronted with them if, led away by the error of the Encratites, we were to contend that marriage is in itself deserving of condemnation." Here I blame Tatian, the chief of the Encratites, for his rejection of marriage, and yet I myself am said to condemn it! Once more, when I contrast virgins with widows, my own words show what my view is concerning wedlock, and set forth the threefold gradation which I propose of virgins, widows-whether in practice or in fact¹³ -and wedded wives. "I do not deny"-these are my words [Ag. Jov. 1:33] -"the blessedness of widows who continue such after their baptism, nor do I undervalue the merit of wives who live in chastity with their husbands; but, just as widows receive a greater reward from God than wives obedient to their husbands, they, too, must be content to see virgins preferred before themselves."

10. Again, when explaining the witness of the apostle to the Galatians, "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified," I have spoken to the following effect: "Marriages also are works of the law. And for this reason there is a curse upon such as do not produce offspring. They are permitted, it is true, even under the Gospel; but it is one thing to concede an indulgence to what is a weakness and quite another to promise a reward to what is a virtue." See my express declaration that marriage is allowed in the Gospel, yet that those who are married cannot receive the rewards of chastity so long as they render their due one to another. If married men feel indignant at this statement, let them vent their anger not on me but on the Holy Scriptures; nay, more, upon all bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and the whole company of priests and levites, who know that they cannot offer sacrifices if they fulfil the obligations of marriage. Again, when I adduce evidence from the Apocalypse, [Ag. Jov. 1:40] is it not clear what view I take concerning virgins, widows, and wives? "These are they who sing a new song [Rev. 14:3] which no man can sing except he be a virgin. These are 'the first fruits unto God and unto the Lamb,' [Rev. 14:4] and they are without spot. If virgins are the first fruits unto God, then widows and wives who live in continence must come after the first fruits-that is to say, in the second place and in the third." We place widows, then, and wives in the second place and in the third, and for this we are charged by the frenzy of a heretic with condemning marriage altogether.

11. Throughout the book I have made many remarks in a tone of great moderation on virginity, widowhood, and marriage. But for the sake of brevity, I will here adduce but one passage, and that of such a kind that no one, I think, will be found to gainsay it save some one who wishes to prove himself malicious or mad. In describing our Lord's visit to the marriage at Cana in Galilee, [John. 2:1, John. 2:2] after some other remarks I have added these: [Ag. Jov. 1:40] "He who went but once to a marriage has taught us that a woman should marry but once; and this fact might tell against virginity if we failed to give marriage its due place-after virginity that is, and chaste widowhood. But, as it is only heretics who condemn marriage and tread under foot the ordinance of God, we listen with gladness to every word said by our Lord in praise of marriage. For the Church does not condemn marriage, but only subordinates it. It does not reject it altogether, but regulates it, knowing (as I have said above) that 'in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earth; and some to honor and some to dishonor. If a man, therefore, purge himself ...he shall be a vessel unto honor meet ...and prepared unto every good work.'" [2 Tim. 2:20, 2 Tim. 2:21] I listen with gladness, I say here, to every word said by the apostle in praise of marriage. Do I listen with gladness to the praise of marriage, and do I yet condemn marriage? The Church, I say, does not condemn wedlock, but subordinates it. Whether you like it or not, marriage is subordinated to virginity and widowhood. Even when marriage continues to fulfil its function, the Church does not condemn it, but only subordinates it; it does not reject it, but only regulates it. It is in your power, if you will, to mount the second step of chastity.¹⁴ Why are you angry if, standing on the third and lowest step, you will not make haste to go up higher?

12. Since, then, I have so often reminded my reader of my views; and since I have picked my way like a prudent traveller over every inch of the road, stating repeatedly that, while I receive marriage as a thing in itself admissible, I yet prefer continence, widowhood, and virginity, the wise and generous reader ought to have judged what seemed hard sayings by my general drift, and not to have charged me with putting forward inconsistent opinions in one and the same book. For who is so dull or so inexperienced in writing as to praise and to condemn one and the same object, as to destroy what he has built up, and to build up what he has destroyed; and when he has vanquished his opponent, to turn his sword, last of all against himself? Were my detractors country bred or unacquainted with the arts of rhetoric or of logic, I should pardon their want of insight; nor should I censure them for accusing me if I saw that their ignorance was in fault and not their will. As it is men of intellect who have enjoyed a liberal education make it their object less to understand me than to wound me, and for such I have this short answer, that they should correct my faults and not merely censure me for them. The lists are open, I cry; your enemy has marshalled his forces, his position is plain, and (if I may quote Virgil [Virg. A. 11:374, 5])- "The foeman calls you: meet him face to face."

Such men should answer their opponent. They ought to keep within the limits of debate, and not to wield the schoolmaster's rod. Their books should aim at showing in what my statements have fallen short of the truth, and in what they have exceeded it. For, although I will not listen to fault-finders, I will follow the advice of teachers. To direct the fighter how to fight when you yourself occupy a post of vantage on the wall is a kind of teaching that does not commend itself; and when you are yourself bathed in perfumes, it is unworthy to charge a bleeding soldier with cowardice. Nor in saying this do I lay myself open to a charge of boasting that while others have slept I only have entered the lists. My meaning simply is that men who have seen me wounded in this warfare may possibly be a little too cautious in their methods of fighting. I would not have you engage in an encounter in which you will have nothing to do but to protect yourself, your right hand remaining motionless while your left manages your shield. You must either strike or fall. I cannot account you a victor unless I see your opponent put to the sword.

13. You are, no doubt, men of vast acquirements; but we too have studied in the schools, and, like you, we have learned from the precepts of Aristotle-or, rather, from those which he has derived from Gorgias-that there are different ways of speaking; and we know, among other things, that he who writes for display uses one style, and he who writes to convince, another.¹⁵ In the former case the debate is desultory; to confute the opposer, now this argument is adduced and now that. One argues as one pleases, saying one thing while one means another. To quote the proverb, "With one hand one offers bread, in the other one holds a stone." [Plaut. Aul. 2:2, 18] In the latter case a certain frankness and openness of countenance are necessary. For it is one thing to start a problem and another to expound what is already proved. The first calls for a disputant, the second for a teacher. I stand in the thick of the fray, my life in constant danger: you who profess to teach me are a man of books. "Do not," you say, "attack unexpectedly or wound by a side-thrust. Strike straight at your opponent. You should be ashamed to resort to feints instead of force." As if it were not the perfection of fighting to menace one part and to strike another. Read, I beg of you, Demosthenes or Cicero, or (if you do not care for pleaders whose aim is to speak plausibly rather than truly) read Plato, Theophrastus, Xenophon, Aristotle, and the rest of those who draw their respective rills of wisdom from the Socratic fountain-head. Do they show any openness? Are they devoid of artifice? Is not every word they say filled with meaning? And does not this meaning always make for victory? Origen, Methodius, Eusebius, and Apollinaris¹⁶ write at great length against Celsus and Porphyry.¹⁷ Consider how subtle are the arguments, how insidious the engines with which they overthrow what the spirit of the devil has wrought. Sometimes, it is true, they are compelled to say not what they think but what is needful; and for this reason they employ against their opponents the assertions of the Gentiles themselves. I say nothing of the Latin authors, of Tertullian, Cyprian, Minutius, Victorinus, Lactantius, Hilary, lest I should appear not so much to be defending myself as to be assailing others. I will only mention the Apostle Paul, whose words seem to me, as often as I hear them, to be not words, but peals of thunder. Read his epistles, and especially those addressed to the Romans, to the Galatians, and to the Ephesians, in all of which he stands in the thick of the battle, and you will see how skilful and how careful he is in the proofs which he draws from the Old Testament, and how warily he cloaks the object which he has in view. His words seem simplicity itself: the expressions of a guileless and unsophisticated person-one who has no skill either to plan a dilemma or to avoid it. Still, whichever way you look, they are thunderbolts. His pleading halts, yet he carries every point which he takes up. He turns his back upon his foe only to overcome him; he simulates flight, but only that he may slay. He, then, if any one, ought to be calumniated; we should speak thus to him: "The proofs which you have used against the Jews or against other heretics bear a different meaning in their own contexts to that which they bear in your epistles. We see passages taken captive by your pen and pressed into service to win you a victory which in the volumes from which they are taken have no controversial bearing at all." May he not reply to us in the words of the Saviour: "I have one mode of speech for those that are without and another for those that are within; the crowds hear my parables, but their interpretation is for my disciples alone"? [Matt. 13:10-17] The Lord puts questions to the Pharisees, but does not elucidate them. To teach a disciple is one thing; to vanquish an opponent, another. "My mystery is for me," says the prophet; "my mystery is for me and for them that are mine." [Isa. 24:16, Vulg]

14. You are indignant with me because I have merely silenced Jovinian and not instructed him. You, do I say? Nay, rather, they who grieve to hear him anathematized, and who impeach their own pretended orthodoxy by eulogizing in another the heresy which they hold themselves. I should have asked him, forsooth, to surrender peaceably! I had no right to disregard his struggles and to drag him against his will into the bonds of truth! I might use such language had the desire of victory induced me to say anything counter to the rule laid down in Scripture, and had I taken the line-so often adopted by strong men in controversy-of justifying the means by the result. As it is, however, I have been an exponent of the apostle rather than a dogmatist on my own account; and my function has been simply that of a commentator. Anything, therefore, which seems a hard saying should be imputed to the writer expounded by me rather than to me the expounder; unless, indeed, he spoke otherwise than he is represented to have done, and I have by an unfair interpretation wrested the plain meaning of his words. If any one charges me with this disingenuousness let him prove his charge from the Scriptures themselves.

I have said in my book, [Ag. Jov. 1:7] "If 'it is good for a man not to touch a woman,' then it is bad for him to touch one, for bad, and bad only, is the opposite of good. But, if though bad it is made venial, then it is allowed to prevent something which would be worse than bad," and so on down to the commencement of the next chapter. The above is my comment upon the apostle's words: "It is good for a man not to touch a woman. Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband." [1 Cor. 7:1, 1 Cor. 7:2] In what way does my meaning differ from that intended by the apostle? Except that where he speaks decidedly I do so with hesitation. He defines a dogma, I hazard an inquiry. He openly says: "It is good for a man not to touch a woman." I timidly ask if it is good for a man not to touch one. If I thus waver, I cannot be said to speak positively. He says: "It is good not to touch." I add what is a possible antithesis to "good." And immediately afterwards I speak thus: [Ag. Jov. 1:7] "Notice the apostle's carefulness. He does not say: 'It is good for a man not to have a wife,' but, 'It is good for a man not to touch a woman'; as if there is danger in the very touching of one-danger which he who touches cannot escape." You see, therefore, that I am not expounding the law as to husbands and wives, but simply discussing the general question of sexual intercourse-how in comparison with chastity and virginity, the life of angels, "It is good for a man not to touch a woman."

"Vanity of vanities," says the Preacher, "all is vanity." [Eccles. 1:2] But if all created things are good, [Gen. 1:31; 1 Tim. 4:4] as being the handiwork of a good Creator, how comes it that all things are vanity? If the earth is vanity, are the heavens vanity too?-and the angels, the thrones, the dominations, the powers, and the rest of the virtues?18 No; if things which are good in themselves as being the handiwork of a good Creator are called vanity, it is because they are compared with things which are better still. For example, compared with a lamp, a lantern is good for nothing; compared with a star, a lamp does not shine at all; the brightest star pales before the moon; put the moon beside the sun, and it no longer looks bright; compare the sun with Christ, and it is darkness. "I am that I am," God says; [Ex. 3:14] and if you compare all created things with Him they have no existence. "Give not thy sceptre," says Esther, "unto them that be nothing" [Esth. 14:11] -that is to say, to idols and demons. And certainly they were idols and demons to whom she prayed that she and hers might not be given over. In Job also we read how Bildad says of the wicked man: "His confidence shall be rooted out of his tabernacle, and destruction as a king shall trample upon him. The companions also of him who is not shall abide in his tabernacle." [Job 18:14, 15 Vulg] This evidently relates to the devil, who must be in existence, otherwise he could not be said to have companions. Still, because he is lost to God, he is said not to be.

Now it was in a similar sense that I declared it to be a bad thing to touch a woman-I did not say a wife-because it is a good thing not to touch one. And I added: [Ag. Jov. 1:7] "I call virginity fine corn, wedlock barley, and fornication cow-dung." Surely both corn and barley are creatures of God. But of the two multitudes miraculously supplied in the Gospel the larger was fed upon barley loaves, and the smaller on corn bread.¹⁹ "Thou, Lord," says the psalmist, "shalt save both man and beast." [Ps. 36:7, P.B.V] I have myself said the same thing in other words, when I have spoken of virginity as gold and of wedlock as silver. [Ag. Jov. 1:3] Again, in discussing [Ag. Jov. 1:40] the one hundred and forty-four thousand sealed virgins who were not defiled with women, [Rev. 14:1, Rev. 14:4] I have tried to show that all who have not remained virgins are reckoned as defiled when compared with the perfect chastity of the angels and of our Lord Jesus Christ. But if any one thinks it hard or reprehensible that I have placed the same interval between virginity and wedlock as there is between fine corn and barley, let him read the book of the holy Ambrose "On Widows," and he will find, among other statements concerning virginity and marriage, the following:²⁰ "The apostle has not expressed his preference for marriage so unreservedly as to quench in men the aspiration after virginity; he commences with a recommendation of continence, and it is only subsequently that he stoops to mention the remedies for its opposite. And although to the strong he has pointed out the prize of their high calling, [Phil. 3:14] yet he suffers none to faint by the way; [Matt. 15:32] whilst he applauds those who lead the van, he does, not despise those who bring up the rear. For he had himself learned that the Lord Jesus gave to some barley bread, lest they should faint by the way, but offered to others His own body, that they should strive to attain His kingdom;" [Matt. 26:26, Matt. 26:29] and immediately afterwards: "The nuptial tie, then, is not to be avoided as a crime, but to be refused as a hard burden. For the law binds the wife to bring forth children in labor and in sorrow. Her desire is to be to her husband that he should rule over her. [Gen. 3:16] It is not the widow, then, but the bride, who is handed over to labor and sorrow in childbearing. It is not the virgin, but the married woman, who is subjected to the sway of a husband." And in another place, "Ye are bought," says the apostle, "with a price; [1 Cor. 6:20; 1 Cor. 7:23] be not therefore the servants of men." [Cf. Eph. 6:6] You see how clearly he defines the servitude which attends the married state. And a little farther on: "If, then, even a good marriage is servitude, what must a bad one be, in which husband and wife cannot sanctify, but only mutually destroy each other?" What I have said about virginity and marriage diffusely, Ambrose has stated tersely and pointedly, compressing much meaning into a few words. Virginity is described by him as a means of recommending continence, marriage as a remedy for incontinence. And when he descends from broad principles to particular details, he significantly holds out to virgins the prize of the high calling, yet comforts the married, that they may not faint by the way. While eulogizing the one class, he does not despise the other. Marriage he compares to the barley bread set before the multitude, virginity to the body of Christ given to the disciples. There is much less difference, it seems to me, between barley and fine corn than between barley and the body of Christ. Finally, he speaks of marriage as a hard burden, to be avoided if possible, and as a badge of the most unmistakable servitude. He makes, also, many other statements, which he has followed up at length in his three books "On Virgins."

15. From all which considerations it is clear that I have said nothing at all new concerning virginity and marriage, but have followed in all respects the judgment of older writers-of Ambrose, that is to say, and others who have discussed the doctrines of the Church. "And I would sooner follow them in their faults than copy the dull pedantry of the writers of to-day."²¹ Let married men, if they please, swell with rage because I have said, [Ag. Jov. 1:7] "I ask you, what kind of good thing is that which forbids a man to pray, and which prevents him from receiving the body of Christ?" When I do my duty as a husband, I cannot fulfil the requirements of continence. The same apostle, in another place, commands us to pray always. [1 Th. 5:17] "But if we are always to pray we must never yield to the claims of wedlock for, as often as I render her due to my wife, I incapacitate myself for prayer." When I spoke thus it is clear that I relied on the words of the apostle: "Defraud ye not one the other, except it be with consent for a time, that ye may give yourselves to ...prayer." [1 Cor. 7:5] The Apostle Paul tells us that when we have intercourse with our wives we cannot pray. If, then, sexual intercourse prevents what is less important-that is, prayer-how much more does it prevent what is more important-that is, the reception of the body of Christ? Peter, too, exhorts us to continence, that our "prayers be not hindered." [1 Pet. 3:7] How, I should like to know, have I sinned in all this? What have I done? How have I been in fault? If the waters of a stream are thick and muddy, it is not the river-bed which is to blame, but the source. Am I attacked because I have ventured to add to the words of the apostle these words of my own: "What kind of good thing is that which prevents a man from receiving the body of Christ?" If so, I will make answer briefly thus: Which is the more important, to pray or to receive Christ's body? Surely to receive Christ's body. If, then, sexual intercourse hinders the less important thing, much more does it hinder that which is the more important.

I have said in the same treatise [Ag. Jov. 1:20] that David and they that were with him could not have lawfully eaten the shew-bread had they not made answer that for three days they had not been defiled with women [1 Sam. 21:4, 1 Sam. 21:5] -not, of course, with harlots, intercourse with whom was forbidden by the law, but with their own wives, to whom they were lawfully united. Moreover, when the people were about to receive the law on Mount Sinai they were commanded to keep away from their wives for three days. [Ex. 19:15] I know that at Rome it is customary for the faithful always to receive the body of Christ, a custom which I neither censure nor indorse. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." [Rom. 14:5] But I appeal to the consciences of those persons who after indulging in sexual intercourse on the same day receive the communion-having first, as Persius puts it, "washed off the night in a flowing stream," [Pers. 2:16] and I ask such why they do not presume to approach the martyrs or to enter the churches.²² Is Christ of one mind abroad and of another at home? What is unlawful in church cannot be lawful at home. Nothing is hidden from God. "The night shineth as the day" before Him. [Ps. 139:11, Ps. 139:12] Let each man examine himself, and so let him approach the body of Christ. [Cf. 1 Cor. 11:28] Not, of course, that the deferring of communion for one day or for two makes a Christian any the holier or that what I have not deserved to-day I shall deserve to-morrow or the day after. But if I grieve that I have not shared in Christ's body it does help me to avoid for a little while my wife's embraces, and to prefer to wedded love the love of Christ. A hard discipline, you will say, and one not to be borne. What man of the world could bear it? He that can bear it, I reply, let him bear it; [Cf. Matt. 19:12] he that cannot must look to himself. it is my business to say, not what each man can do or will do, but what the Scriptures inculcate.

16. Again, objection has been taken to my comments on the apostle in the following passage: [Against Jov. 1:8] "But lest any should suppose from the context of the words before quoted (namely, 'that ye may give yourselves ...to prayer and come together again') that the apostle desires this consummation, and does not merely concede it to obviate a worse downfall, he immediately adds, 'that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency.' [1 Cor. 7:5] 'And come together again.' What a noble indulgence the words convey! One which he blushes to speak of in plainer words, which he prefers only to Satan's temptation, and which has its root in incontinence. Do we labor to expound this as a dark saying when the writer has himself explained his meaning? "I speak this," he says, 'by way of permission, and not as a command.' [1 Cor. 7:6, Vulg] Do we still hesitate to speak of wedlock as a thing permitted instead of as a thing enjoined? or are we afraid that such permission will exclude second or third marriages or some other case?' What have I said here which the apostle has not said? The phrase, I suppose, "which he blushes to speak of in plainer words." I imagine that when he says "come together," and does not mention for what, he takes a modest way of indicating what he does not like to name openly-that is, sexual intercourse. Or is the objection to the words which follow-"which he prefers only to Satan's temptation, and which has its root in incontinence"? Are they not the very words of the apostle, only differently arranged-"that Satan tempt you not for your incontinency"? Or do people cavil because I said, "Do we still hesitate to speak of wedlock as a thing permitted instead of as a thing enjoined?" If this seems a hard saying, it should be ascribed to the apostle, who says, "But I speak this by way of permission, and not as a command," and not to me, who, except that I have rearranged their order, have changed neither the words nor their meaning.

17. The shortness of a letter compels me to hasten on. I pass, accordingly, to the points which remain. "I say," remarks the apostle, "to the unmarried and widows, It is good for them if they abide even as I. But if they cannot contain, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to burn." [1 Cor. 7:8, 1 Cor. 7:9] This section I have interpreted thus: [Ag. Jov. 1:9] "When he has granted to those who are married the use of wedlock, and has made clear his own wishes and concessions, he passes on to those who are unmarried or widows, and sets before them his own example. He calls them happy if they abide even as he, [1 Cor. 7:8] but he goes on, 'if they cannot contain, let them marry.' He thus repeats his former language, 'but only to avoid fornication,' and 'that Satan tempt you not for your incontinence.' And when he says, 'If they cannot contain, let them marry,' he gives as a reason for his words that 'it is better to marry than to burn.' It is only good to marry, because it is bad to burn. But take away the fire of lust, and he will not say 'it is better to marry.' For a thing is said to be better in antithesis to something which is worse, and not simply in contrast with what is admittedly good. It is as though he said, 'It is better to have one eye than none.'" Shortly afterwards, apostrophizing the apostle, I spoke thus: [Ag. Jov. 1:9] "If marriage is good in itself, do not compare it with a conflagration, but simply say, 'It is good to marry.' I must suspect the goodness of a thing which only becomes a lesser evil in the presence of a greater one. I, for my part, would have it not a lighter evil but a downright good." The apostle wishes unmarried women and widows to abstain from sexual intercourse, incites them to follow his own example, and calls them happy if they abide even as he. But if they cannot contain, and are tempted to quench the fire of lust by fornication rather than by continence, it is better, he tells them, to marry than to burn. Upon which precept I have made this comment: "It is good to marry, simply because it is bad to burn," not putting forward a view of my own, but only explaining the apostle's precept, "It is better to marry than to burn;" that is, it is better to take a husband than to commit fornication. If, then, you teach that burning or fornication is good, the good will still be surpassed by what is still better.²³ But if marriage is only a degree better than the evil to which it is preferred, it cannot be of that unblemished perfection and blessedness which suggest a comparison with the life of angels. Suppose I say, "It is better to be a virgin than a married woman;" in this case I have preferred to what is good what is still better. But suppose I go a step further and say, "It is better to marry than to commit fornication;" in that case I have preferred, not a better thing to a good thing, but a good thing to a bad one. There is a wide difference between the two cases; for, while virginity is related to marriage as better is to good, marriage is related to fornication as good is to bad. How, I should like to know, have I sinned in this explanation? My fixed purpose was not to bend the Scriptures to my own wishes, but simply to say what I took to be their meaning. A commentator has no business to dilate on his own views; his duty is to make plain the meaning of the author whom he professes to interpret. For, if he contradicts the writer whom he is trying to expound, he will prove to be his opponent rather than his interpreter. When I am freely expressing my own opinion, and not commenting upon the Scriptures, then any one that pleases may charge me with having spoken hardly of marriage. But if he can find no ground for such a charge, he should attribute such passages in my commentaries as appear severe or harsh to the author commented on, and not to me, who am only his interpreter.

18. Another charge brought against me is simply intolerable! It is urged that in explaining the apostle's words concerning husbands and wives, "Such shall have trouble in the flesh," I have said: [Ag. Jov. 1:13] "We in our ignorance had supposed that in the flesh at least wedlock would have rejoicing. But if married persons are to have trouble in the flesh, the only thing in which they seemed likely to have pleasure, what motive will be left to make women marry? for, besides having trouble in spirit and soul, they will also have it even in the flesh." [1 Th. 5:23] Do I condemn marriage if I enumerate its troubles, such as the crying of infants, the death of children the chance of abortion, domestic losses, and so forth? Whilst Damasus of holy memory was still living, I wrote a book against Helvidius "On the Perpetual Virginity of the Blessed Mary," in which, duly to extol the bliss of virginity, I was forced to say much of the troubles of marriage. Did that excellent man-versed in Scripture as he was, and a virgin doctor of the virgin Church-find anything to censure in my discourse? Moreover, in the treatise which I addressed to Eustochium²⁴ I used much harsher language regarding marriage, and yet no one was offended at it. Nay, every lover of chastity strained his ears to catch my eulogy of continence. Read Tertullian, read Cyprian, read Ambrose, and either accuse me with them or acquit me with them. My critics resemble the characters of Plautus. Their only wit lies in detraction; and they try to make themselves out men of learning by assailing all parties in turn. Thus they bestow their censure impartially upon myself and upon my opponent, and maintain that we are both beaten, although one or other of us must have succeeded.

Moreover, when in discussing digamy and trigamy I have said, [Ag. Jov. 1:14] "It is better for a woman to know one man, even though he be a second husband or a third, than several; it is more tolerable for her to prostitute herself to one man than to many," have I not immediately subjoined my reason for so saying? "The Samaritan woman in the Gospel, when she declares that her present husband is her sixth, is rebuked by the Lord on the ground that he is not her husband."²⁵ For my own part, I now once more freely proclaim that digamy is not condemned in the Church-no, nor yet trigamy-and that a woman may marry a fifth husband, or a sixth, or a greater number still just as lawfully as she may marry a second; but that, while such marriages are not condemned, neither are they commended. They are meant as alleviations of an unhappy lot, and in no way redound to the glory of continence. I have spoken to the same effect elsewhere. [Ag. Jov. 1:15] "When a woman marries more than once-whether she does so twice or three times matters little-she ceases to be a monogamist. 'All things are lawful ...but all things are not expedient.' [1 Cor. 6:12] I do not condemn digamists or trigamists, or even, to put an impossible case, octogamists. Let a woman have an eighth husband if she must; only let her cease to prostitute herself."

19. I will come now to the passage in which I am accused of saying that-at least according to the true Hebrew text-the words "God saw that it was good" [Gen. 1:10] are not inserted after the second day of the creation, as they are after the first, third, and remaining ones, and of adding immediately the following comment: [Ag. Jov. 1:16] "We are meant to understand that there is something not good in the number two, separating us as it does from unity, and prefiguring the marriage-tie. Just as in the account of Noah's ark all the animals that enter by twos are unclean, but those of which an uneven number is taken are clean." [Gen. 7:2] In this statement a passing objection is made to what I have said concerning the second day, whether on the ground that the words mentioned really occur in the passage, although I say that they do not occur, or because, assuming them to occur, I have understood them in a sense different from that which the context evidently requires. As regards the non-occurrence of the words in question (viz., "God saw that it was good"), let them take not my evidence, but that of all the Jewish and other translators-Aquila²⁶ namely, Symmachus,²⁷ and Theodotion.²⁸ But if the words, although occurring in the account of the other days, do not occur in the account of this, either let them give a more plausible reason than I have done for their non-occurrence, or, failing such, let them, whether they like it or not, accept the suggestion which I have made. Furthermore, if in Noah's ark all the animals that enter by twos are unclean, whilst those of which an uneven number is taken are clean, and if there is no dispute about the accuracy of the text, let them explain if they can why it is so written. But if they cannot explain it, then, whether they will or not, they must embrace my explanation of the matter. Either produce better fare and ask me to be your guest, or else rest content with the meal that I offer you, however poor it may be. [Cf. Hor. Ep. 1:6, 67, 68]

I must now mention the ecclesiastical writers who have dealt with this question of the odd number. They are, among the Greeks, Clement, Hippolytus, Origen, Dionysius, Eusebius, Didymus; and, among ourselves, Tertullian, Cyprian, Victorinus, Lactantius, Hilary. What Cyprian said to Fortunatus about the number seven is clear from the letter which he sent to him.²⁹ Or perhaps I ought to bring forward the reasonings of Pythagoras, Archytas of Tarentum, and Publius Scipio in (Cicero's) sixth book "Concerning the Common Weal." If my detractors will not listen to any of these I will make the grammar schools shout in their ears the words of Virgil:

Uneven numbers are the joy of God. [Virg. E. 8:75]

20. To say, as I have done, that virginity is cleaner than wedlock, that the even numbers must give way to the odd, that the types of the Old Testament establish the truth of the Gospel: this, it appears, is a great sin subversive of the churches and intolerable to the world. The remaining points which are censured in my treatise are, I take it, of less importance, or else resolve themselves into this. I have, therefore, refrained from answering them, both that I may not exceed the limit at my disposal, and that I may not seem to distrust your intelligence, knowing as I do that you are ready to be my champion even before I ask you. With my last breath, then, I protest that neither now nor at any former time have I condemned marriage. I have merely answered an opponent without any fear that they of my own party would lay snares for me. I extol virginity to the skies, not because I myself possess it, but because, not possessing it, I admire it all the more. Surely it is a modest and ingenuous confession to praise in others that which you lack yourself. The weight of my body keeps me fixed to the ground, but do I fail to admire the flying birds or to praise the dove because, in the words of Virgil, [Virg. A. 5:217] it "Glides on its liquid path with motionless swift wings?"

Let no man deceive himself, let no man, giving ear to the voice of flattery, rush upon ruin. The first virginity man derives from his birth, the second from his second birth.³⁰ The words are not mine; it is an old saying, "No man can serve two masters;" [Matt. 6:24] that is, the flesh and the spirit. For "the flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other," so that we cannot do the things that we would. [Gal. 5:17] When, then, anything in my little work seems to you harsh, have regard not to my words, but to the Scripture, whence they are taken.

21. Christ Himself is a virgin; [Ag. Jov. 1:31] and His mother is also a virgin; yea, though she is His mother, she is a virgin still. For Jesus has entered in through the closed doors, [John. 20:19] and in His sepulchre—a new one hewn out of the hardest rock—no man is laid either before Him or after Him. [John. 19:41] Mary is "a garden enclosed ...a fountain sealed," [Cant. 4:12] and from that fountain flows, according to Joel,³¹ the river which waters the torrent bed either³² of cords or of thorns;³³ of cords being those of the sins by which we were beforetime bound, [Cf. Prov. 5:22] the thorns those which choked the seed the goodman of the house had sown. [Matt. 13:7] She is the east gate, spoken of by the prophet Ezekiel, [Ezek. 44:2, Ezek. 44:3] always shut and always shining, and either concealing or revealing the Holy of Holies; and through her "the Sun of Righteousness," [Mal. 4:2] our "high priest after the order of Melchizedek," [Heb. 5:10] goes in and out. Let my critics explain to me how Jesus can have entered in through closed doors when He allowed His hands and His side to be handled, and showed that He had bones and flesh, [John. 20:19, John. 20:27] thus proving that His was a true body and no mere phantom of one, and I will explain how the holy Mary can be at once a mother and a virgin. A mother before she was wedded, she remained a virgin after bearing her son. Therefore, as I was going to say, the virgin Christ and the virgin Mary have dedicated in themselves the first fruits of virginity for both sexes.³⁴ The apostles have either been virgins or, though married, have lived celibate lives. Those persons who are chosen to be bishops, priests, and deacons are either virgins or widowers; or at least when once they have received the priesthood, are vowed to perpetual chastity. Why do we delude ourselves and feel vexed if while we are continually straining after sexual indulgence, we find the palm of chastity denied to us? We wish to fare sumptuously, and to enjoy the embraces of our wives, yet at the same time we desire to reign with Christ among virgins and widows. Shall there be but one reward, then, for hunger and for excess, for filth and for finery, for sackcloth and for silk? Lazarus, [Luke 16:19-25] in his lifetime, received evil things, and the rich man, clothed in purple, fat and sleek, while he lived enjoyed the good things of the flesh but, now that they are dead, they occupy different positions. Misery has given place to satisfaction, and satisfaction to misery. And it rests with us whether we will follow Lazarus or the rich man.

1: Marcus Antonius, a Roman orator spoken of by Cicero. Orator 100:5, De Oratore 1:100:21, 47, 48. His treatise "De ratione dicendi" is lost. See Quintal 3:1, 192 2: A Gnostic presbyter of the second century who rejected the Old Testament 3: An Eastern teacher of the third century, a.d., the main feature of whose system was its uncompromising dualism

4: A Syrian rhetorician converted to Christianity by Justin Martyr. He wrote a harmony of the Gospels called Diatessaron 5: I.e. "the abstainers," or "the continent," a Gnostic sect in the second century

6: From this passage compared with Ep. 123:9, and Bede De Temporum Ratlone, 100:1. (De Loquetâ Digitorum), it appears that the number thirty was indicated by joining the tips of the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, sixty was indicated by curling up the forefinger of the same hand and then doubling the thumb over it, while one hundred was expressed by joining the tips of the thumb and forefinger of the right hand. See Prof. Mayor's learned note on Juv. 10:249 7: E.g. Cyprian and Origen (Hom. 1:in Jos.) 8: Paterfamilias. Vide Cypr. de Hab. Virg. 21

9: A.V. marg 10: Acc. to the Vulgate. In A.V. it is the 45th

11: Univira 12: Jerome here explains the word aperispastwj (A.V. "without distraction") in 1 Cor. 7:35.

13: Viduitas vel continentia 14: I.e. continence in marriage

15:

Aliud esse gymnastikwj scribere, aliud dogmatikwj. The words do not appear to be used in this sense in the extant works of Aristotle

16:

The reply of Origen to Celsus is still extant; those of Methodius, Eusebius and Apollinaris to Porphyry have perished. Cf. Letter LXX

17: Two philosophic opponents of Christianity who flourished, the first in the second, the second in the third, century of our era 18: Col. 1:16. Cf. Milton, P. L. 5:601 19: Matt. 14:15-21; Matt. 15:32-38. Cf. John. 6:5-13 20: Ambrose, On Widowhood, 13:79; 13:81; 11:69 21: Ter. Andria Prol. 20, 21

22: That what is now known as reservation of the elements was practised in the early church there is abundant evidence to show. Justin Martyr (Apol. I. 65) writes: "The deacons communicate each of those present and carry away to the absent of the blest bread and wine and water." And those to whom the eucharist was thus taken were not bound to consume it immediately, or all at once, but might reserve a part or all for future occasions. According to Basil (Ep. 93), "in Egypt the laity for the most part had every one the communion in their own houses"-and "all those who dwell alone in the desert, when there is no priest, keep the communion at home and receive it at their own hands." So Jerome speaks (Letter CXXV. 20) of Exuperius as "carrying the Lord's body in a wicker basket, His blood in a vessel of glass." See the article Reservation in Smith and Cheetham's Dict. of Christian Antiquities 23: Fornication must still be subordinated to marriage

24: Letter XXII 25: John. 4:16-18. Jerome's version of the story is inaccurate 26: The author of a literal Greek version of the O. T. made in the second century 27: An ebionitic translator, free, not literal, in style

28: A careful reviser of the LXX. whose work was welcomed by the Church. His version of Daniel completely superseded the older one 29: Cyprian, Letter to Fortunatus, 13:11 30: Tert. de Exh. Cast. I 31: Joel, 3:18; according to the LXX. and Hebrew. A.V. has "vale of Shittim" (thorns)

32:

LXX

33: Hebrew 34: Cf. Letter XXII

Letters - letter_049

Letter 49. To Pammachius.

Jerome encloses the preceding letter, thanks Pammachius for his efforts to suppress his treatise "against Jovinian," but declares these to be useless, and exhorts him, if he still has any hesitation in his mind, to turn to the Scriptures and the commentaries made upon them by Origen and others. Written at the same time as the preceding letter.

1. Christian modesty sometimes requires us to be silent even to our friends, and to nurse our humility in peace, where the renewal of an old friendship would expose us to the charge of self-seeking. Thus, when you have kept silence I have kept silence too, and have not cared to remonstrate with you, lest I should be thought more anxious to conciliate a person of influence than to cultivate a friend. But, now that it has become a duty to reply to your letter, I will endeavor always to be beforehand with you, and not so much to answer your queries as to write independently of them. Thus, if I have shown my modesty hitherto by silence, I will henceforth show it still more by coming forward to speak.

2. I quite recognize the kindness and forethought which have induced you to withdraw from circulation some copies of my work against Jovinian. Your diligence, however, has been of no avail, for several people coming from the city have repeatedly read aloud to me passages which they have come across in Rome. In this province, also, the books have already been circulated; and, as you have read yourself in Horace, "Words once uttered cannot be recalled."¹ I am not so fortunate as are most of the writers of the day-able, that is, to correct my trifles whenever I like. When once I have written anything, either my admirers or my ill-wishers-from different motives, but with equal zeal-sow my work broadcast among the public; and their language, whether it is that of eulogy or of criticism, is apt to run to excess.² They are guided not by the merits of the piece, but by their own angry feelings. Accordingly, I have done what I could. I have dedicated to you a defence of the work in question, feeling sure that when you have read it you will yourself satisfy the doubts of others on my behalf; or else, if you too turn up your nose at the task, you will have to explain in some new manner that section of the apostle³ in which he discusses virginity and marriage.

3. I do not speak thus that I may provoke you to write on the subject yourself-although I know your zeal in the study of the sacred writings to be greater than my own-but that you may compel my tormentors to do so. They are educated; in their own eyes no mean scholars; competent not merely to censure but to instruct me. If they write on the subject, my view will be the sooner neglected when it is compared with theirs. Read, I pray you, and diligently consider the words of the apostle, and you will then see that-with a view to avoid misrepresentation-I have been much more gentle towards married persons than he was disposed to be. Origen, Dionysius, Pierius, Eusebius of Caesarea, Didymus, Apollinaris, have used great latitude in the interpretation of this epistle.⁴ When Pierius, sifting and expounding the apostle's meaning, comes to the words, "I would that all men were even as I myself," [1 Cor. 7:7] he makes this comment upon them: "In saying this Paul plainly preaches abstinence from marriage." Is the fault here mine, or am I responsible for harshness? Compared with this sentence of Pierius,⁵ all that I have ever written is mild indeed. Consult the commentaries of the above-named writers and take advantage of the Church libraries; you will then more speedily finish as you would wish the enterprise which you have so happily begun.⁶

4. I hear that the hopes of the entire city are centred in you, and that bishop⁷ and people are, agreed in wishing for your exaltation. To be a bishop⁸ is much, to deserve to be one is more.

If you read the books of the sixteen prophets⁹ which I have rendered into Latin from the Hebrew; and if, when you have done so, you express satisfaction with my labors, the news will encourage me to take out of my desk some other works now shut up in it. I have lately translated Job into our mother tongue: you will be able to borrow a copy of it from your cousin, the saintly Marcella. Read it both in Greek and in Latin, and compare the old version with my rendering. You will then clearly see that the difference between them is that between truth and falsehood. Some of my commentaries upon the twelve prophets I have sent to the reverend father Domnio, also the four books of Kings-that is, the two called Samuel and the two called Malâchim.¹⁰ If you care to read these you will learn for yourself how difficult it is to understand the Holy Scriptures, and particularly the prophets; and how through the fault of the translators passages which for the Jews flow clearly on for us abound with mistakes. Once more, you must not in my small writings look for any such eloquence as that which for Christ's sake you disregard in Cicero. A version made for the use of the Church, even though it may possess a literary charm, ought to disguise and avoid it as far as possible; in order that it may not speak to the idle schools and few disciples of the philosophers, but may address itself rather to the entire human race.

1: Hor. AP. 390 2: See the Preface to Jerome's Comm. on Daniel

3: 1 Cor. vii 4: 1 Corinthians

5: Master of the catechetical school of Alexandria, 265 a.d. His writings have perished. His name occurs again in Letter LXX 6: Ad optata caepaque pervenies

7:

Pontifex

8: Sacerdos 9: Thus including Daniel 10: The Hebrew word for "Kings.

Letters - letter_050

Letter 50. To Domnio.

Domnio, a Roman (called in Letter 45. "the Lot of our time"), had written to Jerome to tell him that an ignorant monk had been traducing his books "against Jovinian." Jerome, in reply, sharply rebukes the folly of his critic and comments on the want of straightforwardness in his conduct. He concludes the letter with an emphatic restatement of his original position. Written in 394 a.d.

1. Your letter is full at once of affection and of complaining. The affection is your own, which prompts you unceasingly to warn me of impending danger, and which makes you on my behalf "Of safest things distrustful and afraid." [Virg. A. 4:298] The complaining is of those who have no love for me, and seek an occasion against me in my sins. They speak against their brother, they slander their own mother's son. [Ps. 50:20] You write to me of these-nay, of one in particular-a loungee who is to be seen in the streets, at crossings, and in public places; a monk who is a noisy news-monger, clever only in detraction, and eager, in spite of the beam in his own eye, to remove the mote in his neighbor's. [Matt. 7:3-5] And you tell me that he preaches publicly against me, gnawing, rending, and tearing asunder with his fangs the books that I have written against Jovinian. You inform me, moreover, that this home-grown dialectician, this mainstay of the Plautine company, has read neither the "Categories" of Aristotle nor his treatise "On Interpretation," nor his "Analytics," nor yet the "Topics" of Cicero, but that, moving as he does only in uneducated circles, and frequenting no society but that of weak women, he ventures to construct illogical syllogisms and to unravel by subtle arguments what he is pleased to call my sophisms. How foolish I have been to suppose that without philosophy there can be no knowledge of these subjects; and to account it a more important part of composition to erase than to write! In vain have I perused the commentaries of Alexander; to no purpose has a skilled teacher used the "Introduction" of Porphyry to instruct me in logic; and-to make light of human learning-I have gained nothing at all by having Gregory of Nazianzum and Didymus as my catechists in the Holy Scriptures. My acquisition of Hebrew has been wasted labor; and so also has been the daily study which from my youth I have bestowed upon the Law and the Prophets, the Gospels and the Apostles.

2. Here we have a man who has reached perfection without a teacher, so as to be a vehicle of the spirit and a self-taught genius. He surpasses Cicero in eloquence, Aristotle in argument, Plato in discretion, Aristarchus in learning, Didymus, that man of brass, in the number of his books; and not only Didymus, but all the writers of his time in his knowledge of the Scriptures. It is reported that you have only to give him a theme and he is always ready-like Carneades¹ -to argue on this side or on that, for justice or against it. The world escaped a great danger, and civil actions and suits concerning succession were saved from a yawning gulf on the day when, despising the bar, he transferred himself to the Church. For, had he been unwilling, who could ever have been proved innocent? And, if he once began to reckon the points of the case upon his fingers, and to spread his syllogistic nets, what criminal would his pleading have failed to save? Had he but stamped his foot, or fixed his eyes, or knitted his brow, or moved his hand, or twirled his beard, he would at once have thrown dust in the eyes of the jury. No wonder that such a complete Latinist and so profound a master of eloquence overcomes poor me, who-as I have been some time² away (from Rome), and without opportunities for speaking Latin-am half a Greek if not altogether a barbarian. No wonder, I say, that he overcomes me when his eloquence has crushed Jovinian in person. Good Jesus! what! even Jovinian that great and clever man! So clever, indeed, that no one can understand his writings, and that when he sings it is only for himself-and for the muses!

3. Pray, my dear father, warn this man not to hold language contrary to his profession, and not to undo with his words the chastity which he professes by his garb. Whether he elects to be a virgin or a married celibate-and the choice must rest with himself-he must not compare wives with virgins, for that would be to have striven in vain against Jovinian's eloquence. He likes, I am told, to visit the cells of widows and virgins, and to lecture them with his brows knit on sacred literature. What is it that he teaches these poor women in the privacy of their own chambers? Is it to feel assured that virgins are no better than wives? Is it to make the most of the flower of their age, to eat and drink, to frequent the baths, to live in luxury, and not to disdain the use of perfumes? Or does he preach to them chastity, fasting, and neglect of their persons? No doubt the precepts that he inculcates are full of virtue. But if so, let him admit publicly what he says privately. Or, if his private teaching is the same as his public, he should keep aloof altogether from the society of girls. He is a young man-a monk, and in his own eyes an eloquent one (do not pearls fall from his lips, and are not his elegant phrases sprinkled with comic salt and humor?)-I am surprised, therefore, that he can without a blush frequent noblemen's houses, pay constant visits to married ladies, make our religion a subject of contention, distort the faith of Christ by misapplying words, and-in addition to all this-detract from one who is his brother in the Lord. He may, however, have supposed me to be in error (for "in many things we offend all," and "if any man offend not in word he is a perfect man" [Jas. 3:2]). In that case he should have written to convict me or to question me, the course taken by Pammachius, a man of high attainments and position. To this latter I defended myself as best I could, and in a lengthy letter explained the exact sense of my words. He might at least have copied the diffidence which led you to extract and arrange such passages as seemed to give offence; asking me for corrections or explanations, and not supposing me so mad that in one and the same book I should write for marriage and against it.

4. Let him spare himself, let him spare me, let him spare the Christian name. Let him realize his position as a monk, not by talking and arguing, but by holding his peace and sitting still. Let him read the words of Jeremiah: "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him." [Lam. 3:27, Lam. 3:28] Or if he has really the right to apply the censor's rod to all writers, and fancies himself a man of learning because he alone understands Jovinian (you know the proverb: Balbus best knows what Balbus means); yet, as Atilius³ reminds us, "we are not all writers." Jovinian himself-an unlettered man of letters if ever there was one-will with most justice proclaim the fact to him. "That the bishops condemn me," he says, "is not reason but treason. I want no answers from nobodies, who, while they have authority to put me down, have not the wit to teach me. Let one write against me who has a tongue that I can understand, and whom to vanquish will be to vanquish all.

"I know full well: believe me, I have felt

The hero's force when rising o'er his shield

He hurls his whizzing spear." [Virgil, Aen. 11:283, 284]

He is strong in argument, intricate and tenacious, one to fight with his head down. Often has he cried out against me in the streets from late one night till early the next. He is a well-built man, and his thews are those of an athlete. Secretly I believe him to be a follower of my teaching. He never blushes or stops to weigh his words: his only aim is to speak as loud as possible. So famous is he for his eloquence that his sayings are held up as models to our curly-headed youngsters. [Persius 1:29] How often, when I have met him at meetings, has he aroused my wrath and put me into a passion! How often has he spat upon me, and then departed spat upon! But these are vulgar methods, and any of my followers can use them. I appeal to books, to those memorials which must be handed down to posterity. Let us speak by our writings, that the silent reader may judge between us; and that, as I have a flock of disciples, he may have one also-flatterers and parasites worthy of the Gnatho and Phormio⁴ who is their master."

5. It is no difficult matter, my dear Domnio, to chatter at street corners or in apothecaries' shops and to pass judgment on the world. "So-and-so has made a good speech, so-and-so a bad one; this man knows the Scriptures, that one is crazy; this man talks glibly, that never says a word at all." But who considers him worthy thus to judge every one? To make an outcry against a man in every street, and to heap, not definite charges, but vague imputations, on his head, is nothing. Any buffoon or litigiously disposed person can do as much. Let him put forth his hand, put pen to paper, and bestir himself; let him write books and prove in them all he can. Let him give me a chance of replying to his eloquence. I can return bite for bite, if I like; when hurt myself, I can fix my teeth in my opponent. I too have had a liberal education. As Juvenal says, "I also have often withdrawn my hand from the ferule." [Juv. 1:15] Of me, too, it may be said in the words of Horace, "Flee from him; he has hay on his horn."⁵ But I prefer to be a disciple of Him who says, "I gave my back to the smiters ...I hid not my face from shame and spitting." [Isa. 50:6] When He was reviled He reviled not again. [1 Pet. 2:23] After the buffeting, the cross, the scourge, the blasphemies, at the very last He prayed for His crucifiers, saying, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." [Luke 23:34] I, too, pardon the error of a brother. He has been deceived, I feel sure, by the art of the devil. Among the women he was held clever and eloquent; but, when my poor writings reached Rome, dreading me as a rival, he tried to rob me of my laurels. No man on earth, he resolved, should please his eloquent self, unless such as commanded respect rather than sought it, and showed themselves men to be feared more than favored. A man of consummate address, he desired, like an old soldier, with one stroke of the sword to strike down both his enemies,⁶ and to make clear to every one that, whatever view he might take, Scripture was always with him. Well, he must condescend to send me his account of the matter, and to correct my indiscreet language, not by censure but by instruction. If he tries to do this, he will find that what seems forcible on a lounge is not equally forcible in court; and that it is one thing to discuss the doctrines of the divine law amid the spindles and work-baskets of girls and another to argue concerning them among men of education. As it is, without hesitation or shame, he raises again and again the noisy shout, "Jerome condemns marriage," and, whilst he constantly moves among women with child, crying infants, and marriage-beds, he suppresses the words of the apostle just to cover me-poor me-with odium. However, when he comes by and by to write books and to grapple with me at close quarters, then he will feel it, then he will stick fast; Epicurus and Aristippus⁷ will not be near him then; the swineherds⁸ will not come to his aid; the prolific sow⁹ will not so much as grunt. For I also may say, with Turnus:

"Father, I too can launch a forceful spear, And when I strike blood follows from the wound." [Virg. A. 12:50, 51] But if he refuses to write, and fancies that abuse is as effective as criticism, then, in spite of all the lands and seas and peoples which lie between us, he must hear at least the echo of my cry, "I do not condemn marriage," "I do not condemn wedlock." Indeed-and this I say to make my meaning quite clear to him-I should like every one to take a wife who, because they get frightened in the night, cannot manage to sleep alone.¹⁰ 1: A philosopher of the Academy noted for his opposition to stoicism

2:

Eight years

3: An early Roman dramatist of whose works only a few fragments remain. He is said to have translated the Electra of Sophocles, but for the most part to have preferred comedy to tragedy 4: Characters in the Eunuchus and Phormio of Terence 5: Hor. S. 1:iv. 34 6: Viz. Jerome and Jovinian 7: According to both these philosophers pleasure is the highest good 8: The followers of Jovinian 9: Jovinian himself 10: Cic. pro Caelio xv

Letters - letter_051

Letter 51. From Epiphanius, Bishop of Salamis, in Cyprus, to John, Bishop of Jerusalem. A coolness had arisen between these two bishops in connection with the Origenistic controversy, which at this time was at its height. Epiphanius had openly charged John with being an Origenist, and had also uncanonically conferred priests' orders on Jerome's brother Paulinian, in order that the monastery at Bethlehem might henceforth be entirely independent of John. Naturally, John resented this conduct and showed his resentment. The present letter is a kind of half-apology made by Epiphanius for what he had done, and like all such, it only seems to have made matters worse. The controversy is fully detailed in the treatise "Against John of Jerusalem" in this volume, esp. §11-14. An interesting paragraph (§9) narrates how Epiphanius destroyed at Anablatha a church-curtain on which was depicted "a likeness of Christ or of some saint"-an early instance of the iconoclastic spirit.

Originally written in Greek, the letter was (by the writer's request) rendered into Latin by Jerome. Its date is 394 a.d. To the lord bishop and dearly beloved brother, John, Epiphanius sends greeting.

1. It surely becomes us, dearly beloved, not to abuse our rank as clergy, so as to make it an occasion of pride, but by diligently keeping and observing God's commandments, to be in reality what in name we profess to be. For, if the Holy Scriptures say, "Their lots shall not profit them," [Jer. 12:13, LXX] what pride in our clerical position¹ will be able to avail us who sin not only in thought and feeling, but in speech? I have heard, of course, that you are incensed against me, that you are angry, and that you threaten to write about me-not merely to particular places and provinces, but to the uttermost ends of the earth. Where is that fear of God which should make us tremble with the trembling spoken of by the Lord-"Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment"? [Matt. 5:22] Not that I greatly care for your writing what you please. For Isaiah tells us [Isa. 18:2, LXX] of letters written on papyrus and cast upon the waters-missives soon carried away by time and tide. I have done you no harm, I have inflicted no injury upon you, I have extorted nothing from you by violence. My action concerned a monastery whose inmates were foreigners in no way subject to your provincial jurisdiction. Moreover their regard for my insignificance and for the letters which I frequently addressed to them had commenced to produce a feeling of dislike to communion with you. Feeling, therefore, that too great strictness or scrupulosity on my part might have the effect of alienating them from the Church with its ancient faith, I ordained one of the brothers deacon, and after he had ministered as such, admitted him to the priesthood. You should, I think, have been grateful to me for this, knowing, as you surely must, that it is the fear of God which has compelled me to act in this way, and particularly when you recollect that God's priesthood is everywhere the same, and that I have simply made provision for the wants of the Church. For, although each individual bishop of the Church has under him churches which are placed in his charge, and although no man may stretch himself beyond his measure, [Cf. 2 Cor. 10:14] yet the love of Christ, which is without dissimulation, [Rom. 12:9] is set up as an example to us all; and we must consider not so much the thing done as the time and place, the mode and motive, of doing it. I saw that the monastery contained a large number of reverend brothers, and that the reverend presbyters, Jerome and Vincent, through modesty and humility, were unwilling to offer the sacrifices permitted to their rank, and to labor in that part of their calling which ministers more than any other to the salvation of Christians. I knew, moreover, that you could not find or lay hands on this servant of God² who had several times fled from you simply because he was reluctant to undertake the onerous duties of the priesthood, and that no other bishop could easily find him. Accordingly, I was a good deal surprised when, by the ordering of God, he came to me with the deacons of the monastery and others of the brethren, to make satisfaction to me for some grievance or other which I had against them. While, therefore, the Collect³ was being celebrated in the church of the villa which adjoins our monastery-he being quite ignorant and wholly unsuspecting of my purpose-I gave orders to a number of deacons to seize him and to stop his mouth, lest in his eagerness to free himself he might adjure me in the name of Christ. First of all, then, I ordained him deacon, setting before him the fear of God, and forcing him to minister; for he made a hard struggle against it, crying out that he was unworthy, and protesting that this heavy burden was beyond his strength. It was with difficulty, then, that I overcame his reluctance, persuading him as well as I could with passages from Scripture, and setting before him the commandments of God. And when he had ministered in the offering of the holy sacrifices, once more with great difficulty I closed his mouth and ordained him presbyter. Then, using the same arguments as before, I induced him to sit in the place set apart for the presbyters. After this I wrote to the reverend presbyters and other brothers of the monastery, chiding them for not having written to me about him. For a year before I had heard many of them complain that they had no one to celebrate for them the sacraments of the Lord. All then agreed in asking him to undertake the duty, pointing out how great his usefulness would be to the community of the monastery. I blamed them for omitting to write to me and to propose that I should ordain him, when the opportunity was given to them to do so.

2. All this I have done, as I said just now, relying on that Christian love which you, I feel sure, cherish towards my insignificance; not to mention the fact that I held the ordination in a monastery, and not within the limits of your jurisdiction. How truly blessed is the mildness and complacency of the bishops of (my own) Cyprus, as well as their simplicity, though to your refinement and discrimination it appears deserving only of God's pity! For many bishops in communion with me have ordained presbyters in my province whom I had been unable to capture, and have sent to me deacons and subdeacons⁴ whom I have been glad to receive. I myself, too, have urged the bishop Philo of blessed memory, and the reverend Theoprepus, to make provision for the Church of Christ by ordaining presbyters in those churches of Cyprus which, although they were accounted to belong to my see, happened to be close to them, and this for the reason that my province was large and straggling. But for my part I have never ordained deaconesses nor sent them into the provinces of others,⁵ nor have I done anything to rend the Church. Why, then, have you thought fit to be so angry and indignant with me for that work of God which I have wrought for the edification of the brethren, and not for their destruction? [2 Cor. 10:8] Moreover, I have been much surprised at the assertion which you have made to my clergy, that you sent me a message by that reverend presbyter, the abbot Gregory, that I was to ordain no one, and that I promised to comply, saying, "Am I a stripling, or do I not know the canons?" By God's word I am telling you the truth when I say that I know and have heard nothing of all this, and that I have not the slightest recollection of using any language of the sort. As, however, I have had misgivings, lest possibly, being only a man, I may have forgotten this among so many other matters, I have made inquiry of the reverend Gregory, and of the presbyter Zeno, who is with him. Of these, the abbot Gregory replies that he knows nothing whatever about the matter, while Zeno says that the presbyter Rufinus, in the course of some desultory remarks, spoke these words. "Will the reverend bishop, think you, venture to ordain any persons?" but that the conversation went no further. I, Epiphanius, however, have never either received the message or answered it. Do not, then, dearly beloved, allow your anger to overcome you or your indignation to get the better of you, lest, you should disquiet yourself in vain; and lest you should be thought to be putting forward this grievance only to get scope for tendencies of another kind,⁶ and thus to have sought out an occasion of sinning. It is to avoid this that the prophet prays to the Lord, saying: "Turn not aside my heart to words of wickedness, to making excuses for my sins." [Ps. 141:4, acc. to the Gallican Psalter]

3. This also I have been surprised to hear, that certain persons who are in the habit of carrying tales backwards and forwards, and of always adding something fresh to what they have heard, to stir up grievances and disputes between brothers, have succeeded in disquieting you by saying that, when I offer sacrifices to God, I am wont to say this prayer on your behalf: "Grant, O Lord, to John grace to believe aright." Do not suppose me so untutored as to be capable of saying this so openly. To tell you the simple truth, my dearest brother, although I continually use this prayer mentally, I have never confided it to the ears of others, lest I should seem to dishonor you. But when I repeat the prayers required by the ritual of the mysteries, then I say on behalf of all and of you as well as others, "Guard him, that he may preach the truth," or at least this, "Do Thou, O Lord, grant him Thine aid, and guard him, that he may preach the word of truth," as occasion offers itself for the words, and as the turn comes for the particular prayer. Wherefore I beseech you, dearly beloved, and, casting myself down at your feet, I entreat you to grant to me and to yourself this one prayer, that you would save yourself, as it is written, "from an untoward generation." [Acts 2:40] Withdraw, dearly beloved, from the heresy of Origen and from all heresies. For I see that all your indignation has been roused against me simply because I have told you that you ought not to eulogize one who is the spiritual father of Arius, and the root and parent of all heresies. And when I appealed to you not to go astray, and warned you of the consequences, you traversed my words, and reduced me to tears and sadness; and not me only, but many other Catholics who were present.⁷ This I take to be the origin of your indignation and of your passion on the present occasion. On this account you threaten to send out letters against me, and to circulate your version of the matter in all directions;⁸ and thus, while with a view to defending your heresy you kindle men's passions against me, you break through the charity which I have shown towards you, and act with so little discretion that you make me regret that I have held communion with you, and that I have by so doing upheld the erroneous opinions of Origen.

4. I speak plainly. To use the language of Scripture, I do not spare to pluck out my own eye if it cause me to offend, nor to cut off my hand and my foot if they cause me to do so. [Matt. 18:8, Matt. 18:9] And you must be treated in the same way whether you are my eyes, or my hands, or my feet. For what Catholic, what Christian who adorns his faith with good works, can hear with calmness Origen's teaching and counsel, or believe in his extraordinary preaching? "The Son," he tells us, "cannot see the Father, and the Holy Spirit cannot see the Son." These words occur in his book "On First Principles;" thus we read, and thus Origen has spoken. "For as it is unsuitable to say that the Son can see the Father, it is consequently unsuitable to suppose that the Spirit can see the Son." [First Principles, 1:1; 2:4] Can any one, moreover, brook Origen's assertion that men's souls were once angels in heaven, and that having sinned in the upper world, they have been cast down into this, and have been confined in bodies as in barrows or tombs, to pay the penalty for their former sins; and that the bodies of believers are not temples of Christ, [1 Cor. 6:15, 1 Cor. 6:19] but prisons of the condemned? Again, he tampers with the true meaning of the narrative by a false use of allegory, multiplying words without limit; and undermines the faith of the simple by the most varied arguments. Now he maintains that souls, in Greek the "cool things," from a word meaning to be cool,⁹ are so called because in coming down from the heavenly places to the lower world they have lost their former heat; [First Principles 2:8] and now, that our bodies are called by the Greeks chains, from a word meaning chain,¹⁰ or else (on the analogy of our own Latin word) "things fallen,"¹¹ because our souls have fallen from heaven; and that the other word for body which the abundance of the Greek idiom supplies¹² is by many taken to mean a funeral monument,¹³ because the soul is shut up within it in the same way as the corpses of the dead are shut up in tombs and barrows. If this doctrine is true what becomes of our faith? Where is the preaching of the resurrection? Where is the teaching of the apostles, which lasts on to this day in the churches of Christ? Where is the blessing to Adam, and to his seed, and to Noah and his sons? "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." [Gen. 1:28; Gen. 9:7] According to Origen, these words must be a curse and not a blessing; for he turns angels into human souls, compelling them to leave the place of highest rank and to come down lower, as though God were unable through the action of His blessing to grant souls to the human race, had the angels not sinned, and as though for every birth on earth there must be a fall in heaven. We are to give up, then, the teaching of apostles and prophets, of the law, and of our Lord and Saviour Himself, in spite of His language loud as thunder in the gospel. Origen, on the other hand, commands and urges-not to say binds-his disciples not to pray to ascend into heaven, lest sinning once more worse than they had sinned on earth they should be hurled down into the world again. Such foolish and insane notions he generally confirms by distorting the sense of the Scriptures and making them mean what they do not mean at all. He quotes this passage from the Psalms: "Before thou didst humble me by reason of my wickedness, I went wrong;"¹⁴ and this, "Return unto thy rest, O my soul;" [Ps. 116:7] this also, "Bring my soul out of prison;" [Ps. 142:7] and this, "I will make confession unto the Lord in the land of the living,"¹⁵ although there can be no doubt that the meaning of the divine Scripture is different from the interpretation by which he unfairly wrests it to the support of his own heresy. This way of acting is common to the Manichaeans, the Gnostics, the Ebionites, the Marcionites, and the votaries of the other eighty heresies,¹⁶ all of whom draw their proofs from the pure well of the Scriptures, not, however, interpreting it in the sense in which it is written, but trying to make the simple language of the Church's writers accord with their own wishes.

5. Of one position which he strives to maintain I hardly know whether it calls for my tears or my laughter. This wonderful doctor presumes to teach that the devil will once more be what he at one time was, that he will return to his former dignity and rise again to the kingdom of heaven. Oh horror! that a man should be so frantic and foolish as to hold that John the Baptist, Peter, the apostle and evangelist John, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the rest of the prophets, are made co-heirs of the devil in the kingdom of heaven! I pass over his idle explanation of the coats of skins, [In his note on Gen. 3:21] and say nothing of the efforts and arguments he has used to induce us to believe that these coats of skins represent human bodies. Among many other things, he says this: "Was God a tanner or a saddler, that He should prepare the hides of animals, and should stitch from them coats of skins for Adam and Eve?" "It is clear," he goes on, "that he is speaking of human bodies." If this is so, how is it that before the coats of skins, and the disobedience, and the fall from paradise, Adam speaks not in an allegory, but literally, thus: "This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh;" [Gen. 2:23] or what is the ground of the divine narrative, "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept; and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; and the rib which the Lord God had taken from man, made He a woman" [Gen. 2:21, Gen. 2:22] for him? Or what bodies can Adam and Eve have covered with fig-leaves after eating of the forbidden tree? [Gen. 3:7] Who can patiently listen to the perilous arguments of Origen when he denies the resurrection of this flesh, as he most clearly does in his book of explanations of the first psalm and in many other places? Or who can tolerate him when he gives us a paradise in the third heaven, and transfers that which the Scripture mentions from earth to the heavenly places, and when he explains allegorically all the trees which are mentioned in Genesis, saying in effect that the trees are angelic potencies, a sense which the true drift of the passage does not admit? For the divine Scripture has not said, "God put down Adam and Eve upon the earth," but "He drove them out of the paradise, and made them dwell over against the paradise." [Gen. 3:23, LXX] He does not say "under the paradise." "He placed ...cherubims and a flaming sword ...to keep the way of¹⁷ the tree of life." [Gen. 3:24] He says nothing about an ascent to it. "And a river went out of Eden." [Gen. 2:10] He does not say "went down from Eden." "It was parted and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison ...and the name of the second is Gihon." [Gen. 2:10, Gen. 2:11, Gen. 2:13] I myself have seen the waters of Gihon, have seen them with my bodily eyes. It is this Gihon to which Jeremiah points when he says, "What hast thou to do in the way of Egypt to drink the muddy water of Gihon?" [Jer. 2:18, LXX. and Vulg] I have drunk also from the great river Euphrates, not spiritual but actual water, such as you can touch with your hand and imbibe with your mouth. But where there are rivers which admit of being seen and of being drunk, it follows that there also there will be fig-trees and other trees; and it is of these that the Lord says, "Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat." [Gen. 2:16] They are like other trees and timber, just as the rivers are like other rivers and waters. But if the water is visible and real, then the fig-tree and the rest of the timber must be real also, and Adam and Eve must have been originally formed with real and not phantasmal bodies, and not, as Origen would have us believe, have afterwards received them on account of their sin. But, you say, "we read that Saint Paul was caught up to the third heaven, into paradise."¹⁸ You explain the words rightly: "When he mentions the third heaven, and then adds the word paradise, he shows that heaven is in one place and paradise in another." Must not every one reject and despise such special pleading as that by which Origen says of the waters that are above the firmament [In his note on Gen. 1:7] that they are not waters, but heroic beings of angelic power,¹⁹ and again of the waters that are over the earth-that is, below the firmament-that they are potencies²⁰ of the contrary sort-that is, demons? If so, why do we read in the account of the deluge that the windows of heaven were opened, and that the waters of the deluge prevailed? in consequence of which the fountains of the deep were opened, and the whole earth was covered with the waters. [Gen. 7:11]

6. Oh! the madness and folly of those who have forsaken the teaching of the book of Proverbs, "My son, keep thy father's commandment, and forsake not the law of thy mother," [Prov. 6:20] and have turned to error, and say to the fool that he shall be their leader, and do not despise the foolish things which are said by the foolish man, even as the scripture bears witness, "The foolish man speaketh foolishly, and his heart understandeth vanity." [Isa. 32:6, Vulg] I beseech you, dearly beloved, and by the love which I feel towards you, I implore you-as though it were my own members on which I would have pity²¹ -by word and letter to fulfil that which is written, "Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee?" [Ps. 139:21] Origen's words are the words of an enemy, hateful and repugnant to God and to His saints; and not only those which I have quoted, but countless others. For it is not now my intention to argue against all his opinions. Origen has not lived in my day, nor has he robbed me. I have not conceived a dislike to him nor quarrelled with him because of an inheritance or of any worldly matter; but-to speak plainly-I grieve, and grieve bitterly, to see numbers of my brothers, and of those in particular who show the most promise, and have reached the highest rank in the sacred ministry,²² deceived by his persuasive arguments, and made by his most perverse teaching the food of the devil, whereby the saying is fulfilled: "He derides every stronghold, and his fare is choice, and he hath gathered captives as the sand." [Hab. 1:10, 16, 9, LXX] But may God free you, my brother, and the holy people of Christ which is intrusted to you, and all the brothers who are with you, and especially the presbyter Rufinus, from the heresy of Origen, and other heresies, and from the perdition to which they lead. For, if for one word or for two opposed to the faith many heresies have been rejected by the Church, how much more shall he be held a heretic who has contrived such perverse interpretations and such mischievous doctrines to destroy the faith, and has in fact declared himself the enemy of the Church! For, among other wicked things, he has presumed to say this, too, that Adam lost the image of God, although Scripture nowhere declares that he did. Were it so, never would all the creatures in the world be subject to Adam's seed-that is, to the entire human race; yet, in the words of the apostle, everything "is tamed and hath been tamed of mankind." [Jas. 3:7] For never would all things be subjected to men if men had not-together with their authority over all-the image of God. But the divine Scripture conjoins and associates with this the grace of the blessing which was conferred upon Adam and upon the generations which descended from him. No one can by twisting the meaning of words presume to say that this grace of God was given to one only, and that he alone was made in the image of God (he and his wife, that is, for while he was formed of clay she was made of one of his ribs), but that those who were subsequently conceived in the womb and not born as was Adam did not possess God's image, for the Scripture immediately subjoins the following statement: "And Adam lived two hundred and thirty years,²³ and knew Eve his wife, and she bare him a son in his image and after his likeness, and called his name Seth."²⁴ And again, in the tenth generation, two thousand two hundred and forty-two years afterwards,²⁵ God, to vindicate His own image and to show that the grace which He had given to men still continued in them, gives the following commandment: "Flesh ...with the blood thereof shall ye not eat. And surely your blood will I require at the hand of every man that sheddeth it; for in the image of God have I made man."²⁶ From Noah to Abraham ten generations passed away, [Gen. 11:10-26] and from Abraham's time to David's, fourteen more, [Matt. 1:17] and these twenty-four generations make up, taken together, two thousand one hundred and seventeen years.²⁷ Yet the Holy Spirit in the thirty-ninth²⁸ psalm, while lamenting that all men walk in a vain show, and that they are subject to sins, speaks thus: "For all that every man walk eth in the image."²⁹ Also after David's time, in the reign of Solomon his son, we read a somewhat similar reference to the divine likeness. For in the book of Wisdom, which is inscribed with his name, Solomon says: "God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of His own eternity." [Wisd. 2:23] And again, about eleven hundred and eleven years afterwards, we read in the New Testament that men have not lost the image of God. For James, an apostle and brother of the Lord, whom I have mentioned above-that we may not be entangled in the snares of Origen-teaches us that man does possess God's image and likeness. For, after a somewhat discursive account of the human tongue, he has gone on to say of it: "It is an unruly evil ...therewith bless we God, even the Father and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God." [Jas. 3:8, 9] Paul, too, the "chosen vessel," [Acts. 9:15] who in his preaching has fully maintained the doctrine of the gospel, instructs us that man is made in the image and after the likeness of God. "A man," he says, "ought not to wear long hair, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God." [1 Cor. 11:7] He speaks of "the image" simply, but explains the nature of the likeness by the word "glory."

7. Instead of the three proofs from Holy Scripture which you said would satisfy you if I could produce them, behold I have given you seven. Who, then, will put up with the follies of Origen? I will not use a severer word and so make myself like him or his followers, who presume at the peril of their soul to assert dogmatically whatever first comes into their head, and to dictate to God, whereas they ought either to pray to Him or to learn the truth from Him. For some of them say that the image of God which Adam had previously received was lost when he sinned. Others surmise that the body which the Son of God was destined to take of Mary was the image of the Creator. Some identify this image with the soul, others with sensation, others with virtue. These make it baptism, those assert that it is in virtue of God's image that man exercises universal sway. Like drunkards in their cups, they ejaculate now this, now that, when they ought rather to have avoided so serious a risk, and to have obtained salvation by simple faith, not denying the words of God. To God they ought to have left the sure and exact knowledge of His own gift, and of the particular way in which He has created men in His image and after His likeness. Forsaking this course, they have involved themselves in many subtle questions, and through these they have been plunged into the mire of sin. But we, dearly beloved, believe the words of the Lord, and know that God's image remains in all men, and we leave it to Him to know in what respect man is created in His image. And let no one be deceived by that passage in the epistle of John, which some readers fail to understand, where he says: "Now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall See Him as He is." [1 John. 3:2] For this refers to the glory which is then to be revealed [1 Pet. 5:1] to His saints; just as also in another place we read the words "from glory to glory," [2 Cor. 3:18] of which glory the saints have even in this world received an earnest and a small portion. At their head stands Moses, whose face shone exceedingly, and was bright with the brightness of the sun. [Exod. 34:29 sqq.; 2 Cor. 3:7] Next to him comes Elijah, who was caught up into heaven in a chariot of fire, [2 Kings 2:11] and did not feel the effects of the flame. Stephen, too, when he was being stoned, had the face of an angel visible to all. [Acts 6:15] And this which we have verified in a few cases is to be understood of all, that what is written may be fulfilled. "Every one that sanctifieth himself shall be numbered among the blessed." For, "blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." [Matt. 5:8]

8. These things being so, dearly beloved, keep watch over your own soul and cease to murmur against me. For the divine Scripture says: "Neither murmur ye [one against another³⁰] as some of them also murmured, and were destroyed of serpents." [1 Cor. 10:10] Rather give way to the truth and love me who love both you and the truth. And may the God of peace, according to His mercy, grant to us that Satan may be bruised under the feet of Christians, [Rom. 16:20] and that every occasion of evil may be shunned, so that the bond of love and peace may not be rent asunder between us, or the preaching of the right faith be anywise hindered.

9. Moreover, I have heard that certain persons have this grievance against me: When I accompanied you to the holy place called Bethel, there to join you in celebrating the Collect,³¹ after the use of the Church, I came to a villa called Anablatha and, as I was passing, saw a lamp burning there. Asking what place it was, and learning it to be a church, I went in to pray, and found there a curtain hanging on the doors of the said church, dyed and embroidered.³² It bore an image either of Christ or of one of the saints; I do not rightly remember whose the image was. Seeing this, and being loth that an image of a man should be hung up in Christ's church contrary to the teaching of the Scriptures, I tore it asunder and advised the custodians of the place to use it as a winding sheet for some poor person. They, however, murmured, and said that if I made up my mind to tear it, it was only fair that I should give them another curtain in its place. As soon as I heard this, I promised that I would give one, and said that I would send it at once. Since then there has been some little delay, due to the fact that I have been seeking a curtain of the best quality to give to them instead of the former one, and thought it right to send to Cyprus for one. I have now sent the best that I could find, and I beg that you will order the presbyter of the place to take the curtain which I have sent from the hands of the Reader, and that you will afterwards give directions that curtains of the other sort-opposed as they are to our religion-shall not be hung up in any church of Christ. A than of your uprightness should be careful to remove an occasion of offence³³ unworthy alike of the Church of Christ and of those Christians who are committed to your charge. Beware of Palladius of Galatia-a man once dear to me, but who now sorely needs God's pity-for he preaches and teaches the heresy of Origen; and see to it that he does not seduce any of those who are intrusted to your keeping into the perverse ways of his erroneous doctrine. I pray that you may fare well in the Lord.

1:

A play on words. Clericatus ("clerical position") is a derivative of clerus (klhroj), the word used in the LXX. for "lot.

2:

Paulinian, Jerome's brother, at this time about 28 years of age

3:

I.e. the short service which preceded the eucharist. The words might, however, be rendered, "When the congregation was gathered together.

4: Subdeacons cannot be traced back earlier than the third century. At first their province seems to have been to keep the church doors during divine service 5: It seems to be implied that John had done so 6: That is, Origenistic heresies

7:

Epiphanius, on a visit to Jerusalem, had preached against Origenism in the presence of John. See "Ag. John of Jerus.," §11

8:

John actually did write to Theophilus of Alexandria giving a full account of the controversy from his (John's) point of view. (Ag. J. of Jerus., §37.

9: yuxai apo tou yuxesqai. The etymology is right, but the explanation of it wrong 10: demaj as if from dew, "I bind.

11:

ptwma, from piptein: cadaver, from cado

12:

swma

13: shma 14: Ps. 119:67. From memory, or perhaps from the old Latin version 15: Ps. 116:9. This form of the verse is peculiar to Jerome 16: Epiphanius had written a book "against all the heresies.

17: Introitus 18: 2 Cor. xii 2, 2 Cor. xii 4 19: Fortitudines angelicae potestatis

20: Virtues 21: Cf. Philem. 12

22: Sacerdotium 23: LXX. The Heb. text which A.V. follows gives "an hundred and thirty years.

24: Gen. 4:25; Gen. 5:3; Gen. 1:26 25: According to the LXX. The chronology of the Hebrew text gives a period of 1656 years (Gen. v.) 26: Gen. 9:4-6; substantially as in A.V 27: This calculation appears to be based on the LXX 28: Acc. to the Vulg., which Jerome here follows, the thirty-eighth 29: Ps. 39, 6. "In a vain show," R.V 30: Words added by this writer 31: See note on above 32: Velum ...tinctum atque depictum 33: Scrupulositas

Letters - letter_052

Letter 52. To Nepotian.

Nepotian, the nephew of Heliodorus (for whom see Letter 14.), had, like his uncle, abandoned the military for the clerical calling, and was now a presbyter at Altinum, where Heliodorus was bishop. The letter is a systematic treatise on the duties of the clergy and on the rule of life which they ought to adopt. It had a great vogue, and called forth much indignation against Jerome. Its date is 394 a.d.

1. Again and again you ask me, my dear Nepotian, in your letters from over the sea, to draw for you a few rules of life, showing how one who has renounced the service of the world to become a monk or a clergyman may keep the straight path of Christ, and not be drawn aside into the haunts of vice. As a young man, or rather as a boy, and while I was curbing by the hard life of the desert the first onslaughts of youthful passion, I sent a letter of remonstrance¹ to your reverend uncle, Heliodorus, which, by the tears and complainings with which it was filled, showed him the feelings of the friend whom he had deserted. In it I acted the part suited to my age, and as I was still aglow with the methods and maxims of the rhetoricians, I decked it out a good deal with the flourishes of the schools. Now, however, my head is gray, my brow is furrowed, a dewlap like that of an ox hangs from my chin, and, as Virgil says, "The chilly blood stands still around my heart."² Elsewhere he sings:

"Old age bears all, even the mind, away." And a little further on:

"So many of my songs are gone from me,

And even my very voice has left me now." [Virgil, Ec. 9:51, 54, 55]

2. But that I may not seem to quote only profane literature, listen to the mystical teaching of the sacred writings. Once David had been a man of war, but at seventy age had chilled him so that nothing would make him warm. A girl is accordingly sought from the coasts of Israel—Abishag the Shunamite—to sleep with the king and warm his aged frame. [1 K. 1:1-4] Does it not seem to you—if you keep to the letter that killeth [2 Cor. 3:6]—like some farcical story or some broad jest from an Atellan play?³ A chilly old man is wrapped up in blankets, and only grows warm in a girl's embrace. Bathsheba was still living, Abigail was still left, and the remainder of those wives and concubines whose names the Scripture mentions. Yet they are all rejected as cold, and only in the one young girl's embrace does the old man become warm. Abraham was far older than David; still, so long as Sarah lived he sought no other wife. Isaac counted twice the years of David, yet never felt cold with Rebekah, old though she was. I say nothing of the antediluvians, who, although after nine hundred years their limbs must have been not old merely, but decayed with age, had no recourse to girls' embraces. Moses, the leader of the Israelites, counted one hundred and twenty years, yet sought no change from Zipporah.

3. Who, then, is this Shunamite, this wife and maid, so glowing as to warm the cold, yet so holy as not to arouse passion in him whom she warmed? [1 K. 1:4] Let Solomon, wisest of men, tell us of his father's favorite; let the man of peace⁴ recount to us the embraces of the man of war. [1 Chr. 28:3] "Get wisdom," he writes, "get understanding: forget it not; neither decline from the words of my mouth. Forsake her not and she shall preserve thee: love her and she shall keep thee. Wisdom is the principal thing, therefore get wisdom, and with all thy getting get understanding. Exalt her and she shall promote thee. She shall bring thee to honor when thou dost embrace her. She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee." [Prov. 4:5-9]

Almost all bodily excellences alter with age, and while wisdom alone increases all things else decay. Fasts and vigils and almsdeeds become harder. So also do sleeping on the ground, moving from place to place, hospitality to travellers, pleading for the poor, earnestness and steadfastness in prayer, the visitation of the sick, manual labor to supply money for alms-giving. All acts, in short, of which the body is the medium decrease with its decay.

Now, there are young men still full of life and vigor who, by toil and burning zeal, as well as by holiness of life and constant prayer to the Lord Jesus, have obtained knowledge. I do not speak of these, or say that in them the love of wisdom is cold, for this withers in many of the old by reason of age. What I mean is that youth, as such, has to cope with the assaults of passion, and amid the allurements of vice and the tinglings of the flesh is stifled like a fire among green boughs, and cannot develop its proper brightness. But when men have employed their youth in commendable pursuits and have meditated on the law of the Lord day and night, [Ps. 1:2] they learn with the lapse of time, fresh experience and wisdom come as the years go by, and so from the pursuits of the past their old age reaps a harvest of delight. Hence that wise man of Greece, Themistocles,⁵ perceiving, after the expiration of one hundred and seven years, that he was on the verge of the grave, is reported to have said that he regretted extremely having to leave life just when he was beginning to grow wise. Plato died in his eighty-first year, his pen still in his hand. Isocrates completed ninety years and nine in the midst of literary and scholastic work.⁶ I say nothing of other philosophers, such as Pythagoras, Democritus, Xenocrates, Zeno, and Cleanthes, who in extreme old age displayed the vigor of youth in the pursuit of wisdom. I pass on to the poets, Homer, Hesiod, Simonides, Stesichorus, who all lived to a great age, yet at the approach of death sang each of them a swan song sweeter than their wont.⁷ Sophocles, when charged by his sons with dotage on account of his advanced years and his neglect of his property, read out to his judges his recently composed play of Oedipus, and made so great a display of wisdom-in spite of the inroads of time-that he changed the decorous silence of the law court into the applause of the theatre.⁸ And no wonder, when Cato the censor, that most eloquent of Romans, in his old age neither blushed at the thought of learning Greek nor despaired of succeeding.⁹ Homer, for his part, relates that from the tongue of Nestor, even when quite aged and helpless, there flowed speech sweeter than honey.¹⁰

Even the very name Abishag in its mystic meaning points to the greater wisdom of old men. For the translation of it is, "My father is over and above," or "my father's roaring." The term "over and above" is obscure, but in this passage is indicative of excellence, and implies that the old have a larger stock of wisdom, and that it even overflows by reason of its abundance. In another passage "over and above" forms an antithesis to "necessary." Moreover, Abishag, that is, "roaring," is properly used of the sound which the waves make, and of the murmur which we hear coming from the sea. From which it is plain that the thunder of the divine voice dwells in old men's ears with a volume of sound beyond the voices of men. Again, in our tongue Shunamite means "scarlet," a hint that the love of wisdom becomes warm and glowing through religious study. For though the color may point to the mystery of the Lord's blood, it also sets forth the warm glow of wisdom. Hence it is a scarlet thread that in Genesis the midwife binds upon the hand of Pharez-Pharez "the divider," so called because he divided the partition which had before separated two peoples. [Gen. 38:28, Gen. 38:29] So, too, with a mystic reference to the shedding of blood, it was a scarlet cord which the harlot Rahab (a type of the church) hung in her window to preserve her house in the destruction of Jericho. [Josh. 2:18] Hence, in another place Scripture says of holy men: "These are they which came from the warmth of the house of the father of Rechab." [1 Chron. 2:55, Vulg] And in the gospel the Lord says: "I am come to cast fire upon the earth, and fain am I to see it kindled." [Luke 12:49] This was the fire which, when it was kindled in the disciples' hearts, constrained them to say: "Did not our heart burn within us while He talked with us by the way, and while He opened to us the Scriptures?" [Luke 24:32]

4. To what end, you ask, these recondite references? To show that you need not expect from me boyish declamation, flowery sentiments, a meretricious style, and at the close of every paragraph the terse and pointed aphorisms which call forth approving shouts from those who hear them. Let Wisdom alone embrace me; let her nestle in my bosom, my Abishag who grows not old. Undeified truly is she, and a virgin forever for although she daily conceives and unceasingly brings to the birth, like Mary she remains undeflowered. When the apostle says "be fervent in spirit," [Rom. 12:11] he means "be true to wisdom." And when our Lord in the gospel declares that in the end of the world-when the shepherd shall grow foolish, according to the prophecy of Zechariah [Zech. 11:15] -"the love of many shall wax cold," [Matt. 24:12] He means that wisdom shall decay. Hear, therefore-to quote the sainted Cyprian-"words forcible rather than elegant."¹¹ Hear one who, though he is your brother in orders, is in years your father; who can conduct you from the cradle of faith to spiritual manhood; and who, while he builds up stage by stage the rules of holy living, can instruct others in instructing you. I know, of course, that from your reverend uncle, Heliodorus, now a bishop of Christ, you have learned and are daily learning all that is holy; and that in him you have before you a rule of life and a pattern of virtue. Take, then, my suggestions for what they are worth, and compare my precepts with his. He will teach you the perfection of a monk, and I shall show you the whole duty of a clergyman.

5. A clergyman, then, as he serves Christ's church, must first understand what his name means; and then, when he realizes this, must endeavor to be that which he is called. For since the Greek word "κληρονομία" means "lot," or "inheritance," the clergy are so called either because they are the lot of the Lord, or else because the Lord Himself is their lot and portion. Now, he who in his own person is the Lord's portion, or has the Lord for his portion, must so bear himself as to possess the Lord and to be possessed by Him. He who possesses the Lord, and who says with the prophet, "The Lord is my portion," [Pss. 16:5; Pss. 73:26] can hold to nothing beside the Lord. For if he hold to something beside the Lord, the Lord will not be his portion. Suppose, for instance, that he holds to gold or silver, or possessions or inlaid furniture; with such portions as these the Lord will not deign to be his portion. I, if I am the portion of the Lord, and the line of His heritage, [Ps. 16:5, Ps. 16:6] receive no portion among the remaining tribes; but, like the Priest and the Levite, I live on the tithe, [Nu. 18:24] and serving the altar, am supported by its offerings. [1 Cor. 9:13] Having food and raiment, I shall be content with these, [1 Tim. 6:8] and as a disciple of the Cross shall share its poverty. I beseech you, therefore, and "Again and yet again admonish you;"¹² do not look to your military experience for a standard of clerical obligation. Under Christ's banner seek for no worldly gain, lest having more than when you first became a clergyman, you hear men say, to your shame, "Their portion shall not profit them."¹³ Welcome poor men and strangers to your homely board, that with them Christ may be your guest. A clergyman who engages in business, and who rises from poverty to wealth, and from obscurity to a high position, avoid as you would the plague. For "evil communications corrupt good manners." [1 Cor. 15:33] You despise gold; he loves it. You spurn wealth; he eagerly pursues it. You love silence, meekness, privacy; he takes delight in talking and effrontery, in squares, and streets, and apothecaries' shops. What unity of feeling can there be where there is so wide a divergency of manners? A woman's foot should seldom, if ever, cross the threshold of your home. To all who are Christ's virgins show the same regard or the same disregard. Do not linger under the same roof with them, and do not rely on your past continence. You cannot be holier than David or wiser than Solomon. Always bear in mind that it was a woman who expelled the tiller of paradise from his heritage.¹⁴ In case you are sick one of the brethren may attend you; your sister also or your mother or some woman whose faith is approved with all. But if you have no persons so connected with you or so marked out by chaste behaviour, the Church maintains many elderly women who by their ministrations may oblige you and benefit themselves so that even your sickness may bear fruit in the shape of almsdeeds. I know of cases where the recovery of the body has but precluded the sickness of the soul. There is danger for you in the service of one for whose face you constantly watch. If in the course of your clerical duty you have to visit a widow or a virgin, never enter the house alone. Let your companions be persons association with whom will not disgrace you. If you take a reader with you or an acolyte or a psalm-singer, let their character not their garb be their adornment; let them use no tongs to curl their hair; rather let their mien be an index of their chastity. You must not sit alone with a woman or see one without witnesses. If she has anything confidential to disclose, she is sure to have some nurse or housekeeper,¹⁵ some virgin, some widow, some married woman. She cannot be so friendless as to have none save you to whom she can venture to confide her secret. Beware of all that gives occasion for suspicion; and, to avoid scandal, shun every act that may give colour to it. Frequent gifts of handkerchiefs and garters, of face-cloths and dishes first tasted by the giver—to say nothing of notes full of fond expressions—of such things as these a holy love knows nothing. Such endearing and alluring expressions as 'my honey' and 'my darling,' 'you who are all my charm and my delight' the ridiculous courtesies of lovers and their foolish doings, we blush for on the stage and abhor in men of the world. How much more do we loathe them in monks and clergymen who adorn the priesthood by their vows¹⁶ while their vows are adorned by the priesthood. I speak thus not because I dread such evils for you or for men of saintly life, but because in all ranks and callings and among both men and women there are found both good and bad and in condemning the bad I commend the good.

6. Shameful to say, idol-priests, play-actors, jockeys, and prostitutes can inherit property: clergymen and monks alone lie under a legal disability, a disability enacted not by persecutors but by Christian emperors.¹⁷ I do not complain of the law, but I grieve that we have deserved a statute so harsh. Cauterizing is a good thing, no doubt; but how is it that I have a wound which makes me need it? The law is strict and far-seeing, yet even so rapacity goes on unchecked. By a fiction of trusteeship we set the statute at defiance; and, as if imperial decrees outweigh the mandates of Christ, we fear the laws and despise the Gospels. If heir there must be, the mother has first claim upon her children, the Church upon her flock-the members of which she has borne and reared and nourished. Why do we thrust ourselves in between mother and children?

It is the glory of a bishop to make provision for the wants of the poor; but it is the shame of all priests to amass private fortunes. I who was born (suppose) in a poor man's house, in a country cottage, and who could scarcely get of common millet and household bread enough to fill an empty stomach, am now come to disdain the finest wheat flour and honey. I know the several kinds of fish by name. I can tell unerringly on what coast a mussel has been picked. I can distinguish by the flavour the province from which a bird comes. Dainty dishes delight me because their ingredients are scarce and I end by finding pleasure in their ruinous cost.

I hear also of servile attention shewn by some towards old men and women when these are childless. They fetch the basin, beset the bed and perform with their own hands the most revolting offices. They anxiously await the advent of the doctor and with trembling lips they ask whether the patient is better. If for a little while the old fellow shews signs of returning vigour, they are in agonies. They pretend to be delighted, but their covetous hearts undergo secret torture. For they are afraid that their labours may go for nothing and compare an old man with a clinging to life to the patriarch Methuselah. How great a reward might they have with God if their hearts were not set on a temporal prize! With what great exertions do they pursue an empty heritage! Less labour might have purchased for them the pearl of Christ.

7. Read the divine scriptures constantly; never, indeed, let the sacred volume be out of your hand. Learn what you have to teach. "Hold fast the faithful word as you have been taught that you may be able by sound doctrine to exhort and convince the gainsayers. Continue thou in the things that thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them;" [Titus, 1:9; 2 Tim. 3:14] and "be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope and faith that are in you." [1 Pet. 3:15] Do not let your deeds belie your words; lest when you speak in church someone may mentally reply "Why do you not practise what you profess? Here is a lover of dainties turned censor! his stomach is full and he reads us a homily on fasting. As well might a robber accuse others of covetousness." In a priest of Christ mouth mind, and hand should be at one. Be obedient to your bishop and welcome him as the parent of your soul. Sons love their fathers and slaves fear their masters. "If I be a father," He says, "where is mine honour? And if I am a master where is my fear?" [Mal. 1:6] in your case the bishop combines in himself many titles to your respect. He is at once a monk, a prelate, and an uncle who has before now instructed you in all holy things. This also I say that the bishops should know themselves to be priests not lords. Let them render to the clergy the honour which is their due that the clergy may offer to them the respect which belongs to bishops. There is a witty saying of the orator Domitius which is here to the point: "Why am I to recognize you as leader of the Senate when you will not recognize my rights as a private member?" [Cicero, de Orat. 3:1] We should realize that a bishop and his presbyters are like Aaron and his sons. As there is but one Lord and one Temple; so also should there be but one ministry. Let us ever bear in mind the charge which the apostle Peter gives to priests: "feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof not by constraint but willingly as God would have you;18 not for filthy lucre but of a ready mind; neither as being lords over God's heritage but being ensamples to the flock," and that gladly; that "when the chief-shepherd shall appear ye may receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away." [1 Pet. 5:4] It is a bad custom which prevails in certain churches for presbyters to be silent when bishops are present on the ground that they would be jealous or impatient hearers. "If anything," writes the apostle Paul, "be revealed to another that sitteth by, let the first hold his peace. For ye may all prophesy one by one that all may learn and all may be comforted; and the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. For God is not the author of confusion but of peace." [1 Cor. 14:30-33] "A wise son maketh a glad father;" [Prov. 10:1] and a bishop should rejoice in the discrimination which has led him to choose such for the priests of Christ.

8. When teaching in church seek to call forth not plaudits but groans. Let the tears of your hearers be your glory. A presbyter's words ought to be seasoned by his reading of scripture. Be not a declaimer or a ranter, one who gabbles without rhyme or reason; but shew yourself skilled in the deep things and versed in the mysteries of God. To mouth your words and by your quickness of utterance astonish the unlettered crowd is a mark of ignorance. Assurance often explains that of which it knows nothing; and when it has convinced others imposes on itself. My teacher, Gregory of Nazianzus, when I once asked him to explain Luke's phrase "σ■ββατον δευτερ■πρωτον", that is "the second-first Sabbath," playfully evaded my request saying: "I will tell you about it in church, and there, when all the people applaud me, you will be forced against your will to know what you do not know at all. For, if you alone remain silent, every one will put you down for a fool." There is nothing so easy as by sheer volubility to deceive a common crowd or an uneducated congregation: such most admire what they fail to understand. Hear Marcus Tullius, the subject of that noble eulogy: "You would have been the first of orators but for Demosthenes: he would have been the only one but for you." Hear what in his speech for Quintus Gallius¹⁹ he has to say about unskilled speakers and popular applause and then you will not be the sport of such illusions. "What I am telling you," said he, "is a recent experience of my own. One who has the name of a poet and a man of culture has written a book entitled Conversations of Poets and Philosophers. In this he represents Euripides as conversing with Menander and Socrates with Epicurus-men whose lives we know to be separated not by years but by centuries. Nevertheless he calls forth limitless applause and endless acclamations. For the theatre contains many who belong to the same school as he: like him they have never learned letters."

9. In dress avoid sombre colours as much as bright ones. Showiness and slovenliness are alike to be shunned; for the one savours of vanity and the other of pride. To go about without a linen scarf on is nothing: what is praiseworthy is to be without money to buy one. It is disgraceful and absurd to boast of having neither napkin nor handkerchief and let to carry a well-filled purse.

Some bestow a trifle on the poor to receive a larger sum themselves and under the cloak of almsgiving do but seek for riches. Such are almshunters rather than almsgivers. Their methods are those by which birds, beasts, and fishes are taken. A morsel of bait is put on the hook-to land a married lady's purse! The church is committed to the bishop; let him take heed whom he appoints to be his almoner. It is better for me to have no money to give away than shamelessly to beg what I mean to hoard. It is arrogance too to wish to seem more liberal than he who is Christ's bishop. "All things are not open to us all."²⁰ In the church one is the eye, another is the tongue, another the hand, another the foot, others ears, belly, and so on. Read Paul's epistle to the Corinthians and learn how the one body is made up of different members. [1 Cor. 12:12-27] The rude and simple brother must not suppose himself a saint just because he knows nothing; and he who is educated and eloquent must not measure his saintliness merely by his fluency. Of two imperfect things holy rusticity is better than sinful eloquence.

10. Many build churches nowadays; their walls and pillars of glowing marble, their ceilings glittering with gold, their altars studded with jewels. Yet to the choice of Christ's ministers no heed is paid, And let no one allege against me the wealth of the temple in Judaea, its table, its lamps, its censers, its dishes, its cups, its spoons, [Mortariola. See Nu. 7:24, Vulg] and the rest of its golden vessels. If these were approved by the Lord it was at a time when the priests had to offer victims and when the blood of sheep was the redemption of sins. They were figures typifying things still future and were "written for our admonition upon whom the ends of the world are come." [1 Cor. 10:11] But now our Lord by His poverty has consecrated the poverty of His house. Let us, therefore, think of His cross and count riches to be but dirt. Why do we admire what Christ calls "the mammon of unrighteousness"? [Luke 16:9] Why do we cherish and love what it is Peter's boast not to possess? [Acts 3:6] Or if we insist on keeping to the letter and find the mention of gold and wealth so pleasing, let us keep to everything else as well as the gold. Let the bishops of Christ be bound to marry wives, who must be virgins. [Levit. 21:14] Let the best-intentioned priest be deprived of his office if he bear a scar and be disfigured. [Levit. 21:17-23] Let bodily leprosy be counted worse than spots upon the soul. Let us be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, [Gen. 1:28] but let us slay no lamb and celebrate no mystic passover, for where there is no temple, [Deut. 16:5] the law forbids these acts. Let us pitch tents in the seventh month [Levit. 23:40-42] and noise abroad a solemn fast with the sound of a horn. [Joel 2:15] But if we compare all these things as spiritual with things which are spiritual; [1 Cor. 2:13] and if we allow with Paul that "the Law is spiritual" [Rom. 7:14] and call to mind David's words: "open thou mine eyes that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law;" [Ps. 119:18] and if on these grounds we interpret it as our Lord interprets it-He has explained the Sabbath in this way: [Matt. 12:1-9] then, rejecting the superstitions of the Jews, we must also reject the gold; or, approving the gold, we must approve the Jews as well. For we must either accept them with the gold or condemn them with it.

11. Avoid entertaining men of the world, especially those whose honours make them swell with pride. You are the priest of Christ-one poor and crucified who lived on the bread of strangers. It is a disgrace to you if the consul's lictors or soldiers keep watch before your door, and if the Judge of the province has a better dinner with you than in his own palace. If you plead as an excuse your wish to intercede for the unhappy and the oppressed, I reply that a worldly judge will defer more to a clergyman who is self-denying than to one who is rich; he will pay more regard to your holiness than to your wealth. Or if he is a man who will not hear the clergy on behalf of the distressed except over the bowl, I will readily forego his aid and will appeal to Christ who can help more effectively and speedily than any judge. Truly "it is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in man. It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes." [Ps. 118:8, Ps. 118:9]

Let your breath never smell of wine lest the philosopher's words be said to you: "instead of offering me a kiss you are giving me a taste of wine." Priests given to wine are both condemned by the apostle [1 Tim. 3:3] and forbidden by the old Law. Those who serve the altar, we are told, must drink neither wine nor shechar.²¹ Now every intoxicating drink is in Hebrew called shechar whether it is made of corn or of the juice of apples, whether you distil from the honeycomb a rude kind of mead or make a liquor by squeezing dates or strain a thick syrup from a decoction of corn. Whatever intoxicates and disturbs the balance of the mind avoid as you would wine. I do not say that we are to condemn what is a creature of God. The Lord Himself was called a "wine-bibber" and wine in moderation was allowed to Timothy because of his weak stomach. I only require that drinkers should observe that limit which their age, their health, or their constitution requires. But if without drinking wine at all I am aglow with youth and am inflamed by the heat of my blood and am of a strong and lusty habit of body, I will readily forego the cup in which I cannot but suspect poison. The Greeks have an excellent saying which will perhaps bear translation, Fat bellies have no sentiments refined.²²

12. Lay upon yourself only as much fasting as you can bear, and let your fasts be pure, chaste, simple, moderate, and not superstitious. What good is it to use no oil if you seek after the most troublesome and out-of-the-way kinds of food, dried figs, pepper, nuts, dates, fine flour, honey, pistachios? All the resources of gardening are strained to save us from eating household bread; and to pursue dainties we turn our backs on the kingdom of heaven. There are some, I am told, who reverse the laws of nature and the race; for they neither eat bread nor drink water but imbibe thin decoctions of crushed herbs and beet-juice-not from a cup but from a shell. Shame on us that we have no blushes for such follies and that we feel no disgust at such superstition! To crown all, in the midst of our dainties we seek a reputation for abstinence. The strictest fast is bread and water. But because it brings with it no glory and because we all of us live on bread and water, it is reckoned no fast at all but an ordinary and common matter.

13. Do not angle for compliments, lest, while you win the popular applause, you do despite to God. "If I yet pleased men," says the apostle, "I should not be the servant of Christ." [Gal. 1:10] He ceased to please men when he became Christ's servant Christ's soldier marches on through good report and evil report, [2 Cor. 6:8] the one on the right hand and the other on the left. No praise elates him, no reproaches crush him. He is not puffed up by riches, nor does he shrink into himself because of poverty. Joy and sorrow he alike despises. The sun does not burn him by day nor the moon by night. [Ps. 121:6] Do not pray at the corners of the streets, [Matt. 6:5] lest the applause of men interrupt the straight course of your prayers. Do not broaden your fringes and for show wear phylacteries, [Matt. 23:5] or, despite of conscience, wrap yourself in the self-seeking of the Pharisee.²³ Would you know what mode of apparel the Lord requires? Have prudence, justice, temperance, fortitude.²⁴ Let these be the four quarters of your horizon, let them be a four-horse team to bear you, Christ's charioteer, at full speed to your goal. No necklace can be more precious than these; no gems can form a brighter galaxy. By them you are decorated, you are girt about, you are protected on every side. They are your defence as well as your glory; for every gem is turned into a shield.

14. Beware also of a blabbing tongue and of itching ears. Neither detract from others nor listen to detractors. "Thou sittest," says the psalmist, "and speakest against thy brother; thou slanderest thine own mother's son. These things hast thou done and I kept silence; thou thoughtest wickedly that I was such an one as thyself, but I will reprove thee and set them²⁵ in order before thine eyes." [Ps. 50:20, Ps. 50:21] Keep your tongue from cavilling and watch over your words. Know that in judging others you are passing sentence on yourself and that you are yourself guilty of the faults which you blame in them. It is no excuse to say: "if others tell me things I cannot be rude to them." No one cares to speak to an unwilling listener. An arrow never lodges in a stone: often it recoils upon the shooter of it. Let the detractor learn from your unwillingness to listen not to be so ready to detract. Solomon says:-"meddle not with them that are given to detraction: for their calamity shall rise suddenly; and who knoweth the destruction of them both?" [Prov. 24:21, 22, Vulg] -of the detractor, that is, and of the person who lends an ear to his detraction.

15. It is your duty to visit the sick, to know the homes and children of ladies who are married, and to guard the secrets of noblemen. Make it your object, therefore, to keep your tongue chaste as well as your eyes. Never discuss a woman's figure nor let one house know what is going on in another. Hippocrates,²⁶ before he will teach his pupils, makes them take an oath and compels them to swear fealty to him. He binds them over to silence, and prescribes for them their language, their gait, their dress, their manners. How much more reason have we to whom the medicine of the soul has been committed to love the houses of all Christians as our own homes. Let them know us as comforters in sorrow rather than as guests in time of mirth. That clergyman soon becomes an object of contempt who being often asked out to dinner never refuses to go.

16. Let us never seek for presents and rarely accept them when we are asked to do so. For "it is more blessed to give than to receive." [Acts 20:35] Somehow or other the very man who begs leave to offer you a gift holds you the cheaper for your acceptance of it; while, if you refuse it, it is wonderful how much more he will come to respect you. The preacher of continence must not be a maker of marriages. Why does he who reads the apostle's words "it remaineth that they that have wives be as though they had none" [1 Cor. 7:29] -why does he press a virgin to marry? Why does a priest, who must be a monogamist, [1 Tim. 3:2] urge a widow to marry again? How can the clergy be managers and stewards of other men's households, when they are bidden to disregard even their own interests? To wrest a thing from a friend is theft but to cheat the Church is sacrilege. When you have received money to be doled out to the poor, to be cautious or to hesitate while crowds are starving is to be worse than a robber; and to subtract a portion for yourself is to commit a crime of the deepest dye. I am tortured with hunger and are you to judge what will satisfy my cravings? Either divide immediately what you have received, or, if you are a timid almoner, send the donor to distribute his own gifts. Your purse ought not to remain full while I am in need. No one can look after what is mine better than I can. He is the best almoner who keeps nothing for himself.

17. You have compelled me, my dear Nepotian, in spite of the castigation which my treatise on Virginity has had to endure-the one which I wrote for the saintly Eustochium at Rome:²⁷ -you have compelled me after ten years have passed once more to open my mouth at Bethlehem and to expose myself to the stabs of every tongue. For I could only escape from criticism by writing nothing-a course made impossible by your request; and I knew when I took up my pen that the shafts of all gainsayers would be launched against me. I beg such to hold their peace and to desist from gainsaying: for I have written to them not as to opponents but as to friends. I have not inveighed against those who sin: I have but warned them to sin no more. My judgment of myself has been as strict as my judgment of them. When I have wished to remove the mote from my neighbour's eye, I have first cast out the beam in my own. [Matt. 7:3-5] I have calumniated no one. Not a name has been hinted at. My words have not been aimed at individuals and my criticism of shortcomings has been quite general. If any one wishes to be angry with me he will have first to own that he himself suits my description.

1: Letter XIV. 9 v 2: Virgil, G. 2:484 3: So called because first devised in the Oscan town of Atella
4: The name Solomon means "man of peace."

5: A slip of the pen for Theophrastus 6: Cicero, de Sen. v 7: Cicero, de Sen. vii

8: Id. ibid 9: Cic. de Sen. viii 10: Homer, Il. 1:249; Cic. de Sen. x 11: Cyprian, Ep. ad Donatum 12: Virgil, Aen. 3:436 13: Jer. 12:13, LXX. There is a play on the word klhroj, which means (1) portion, (2) clergy 14: Another allusion to the word klhroj

15: Major domus 16: The vow of celibacy is probably intended 17: The disability alluded to was enacted by Valentinian 18: So the Vulgate 19: This is not extant 20: Virgil, Ec. 8:63 21: Levit. 10:9; the word shechar occurs in the Greek text of Luke 1:15 22: Cf. Shakespere:

23: Some irrelevant sentences are found here in the ordinary text which are obviously an interpolation 24: Wisd. 8:7, the cardinal virtues of Greek philosophy 25: Viz. thy misdeeds 26: The principal physician of this name flourished in the fifth century, b.c 27: Viz. Letter XXII

Letters - letter_053

Letter 53. To Paulinus.

Jerome urges Paulinus, bishop of Nola, (for whom see Letter 58.) to make a diligent study of the Scriptures and to this end reminds him of the zeal for learning displayed not only by the wisest of the pagans but also by the apostle Paul. Then going through the two Testaments in detail he describes the contents of the several books and the lessons which may be learned from them. He concludes with an appeal to Paulinus to divest himself wholly of his earthly wealth and to devote himself altogether to God. Written in 394 a.d.

1. Our brother Ambrose along with your little gifts has delivered to me a most charming letter which, though it comes at the beginning of our friendship, gives assurance of tried fidelity and of long continued attachment. A true intimacy cemented by Christ Himself is not one which depends upon material considerations, or upon the presence of the persons, or upon an insincere and exaggerated flattery; but one such as ours, wrought by a common fear of God and a joint study of the divine scriptures.

We read in old tales that men traversed provinces, crossed seas, and visited strange peoples, simply to see face to face persons whom they only knew from books. Thus Pythagoras visited the prophets of Memphis; and Plato, besides visiting Egypt and Archytas of Tarentum, most carefully explored that part of the coast of Italy which was formerly called Great Greece. In this way the influential Athenian master with whose lessons the schools¹ of the Academy resounded became at once a pilgrim and a pupil choosing modestly to learn what others had to teach rather than over confidently to propound views of his own. Indeed his pursuit of learning-which seemed to fly before him all the world over-finally led to his capture by pirates who sold him into slavery to a cruel tyrant.² Thus he became a prisoner, a bond-man, and a slave; yet, as he was always a philosopher, he was greater still than the man who purchased him. Again we read that certain noblemen journeyed from the most remote parts of Spain and Gaul to visit Titus Livius, [Cf. Quint. X. 1:32] and listen to his eloquence which flowed like a fountain of milk. Thus the fame of an individual had more power to draw men to Rome than the attractions of the city itself; and the age displayed an unheard of and noteworthy portent in the shape of men who, entering the great city, bestowed their attention not upon it but upon something else. Apollonius³ too was a traveller-the one I mean who is called the sorcerer⁴ by ordinary people and the philosopher by such as follow Pythagoras. He entered Persia, traversed the Caucasus and made his way through the Albanians, the Scythians, the Massagetae, and the richest districts of India. At last, after crossing that wide river the Pison, [Gen. 2:11] he came to the Brahmans. There he saw Hiarcas [Philostratus 3:7] sitting upon his golden throne and drinking from his Tantalus-fountain, and heard him instructing a few disciples upon the nature, motions, and orbits of the heavenly bodies. After this he travelled among the Elamites, the Babylonians, the Chaldeans, the Medes, the Assyrians, the Parthians, the Syrians, the Phenicians, the Arabians, and the Philistines.⁵ Then returning to Alexandria he made his way to Ethiopia to see the gymnosophists and the famous table of the sun spread in the sands of the desert. [Herod. 3:17, 18] Everywhere he found something to learn, and as he was always going to new places, he became constantly wiser and better. Philostratus has written the story of his life at length in eight books.

2. But why should I confine my allusions to the men of this world, when the Apostle Paul, the chosen vessel [Acts 9:15] the doctor⁶ of the Gentiles, who could boldly say: "Do ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me?" [2 Cor. 13:3] knowing that he really had within him that greatest of guests-when even he after visiting Damascus and Arabia "went up to Jerusalem to see Peter and abode with him fifteen days." [Gal. 1:17, Gal. 1:18] For he who was to be a preacher to the Gentiles had to be instructed in the mystical numbers seven and eight. And again fourteen years after he took Barnabas and Titus and communicated his gospel to the apostles lest by any means he should have run or had run in vain. [Gal. 2:1, Gal. 2:2] Spoken words possess an indefinable hidden power, and teaching that passed directly from the mouth of the speaker into the ears of the disciples is more impressive than any other. When the speech of Demosthenes against Aeschines was recited before the latter during his exile at Rhodes, amid all the admiration and applause he sighed "if you could but have heard the brute deliver his own periods!"⁷

3. I do not adduce these instances because I have anything in me from which you either can or will learn a lesson, but to show you that your zeal and eagerness to learn-even though you cannot rely on help from me-are in themselves worthy of praise. A mind willing to learn deserves commendation even when it has no teacher. What is of importance to me is not what you find but what you seek to find. Wax is soft and easy to mould even where the hands of craftsman and modeller are wanting to work it. It is already potentially all that it can be made. The apostle Paul learned the Law of Moses and the prophets at the feet of Gamaliel and was glad that he had done so, for armed with this spiritual armour, he was able to say boldly "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds;" armed with these we war "casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ; and being in a readiness to revenge all disobedience." [2 Cor. 10:4-6] He writes to Timothy who had been trained in the holy writings from a child exhorting him to study them diligently [2 Tim. 3:14, 2 Tim. 3:15] and not to neglect the gift which was given him with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. [1 Tim. 4:14] To Titus he gives commandment that among a bishop's other virtues (which he briefly describes) he should be careful to seek a knowledge of the scriptures: A bishop, he says, must hold fast "the faithful word as he hath been taught that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers." [Tit. 1:9] In fact want of education in a clergyman⁸ prevents him from doing good to any one but himself and much as the virtue of his life may build up Christ's church, he does it an injury as great by failing to resist those who are trying to pull it down. The prophet Haggai says-or rather the Lord says it by the mouth of Haggai-"Ask now the priests concerning the law." [Hag. 2:11] For such is the important function of the priesthood to give answers to those who question them concerning the law. And in Deuteronomy we read "Ask thy father and he will shew thee; thy elders and they will tell thee." [Deut. 32:7] Also in the one hundred and nineteenth psalm "thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage." David too, in the description of the righteous man whom he compares to the tree of life in paradise, amongst his other excellences speaks of this, "His delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night." [Ps. 1:2] In the close of his most solemn vision Daniel declares that "the righteous shall shine as the stars; and the wise, that is the learned, as the firmament." [Dan. 12:3] You can see, therefore, how great is the difference between righteous ignorance and instructed righteousness. Those who have the first are compared with the stars, those who have the second with the heavens. Yet, according to the exact sense of the Hebrew, both statements may be understood of the learned, for it is to be read in this way:—"They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." Why is the apostle Paul called a chosen vessel? [Acts 9:15] Assuredly because he is a repertory of the Law and of the holy scriptures. The learned teaching of our Lord strikes the Pharisees dumb with amazement, and they are filled with astonishment to find that Peter and John know the Law although they have not learned letters. For to these the Holy Ghost immediately suggested what comes to others by daily study and meditation; and, as it is written, [1 Thess. 4:9] they were "taught of God." The Saviour had only accomplished his twelfth year when the scene in the temple took place; [Luke 2:46] but when he interrogated the elders concerning the Law His wise questions conveyed rather than sought information.

4. But perhaps we ought to call Peter and John ignorant, both of whom could say of themselves, "though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge." [2 Cor. 11:6] Was John a mere fisherman, rude and untaught? If so, whence did he get the words "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God and the word was God." [John. 1:1] Logos in Greek has many meanings. It signifies word and reason and reckoning and the cause of individual things by which those which are subsist. All of which things we rightly predicate of Christ. This truth Plato with all his learning did not know, of this Demosthenes with all his eloquence was ignorant. "I will destroy," it is said, "the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent." [1 Cor. 1:19] The true wisdom must destroy the false, and, although the foolishness of preaching [1 Cor. 1:21] is inseparable from the Cross, Paul speaks "wisdom among them that are perfect, yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world that come to nought," but he speaks "the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world." [1 Cor. 2:6, 1 Cor. 2:7] God's wisdom is Christ, for Christ, we are told, is "the power of God and the wisdom of God." [1 Cor. 1:24] He is the wisdom which is hidden in a mystery, of which also we read in the heading of the ninth psalm "for the hidden things of the son."9 In Him are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. He also who was hidden in a mystery is the same that was foreordained before the world. Now it was in the Law and in the Prophets that he was foreordained and prefigured. For this reason too the prophets were called seers, [1 Sam. 9:9] because they saw Him whom others did not see. Abraham saw His day and was glad. [John. 8:56] The heavens which were sealed to a rebellious people were opened to Ezekiel. "Open thou mine eyes," saith David, "that I may behold wonderful things out of thy Law." [Ps. 119:18] For "the law is spiritual" [Rom. 7:14] and a revelation is needed to enable us to comprehend it and, when God uncovers His face, to behold His glory.

5. In the apocalypse a book is shewn sealed with seven seals, [Rev. 5:1] which if you deliver to one that is learned saying, Read this, he will answer you, I cannot, for it is sealed. [Isa. 29:11] How many there are to-day who fancy themselves learned, yet the scriptures are a sealed book to them, and one which they cannot open save through Him who has the key of David, "he that openeth and no man shutteth; and shutteth and no man openeth." [Rev. 3:7] In the Acts of the Apostles the holy eunuch (or rather "man" for so the scripture calls him [Acts 8:27]) when reading

Isaiah he is asked by Philip "Understandest thou what thou readest?", makes answer:-"How can I except some man should guide me?" [Acts 8:30, Acts 8:31] To digress for a moment to myself, I am neither holier nor more diligent than this eunuch, who came from Ethiopia, that is from the ends of the world, to the Temple leaving behind him a queen's palace, and was so great a lover of the Law and of divine knowledge that he read the holy scriptures even in his chariot. Yet although he had the book in his hand and took into his mind the words of the Lord, nay even had them on his tongue and uttered them with his lips, he still knew not Him, whom-not knowing-he worshipped in the book. Then Philip came and shewed him Jesus, who was concealed beneath the letter. Wondrous excellence of the teacher! In the same hour the eunuch believed and was baptized; he became one of the faithful and a saint. He was no longer a pupil but a master; and he found more in the church's font there in the wilderness than he had ever done in the gilded temple of the synagogue.

6. These instances have been just touched upon by me (the limits of a letter forbid a more discursive treatment of them) to convince you that in the holy scriptures you can make no progress unless you have a guide to shew you the way. I say nothing of the knowledge of grammarians, rhetoricians, philosophers, geometers, logicians, musicians, astronomers, astrologers, physicians, whose several kinds of skill are most useful to mankind, and may be ranged under the three heads of teaching, method, and proficiency. I will pass to the less important crafts which require manual dexterity more than mental ability. Husbandmen, masons, carpenters, workers in wood and metal, wool-dressers and fullers, as well as those artisans who make furniture and cheap utensils, cannot attain the ends they seek without instruction from qualified persons. As Horace says¹⁰ "Doctors alone profess the healing art And none but joiners ever try to join."

7. The art of interpreting the scriptures is the only one of which all men everywhere claim to be masters. To quote Horace again "Taught or untaught we all write poetry." [Hor. Ep. II. 1:117] The chatty old woman, the doting old man, and the wordy sophist, one and all take in hand the Scriptures, rend them in pieces and teach them before they have learned them. Some with brows knit and bombastic words, balanced one against the other philosophize concerning the sacred writings among weak women. Others-I blush to say it-learn of women what they are to teach men; and as if even this were not enough, they boldly explain to others what they themselves by no means understand. I say nothing of persons who, like myself have been familiar with secular literature before they have come to the study of the holy scriptures. Such men when they charm the popular ear by the finish of their style suppose every word they say to be a law of God. They do not deign to notice what Prophets and apostles have intended but they adapt conflicting passages to suit their own meaning, as if it were a grand way of teaching-and not rather the faultiest of all-to misrepresent a writer's views and to force the scriptures reluctantly to do their will. They forget that we have read centos from Homer and Virgil; but we never think of calling the Christless Maro¹¹ a Christian because of his lines:- Now comes the Virgin back and Saturn's reign, "Now from high heaven comes a Child newborn." [Virg. E. 4:6, 7] Another line might be addressed by the Father to the Son:- "Hail, only Son, my Might and Majesty." [Virg. A. 1:664] And yet another might follow the Saviour's words on the cross:- "Such words he spake and there transfixed remained." [Virg. A. 2:650] But all this is puerile, and resembles the sleight-of-hand of a mountebank. It is idle to try to teach what you do not know, and-if I may speak with some warmth-is worse still to be ignorant of your ignorance.

8. Genesis, we shall be told, needs no explanation; its topics are too simple-the birth of the world, the origin of the human race,¹² the division of the earth,¹³ the confusion of tongues,¹⁴ and the descent of the Hebrews into Egypt!¹⁵ Exodus, no doubt, is equally plain, containing as it does merely an account of the ten plagues,¹⁶ the decalogue,¹⁷ and sundry mysterious and divine precepts! The meaning of Leviticus is of course self-evident, although every sacrifice that it describes, nay more every word that it contains, the description of Aaron's vestments,¹⁸ and all the regulations connected with the Levites are symbols of things heavenly! The book of Numbers too-are not its very figures,¹⁹ and Balaam's prophecy,²⁰ and the forty-two camping places in the wilderness²¹ so many mysteries? Deuteronomy also, that is the second law or the foreshadowing of the law of the gospel,-does it not, while exhibiting things known before, put old truths in a new light? So far the 'five words' of the Pentateuch, with which the apostle boasts his wish to speak in the Church. [1 Cor. 14:19] Then, as for Job,²² that pattern of patience, what mysteries are there not contained in his discourses? Commencing in prose the book soon glides into verse and at the end once more reverts to prose. By the way in which it lays down propositions, assumes postulates, adduces proofs, and draws inferences, it illustrates all the laws of logic. Single words occurring in the book are full of meaning. To say nothing of other topics, it prophesies the resurrection of men's bodies at once with more clearness and with more caution than any one has yet shewn. "I know," Job says, "that my redeemer liveth, and that at the last day I shall rise again from the earth; and I shall be clothed again with my skin, and in my flesh shall I see God. Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another. This my hope is stored up in my own bosom." [Job 19:25-27, Vulg] I will pass on to Jesus the son of Nave²³ -a type of the Lord in name as well as in deed-who crossed over Jordan, subdued hostile kingdoms, divided the land among the conquering people and who, in every city, village, mountain, river, hill-torrent, and boundary which he dealt with, marked out the spiritual realms of the heavenly Jerusalem, that is, of the church. [Gal. 4:26] In the book of Judges every one of the popular leaders is a type. Ruth the Moabitess fulfils the prophecy of Isaiah:-"Send thou a lamb, O Lord, as ruler of the land from the rock of the wilderness to the mount of the daughter of Zion."²⁴ Under the figures of Eli's death and the slaying of Saul Samuel shews the abolition of the old law. Again in Zadok and in David he bears witness to the mysteries of the new priesthood and of the new royalty. The third and fourth books of Kings called in Hebrew Malachim give the history of the kingdom of Judah from Solomon to Jeconiah,²⁵ and of that of Israel from Jeroboam the son of Nebat to Hoshea who was carried away into Assyria. If you merely regard the narrative, the words are simple enough, but if you look beneath the surface at the hidden meaning of it, you find a description of the small numbers of the church and of the wars which the heretics wage against it. The twelve prophets whose writings are compressed within the narrow limits of a single volume,²⁶ have typical meanings far different from their literal ones. Hosea speaks many times of Ephraim, of Samaria, of Joseph, of Jezreel, of a wife of whoredoms and of children of whoredoms, [Hos. 1:2] of an adulteress shut up within the chamber of her husband, sitting for a long time in widowhood and in the garb of mourning, awaiting the time when her husband will return to her. [Hos. 3:1, 3, 4] Joel the son of Pethuel describes the land of the twelve tribes as spoiled and devastated by the palmerworm the canker-worm, the locust, and the blight, [Joel 1:4] and predicts that after the overthrow of the former people the Holy Spirit shall be poured out upon God's servants and handmaids; [Joel 2:29] the same spirit, that is, which was to be poured out in the upper chamber at Zion upon the one hundred and twenty believers. [Acts 1:13, Acts 1:15] These believers rising by gradual and regular gradations from one to fifteen form the steps to which there is a mystical allusion in the "psalms of degrees."²⁷ Amos, although he is only "an herdman" from the country, "a gatherer of sycomore fruit," [Amos 7:14] cannot be explained in a few words. For who can adequately speak of the three transgressions and the four of Damascus, of Gaza, of Tyre, of Idumaea, of Moab, of the children of Ammon, and in the seventh and eighth place of Judah and of Israel? He speaks to the fat kine that are in the mountain of Samaria, [Amos 4:1] and bears witness that the great house and the little house shall fall. [Amos 6:11] He sees now the maker of the grasshopper, [Amos 7:1] now the Lord, standing upon a wall [Amos 7:7] daubed²⁸ or made of adamant,²⁹ now a basket of apples [Amos 8:1] that brings doom to the transgressors, and now a famine upon the earth "not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord." [Amos 8:11] Obadiah, whose name means the servant of God, thunders against Edom red with blood and against the creature born of earth.³⁰ He smites him with the spear of the spirit because of his continual rivalry with his brother Jacob. Jonah, fairest of doves, whose shipwreck shews in a figure the passion of the Lord, recalls the world to penitence, and while he preaches to Nineveh, announces salvation to all the heathen. Micah the Morasthite a joint heir with Christ³¹ announces the spoiling of the daughter of the robber and lays siege against her, because she has smitten the jawbone of the judge of Israel. [Mic. 5:1, Vulg] Nahum, the consoler of the world, rebukes "the bloody city" [i.e., Nineveh-Nahum 3:1] and when it is overthrown cries: "Behold upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings." [Nahum 1:15] Habakkuk, like a strong and unyielding wrestler,³² stands upon his watch and sets his foot upon the tower [Hab. 2:1] that he may contemplate Christ upon the cross and say "His glory covered the heavens and the earth was full of his praise. And his brightness was as the light; he had horns coming out of his hand: and there was the hiding of his power." [Hab. 3:3, Hab. 3:4] Zephaniah, that is the bodyguard and knower of the secrets of the Lord,³³ hears "a cry from the fishgate, and an howling from the second, and a great crashing from the hills." [Zeph. 1:10] He proclaims "howling to the inhabitants of the mortar;³⁴ for all the people of Canaan are undone; all they that were laden with silver are cut off." [Zeph. 1:11, RV] Haggai, that is he who is glad or joyful, who has sown in tears to reap in joy, [Ps. 126:5] is occupied with the rebuilding of the temple. He represents the Lord(the Father, that is) as saying "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land; and I will shake all nations and he who is desired³⁵ of all nations shall come" [Hag. 2:6, Hag. 2:7] Zechariah, he that is mindful of his Lord,³⁶ gives us many prophecies. He sees Jesus,³⁷ "clothed with filthy garments," [Zech. 3:3] a stone with seven eyes, [Zech. 3:9] a candle-stick all of gold with lamps as many as the eyes, and two olivetrees on the right side of the bowl [Zech. 4:2, Zech. 4:3] and on the left. After he has described the horses, red, black, white, and grisled, [Zech. 6:1-3] and the cutting off of the chariot from Ephraim and of the horse from Jerusalem [Zech. 9:10] he goes on to prophesy and predict a king who shall be a poor man and who shall sit "upon a colt the foal of an ass." [Zech. 9:9] Malachi, the last of all the prophets, speaks openly of the rejection of Israel and the calling of the nations. "I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of hosts, neither will I accept an offering at your hand. For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, my name is great among the Gentiles: and in every place incense³⁸ is offered unto my name, and a pure offering." [Mal. 1:10, Mal. 1:11, RV] As for Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, who can fully understand or adequately explain them? The first of them seems to compose not a prophecy but a gospel. The second speaks of a rod of an almond tree [Jer. 1:11] and of a seething pot with its face toward the north, [Jer. 1:13] and of a leopard which has changed its spots. [Jer. 13:23] He also goes four times through the alphabet in different metres.³⁹ The beginning and ending of Ezekiel, the third of the four, are involved in so great obscurity that like the commencement of Genesis they are not studied by the Hebrews until they are thirty years old. Daniel, the fourth and last of the four prophets, having knowledge of the times and being interested in the whole world, in clear language proclaims the stone cut out of the mountain without hands that overthrows all kingdoms. [Dan. 2:45] David, who is our Simonides, Pindar, and Alcaeus, our Horace, our Catullus, and our Serenus all in one, sings of Christ to his lyre; and on a psaltery with ten strings calls him from the lower world to rise again. Solomon, a lover of peace⁴⁰ and of the Lord, corrects morals, teaches nature, unites Christ and the church, and sings a sweet marriage song⁴¹ to celebrate that holy bridal. Esther, a type of the church, frees her people from danger and, after having slain Haman whose name means iniquity, hands down to posterity a memorable day and a great feast.⁴² The book of things omitted⁴³ or epitome of the old dispensation⁴⁴ is of such importance and value that without it any one who should claim to himself a knowledge of the scriptures would make himself a laughing stock in his own eyes. Every name used in it, nay even the conjunction of the words, serves to throw light on narratives passed over in the books of Kings and upon questions suggested by the gospel. Ezra and Nehemiah, that is the Lord's helper and His consoler, are united in a single book. They restore the Temple and build up the walls of the city. In their pages we see the throng of the Israelites returning to their native land, we read of priests and Levites, of Israel proper and of proselytes; and we are even told the several families to which the task of building the walls and towers was assigned. These references convey one meaning upon the surface, but another below it.

9. [In Migne, 8.] You see how, carried away by my love of the scriptures, I have exceeded the limits of a letter yet have not fully accomplished my object. We have heard only what it is that we ought to know and to desire, so that we too may be able to say with the psalmist: "My soul breaketh out for the very fervent desire that it hath alway unto thy judgments." [Ps. 119:20, PBV] But the saying of Socrates about himself- "this only I know that I know nothing"⁴⁵ -is fulfilled in our case also. The New Testament I will briefly deal with. Matthew, Mark, Luke and John are the Lord's team of four,⁴⁶ the true cherubim or store of knowledge.⁴⁷ With them the whole body is full of eyes, [Ezek. 1:18, Vulg] they glitter as sparks, [Ezek. 1:7] they run and return like lightning, [Ezek. 1:14] their feet are straight feet, [Ezek. 1:7] and lifted up, their backs also are winged, ready to fly in all directions. They hold together each by each and are interwoven one with another: [Ezek. 1:11] like wheels within wheels they roll along [Ezek. 1:16] and go whithersoever the breath of the Holy Spirit wafts them. [Ezek. 1:20] The apostle Paul writes to seven churches⁴⁸ (for the eighth epistle- that to the Hebrews- is not generally counted in with the others). He instructs Timothy and Titus; he intercedes with Philemon for his runaway slave.⁴⁹ Of him I think it better to say nothing than to write inadequately. The Acts of the Apostles seem to relate a mere unvarnished narrative descriptive of the infancy of the newly born church; but when once we realize that their author is Luke the physician whose praise is in the gospel, [Col. 4:14; 2 Cor. 8:18] we shall see that all his words are medicine for the sick soul. The apostles James, Peter, John, and Jude, have published seven epistles at once spiritual and to the point, short and long, short that is in words but lengthy in substance so that there are few indeed who do not find themselves in the dark when they read them. The apocalypse of John has as many mysteries as words. In saying this I have said less than the book deserves. All praise of it is inadequate; manifold meanings lie hid in its every word.

10. [In Migne, 9.] I beg of you, my dear brother, to live among these books, to meditate upon them, to know nothing else, to seek nothing else. Does not such a life seem to you a foretaste of heaven here on earth? Let not the simplicity of the scripture or the poorness of its vocabulary offend you; for these are due either to the faults of translators or else to deliberate purpose: for in this way it is better fitted for the instruction of an unlettered congregation as the educated person can take one meaning and the uneducated another from one and the same sentence. I am not so dull or so forward as to profess that I myself know it, or that I can pluck upon the earth the fruit which has its root in heaven, but I confess that I should like to do so. I put myself before the man who sits idle and, while I lay no claim to be a master, I readily pledge myself to be a fellow-student. "Every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened." [Matt. 7:8] Let us learn upon earth that knowledge which will continue with us in heaven.

11. [In Migne, 10.] I will receive you with open hands and-if I may boast and speak foolishly like Hermagoras⁵⁰ -I will strive to learn with you whatever you desire to study. Eusebius who is here regards you with the affection of a brother; he⁵¹ has made your letter twice as precious by telling me of your sincerity of character, your contempt for the world, your constancy in friendship, and your love to Christ. The letter bears on its face (without any aid from him) your prudence and the charm of your style. Make haste then, I beseech you, and cut instead of loosing the hawser which prevents your vessel from moving in the sea. The man who sells his goods because he despises them and means to renounce the world can have no desire to sell them dear. Count as money gained the sum that you must expend upon your outfit. There is an old saying that a miser lacks as much what he has as what he has not. The believer has a whole world of wealth; the unbeliever has not a single farthing. Let us always live "as having nothing and yet possessing all things." [2 Cor. 6:10] Food and raiment, these are the Christian's wealth. [1 Tim. 6:8] If your property is in your own power, [Cf. Acts 5:4] sell it: if not, cast it from you. "If any man... will take away thy coat, let him have thy cloke also." [Matt. 5:40] You are all for delay, you wish to defer action: unless-so you argue-unless I sell my goods piecemeal and with caution, Christ will be at a loss to feed his poor. Nay, he who has offered himself to God, has given Him everything once for all. The apostles did but forsake ships and nets. [Matt. 4:18-22] The widow cast but two brass coins into the treasury [Mark 12:41-44] and yet she shall be preferred before Croesus⁵² with all his wealth. He readily despises all things who reflects always that he must die.

1: Gymnasia 2: Dionysius of Syracuse 3: Apollonius of Tyana, whose strange life and adventures have been written for us by Philostratus

4: Magus 5: i.e. dwellers in Palestine 6: A favourite title for theologians in the Middle Ages 7: Cic. de Orat. 3:56, the word 'brute 0' is inserted by Jerome 8: Sancta rusticitas 9: "Upon Muthlabben" AV. See Perowne on the words 10: Hor. Ep. II. 1. 115, 116 11: Virgil's full name was Publius Vergilius Maro

12:

Cc. 1-2

13:

C. x

14:

C. xi

15:

C. xlvi

16:

Cc. vii-xii

17:

C. xx

18:

C. viii

19: C. xxvi 20: Cc. xxiii., xxiv 21: C. 33: See Letter lxxviii

22: The mention of Job at this point is curious: it would seem that in Jerome's opinion he was coeval with or very little later than Moses 23: i.e., Joshua the son of Nun whose name is so rendered by the LXX. Cf. Ecclus. 46:1, AV 24: Isa. 16:1, Vulg. 'the rock of the wilderness'=Moab 25: Also called Coniah and Jehoiachin 26: They are reckoned as forming one book in the Hebrew Bible 27: The allusion is to Psalms cxx.-cxxxiv. One hundred and twenty is the sum of the numerals one to fifteen 28: So the Vulgate

29: So the LXX 30: 'Edom 0' means 'red 0' and is connected with 'Adâmâh 0'='the earth. 0 31: Jerome interprets the Hebrew word 'Morasthite 0' to mean 'my possession. 0 32: The name strictly means 'embrace.' 33: Strictly 'the Lord guards' or 'hides.' 34: So RV. marg. Probably a place in Jerusalem 35: So Vulg. 'the desire' AV 36: Strictly 'the Lord is mindful.' 37: i.e., Joshua the High Priest 38: This word is not in the Vulg 39: Lamentations 200:I.-IV., each verse in which begins with a different letter of the alphabet 40: See note on LII. 3, p 41: The Song of Songs 42: i.e. the feast of Purim-Esth. 9:20-32 43: Paraleipomena, the name given in the LXX. to the books of Chronicles 44: Veteris instrumenti 'epitome' 45: Plato, Ap. Soc. 21, 22 46: Quadriga. cf Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. III. 2:8 47: Clement of Alexandria, following Philo, makes cherub mean wisdom 48: i.e. those of Rome, Corinth, Galatia, Ephesus, Philippi, Colosse, Thessalonica

49: Onesimus 50: A verbose rhetorician mentioned by Cic. de Inv. 1:6

51: Eusebius of Cremona, who for the next five years remained with Jerome, and afterwards corresponded with him from Italy. See Letter LVII. Rufinus, Apol. 1:19. Jerome, Apol. 3:4, 5, etc

52: The last king of Lydia, celebrated for his riches

Letters - letter_054

Letter 54. To Furia. A letter of guidance to a widow on the best means of preserving her widowhood (according to Jerome 'the second of the three degrees of chastity'). Furia had at one time thought of marrying again but eventually abandoned her intention and devoted herself to the care of her young children and her aged father. Jerome draws a vivid picture of the dangers to which she is exposed at Rome, lays down rules of conduct for her guidance, and commends her to the care of the presbyter Exuperius (afterwards bishop of Toulouse). The date of the letter is 394 a.d.

1. You beg and implore me in your letter to write to you-or rather write back to you-what mode of life you ought to adopt to preserve the crown of widowhood and to keep your reputation for chastity unsullied. My mind rejoices, my reins exult, and my heart is glad that you desire to be after marriage what your mother Titiana of holy memory was for a long time in marriage.¹ Her prayers and supplications are heard. She has succeeded in winning afresh in her only daughter that which she herself when living possessed. It is a high privilege of your family that from the time of Camillus² few or none of your house are described as contracting second marriages. Therefore it will not redound so much to your praise if you continue a widow as to your shame if being a Christian you fail to keep what heathen women have jealously guarded for so many centuries.

2. I say nothing of Paula and Eustochium, the fairest flowers of your stock; for, as my object is to exhort you, I do not wish it to appear that I am praising them. Blaesilla too I pass over who following her husband-your brother-to the grave, fulfilled in a short time of life a long time of virtue. [Wisdom 4:13] Would that men would imitate the laudable examples of women, and that wrinkled old age would pay at last what youth gladly offers at first! In saying this I am putting my hand into the fire deliberately and with my eyes open. Men will knit their brows and shake their clenched fists at me;

"In swelling tones will angry Chremes rave."³ The leaders will rise as one man against my epistle; the mob of patricians will thunder at me. They will cry out that I am a sorcerer and a seducer; and that I should be transported to the ends of the earth. They may add, if they will, the title of Samaritan; for in it I shall but recognize a name given to my Lord. But one thing is certain. I do not sever the daughter from the mother, I do not use the words of the gospel: "let the dead bury their dead." [Matt. 8:22] For whosoever believes. in Christ is alive; and he who believes in Him "ought himself also so to walk even as He walked." [1 John. 2:6]

3. A truce to the calumnies which the malice of backbiters continually fastens upon all who call themselves Christians to keep them through fear of shame from aspiring to virtue. Except by letter we have no knowledge of each other; and where there is no knowledge after the flesh, there can be no motive for intercourse save a religious one. "Honour thy father," [Ex. 20:12] the commandment says, but only if he does not separate you from your true Father. Recognize the tie of blood but only so long as your parent recognizes his Creator. Should he fail to do so, David will sing to you: "hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people and thy father's house. So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty, for he is thy Lord." [Ps. 45:10, Ps. 45:11] Great is the prize offered for the forgetting of a parent, "the king shall desire thy beauty." You have heard, you have considered, you have inclined your ear, you have forgotten your people and your father's house; therefore the king shall desire your beauty and shall say to you: - "thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee." [Cant. 4:7] What can be fairer than a soul which is called the daughter of God, [Ps. 45:10] and which seeks for herself no outward adorning. [Cf. 1 Pet. 3:3] She believes in Christ, and, dowered with this hope of greatness⁴ makes her way to her spouse; for Christ is at once her bridegroom and her Lord.

4. What troubles matrimony involves you have learned in the marriage state itself; you have been surfeited with quails' flesh [Numb. 11:20, Numb. 11:31-4] even to loathing; your mouth has been filled with the gall of bitterness; you have expelled the indigestible and unwholesome food; you have relieved a heaving stomach. Why will you again swallow what has disagreed with you? "The dog is turned to his own vomit again and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire." [Pet. 2:22] Even brute beasts and flying birds do not fall into the same snares twice. Do you fear extinction for the line of Camillus if you do not present your father with some little fellow to crawl upon his breast and slobber his neck? As if all who marry have children! and as if when they do come, they always resemble their forefathers! Did Cicero's son exhibit his father's eloquence? Had your own Cornelia,⁵ pattern at once of chastity and of fruitfulness, cause to rejoice that she was mother of her Gracchi? It is ridiculous to expect as certain the offspring which many, as you can see, have not got, while others who have had it have lost it again. To whom then are you to leave your great riches? To Christ who cannot die. Whom shall you make your heir? The same who is already your Lord. Your father will be sorry but Christ will be glad; your family will grieve but the angels will rejoice with you. Let your father do what he likes with what is his own. You are not his to whom you have been born, but His to whom you have been born again, and who has purchased you at a great price with His own blood. [Acts 20:28]

5. Beware of nurses and waiting maids and similar venomous creatures who try to satisfy their greed by sucking your blood. They advise you to do not what is best for you but what is best for them. They are for ever dinning into your ears Virgil's lines:- "Will you waste all your youth in lonely grief And children sweet, the gifts of love, forswear?" [Virg. A. 4:32.]

Wherever there is holy chastity, there is also frugal living; and wherever there is frugal living, servants lose by it. What they do not get is in their minds so much taken from them. The actual sum received is what they look to, and not its relative amount. The moment they see a Christian they at once repeat the hackneyed saying:-"The Greek! The impostor!"⁶ They spread the most scandalous reports and, when any such emanates from themselves, they pretend that they have heard it from others, managing thus at once to originate the story and to exaggerate it. A lying rumour goes forth; and this, when it has reached the married ladies and has been fanned by their tongues, spreads through the provinces. You may see numbers of these-their faces painted, their eyes like those of vipers, their teeth rubbed with pumice-stone-raving and carping at Christians with insane fury. One of these ladies,

"A violet mantle round her shoulders thrown,

Drawls out some mawkish stuff, speaks through her nose,

And minces half her words with tripping tongue." [Persius 1:32 sqq]

Hereupon the rest chime in and every bench expresses hoarse approval. They are backed up by men of my own order who, finding themselves assailed, assail others. Always fluent in attacking me, they are dumb in their own defence; just as though they were not monks themselves, and as though every word said against monks did not tell also against their spiritual progenitors the clergy. Harm done to the flock brings discredit on the shepherd. On the other hand we cannot but praise the life of a monk who holds up to veneration the priests of Christ and refuses to detract from that order to which he owes it that he is a Christian.

6. I have spoken thus, my daughter in Christ, not because I doubt that you will be faithful to your vows,⁷ (you would never have asked for a letter of advice had you been uncertain as to the blessedness of monogamy): but that you may realize the wickedness of servants who merely wish to sell you for their own advantage, the snares which relations may set for you and the well meant but mistaken suggestions of a father. While I allow that this latter feels love toward you, I cannot admit that it is love according to knowledge. I must say with the apostle: "I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge." [Rom. 10:2] Imitate rather-I cannot say it too often-your holy mother⁸ whose zeal for Christ comes into my mind as often as I remember her, and not her zeal only but the paleness induced in her by fasting, the alms given by her to the poor, the courtesy shewn by her to the servants of God, the lowliness of her garb and heart, and the constant moderation of her language. Of your father too I speak with respect, not because he is a patrician and of consular rank but because he is a Christian. Let him be true to his profession as such. Let him rejoice that he has begotten a daughter for Christ and not for the world. Nay rather let him grieve that you have in vain lost your virginity as the fruits of matrimony have not been yours. Where is the husband whom he gave to you? Even had he been lovable and good, death would still have snatched all away, and his decease would have terminated the fleshly bond between you. Seize the opportunity, I beg of you, and make a virtue of necessity. In the lives of Christians we look not to the beginnings but to the endings. Paul began badly but ended well. The start of Judas wins praise; his end is condemned because of his treachery. Read Ezekiel, "The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him in the day of his transgression; as for the wickedness of the wicked he shall not fall thereby in the day that he turneth from his wickedness." [Ezek. 33:12] The Christian life is the true Jacob's ladder on which the angels ascend and descend, [Gen. 28:12] while the Lord stands above it holding out His hand to those who slip and sustaining by the vision of Himself the weary steps of those who ascend. But while He does not wish the death of a sinner, but only that he should be converted and live, He hates the lukewarm [Rev. 3:16] and they quickly cause him loathing. To whom much is forgiven, the same loveth much. [Luke 7:47]

7. In the gospel a harlot wins salvation. How? She is baptized in her tears and wipes the Lord's feet with that same hair with which she had before deceived many. She does not wear a waving headdress or creaking boots, she does not darken her eyes with antimony. Yet in her squalor she is lovelier than ever. What place have rouge and white lead on the face of a Christian woman? The one simulates the natural red of the cheeks and of the lips; the other the whiteness of the face and of the neck. They serve only to inflame young men's passions, to stimulate lust, and to indicate an unchaste mind. How can a woman weep for her sins whose tears lay bare her true complexion and mark furrows on her cheeks? Such adorning is not of the Lord; a mask of this kind belongs to Antichrist. With what confidence can a woman raise features to heaven which her Creator must fail to recognize? It is idle to allege in excuse for such practices girlishness and youthful vanity. A widow who has ceased to have a husband to please, and who in the apostle's language a widow indeed, [1 Tim. 5:5] needs nothing more but perseverance only. She is mindful of past enjoyments, she knows what gave her pleasure and what she has now lost. By rigid fast and vigil she must quench the fiery darts of the devil. [Eph. 6:16] If we are widows, we must either speak as we are dressed, or else dress as we speak. Why do we profess one thing, and practise another? The tongue talks of chastity, but the rest of the body reveals incontinence.

8. So much for dress and adornment. But a widow "that liveth in pleasure"-the words are not mine but those of the apostle-"is dead while she liveth." [1 Tim. 5:6] What does that mean-"is dead while she liveth"? To those who know no better she seems to be alive and not, as she is, dead in sin; yes, and in another sense dead to Christ, from whom no secrets are hid. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." [Ezek. 18:20] "Some men's sins are open ...going before to judgment: and some they follow after. Likewise also good works are manifest, and they that are otherwise cannot be hid. [1 Tim. 5:24, 1 Tim. 5:25] The words mean this:-Certain persons sin so deliberately and flagrantly that you no sooner see them than you know them at once to be sinners. But the defects of others are so cunningly concealed that we only learn them from subsequent information. Similarly the good deeds of some people are public property, while those of others we come to know only through long intimacy with them. Why then must we needs boast of our chastity, a thing which cannot prove itself to be genuine without its companions and attendants, continence and plain living? The apostle macerates his body and brings it into subjection to the soul lest what he has preached to others he should himself fail to keep; [1 Cor. 9:27] and can a mere girl whose passions are kindled by abundance of food, can a mere girl afford to be confident of her own chastity?

9. In saying this, I do not of course condemn food which God created to be enjoyed with thanksgiving, [1 Tim. 4:4] but I seek to remove from youths and girls what are incentives to sensual pleasure. Neither the fiery Etna nor the country of Vulcan,⁹ nor Vesuvius, nor Olympus, burns with such violent heat as the youthful marrow of those who are flushed with wine and filled with food. Many trample covetousness under foot, and lay it down as readily as they lay down their purse. An enforced silence serves to make amends for a railing tongue. The outward appearance and the mode of dress can be changed in a single hour. All other sins are external, and what is external can easily be cast away. Desire alone, implanted in men by God to lead them to procreate children, is internal; and this, if it once oversteps its own bounds, becomes a sin, and by a law of nature cries out for sexual intercourse. It is therefore a work of great merit, and one which requires unremitting diligence to overcome that which is innate in you; while living in the flesh not to live after the flesh; to strive with yourself day by day and to watch the foe shut up within you with the hundred eyes of the fabled Argus.¹⁰ This is what the apostle says in other words: "Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body." [1 Cor. 6:18] Physicians and others who have written on the nature of the human body, and particularly Galen in his books entitled On matters of health, say that the bodies of boys and of young men and of full grown men and women glow with an interior heat and consequently that for persons of these ages all food is injurious which tends to promote this heat: while on the other hand it is highly conducive to health in eating and in drinking to take things cold and cooling.

Contrariwise they tell us that warm food and old wine are good for the old who suffer from humours and from chilliness. Hence it is that the Saviour says "Take heed to yourselves lest at any time your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life." [Luke 21:34] So too speaks the apostle: "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess." [Eph. 5:18] No wonder that the potter spoke thus of the vessel which He had made when even the comic poet whose only object is to know and to describe the ways of men tells us that Where Ceres fails and Liber, Venus droops. [Ter. Enn. 4:5, 6]

10. In the first place then, till you have passed the years of early womanhood, take only water to drink, for this is by nature of all drinks the most cooling. This, if your stomach is strong enough to bear it; but if your digestion is weak, hear what the apostle says to Timothy: "use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." [1 Tim. 5:23] Then as regards your food you must avoid all heating dishes. I do not speak of flesh dishes only (although of these the chosen vessel declares his mind thus: "it is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine" [Rom. 14:21]) but of vegetables as well. Everything provocative or indigestible is to be refused. Be assured that nothing is so good for young Christians as the eating of herbs. Accordingly in another place he says: "another who is weak eateth herbs." [Rom. 14:2] Thus the heat of the body must be tempered with cold food. Daniel and the three children lived on pulse. [Dan. 1:16] They were still boys and had not come yet to that frying-pan on which the King of Babylon fried the elders¹¹ who were judges. Moreover, by an express privilege of God's own giving their bodily condition was improved by their regimen. We do not expect that it will be so with us, but we look for increased vigour of soul which becomes stronger as the flesh grows weaker. Some persons who aspire to the life of chastity fall midway in their journey from supposing that they need only abstain from flesh. They load their stomachs with vegetables which are only harmless when taken sparingly and in moderation. If I am to say what I think, there is nothing which so much heats the body and inflames the passions as undigested food and breathing broken with hiccoughs. As for you, my daughter, I would rather wound your modesty than endanger my case by understatement. Regard everything as poison which bears within it the seeds of sensual pleasure. A meagre diet which leaves the appetite always unsatisfied is to be preferred to fasts three days long. It is much better to take a little every day than some days to abstain wholly and on others to surfeit oneself. That rain is best which falls slowly to the ground. Showers that come down suddenly and with violence wash away the soil.

11. When you eat your meals, reflect that you must immediately afterwards pray and read. Have a fixed number of lines of holy scripture, and render it as your task to your Lord. On no account resign yourself to sleep until you have filled the basket of your breast with a woof of this weaving. After the holy scriptures you should read the writings of learned men; of those at any rate whose faith is well known. You need not go into the mire to seek for gold; you have many pearls, buy the one pearl with these. [Matt. 13:45, Matt. 13:46] Stand, as Jeremiah says, in more ways than one that so you may come on the true way that leads to the Father. [Jer. 6:16] Exchange your love of necklaces and of gems and of silk dresses for earnestness in studying the scriptures. Enter the land of promise that flows with milk and honey. [Ex. 33:3] Eat fine flour and oil. Let your clothing be, like Joseph's, of many colors. [Gen. 37:23] Let your ears like those of Jerusalem [Ezek. 16:12] be pierced by the word of God that the precious grains of new corn may hang from them. In that reverend man Exuperius¹² you have a man of tried years and faith ready to give you constant support with his advice.

12. Make to yourself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness that they may receive you into everlasting habitations. [Luke 16:9] Give your riches not to those who feed on pheasants but to those who have none but common bread to eat, such as stays hunger while it does not stimulate lust. Consider the poor and needy. [Ps. 41:1] Give to everyone that asks of you, [Matt. 5:42] but especially unto them who are of the household of faith. [Gal. 6:10] Clothe the naked, feed the hungry, visit the sick. [Cf. Matt. 25:35, Matt. 25:36] Every time that you hold out your hand, think of Christ. See to it that you do not, when the Lord your God asks an alms of you, increase riches which are none of His.

13. Avoid the company of young men. Let long baited youths dandified and wanton never be seen under your roof. Repel a singer as you would some bane. Hurry from your house women who live by playing and singing, the devil's choir whose songs are the fatal ones of sirens. Do not arrogate to yourself a widow's license and appear in public preceded by a host of eunuchs. It is a most mischievous thing for those who are weak owing to their sex and youth to misuse their own discretion and to suppose that things are lawful because they are pleasant. "All things are lawful, but all things are not expedient." [1 Cor. 6:12] No frizzled steward nor shapely foster brother nor fair and ruddy footman must dangle at your heels. Sometimes the tone of the mistress is inferred from the dress of the maid. Seek the society of holy virgins and widows; and, if need arises for holding converse with men, do not shun having witnesses, and let your conversation be marked with such confidence that the entry of a third person shall neither startle you nor make you blush. The face is the mirror of the mind and a woman's eyes without a word betray the secrets of her heart. I have lately seen a most miserable scandal traverse the entire East. The lady's age and style, her dress and mien, the indiscriminate company she kept, her dainty table and her regal appointments bespoke her the bride of a Nero or of a Sardanapallus. The scars of others should teach us caution. 'When he that causeth trouble is scourged the fool will be wiser.' [Prov. 19:25, Vulg] A holy love knows no impatience. A false rumor is quickly crushed and the after life passes judgment on that which has gone before. It is not indeed possible that any one should come to the end of life's race without suffering from calumny; the wicked find it a consolation to carp at the good, supposing the guilt of sin to be less, in proportion as the number of those who commit it is greater. Still a fire of straw quickly dies out and a spreading flame soon expires if fuel to it be wanting. Whether the report which prevailed a year ago was true or false, when once the sin ceases, the scandal also will cease. I do not say this because I fear anything wrong in your case but because, owing to my deep affection for you, there is no safety that I do not fear. [Cf. Virg. A. 4:298] Oh! that you could see your sister¹³ and that it might be yours to hear the eloquence of her holy lips and to behold the mighty spirit which animates her diminutive frame. You might hear the whole contents of the old and new testaments come bubbling up out of her heart. Fasting is her sport, and prayer she makes her pastime. Like Miriam after the drowning Pharaoh she takes up her timbrel and sings to the virgin choir, "Let us sing to the Lord for He hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." [Ex. 15:21] She teaches her companions to be music girls but music girls for Christ, to be luteplayers but luteplayers for the Saviour. In this occupation she passes both day and night and with oil ready to put in the lamps she waits the coming of the Bridegroom. [Matt. 25:4] Do you therefore imitate your kinswoman. Let Rome have in you what a grander city than Rome, I mean Bethlehem, has in her.

14. You have wealth and can easily therefore supply food to those who want it. Let virtue consume what was provided for self-indulgence; one who means to despise matrimony need fear no degree of want. Have about you troops of virgins whom you may lead into the king's chamber. Support widows that you may mingle them as a kind of violets with the virgins' lilies and the martyrs' roses. Such are the garlands you must weave for Christ in place of that crown of thorns [Matt. 27:29] in which he bore the sins of the world. Let your most noble father thus find in you his joy and support, let him learn from his daughter the lessons he used to learn from his wife. His hair is already gray, his knees tremble, his teeth fall out, his brow is furrowed through years, death is nigh even at the doors, the pyre is all but laid out hard by. Whether we like it or not, we grow old. Let him provide for himself the provision which is needful for his long journey. Let him take with him what otherwise he must unwillingly leave behind, nay let him send before him to heaven what if he declines it, will be appropriated by earth.

15. Young widows, of whom some "are already turned aside after Satan, when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ " [1 Tim. 5:15, 1 Tim. 5:11] and wish to marry, generally make such excuses as these. "My little patrimony is daily decreasing, the property which I have inherited is being squandered, a servant has spoken insultingly to me, a maid has neglected my orders. Who will appear for me before the authorities? Who will be responsible for the rents of my estates? Who will see to the education of my children, and to the bringing up of my slaves?" Thus, shameful to say, they put that forward as a reason for marrying again, which alone should deter them from doing so. For by marrying again a mother places over her sons not a guardian but a foe, not a father but a tyrant. Inflamed by her passions she forgets the fruit of her womb, and among the children who know nothing of their sad fate the lately weeping widow dresses herself once more as a bride. Why these excuses about your property and the insolence of slaves? Confess the shameful truth. No woman marries to avoid cohabiting with a husband. At least, if passion is not your motive, it is mere madness to play the harlot just to increase wealth. You do but purchase a paltry and passing gain at the price of a grace which is precious and eternal! If you have children already, why do you want to marry? If you have none, why do you not fear a recurrence of your former sterility? Why do you put an uncertain gain before a certain loss of self-respect? A marriage-settlement is made in your favour to-day but in a short time you will be constrained to make your will. Your husband will feign sickness and will do for you what he wants you to do for him. Yet he is sure to live and you are sure to die. Or if it happens that you have sons by the second husband, domestic strife is certain to result and intestine disputes. You will not be allowed to love your first children, nor to look kindly on those to whom you have yourself given birth. You will have to give them their food secretly; yet even so your present husband will bear a grudge against your previous one and, unless you hate your sons, he will think that you still love their father. But your husband have may issue by a former wife. If so when he takes you to his home, though you should be the kindest person in the world, all the commonplaces of rhetoricians and declamations of comic poets and writers of mimes will be hurled at you as a cruel stepmother. If your stepson fall sick or have a headache you will be calumniated as a poisoner. If you refuse him food, you will be cruel, while if you give it, you will be held to have bewitched him. I ask you what benefit has a second marriage to confer great enough to compensate for these evils?

16. Do we wish to know what widows ought to be? Let us read the gospel according to Luke. "There was one Anna," he says, "a prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel of the tribe of Aser."

[Luke 2:36] The meaning of the name Anna is grace. Phanuel is in our tongue the face of God. Aser may be translated either as blessedness or as wealth. From her youth up to the age of fourscore and four years she had borne the burden of widowhood, not departing from the temple and giving herself to fastings and prayers night and day; therefore she earned spiritual grace, received the title 'daughter of the face of God,'¹⁵ and obtained a share in the 'blessedness and wealth'¹⁶ which belonged to her ancestry. Let us recall to mind the widow of Zarephath [1 K. 17] who thought more of satisfying Elijah's hunger than of preserving her own life and that of her son. Though she believed that she and he must die that very night unless they had food, she determined that her guest should survive. She preferred to sacrifice her life rather than to neglect the duty of almsgiving. In her handful of meal she found the seed from which she was to reap a harvest sent her by the Lord. She sows her meal and lo! a cruse of oil comes from it. In the land of Judah grain was scarce for the corn of wheat had died there; [John. 12:24] but in the house of a heathen widow oil flowed in streams. In the book of Judith-if any one is of opinion that it should be received as canonical-we read of a widow wasted with fasting and wearing the sombre garb of a mourner, whose outward squalor indicated not so much the regret which she felt for her dead husband as the temper¹⁷ in which she looked forward to the coming of the Bridegroom. I see her hand armed with the sword and stained with blood. I recognize the head of Holofernes which she has carried away from the camp of the enemy. Here a woman vanquishes men, and chastity beheads lust. Quickly changing her garb, she puts on once more in the hour of victory her own mean dress finer than all the splendours of the world. [Judith 13]

17. Some from a misapprehension number Deborah among the widows, and suppose that Barak the leader of the army is her son, though the scripture tells a different story. I will mention her here because she was a prophetess and is reckoned among the judges, and again because she might have said with the psalmist:-"How sweet are thy words unto my taste! yea sweeter than honey to my mouth." [Ps. 119:103] Well was she called the bee¹⁸ for she fed on the flowers of scripture, was enveloped with the fragrance of the Holy Spirit, and gathered into one with prophetic lips the sweet juices of the nectar. Then there is Naomi, in Greek "παράκλημα■νη"¹⁹ or she who is consoled, who, when her husband and her children died abroad, carried her chastity back home and, being supported on the road by its aid, kept with her her Moabitish daughter-in-law, that in her the prophecy of Isaiah²⁰ might find a fulfilment. "Send out the lamb, O Lord, to rule over the land from the rock of the desert to the mount of the daughter of Zion."²¹ I pass on to the widow in the gospel who, though she was but a poor widow was yet richer than all the people of Israel. [Mark 12:43] She had but a grain of mustard seed, but she put her leaven in three measures of flour; and, combining her confession of the Father and of the Son with the grace of the Holy Spirit, she cast her two mites into the treasury. All the substance that she had, her entire possessions, she offered in the two testaments of her faith. These are the two seraphim which glorify the Trinity with threefold song²² and are stored among the treasures of the church. They also form the legs of the tongs by which the live coal is caught up to purge the sinner's lips. [Isa. 6:6]

18. But why should I recall instances from history and bring from books types of saintly women, when in your own city you have many before your eyes whose example you may well imitate? I shall not recount their merits here lest I should seem to flatter them. It will suffice to mention the saintly Marcella²³ who, while she is true to the claims of her birth and station, has set before us a life which is worthy of the gospel. Anna "lived with an husband seven years from her virginity";

[Luke 2:36] Marcella lived with one for seven months. Anna looked for the coming of Christ; Marcella holds fast the Lord whom Anna received in her arms. Anna sang His praise when He was still a wailing infant; Marcella proclaims His glory now that He has won His triumph. Anna spoke of Him to all those who waited for the redemption of Israel; Marcella cries out with the nations of the redeemed: "A brother redeemeth not, yet a man shall redeem," [Ps. 49:7. Vulg] and from another psalm: "A man was born in her, and the Highest Himself hath established her." [Ps. 87:5]

About two years ago, as I well remember, I published a book against Jovinian in which by the authority of scripture I crushed the objections raised on the other side on account of the apostle's concession of second marriages. It is unnecessary that I should repeat my arguments afresh here, as you can find them all in this treatise. That I may not exceed the limits of a letter, I will only give you this one last piece of advice. Think every day that you must die, and you will then never think of marrying again.

1: i.e. a celibate 2: Lucius Furius Camillus, the hero who conquered Veii and freed Rome from the Gauls 3: Horace, A. P. 94: the allusion is to a scene in the Heauton Timorumenus of Terence 4: Hac ambitione ditata 5: Furia's sister-in-law Blaesilla was through her mother Paula descended from the Gracchi. See Letter CVIII 6: See Letter 38 7: Propositum. The word was passing from the meaning of a purpose into that of a formal vow

8: Titiana 9: The island of Lemnos in the Aegean Sea 10: The hundred-eyed son of Inachus appointed by Hera to be the guardian of Io

11: i.e. Ahab and Zedekiah whose fate is recorded Jer. 29:20-23. According to Jerome tradition identified them with the elders who tempted Susannah. although these latter are said to have been stoned and not burned 12: Afterwards Bishop of Tolosa (Toulouse). He is mentioned again in Letters CXXIII. and CXXV 13: Her cousin Eustochium seems to be meant 14: Agrorum tributa 15: Penuel (AV. Phanuel) means 'face of God' cf. Gen. 32:30 16: Asher = 'blessedness or wealth.' 17: i.e., that of penitence 18: The meaning of Deborah 19: Jerome appears to have read ymt 20: Made long afterwards 21: Isa. 16:1 Vulg. 'the rock of the desert' is a poetical name for Moab 22: Isa. 6:2, Isa. 6:3. See Letter, 18 ante 23: See Letters 23, 77, etc

Letters - letter_055

Letter 55. To Amandus. A very interesting letter. Amandus a presbyter of Burdigala (Bordeaux) had written to Jerome for an explanation of three passages of scripture, viz. Matt. vi. 34, 1 Cor. vi. 18, 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26, and had in the same letter on behalf of a 'sister' (supposed by Thierry to have been Fabiola) put the following question: 'Can a woman who has divorced her first husband on account of his vices and who has during his lifetime under compulsion married again, communicate with the Church without first doing penance? Jerome in his reply gives the explanations asked for but answers the farther question, that concerning the 'sister,' with an emphatic negative. Written about the year 394 a.d.

1. A short letter does not admit of long explanations; compressing much matter into a small space it can only give a few words to topics which suggest many thoughts. You ask me what is the meaning of the passage in the gospel according to Matthew, "take no thought for the morrow. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." [Matt. 6:34] In the holy scriptures "the morrow" signifies the time to come. Thus in Genesis Jacob says: "So shall my righteousness answer for me to-morrow." [Gen. 30:33, AV. marg] Again when the two tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh had built an altar and when all Israel had sent to them an embassy, they made answer to Phinehas the high priest that they had built the altar lest "to-morrow" it might be said to their children, "ye have no part in the Lord."¹ You may find many similar passages in the old instrument.² While then Christ forbids us to take thought for things future, He has allowed us to do so for things present, knowing as He does the frailty of our mortal condition. His remaining words "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof" are to be understood as meaning that it is sufficient for us to think of the present troubles of this life. Why need we extend our thoughts to contingencies, to objects which we either cannot obtain or else having obtained must soon relinquish? The Greek word "κακία" rendered in the Latin version "wickedness" has two distinct meanings, wickedness and tribulation, which latter the Greek call "κακωσις" and in this passage "tribulation" would be a better rendering than "wickedness." But if any one demurs to this and insists that the word "κακία" must mean "wickedness" and not "tribulation" or "trouble," the meaning must be the same as in the words "the whole world lieth in wickedness"³ and as in the Lord's prayer in the clause, "deliver us from evil:" [Matt. 6:13. apo tou ponhrou] the purport of the passage will then be that our present conflict with the wickedness of this world should be enough for us.

2. Secondly, you ask me concerning the passage in the first epistle of the blessed apostle Paul to the Corinthians where he says: 'every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body.' [1 Cor. 6:18] Let us go back a little farther and read on until we come to these words, for we must not seek to learn the whole meaning of the section, from the concluding parts of it, or, if I may so say, from the tail of the chapter.⁴ "The body is not for fornication but for the Lord; and the Lord for the body. And God hath both raised up the Lord and will also raise up us [with Him] by his own power. Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ? Shall I then take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid. What! Know ye not that he which is joined to an harlot is one body? For two, saith he, shall be one flesh. But he that is joined unto the Lord is one spirit. Flee fornication. Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body," [1 Cor. 6:13-18] and so on. The holy apostle has been arguing against excess and has just before said "meats for the belly and the belly for meats: but God shall destroy both it and them." [1 Cor. 6:13] Now he comes to treat of fornication. For excess in eating is the mother of lust; a belly that is distended with food and saturated with draughts of wine is sure to lead to sensual passion. As has been elsewhere said "the arrangement of man's organs suggests the course of his vices."⁵ Accordingly all such sins as theft, manslaughter, pillage, perjury, and the like can be repented of after they have been committed; and, however much interest may tempt him, conscience always smites the offender. It is only lust and sensual pleasure that in the very hour of penitence undergo once more the temptations of the past, the itch of the flesh, and the allurements of sin; so that the very thought which we bestow on the correction of such transgressions becomes in itself a new source of sin. Or to put the matter in a different light: other sins are outside of us; and whatever we do we do against others. But fornication defiles the fornicator both in conscience and body; and in accordance with the words of the Lord, "for this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and they twain shall be one flesh," [Matt. 19:5; 1 Cor. 6:16] he too becomes one body with a harlot and sins against his own body by making what is the temple of Christ the body of a harlot. Not to pass over any suggestion of the Greek commentators, I shall give you one more explanation. It is one thing, they say, to sin with the body, and another to sin in the body. Theft, manslaughter, and all other sins except fornication we commit with our hands outside ourselves. Fornication alone we commit inside ourselves in our bodies and not with our bodies upon others. The preposition 'with' denotes the instrument used in sinning, while the preposition 'in' signifies the sphere of the passion is ourselves. Some again give this explanation that according to the scripture a man's body is his wife and that when a man commits fornication he is said to sin against his own body that is against his wife inasmuch as he defiles her by his own fornication and causes her though herself free from sin to become a sinner through her intercourse with him.

3. I find joined to your letter of inquiries a short paper containing the following words: "ask him,(that is me,) whether a woman who has left her husband on the ground that he is an adulterer and sodomite and has found herself compelled to take another may in the lifetime of him whom she first left be in communion with the church without doing penance for her fault." As I read the case put I recall the verse "they make excuses for their sins." [Ps. 161:4 Vulg] We are all the and a indulgent to our own faults; and what our own will leads us to do we attribute to a necessity of nature. It is as though a young man were to say, "I am over-borne by my body, the glow of nature kindles my passions, the structure of my frame and its reproductive organs call for sexual intercourse." Or again a murderer might say, "I was in want, I stood in need of food, I had nothing to cover me. If i shed the blood of another, it was to save myself from dying of cold and hunger." Tell the sister, therefore, who thus enquires of me concerning her condition, not my sentence but that of the apostle. "Know ye not, brethren (for I speak to them that know the law,) how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband, so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. So then, if, while her husband liveth, she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress." [Rom. 7:1-3] And in another place: "the wife is bound by the law as long as her husband liveth; but if her husband be dead, she is at liberty to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord." [1 Cor. 7:39] The apostle has thus cut away every plea and has clearly declared that, if a woman marries again while her husband is living, she is an adulteress. You must not speak to me of the violence of a ravisher, a mother's pleading, a father's bidding, the influence of relatives, the insolence and the intrigues of servants, household losses. A husband may be an adulterer or a sodomite, he may be stained with every crime and may have been left by his wife because of his sins; yet he is still her husband and, so long as he lives, she may not marry another. The apostle does not promulgate this decree on his own authority but on that of Christ who speaks in him. For he has followed the words of Christ in the gospel: "whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced, committeth adultery." [Matt. 5:32] Mark what he says: "whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery." Whether she has put away her husband or her husband her, the man who marries her is still an adulterer. Wherefore the apostles seeing how heavy the yoke of marriage was thus made said to Him: "if the case of the man be so with his wife, it is not good to marry," and the Lord replied, "he that is able to receive it, let him receive it." And immediately by the instance of the three eunuchs he shows the blessedness of virginity which is bound by no carnal tie. [Matt. 19:10-12]

4. I have not been able quite to determine what it is that she means by the words "has found herself compelled" to marry again. What is this compulsion of which she speaks? Was she overborne by a crowd and ravished against her will? If so, why has she not, thus victimized, subsequently put away her ravisher? Let her read the books of Moses and she will find that if violence is offered to a betrothed virgin in a city and she does not cry out, she is punished as an adulteress: but if she is forced in the field, she is innocent of sin and her ravisher alone is amenable to the laws. [Deut. 22:23-27] Therefore if your sister, who, as she says, has been forced into a second union, wishes to receive the body of Christ and not to be accounted an adulteress, let her do penance; so far at least as from the time she begins to repent to have no farther intercourse with that second husband who ought to be called not a husband but an adulterer. If this seems hard to her and if she cannot leave one whom she has once loved and will not prefer the Lord to sensual pleasure, let her hear the declaration of the apostle: "ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of devils: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and of the table of devils," [1 Cor. 10:21] and in another place: "what communion hath light with darkness? and what concord hath Christ with Belial?" [2 Cor. 6:14, 2 Cor. 6:15] What I am about to say may sound novel but after all it is not new but old for it is supported by the witness of the old testament. If she leaves her second husband and desires to be reconciled with her first, she cannot be so now; for it is written in Deuteronomy: "When a man hath taken a wife, and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her; then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house. And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement and giveth it in her hand, and sendeth her out of his house; or if the latter husband die which took her to be his wife; her former husband, which sent her away may not take her again to be his wife, after that she is defiled; for that is abomination before the Lord: and thou shalt not cause the land to sin, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance." [Deut. 24:1-4] Wherefore, I beseech you, do your best to comfort her and to urge her to seek salvation. Diseased flesh calls for the knife and the searing-iron. The wound is to blame and not the healing art, if with a cruelty that is really kindness a physician to spare does not spare, and to be merciful is cruel.⁶

5. Your third and last question relates to the passage in the same epistle where the apostle in discussing the resurrection, comes to the words: "for he must reign, till he hath put all things under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith, all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him that God may be all in all." [1 Cor. 15:25-28] I am surprised that you have resolved to question me about this passage when that reverend man, Hilary, bishop of Poitiers, has occupied the eleventh book of his treatise against the Arians with a full examination and explanation of it. Yet I may at least say a few words. The chief stumbling-block in the passage is that the Son is said to be subject to the Father. Now which is the more shameful and humiliating, to be subject to the Father (often a mark of loving devotion as in the psalm "truly my soul is subject unto God" [Ps. 62:1, Vulg]) or to be crucified and made the curse of the cross? For "cursed is everyone that hangeth on a tree." [Gal. 3:13] If Christ then for our sakes was made a curse that He might deliver us from the curse of the law, are you surprised that He is also for our sakes subject to the Father to make us too subject to Him as He says in the gospel: "No man cometh unto the Father but by me," [John. 14:6] and "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." [John. 12:32] Christ then is subject to the Father in the faithful; for all believers, nay the whole human race, are accounted members of His body. But in unbelievers, that is in Jews, heathens, and heretics, He is said to be not subject; for these members of His body are not subject to the faith. But in the end of the world when all His members shall see Christ, that is their own body, reigning, they also shall be made subject to Christ, that is to their own body, that the whole of Christ's body may be subject unto God and the Father, and that God may be all in all. He does not say "that the Father may be all in all" but that "God" may be, a title which properly belongs to the Trinity and may be referred not only to the Father but also to the Son and to the Holy Ghost. His meaning therefore is "that humanity may be subject to the Godhead." By humanity we here intend not that gentleness and kindness which the Greeks call philanthropy but the whole human race. Moreover when he says "that God may be all in all," it is to be taken in this sense. At present our Lord and Saviour is not all in all, but only a part in each of us. For instance He is wisdom in Solomon, generosity in David, patience in Job, knowledge of things to come in Daniel faith in Peter, zeal in Phinehas and Paul, virginity in John, and other virtues in others. But when the end of all things shall come, then shall He be all in all, for then the saints shall severally possess all the virtues and all will possess Christ in His entirety.

1:

Josh. 22:27, AV. and RV. have "in time to come.

2: Instrumentum-a legal term introduced by Tertullian. He uses it both of the Christian dispensation and of its written record 3: 1 John. 5:19. Where, however, the word is entwined

4: Capitulum, "Passage." The present division of the Bible into chapters did not exist in Jerome's time. It is ascribed by some to Abp. Stephen Langton and by others to Card. Hugh de St. Cher 5: Tertullian, on Fasting, I 6: Cf. Letter XL

Letters - letter_056

Letter 56. From Augustine

Augustine's first letter to Jerome: through a series of accidents it was not delivered until nine years after it had been written. In it Augustine comments on Jerome's new Latin version of the O. T. and advises him in his future labours to adhere more closely to the text of the LXX. He also discusses Jerome's account (in his commentary on the epistle to the Galatians) of the quarrel between Paul and Peter at Antioch. This according to Jerome was not a real misunderstanding but only one artificially 'got up' to put clearly before the Church the mischief of Christians conforming to the now obsolete Mosaic Law. Augustine strongly controverts this view and maintains that it is fatal to the veracity and authority claimed for scripture. Written from Hippo about the year 394 a.d. In collections labeled Augustine's Letter 28, or Jerome's Letter 56. To Jerome, His Most Beloved Lord, and Brother and Fellow-Presbyter, Worthy of Being Honoured and Embraced with the Sincerest Affectionate Devotion, Augustin Sends Greeting.

1. Never was the face of any one more familiar to another, than the peaceful, happy, and truly noble diligence of your studies in the Lord has become to me. For although I long greatly to be acquainted with you, I feel that already my knowledge of you is deficient in respect of nothing but a very small part of you, -namely, your personal appearance; and even as to this, I cannot deny that since my most blessed brother Alypius (now invested with the office of bishop, of which he was then truly worthy) has seen you, and has on his return been seen by me, it has been almost completely imprinted on my mind by his report of you; nay, I may say that before his return, when he saw you there, I was seeing you myself with his eyes. For any one who knows us may say of him and me, that in body only, and not in mind, we are two, so great is the union of heart, so firm the intimate friendship subsisting between us; though in merit we are not alike, for his is far above mine. Seeing, therefore, that you love me, both of old through the communion of spirit by which we are knit to each other, and more recently through what you know of me from the mouth of my friend, I feel that it is not presumptuous in me (as it would be in one wholly unknown to you) to recommend to your brotherly esteem the brother Profuturus, in whom we trust that the happy omen of his name (Good-speed) may be fulfilled through our efforts furthered after this by your aid; although, perhaps, it may be presumptuous on this ground, that he is so great a man, that it would be much more fitting that I should be commended to you by him, than he by me. I ought perhaps to write no more, if I were willing to content myself with the style of a formal letter of introduction; but my mind overflows into conference with you, concerning the studies with which we are occupied in Christ Jesus our Lord, who is pleased to furnish us largely through your love with many benefits, and some helps by the way, in the path which He has pointed out to His followers.

2. We therefore, and with us all that are devoted to study in the African churches, beseech you not to refuse to devote care and labour to the translation of the books of those who have written in the Greek language most able commentaries on our Scriptures. You may thus put us also in possession of these men, and especially of that one whose name you seem to have singular pleasure in sounding forth in your writings [Origen]. But I beseech you not to devote your labour to the work of translating into Latin the sacred canonical books, unless you follow the method in which you have translated Job, viz. with the addition of notes, to let it be seen plainly what differences there are between this version of yours and that of the LXX., whose authority is worthy of highest esteem. For my own part, I cannot sufficiently express my wonder that anything should at this date be found in the Hebrew Mss. which escaped so many translators perfectly acquainted with the language. I say nothing of the LXX., regarding whose harmony in mind and spirit, surpassing that which is found in even one man, I dare not in any way pronounce a decided opinion, except that in my judgment, beyond question, very high authority must in this work of translation be conceded to them. I am more perplexed by those translators who, though enjoying the advantage of labouring after the LXX. had completed their work, and although well acquainted, as it is reported, with the force of Hebrew words and phrases, and with Hebrew syntax, have not only failed to agree among themselves, but have left many things which, even after so long a time, still remain to be discovered and brought to light. Now these things were either obscure or plain: if they were obscure, it is believed that you are as likely to have been mistaken as the others; if they were plain, it is not believed that they [the LXX.] could possibly have been mistaken. Having stated the grounds of my perplexity, I appeal to your kindness to give me an answer regarding this matter.

3. I have been reading also some writings, ascribed to you, on the Epistles of the Apostle Paul. In reading your exposition of the Epistle to the Galatians, that passage came to my hand in which the Apostle Peter is called back from a course of dangerous dissimulation. To find there the defence of falsehood undertaken, whether by you, a man of such weight, or by any author (if it is the writing of another), causes me, I must confess, great sorrow, until at least those things which decide my opinion in the matter are refuted, if indeed they admit of refutation. For it seems to me that most disastrous consequences must follow upon our believing that anything false is found in the sacred books: that is to say, that the men by whom the Scripture has been given to us, and committed to writing, did put down in these books anything false. It is one question whether it may be at any time the duty of a good man to deceive; but it is another question whether it can have been the duty of a writer of Holy Scripture to deceive: nay, it is not another question-it is no question at all. For if you once admit into such a high sanctuary of authority one false statement as made in the way of duty,¹ there will not be left a single sentence of those books which, if appearing to any one difficult in practice or hard to believe, may not by the same fatal rule be explained away, as a statement in which, intentionally, and under a sense of duty, the author declared what was not true.

4. For if the Apostle Paul did not speak the truth when, finding fault with the Apostle Peter, he said: "If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?"-if, indeed, Peter seemed to him to be doing what was right, and if, notwithstanding, he, in order to soothe troublesome opponents, both said and wrote that Peter did what was wrong; [Gal. 2:11-14] -if we say thus, what then shall be our answer when perverse men such as he himself prophetically described arise, forbidding marriage, [1 Tim. 4:3] if they defend themselves by saying that, in all which the same apostle wrote in confirmation of the lawfulness of marriage, [Cor. 7:10-16] he was, on account of men who, through love for their wives, might become troublesome opponents, declaring what was false,-saying these things, forsooth, not because he believed them, but because their opposition might thus be averted? It is unnecessary to quote many parallel examples. For even things which pertain to the praises of God might be represented as piously intended falsehoods, written in order that love for Him might be enkindled in men who were slow of heart; and thus nowhere in the sacred books shall the authority of pure truth stand sure. Do we not observe the great care with which the same apostle commends the truth to us, when he says: "And if Christ be not risen, then is our: preaching vain, and your faith is also vain: yea, I and we are found false witnesses of God; because we have testified of God that He raised up Christ; whom He raised not up, if so be that the dead rise not." [1 Cor. 15:14-15] If any one said to him, "Why are you so shocked by this falsehood, when the thing which you have said, even if it were false, tends very greatly to the glory of God?" would he not, abhorring the madness of such a man, with every word and sign which could express his feelings, open clearly the secret depths of his own heart, protesting that to speak well of a falsehood uttered on behalf of God, was a crime not less, perhaps even greater, than to speak ill of the truth concerning Him? We must therefore be careful to secure, in order to our knowledge of the divine Scriptures, the guidance only of such a man as is imbued with a high reverence for the sacred books, and a profound persuasion of their truth, preventing him from flattering himself in any part of them with the hypothesis of a statement being made not because it was true, but because it was expedient, and making him rather pass by what he does not understand, than set up his own feelings above that truth. For, truly, when he pronounces anything to be untrue, he demands that he be believed in preference, and endeavours to shake our confidence in the authority of the divine Scriptures.

5. For my part, I would devote all the strength which the Lord grants me, to show that every one of those texts which are wont to be quoted in defence of the expediency of falsehood ought to be otherwise understood, in order that everywhere the sure truth of these passages themselves may be consistently maintained. For as statements adduced in evidence must not be false, neither ought they to favour falsehood. This, however, I leave to your own judgment. For if you apply more thorough attention to the passage, perhaps you will see it much more readily than I have done. To this more careful study that piety will move you, by which you discern that the authority of the divine Scriptures becomes unsettled (so that every one may believe what he wishes, and reject what he does not wish) if this be once admitted, that the men by whom these things have been delivered unto us, could in their writings state some things which were not true, from considerations of duty;² unless, perchance, you propose to furnish us with certain rules by which we may know when a falsehood might or might not become a duty. If this can be done, I beg you to set forth these rules with reasonings which may be neither equivocal nor precarious; and I beseech you by our Lord, in whom Truth was incarnate, not to consider me burdensome or presumptuous in making this request. For a mistake of mine which is in the interest of truth cannot deserve great blame, if indeed it deserves blame at all, when it is possible for you to use truth in the interest of falsehood without doing wrong.

6. Of many other things I would wish to discourse with your most ingenuous heart, and to take counsel with you concerning Christian studies; but this desire could not be satisfied within the limits of any letter. I may do this more fully by means of the brother bearing this letter, whom I rejoice in sending to share and profit by your sweet and useful conversation. Nevertheless, although I do not reckon myself superior in any respect to him, even he may take less from you than I would desire; and he will excuse my saying so, for I confess myself to have, more room for receiving from you than he has. I see his mind to be already more fully stored, in which unquestionably he excels me. Therefore, when he returns, as I trust he may happily do by God's blessing, and when I become a sharer in all with which his heart has been richly furnished by you, there will still be a consciousness of void unsatisfied in me, and a longing for personal fellowship with you. Hence of the two I shall be the poorer, and he the richer, then as now. This brother carries with him some of my writings, which if you condescend to read, I implore you to review them with candid and brotherly strictness. For the words of Scripture, "The righteous shall correct me in compassion, and reprove me; but the oil of the sinner shall not anoint my head," [Ps. 141:5, Septuagint] I understand to mean that he is the truer friend who by his censure heals me, than the one who by flattery anoints my head. I find the greatest difficulty in exercising a right judgment when I read over what I have written, being either too cautious or too rash. For I sometimes see my own faults, but I prefer to hear them reproved by those who are better able to judge than I am; lest after I have, perhaps justly, charged myself with error, I begin again to flatter myself, and think that my censure has arisen from an undue mistrust of my own judgment.

1:

Officiiosum mendacium.

2:

Aliquaa officiose mentiri.

Letters - letter_057

Letter 57. To Pammachius on the Best Method of Translating.

Written to Pammachius (for whom see Letter 66.) in a.d. 395. In the previous year Jerome had rendered into Latin Letter 51. (from Epiphanius to John of Jerusalem) under circumstances which he here describes (§2). His version soon became public and incurred severe criticism from Some person not named by Jerome but supposed by him to have been instigated by Rufinus (§12). Charged with having falsified his original he now repudiates the charge and defends his method of translation ("to give sense for sense and not word for word" §5) by an appeal to the practice of classical (§5), ecclesiastical (§6), and N. T. (§§7-10) writers. When at a subsequent period Rufinus gave to the world what was in Jerome's opinion a misleading version of Origen's First Principles, he appealed to this letter as giving him ample warranty for what he had done. See Letters LXXX, and LXXXI, and Rufinus' Preface to the peei !Aecwn in Vol. iii. of this series.

1. The apostle Paul when he appeared before King Agrippa to answer the charges, which were brought against him, wishing to use language intelligible to his hearers and confident of the success of his cause, began by congratulating himself in these words: "I think myself happy, King Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee touching all the things whereof I am accused by the Jews: especially because thou art expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews." [Acts 26:2, Acts 26:3] He had read the saying of Jesus:1 "Well is him that speaketh in the ears of them that will hear;" [Ecclus. 25:9] and he knew that a pleader only succeeds in proportion as he impresses his judge. On this occasion I too think myself happy that learned ears will hear my defence. For a rash tongue charges me with ignorance or falsehood; it alleges that in translating another man's letter I have made mistakes through incapacity or carelessness; it convicts me of either an involuntary error or a deliberate offence. And test it should happen that my accuser-encouraged by a volubility which stops at nothing and by an impunity which arrogates to itself an unlimited license-should accuse me as he has already done our father (Pope) Epiphanius; I send this letter to inform you-and through yon others who think me worthy of their regard-of the true order of the facts.

2. About two years ago the aforesaid Pope Epiphanius sent a letter² to Bishop John, first finding fault with him as regarded some of his opinions and then mildly calling him to penitence. Such was the repute of the writer or else the elegance of the letter that all Palestine fought for copies of it. Now there was in our monastery a man of no small estimation in his country, Eusebius of Cremona, who, when he found that this letter was in everybody's mouth and that the ignorant and the educated alike admired it for its teaching and for the purity of its style, set to work to beg me to translate it for him into Latin and at the same time to simplify tile argument so that he might more readily understand it; for he was himself altogether unacquainted with the Greek language. I consented to his request and calling to my aid a secretary speedily dictated my version, briefly marking on the side of the page the contents of the several chapters. The fact is that he asked me to do this merely for himself, and I requested of him in return to keep his copy private and not too readily to circulate it. A year and six months went by, and then the aforesaid translation found its way by a novel stratagem from his desk to Jerusalem. For a pretended monk-either bribed as there is much reason to believe or actuated by malice of his own as his tempter vainly tries to convince us-shewed himself a second Judas by robbing Eusebius of his literary property and gave to the adversary an occasion of railing³ against me. They tell the unlearned that I have falsified the original, that I have not rendered word for word, that I have put 'dear friend' in place of 'honourable sir,' and more shameful still! that I have cut down my translation by omitting the words "α■δεσιμ■τατε Π■ππα".⁴ These and similar trifles form the substance of the charges brought against me.

3. At the outset before I defend my version I wish to ask those persons who confound wisdom with cunning, some few questions. Where did you get your copy of the letter? Who gave it to you? How have you the effrontery to bring forward what you have procured by fraud? What place of safety will be left us if we cannot conceal our secrets even within our own walls and our own writing-desks? Were I to press such a charge against you before a legal tribunal, I could make you amenable to the laws which even in fiscal cases appoint penalties for meddlesome informers and condemn the traitor even while they accept his treachery. For though they welcome the profit which the information gives them, they disapprove the motive which actuates the informer. A little while ago a man of consular rank named Hesychius (against whom the patriarch Gamaliel waged an implacable war) was condemned to death by the emperor Theodosius simply because he had laid hold of imperial papers through a secretary whom he had tempted. We read also in old histories [Livy 5:27] that the schoolmaster who betrayed the children of the Faliscans was sent back to his boys and handed over to them in bonds, the Roman people refusing to accept a dishonourable victory. When Pyrrhus king of Epirus was lying in his camp ill from the effects of a wound, his physician offered to poison him, but Fabricius thinking it shame that the king should die by treachery sent the traitor back in chains to his master, refusing to sanction crime even when its victim was an enemy.⁵ A principle which the laws uphold, which is maintained by enemies, which warfare and the sword fail to violate, has hitherto been held unquestioned among the monks and priests of Christ. And can any one of them presume now, knitting his brow and snapping his fingers,⁶ to spend his breath in saving: "What if he did use bribes or other inducements! he did what suited his purpose." A strange plea truly to defend a fraud as though robbers, thieves, and pirates did not do the same. Certainly, when Annas and Caiaphas led hapless Judas astray, they only did what they believed to be expedient for themselves.

4. Suppose that I wish to write down in my note books this or that silly trifle, or to make comments upon the scriptures, to retort upon my calumniators, to digest my wrath, to practise myself in the use of commonplaces and to stow away sharp shafts for the day of battle. So long as I do not publish my thoughts, they are only unkind words not matter for a charge of libel; in fact they are not even unkind words for the public ear never hears them. You⁷ may bribe my slaves and tamper with my clients. You may, as the fable has it, penetrate by means of your gold to the chamber of Danaë;⁸ and then, dissembling what you have done, you may call me a falsifier; but, if you do so, you will have to plead guilty yourself to a worse charge than any that you can bring against me. One man inveighs against you as a heretic, another as a perverter of doctrine. You are silent yourself; you do not venture to answer; you assail the translator; you cavil about syllables and you fancy your defence complete if your calumnies provoke no reply. Suppose that I have made a mistake or an omission in my rendering. Your whole case turns upon this; this is the defence which you offer to your accusers. Are you no heretic because I am a bad translator? Mind, I do not say that I know you to be a heretic; I leave such knowledge to your accuser, to him who wrote the letter:⁹ what I do say is that it is the height of folly for you when you are accused by one man to attack another, and when you are covered with wounds yourself to seek comfort by wounding one who is still quiescent and unaggressive.

5. In the above remarks I have assumed that I have made alterations in the letter and that a simple translation may contain errors though not wilful ones. As, however the letter itself shews that no changes have been made in the sense, that nothing has been added, and that no doctrine has been foisted into it, "obviously their object is understanding to understand nothing;"¹⁰ and while they desire to arraign another's want of skill, they betray their own. For I myself not only admit but freely proclaim that in translating from the Greek (except in the case of the holy scriptures where even the order of the words is a mystery) I render sense for sense and not word for word. For this course I have the authority of Tully who has so translated the Protagoras of Plato, the Oeconomicus of Xenophon, and the two beautiful orations¹¹ which Aeschines and Demosthenes delivered one against the other. What omissions, additions, and alterations he has made substituting the idioms of his own for those of another tongue, this is not the time to say. I am satisfied to quote the authority of the translator who has spoken as follows in a prologue¹² prefixed to the orations. "I have thought it right to embrace a labour which though not necessary for myself will prove useful to those who study. I have translated the noblest speeches of the two most eloquent of the Attic orators, the speeches which Aeschines and Demosthenes delivered one against the other; but I have rendered them not as a translator but as an orator, keeping the sense but altering the form by adapting both the metaphors and the words to suit our own idiom. I have not deemed it necessary to render word for word but I have reproduced the general style and emphasis. I have not supposed myself bound to pay the words out one by one to the reader but only to give him an equivalent in value." Again at the close of his task he says, "I shall be well satisfied if my rendering is found, as I trust it will be, true to this standard. In making it I have utilized all the excellences of the originals, I mean the sentiments, the forms of expression and the arrangement of the topics, while I have followed the actual wording only so far as I could do so without offending our notions of taste. If all that I have written is not to be found in the Greek, I have at any rate striven to make it correspond with it." Horace too, an acute and learned writer, in his Art of Poetry gives the same advice to the skilled translator:- "And care not thou with over anxious thought To render word for word."¹³

Terence has translated Menander; Plautus and Caecilius the old comic poets.¹⁴ Do they ever stick at words? Do they not rather in their versions think first of preserving the beauty and charm of their originals? What men like you call fidelity in transcription, the learned term pestilent minuteness.¹⁵ Such were my teachers about twenty years ago; and even then¹⁶ I was the victim of a similar error to that which is now imputed to me, though indeed I never imagined that you would charge me with it. In translating the Chronicle of Eusebius of Caesarea into Latin, I made among others the following prefatory observations: "It is difficult in following lines laid down by others not sometimes to diverge from them, and it is hard to preserve in a translation the charm of expressions which in another language are most felicitous Each particular word conveys a meaning of its own, and possibly I have no equivalent by which to render it, and I make a circuit to reach my goal, I have to go many miles to cover a short distance.¹⁷ To these difficulties must be added the windings of hyperbata, differences in the use of cases, divergencies of metaphor; and last of all the peculiar and if I may so call it, inbred character of the language. If I render word for word, the result will sound uncouth, and if compelled by necessity I alter anything in the order or wording, I shall seem to have departed from the function of a translator."¹⁸ And after a long discussion which it would be tedious to follow out here, I added what follows: "If any one imagines that translation does not impair the charm of style, let him render Homer word for word into Latin, nay I will go farther still and say, let him render it into Latin prose, and the result will be that the order of the words will seem ridiculous and the most eloquent of poets scarcely articulate."¹⁹

6. In quoting my own writings my only object has been to prove that from my youth up I at least have always aimed at rendering sense not words, but if such authority as they supply is deemed insufficient, read and consider the short preface dealing with this matter which occurs in a book narrating the life of the blessed Antony.²⁰ "A literal translation from one language into another obscures the sense; the exuberance of the growth lessens the yield. For while one's diction is enslaved to cases and metaphors, it has to explain by tedious circumlocutions what a few words would otherwise have sufficed to make plain. I have tried to avoid this error in the translation which at your request I have made of the story of the blessed Antony. My version always preserves the sense although it does not invariably keep the words of the original. Leave others to catch at syllables and letters, do you for your part look for the meaning." Time would fail me were I to unfold the testimonies of all who have translated only according to the sense. It is sufficient for the present to name Hilary the confessor²¹ who has turned some homilies on Job and several treatises on the Psalms from Greek into Latin; yet has not bound himself to the drowsiness of the letter or fettered himself by the stale literalism of inadequate culture. Like a conqueror he has led away captive into his own tongue the meaning of his originals.

7. That secular and church writers should have adopted this line need not surprise us when we consider that the translators of the Septuagint,²² the evangelists, and the apostles, have done the same in dealing with the sacred writings. We read in Mark [Mark 5:41] of the Lord saying Talitha cumi and it is immediately added "which is interpreted, Damsel, I say unto thee, arise." The evangelist may be charged with falsehood for having added the words "I say unto thee" for the Hebrew is only "Damsel arise." To emphasize this and to give the impression of one calling and commanding he has added "I say unto thee." Again in Matthew [Matthew 27:9, Matthew 27:10] when the thirty pieces of silver are returned by the traitor Judas and the potter's field is purchased with them, it is written: "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken of by Jeremy the prophet, saying, "And they took the thirty pieces of silver the price of him that was valued which²³ they of the children of Israel did value, and gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me." This passage is not found in Jeremiah at all but in Zechariah, in quite different words and an altogether different order. In fact the Vulgate renders it as follows: "And I will say unto them, If it is good in your sight, give ye me a price or refuse it: So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver. And the Lord said unto me, Put them into the melting furnace and consider if it is tried as I have been tried by them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver and cast them into the house of the Lord." [Zech. 11:12, 13, Vulg] It is evident that the rendering of the Septuagint differs widely from the quotation of the evangelist. In the Hebrew also, though the sense is the same, the words are quite different and differently arranged. It says: "And I said unto them, If ye think good, give me my price; and, if not, forbear. So they weighed for my price thirty pieces of silver. And the Lord said unto me, Cast it unto the potter;²⁴ a goodly price that I was priced at of them. And I took the thirty pieces of silver and cast them to the potter in the house of the Lord." [Zech. 11:12, Zech. 11:13, AV] They may accuse the apostle of falsifying his version seeing that it agrees neither with the Hebrew nor with the translators of the Septuagint: and worse than this, they may say that he has mistaken the author's name putting down Jeremiah when it should be Zechariah. Far be it from us to speak thus of a follower²⁵ of Christ, who made it his care to formulate dogmas rather than to hunt for words and syllables. To take another instance from Zechariah, the evangelist John quotes from the Hebrew, "They shall look on him whom they pierced," [John. 19:37, Zech. 12:10] for which we read in the Septuagint, "And they shall look upon me because they have mocked me," and in the Latin version, "And they shall look upon me for the things which they have mocked or insulted." Here the evangelist, the Septuagint, and our own version²⁶ all differ; yet the divergence of language is atoned by oneness of spirit. In Matthew again we read of the Lord preaching flight to the apostles and confirming His counsel with a passage from Zechariah. "It is written," he says, "I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad." [Matt. 26:31, Zech. 13:7] But in the Septuagint and in the Hebrew it reads differently, for it is not God who speaks, as the evangelist makes out, but the prophet who appeals to God the Father saying:—"Smite the shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered." In this instance according to my judgment—and I have some careful critics with me—the evangelist is guilty of a fault in presuming to ascribe to God what are the words of the prophet. Again the same evangelist writes that at the warning of an angel Joseph took the young child and his mother and went into Egypt and remained there till the death of Herod; "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son." [Matt. 2:13-15] The Latin manuscripts do not so give the passage, but in Hosea [Hos. 11:1] the true Hebrew text has the following:—"When Israel was a child then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt." Which the Septuagint renders thus:—"When Israel was a child then I loved him, and called his sons out of Egypt." Are they²⁷ altogether to be rejected because they have given another turn to a passage which refers primarily to the mystery of Christ? Or should we not rather pardon the shortcomings of the translators on the score of their human frailty according to the saying of James, "In many things we offend all. If any man offend not in word the same is a perfect man and able also to bridle the whole body." [James 3:2] Once more it is written in the pages of the same evangelist, "And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene." [Matt. 2:23] Let these word fanciers and nice critics of all composition tell us where they have read the words; and if they cannot, let me tell them that they are in Isaiah. [Isa. 11:1] For in the place where we read and translate, "There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots,"²⁸ in the Hebrew idiom it is written thus, "There shall come forth a rod out of the root of Jesse and a Nazarene shall grow from his root." How can the Septuagint leave out the word 'Nazarene,' if it is unlawful to substitute one word for another? It is sacrilege either to conceal or to set at naught a mystery.

8. Let us pass on to other passages, for the brief limits of a letter do not suffer us to dwell too long on any one point. The same Matthew says:—"Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet saying, Behold a virgin shall be with child and shall bring forth a son and they shall call his name Emmanuel." [Matt. 1:22, Matt. 1:23, Isa. 7:14] The rendering of the Septuagint is, "Behold a virgin shall receive seed and shall bring forth a son, and ye shall call his name Emmanuel." If people cavil at words, obviously 'to receive seed' is not the exact equivalent of 'to be with child,' and 'ye shall call' differs from 'they shall call.' Moreover in the Hebrew we read thus, "Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son and shall call his name Immanuel."²⁹ Ahaz shall not call him so for he was convicted of want of faith, nor the Jews for they were destined to deny him, but she who is to conceive him, and bear him, the virgin herself. In the same evangelist we read that Herod was troubled at the coming of the Magi and that gathering together the scribes and the priests he demanded of them where Christ should be born and that they answered him, "In Bethlehem of Judaea: for thus it is written by the prophet; And thou Bethlehem in the land of Judah art not the least among the princes of Judah, for out of thee shall come a governour that shall rule my people Israel." [Matt. 2:5, Matt. 2:6] In the Vulgate³⁰ this passage appears as follows:—"And thou Bethlehem, the house of Ephratah, art small to be among the thousands of Judah, yet one shall come out of thee for me to be a prince in Israel." You will be more surprised still at the difference in words and order between Matthew and the Septuagint if you look at the Hebrew which runs thus:—"But thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel." [Mic. 5:2] Consider one by one the words of the evangelist:—"And thou Bethlehem in the land of Judah." For "the land of Judah" the Hebrew has "Ephratah" while the Septuagint gives "the house of Ephratah." The evangelist writes, "art not the least among the princes of Judah." In the Septuagint this is, "art small to be among the thousands of Judah," while the Hebrew gives, "though thou be little among the thousands of Judah." There is a contradiction here-and that not merely verbal-between the evangelist and the prophet; for in this place at any rate both Septuagint and Hebrew agree. The evangelist says that he is not little among the princes of Judah, while the passage from which he queries says exactly the opposite of this, "Thou art small indeed and little; but yet out of thee, small and little as thou art, there shall come forth for me a leader in Israel," a sentiment in harmony with that of the apostle, "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." [1 Cor. 1:27] Moreover the last clause "to rule" or "to feed my people Israel" clearly runs differently in the original.

9. I refer to these passages, not to convict the evangelists of falsification-a charge worthy only of impious men like Celsus, Porphyry, and Julian-but to bring home to my critics their own want of knowledge, and to gain from them such consideration that they may concede to me in the case of a simple letter what, whether they like it or not, they will have to concede to the Apostles in the Holy Scriptures. Mark, the disciple of Peter, begins his gospel thus:—"The beginning of the gospel of Jesus Christ, as it is written in the prophet Isaiah: Behold I send my messenger before thy face which shall prepare thy way before thee. The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." [Mark 1:1-3; see RV] This quotation is made up from two prophets, Malachi that is to say and Isaiah. For the first part: "Behold I send my messenger before thy face which shall prepare thy way before thee," occurs at the close of Malachi. [Mal. 3:1] But the second part: "The voice of one crying, etc.," we read in Isaiah. [Isa. 40:3] On what grounds then has Mark in the very beginning of his book set the words: "As it is written in the prophet Isaiah, Behold I send my messenger," when, as we have said, it is not written in Isaiah at all, but in Malachi the last of the twelve prophets? Let ignorant presumption solve this nice question if it can, and I will ask pardon for being in the wrong. The same Mark brings before us the Saviour thus addressing the Pharisees: "Have ye never read what David did when he had need and was an hungred, he and they that were with him, how he went into the house of God in the days of Abiathar the highpriest, and did eat the shew-bread which is not lawful to eat but for the priests?" [Mark 2:25, Mark 2:26] Now let us turn to the books of Samuel, or, as they are commonly called, of Kings, and we shall find there that the highpriest's name was not Abiathar but Ahimelech, [1 Sam. 21:1] the same that was afterwards put to death with the rest of the priests by Doeg at the command of Saul. [1 Sam. 22:16-18] Let us pass on now to the apostle Paul who writes thus to the Corinthians: "For had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. But, as it is written, Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." [1 Cor. 2:8, 1 Cor. 2:9] Some writers on this passage betake themselves to the ravings of the apocryphal books and assert that the quotation comes from the Revelation of Elijah;³¹ whereas the truth is that it is found in Isaiah according to the Hebrew text: "Since the beginning of the world men have not heard nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee what thou hast prepared for them that wait for thee."³² The Septuagint has rendered the words quite differently: "Since the beginning of the world we have not heard, neither have our eyes seen any God beside thee and thy true works, and thou wilt shew mercy to them that wait for thee." We see then from what place the quotation is taken and yet the apostle has not rendered his original word for word, but, using a paraphrase, he has given the sense in different terms. In his epistle to the Romans the same apostle quotes these words from Isaiah: "Behold I lay in Sion a stumbling-stone and rock of offence," [Rom. 9:33] a rendering which is at variance with the Greek version³³ yet agrees with the original Hebrew. The Septuagint gives an opposite meaning, "that you fall not on a stumblingstone nor on a rock of offence." The apostle Peter agrees with Paul and the Hebrew, writing: "but to them that do not believe, a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence." [1 Pet. 2:8. AV. is different] From all these passages it is clear that the apostles and evangelists in translating the old testament scriptures have sought to give the meaning rather than the words, and that they have not greatly cared to preserve forms or constructions, so long as they could make clear the subject to the understanding.

10. Luke the evangelist and companion of apostles describes Christ's first martyr Stephen as relating what follows in a Jewish assembly. "With threescore and fifteen souls Jacob went down into Egypt, and died himself, and our fathers were carried over³⁴ into Sychem, and laid in the sepulchre that Abraham bought for a sum of money of the sons of Emmor³⁵ the father of Sychem." [Acts 7:15-16] In Genesis this passage is quite differently given, for it is Abraham that buys of Ephron the Hittite, the son of Zohar, near Hebron, for four hundred shekels³⁶ of silver, a double cave,³⁷ and the field that is about it, and that buries in it Sarah his wife. And in the same book we read that, after his return from Mesopotamia with his wives and his sons, Jacob pitched his tent before Salem, a city of Shechem which is in the land of Canaan, and that he dwelt there and "bought a parcel of a field where he had spread his tent at the band of Hamor, the father of Sychem, for an hundred lambs,"³⁸ and that "he erected there an altar and called there upon the God of Israel."³⁹ Abraham does not buy the cave from Hamor the father of Sychem, but from Ephron the son of Zohar, and he is not buried in Sychem but in Hebron which is corruptly called Arboch. Whereas the twelve patriarchs are not buried in Arboch but in Sychem, in the field purchased not by Abraham but by Jacob. I postpone the solution of this delicate problem to enable those who cavil at me to search and see that in dealing with the scriptures it is the sense we have to look to and not the words. In the Hebrew the twenty-second psalm begins with the exact words which the Lord uttered on the cross: Eli Eli lama azabthani, which means, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" [Ps. 22:1] Let my critics tell me why the Septuagint introduces here the words "look thou upon me." For its rendering is as follows: "My God, my God, look thou upon me, why hast thou forsaken me?" They will answer no doubt that no harm is done to the sense by the addition of a couple of words. Let them acknowledge then that, if in the haste of dictation I have omitted a few, I have not by so doing endangered the position of the churches.

11. It would be tedious now to enumerate, what great additions and omissions the Septuagint has made, and all the passages which in church-copies are marked with daggers and asterisks. The Jews generally laugh when they hear our version of this passage of Isaiah, "Blessed is he that hath seed in Zion and servants in Jerusalem." [Isa. 31:9, LXX] In Amos also⁴⁰ after a description of self-indulgence [Amos 6:4-6] there come these words: "They have thought of these things as halting and not likely to fly," a very rhetorical sentence quite worthy of Tully. But how shall we deal with the Hebrew originals in which these passages and others like them are omitted, passages so numerous that to reproduce them all would require books without number? The number of the omissions is shown alike by the asterisks mentioned above and by my own version when compared by a careful reader with the old translation.⁴¹ Yet the Septuagint has rightly kept its place in the churches, either because it is the first of all the versions in time, made before the coming of Christ, or else because it has been used by the apostles (only however in places where it does not disagree with the Hebrews⁴²). On the other hand we do right to reject Aquila, the proselyte and controversial translator, who has striven to translate not words only but their etymologies as well. Who could accept as renderings of "corn and wine and oil" [Cf. Deut. 7:13] such words as "χε■μα ■πωρισμ■ς στιλπν■της", or, as we might say, 'pouring,' and 'fruitgathering,' and 'shining'? or, because Hebrew has in addition to the article other prefixes⁴³ as well, he must with an unhappy pedantry translate syllable by syllable and letter, by letter thus: "σ■ν τ■ν ■υραν■ν κα■ σ■ν τ■ν γ■ν", a construction which neither Greek nor Latin admits of,⁴⁴ as many passages in our own writers shew. How many are the phrases charming in Greek which, if rendered word for word, do not sound well in Latin, and again how many there are that are pleasing to us in Latin, but which-assuming the order of the words not to be altered-would not please in Greek.

12. But to pass by this limitless field of discussion and to shew you, most Christian of nobles, and most noble of Christians, what is the kind of falsification which is censured in my translation, I will set before you the opening words of the letter in the Greek original and as rendered by me, that from one count in the indictment you may form an opinion of all. The letter begins "Εδει ■μ■ς, ■γαπητε, μ■ τ■ ο■·σει τ■ν κλ■ρων φ■ρεσθαι" which I remember to have rendered as follows: "Dearly beloved, we ought not to misuse our position as ministers to gratify our pride." See there, they cry, what a number of falsehoods in a single line! In the first place "■γαπητ■ς" means 'loved,' not 'dearly beloved.' Then "ο■ησις" means 'estimate,' not 'pride,' for this and not "ο■δημα" is the word used. "Οιδ■μα" signifies 'a swelling' but "ο■-σις" means 'judgment.' All the rest, say they: "not to misuse our position to gratify our pride" is your own. What is this you are saying, O pillar of learning⁴⁵ and latter day Aristarchus,⁴⁶ who are so ready to pass judgment upon all writers? It is all for nothing then that I have studied so long; that, as Juvenal says, [Juv. 1:15] "I have so often withdrawn my hand from the ferule." The moment I leave the harbour I run aground. Well, to err is human and to confess one's error wise. Do you therefore, who are so ready to criticise and to instruct me, set me right and give me a word for word rendering of the passage. You tell me I should have said: "Beloved, we ought not to be carried away by the estimation of the clergy." Here, indeed we have eloquence worthy of Plautus, here we have Attic grace, the true style of the Muses. The common proverb is true of me: "He who trains an ox for athletics loses both oil and money."⁴⁷ Still he is not to blame who merely puts on the mask and plays the tragedy for another: his teachers⁴⁸ are the real culprits; since they for a great price have taught him-to know nothing. I do not think the worse of any Christian because he lacks skill to express himself; and I heartily wish that we could all say with Socrates "I know that I know nothing;"⁴⁹ and carry out the precept of another wise man, "Know thyself."⁵⁰ I have always held in esteem a holy simplicity but not a wordy rudeness. He who declares that he imitates the style of apostles should first imitate the virtue of their lives; the great holiness of which made up for much plainness of speech. They confuted the syllogisms of Aristotle and the perverse ingenuities of Chrysippus by raising the dead. Still it would be absurd for one of us-living as we do amid the riches of Croesus and the luxuries of Sardanapalus-to make his boast of mere ignorance. We might as well say that all robbers and criminals would be men of culture if they were to hide their blood-stained swords in books of philosophy and not ill trunks of trees.

13. I have exceeded the limits of a letter, but I have not exceeded in the expression of my chagrin. For, though I am called a falsifier, and have my reputation torn to shreds, wherever there are shuttles and looms and women to work them; I am content to repudiate the charge without retaliating in kind. I leave everything to your discretion. You can read the letter of Epiphanius both in Greek and in Latin; and, if you do so, you will see at once the value of my accusers' lamentations and insulting complaints. For the rest, I am satisfied to have instructed one of my dearest friends and am content simply to stay quiet in my cell and to wait for the day of judgment. If it may be so, and if my enemies allow it, I hope to write for you, not philippics like those of Demosthenes or Tully, but commentaries upon the scriptures.

1: i.e., the son of Sirach 2: Letter LI. to John Bp. of Jerusalem

3:

Cf. Jude 9

4: i.e., 'most reverend pope. 0' This title at first given to all bishops was in Jerome's time becoming restricted to metropolitans and patriarchs. Jerome, however, still uses it in the wider sense. The omission of the title here may well have seemed deliberate, as Jerome was known to entertain very bitter feelings towards John of Jerusalem 5: Plutarch, Life of Pyrrhus 6: Jerome constantly speaks of Rufinus in this way. See Letter CXXV. 18 and Apol. 100:Ruf. I. 13, 32 7: Rufinus is meant

8:

Danaë, the daughter of Acrisius, was confined by her father in a brazen tower to which Zeus obtained access in the shape of a shower of gold

9: Epiphanius 10: Ter. And. prol. 17 11: The two speeches on the Crown 12: Only a small part of this is extant 13: Hor. A. P. 133 14: i.e the poets of the so called New Comedy

15: kakozhlian 16: That is, five years later. Jerome translated the Chronicle of Eusebius at Constantinople in 381-2 17: Vix brevis viae spatia consummo 18: Preface, translated in this

Volume

19:

Preface §2

20: This life long supposed to have been the work of Athanasius was originally composed in Greek but had been rendered into Latin by Evagrius bishop of Antioch 21: i.e., Hilary of Poitiers 22: Lit. the seventy translators 23: Quod. AV. has `whom. 0

24:

Statuarius

25: Pedissequus 26: i.e., the Italic, for the Vulgate, which was not then published, accurately represents the Hebrew 27: i.e., the Septuagint and Vulgate versions 28: So AV. the Vulg. varies slightly

29: AV 30: i.e. the Versio Itala which was vulgata or `commonly used 0' at this time as Jerome's Version was afterwards 31: This book is no longer extant. It belonged to the same class as the Book of Enoch 32: Isa. 64:4, 70:AV. has `what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him. 0 33: Lit. `with the old version. 0 34: So the Vulg.: AV. punctuates differently

35:

i.e. Hamor

36: Drachmae 37: Spelunca duplex

38: AV. marg 39: Gen. 33:18-20. AV. varies slightly 40: According to the LXX

41: Jerome's Vulgate version supplied from the Hebrew the omissions and removed the redundancies of the old Latin version. These were due to the uncertain text of the LXX., on which alone the old Latin version was founded 42: This statement is not borne out by the facts

43:

proarqra

44: Lit. `with the heaven and with the earth 0' (Gen. 1:1). In Hebrew the preposition `with 0' is identical in form with the sign of the accus. Hence Aquila's rendering 45: Jerome apostrophises his critic 46: The famous grammarian and critic of Homer 47: Oleum perdit et impensas qui bovem mittit ad ceroma

48: Rufinus and Melania, who were believed by Jerome to have instigated the theft. Their names are inserted in some copies 49: Plato, Apol. Soc. 21, 22 50: This saying is variously attributed to Chilon and others of the seven wise men of Greece

Letters - letter_058

Letter 58. To Paulinus. In this his second letter to Paulinus of Nola Jerome dissuades him from making a pilgrimage to the Holy Places, and describes Jerusalem not as it ought to be but as it is. He then gives his friend counsels for his life similar to those which he has previously addressed to Nepotian, praises Paulinus for his Panegyric (now no longer extant) on the Emperor Theodosius, compares his style with those of the great writers of the Latin Church, and concludes with a commendation of his messenger, that Vigilantius who was soon to become the object of his bitterest contempt. Written about the year 395 a.d.

I. "A good man out of the good treasure of the heart bringeth forth good things," [Matt. 12:35] and "every tree is known by his fruit." [Luke 6:44] You measure me by the scale of your own virtues and because of your own greatness magnify my littleness. You take the lowest room at the banquet that the goodman of the house may bid you to go up higher. [Luke 14:10] For what is there in me or what qualities do I possess that I should merit praise from a man of learning? that I, small and lowly as I am, should be eulogized by lips which have pleaded on behalf of our most religious sovereign? Do not, my dearest brother, estimate my worth by the number of my years. Gray hairs are not wisdom; it is wisdom which is as good as gray hairs. At least that is what Solomon says: "wisdom is the gray hair unto men." [Wisd. 4:9] Moses too in choosing the seventy elders is told to take those whom he knows to be elders indeed, and to select them not for their years but for their discretion. [Nu. 11:16] And, as a boy, Daniel judges old men and in the flower of youth condemns the incontinence of age.¹ Do not, I repeat, weigh faith by years, nor suppose me better than yourself merely because I have enlisted under Christ's banner earlier than you. The apostle Paul, that chosen vessel framed out of a persecutor, [Acts 9:15] though last in the apostolic order is first in merit. For though last he has laboured more than they all. [1 Cor. 15:10] To Judas it was once said: "thou art a man who didst take sweet food with me, my guide and mine acquaintance; we walked in the house of God with company:"² yet the Saviour accuses him of betraying his friend and master. A line of Virgil well describes his end:

"From a high beam he knots a hideous death."³ The dying robber, on the contrary, exchanges the cross for paradise and turns to martyrdom the penalty of murder. How many there are nowadays who have lived so long that they bear corpses rather than bodies and are like whited sepulchres filled with dead men's bones! [Matt. 23:27] A newly kindled heat is more effective than a long continued lukewarmness.

2. As for you, when you hear the Saviour's counsel: "if thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and come follow me," [Matt. 19:21] you translate his words into action; and baring yourself to follow the bare cross⁴ you mount Jacob's ladder the easier for carrying nothing. Your dress changes with the change in your convictions, and you aim at no showy shabbiness which leaves your purse as full as before. No, with pure hands and a clear conscience you make it your glory that you are poor both in spirit and in deed. There is nothing great in wearing a sad or a disfigured face, in simulating and in showing off fasts, or in wearing a cheap cloak while you retain a large income. When Crates the Theban-a millionaire of days gone by-was on his way to Athens to study philosophy, he cast away untold gold in the belief that wealth could not be compatible with virtue. What a contrast he offers to us, the disciples of a poor Christ, who cram our pockets with gold and cling under pretext of almsgiving to our old riches. How can we faithfully distribute what belongs to another when we thus timidly keep back what is our own? [Cf. Luke 16:12] When the stomach is full, it is easy to talk of fasting. What is praiseworthy is not to have been at Jerusalem but to have lived a good life while there.⁵ The city which we are to praise and to seek is not that which has slain the prophets [Matt. 23:37] and shed the blood of Christ, but that which is made glad by the streams of the river, [Ps. 46:4] which is set upon a mountain and so cannot be hid, [Matt. 5:14] which the apostle declares to be a mother of the saints, [Gal. 4:26] and in which he rejoices to have his citizenship with the righteous. [Phil. 3:20., RV]

3. In speaking thus I am not laying myself open to a charge of inconsistency or condemning the course which I have myself taken. It is not, I believe, for nothing that I, like Abraham, have left my home and people. But I do not presume to limit God's omnipotence or to restrict to a narrow strip of earth Him whom the heaven cannot contain. Each believer is judged not by his residence in this place or in that but according to the deserts of his faith. The true worshippers worship the Father neither at Jerusalem nor on mount Gerizim; for "God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." [John. 4:24] "Now the spirit bloweth where it listeth," [John. 3:8, RV. marg] and "the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." [Ps. 24:1] When the fleece of Judaea was made dry although the whole world was wet with the dew of heaven, [Judg. 6:36-40] and when many came from the East and from the West [Luke 13:29] and sat in Abraham's bosom: [Luke 16:22] then God ceased to be known in Judah only and His name to be great in Israel alone; [Ps. 76:1] the sound of the apostles went out into all the earth and their words into the ends of the world. [Ps. 19:4] The Saviour Himself speaking to His disciples in the temple⁶ said: "arise, let us go hence," [John. 14:31] and to the Jews: "your house is left unto you desolate." [Matt. 23:38] If heaven and earth must pass away, [Luke 21:33] obviously all things that are earthly must pass away also. Therefore the spots which witnessed the crucifixion and the resurrection profit those only who bear their several crosses, who day by day rise again with Christ, and who thus shew themselves worthy of an abode so holy. Those who say "the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord," [Jer. 7:4] should give ear to the words of the apostle: "ye are the temple of the Lord," [2 Cor. 6:16] and the Holy Ghost "dwelleth in you." [Rom. 8:11] Access to the courts of heaven is as easy from Britain as it is from Jerusalem; for "the kingdom of God is within you." [Luke 17:21] Antony and the hosts of monks who are in Egypt, Mesopotamia, Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia, have never seen Jerusalem: and the door of Paradise is opened for them at a distance from it. The blessed Hilarion, though a native of and a dweller in Palestine, only set eyes on Jerusalem for a single day, not wishing on the one hand when he was so near to neglect the holy places, nor yet on the other to appear to confine God within local limits. From the time of Hadrian to the reign of Constantine-a period of about one hundred and eighty years⁷ -the spot which had witnessed the resurrection was occupied by a figure of Jupiter; while on the rock where the cross had stood, a marble statue of Venus was set up by the heathen and became an object of worship. The original persecutors, indeed, supposed that by polluting our holy places they would deprive us of our faith in the passion and in the resurrection. Even my own Bethlehem, as it now is, that most venerable spot in the whole world of which the psalmist sings: "the truth hath sprung out of the earth," [Ps. 85:11, Vulg] was overshadowed by a grove of Tammuz, [Ezek. 8:14] that is of Adonis; and in the very cave⁸ where the infant Christ had uttered His earliest cry lamentation was made for the paramour of Venus.⁹

4. Why, you will say, do I make these remote allusions? To assure you that nothing is lacking to your faith although you have not seen Jerusalem and that I am none the better for living where I do. Be assured that, whether you dwell here or elsewhere, a like recompense is in store for your good works with our Lord. Indeed, if I am frankly to express my own feelings, when I take into consideration your vows and the earnestness with which you have renounced the world, I hold that as long as you live in the country one place is as good as another. Forsake cities and their crowds, live on a small patch of ground, seek Christ in solitude, pray on the mount alone with Jesus,¹⁰ keep near to holy places: keep out of cities, I say, and you will never lose your vocation. My advice concerns not bishops, presbyters, or the clergy, for these have a different duty. I am speaking only to a monk who having been a man of note in the world has laid the price of his possessions at the apostles' feet, [Acts 4:37] to shew men that they must trample on their money, and has resolved to live a life of loneliness and seclusion and always to continue to reject what he has once rejected. Had the scenes of the Passion and of the Resurrection been elsewhere than in a populous city with court and garrison, with prostitutes, playactors, and buffoons, and with the medley of persons usually found in such centres; or had the crowds which thronged it been composed of monks; then a city would be a desirable abode for those who have embraced the monastic life. But, as things are, it would be the height of folly first to renounce the world, to forswear one's country, to forsake cities, to profess one's self a monk; and then to live among still greater numbers the same kind of life that you would have lived in your own country. Men rush here from all quarters of the world, the city is filled with people of every race, and so great is the throng of men and women that here you will have to tolerate in its full dimensions an evil from which you desired to flee when you found it partially developed elsewhere.

5. Since you ask me as a brother in what path you should walk, I will be open with you. If you wish to take duty as a presbyter, and are attracted by the work or dignity which falls to the lot of a bishop, live in cities and walled towns,¹¹ and by so doing turn the salvation of others into the profit of your own soul. But if you desire to be in deed what you are in name-a monk,¹² that is, one who lives alone, what have you to do with cities which are the homes not of solitaries but of crowds? Every mode of life has its own exponents. For instance, let Roman generals imitate men like Camillus, Fabricius, Regulus, and Scipio. Let philosophers take for models Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. Let poets strive to rival Homer, Virgil, Menander, and Terence. Let writers of history follow Thucydides, Sallust, Herodotus and Livy. Let orators find masters in Lysias, the Gracchi, Demosthenes, and Tully. And, to come to our own case, let bishops and presbyters take for their examples the apostles or their companions; and as they hold the rank which these once held, let them endeavour to exhibit the same excellence. And last of all let us monks take as the patterns which we are to follow the lives of Paul, of Antony, of Julian, of Hilarion, of the Macarii. And to go back to the authority of scripture, we have our masters in Elijah and Elisha, and our leaders in the sons of the prophets; who lived in fields and solitary places and made themselves tents by the waters of Jordan. [2 Kings 6:1, 2 Kings 6:2] The sons of Rechab too are of the number who drank neither wine nor strong drink and who abode in tents; men whom God's voice praises through Jeremiah,¹³ and to whom a promise is made that there shall never be wanting a man of their stock to stand before God. [Jer. 35:19] This is probably what is meant by the title of the seventy-first psalm: "of the sons of Jonadab and of those who were first led into captivity."¹⁴ The person intended is Jonadab the son of Rechab who is described in the book of Kings [2 Kings, 10:15, 2 Kings, 10:16] as having gone up into the chariot of Jehu. His sons having always lived in tents until at last (owing to the inroads made by the Chaldean army) they were forced to come into Jerusalem, are described [Jer. 35:11] as being the first to undergo captivity; because after the freedom of their lonely life they found confinement in a city as bad as imprisonment.

6. Since you are not wholly independent but are bound to a wife who is your sister in the Lord, I entreat you-whether here or there-that you will avoid large gatherings, visits official and complimentary, and social parties, indulgences all of which tend to enchain the soul. Let your food be coarse-say cabbage and pulse-and do not take it until evening. Sometimes as a great delicacy you may have some small fish. He who longs for Christ and feeds upon the true bread cares little for dainties which must be transmuted into ordure. Food that you cannot taste when once it has passed your gullet might as well be-so far as you are concerned-bread and pulse. You have my books against Jovinian which speak yet more largely of despising the appetite and the palate. Let some holy volume be ever in your hand. Pray constantly, and bowing down your body lift up your mind to the Lord. Keep frequent vigils and sleep often on an empty stomach. Avoid tittle-tattle and all self-laudation. Flee from wheedling flatterers as from open enemies. Distribute with your own hand provisions to alleviate the miseries of the poor and of the brethren. With your own hands, I say, for good faith is rare among men. You do not believe what I say? Think of Judas and his bag. Seek not a lowly garb for a swelling soul. Avoid the society of men of the world, especially if they are in power. Why need you look again on things contempt for which has made you a monk? Above all let your sister¹⁵ hold aloof from married ladies. And, if women round her wear silk dresses and gems while she is meanly attired, let her neither fret nor congratulate herself. For by so doing she will either regret her resolution or sow the seeds of pride. If you are already famed as a faithful steward of your own substance, do not take other people's money to give away. You understand What I mean, for the Lord has given you understanding in all things. Be simple as a dove and lay snares for no man: but be cunning as a serpent and let no man lay snares for you. [Matt. 10:16] For a Christian who allows others to deceive him is almost at much at fault as one who tries to deceive others. If a man talks to you always or nearly always about money (except it be about alms-giving, a topic which is open to all) treat him as a broker rather than a monk. Besides food and clothing and things manifestly necessary give no man anything; for dogs must not eat the children's bread. [Matt. 15:26]

7. The true temple of Christ is the believer's soul; adorn this, clothe it, offer gifts to it, welcome Christ in it. What use are walls blazing with jewels when Christ in His poor [Matt. 25:40] is in danger of perishing from hunger? Your possessions are no longer your own but a stewardship is entrusted to you. Remember Ananias and Sapphira who from fear of the future kept what was their own, and be careful for your part not rashly to squander what is Christ's. Do not, that is, by an error of judgment give the property of the poor to those who are not poor; lest, as a wise man has told us,¹⁶ charity prove the death of charity. Look not upon "Gay trappings or a Cato's empty name."¹⁷ In the words of Persius, God says:- "I know thy thoughts and read thine inmost soul."¹⁸ To be a Christian is the great thing, not merely to seem one. And somehow or other those please the world most who please Christ least. In speaking thus I am not like the sow lecturing Minerva; but, as a friend warns a friend, so I warn you before you embark on your new course. I would rather fail in ability than in will to serve you; for my wish is that where I have fallen you may keep your footing.

8. It is with much pleasure that I have read the book which you have sent to me containing your wise and eloquent defence of the emperor Theodosius; and your arrangement of the subject has particularly pleased me. While in the earlier chapters you surpass others, in the latter you surpass yourself. Your style is terse and neat; it has all the purity of Tully, and yet it is packed with meaning. For, as someone has said,¹⁹ that speech is a failure of which men only praise the diction. You have been successful in preserving both sequence of subjects and logical connexion. Whatever sentence one takes, it is always a conclusion to what goes before or an introduction to what follows. Theodosius is fortunate in having a Christian orator like you to plead his cause. You have made his purple illustrious and have consecrated for future ages his useful laws. Go on and prosper, for, if such be your first ventures in the field, what will you not do when you become a trained soldier? Oh! that it were mine to conduct a genius like you, not (as the poets sing) through the Aonian mountains and the peaks of Helicon but through Zion and Tabor and the high places of Sinai. If I might teach you what I have learned myself and might pass on to you the mystic rolls of the prophets, then might we give birth to something such as Greece with all her learning could not shew.

9. Hear me, therefore, my fellow-servant, my friend, my brother; give ear for a moment that I may tell you how you are to walk in the holy scriptures. All that we read in the divine books, while glistening and shining without, is yet far sweeter within. "He who desires to eat the kernel must first break the nut." [Plautus, Curc. I. 1:55] "Open thou mine eyes," says David, "that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." [Ps. 119:18] Now, if so great a prophet confesses that he is in the darkness of ignorance; how deep, think you, must be the night of misapprehension with which we, mere babes and unweaned infants, are enveloped! Now this veil rests not only on the face of Moses, [2 Cor. 3:14, 2 Cor. 3:15] but on the evangelists and the apostles as well.²⁰ To the multitudes the Saviour spoke only in parables and, to make it clear that His words had a mystical meaning, said: "he that hath ears to hear, let him hear." [Luke 8:8, Luke 8:10] Unless all things that are written are opened by Him "who hath the key of David, who openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth," [Rev. 3:7] no one can undo the lock or set them before you. If only you had the foundation which He alone can give; nay, if even His fingers were but passed over your work; there would be nothing finer than your volumes, nothing more learned, nothing more attractive, nothing more Latin.

10. Tertullian is packed with meaning but his style is rugged and uncouth. The blessed Cyprian like a fountain of pure water flows softly and sweetly but, as he is taken up with exhortations to virtue and with the troubles consequent on persecution, he has nowhere discussed the divine scriptures. Victorinus, although he has the glory of a martyr's crown, yet cannot express what he knows. Lactantius has a flow of eloquence worthy of Tully: would that he had been as ready to teach our doctrines as he was to pull down those of others! Arnobius is lengthy and unequal, and often confused from not making a proper division of his subject. That reverend man Hilary gains in height from his Gallic buskin; yet, adorned as he is with the flowers of Greek rhetoric, he sometimes entangles himself in long periods and offers by no means easy reading to the less learned brethren. I say nothing of other writers whether dead or living; others will hereafter judge them both for good and for evil.²¹

11. I will come to yourself, my fellow-mystic, my companion, and my friend; my friend, I say, though not yet personally known: and I will ask you not to suspect a flatterer in one so intimate. Better that you should think me mistaken or led astray by affection than that you should hold me capable of fawning on a friend. You have a great intellect and an inexhaustible store of language, your diction is fluent and pure, your fluency and purity are mingled with wisdom. Your head is clear and all your senses keen. Were you to add to this wisdom and eloquence a careful study and knowledge of scripture, I should soon see you holding our citadel against all comers; you would go up with Joab upon the roof of Zion, [1 Chron. 11:5, 1 Chron. 11:6] and sing upon the housetops what you had learned in the secret chambers. [Cf. Luke 12:3] Gird up, I pray you, gird up your loins. As Horace says:- "Life hath no gifts for men except they toil." [Horace, Sat. I. 9:59, 60]

Shew yourself as much a man of note in the church, as you were before in the senate. Provide for yourself riches which you may spend daily yet they will not fail. Provide them while you are still strong and while as yet your head has no gray hairs: before, in the words of Virgil, Diseases creep on you, and gloomy age, "And pain, and cruel death's inclemency." [Virgil, Georg. 3:67, 68] I am not content with mediocrity for you: I desire all that you do to be of the highest excellence.

How heartily I have welcomed the reverend presbyter Vigilantius,²² his own lips will tell you better than this letter. Why he has so soon left us and started afresh I cannot say; and, indeed, I do not wish to hurt anyone's feelings.²³ Still, mere passer-by as he was, in haste to continue his journey, I managed to keep him back until I had given him a taste of my friendship for you. Thus you can learn from him what you want to know about me. Kindly salute your reverend sister²⁴ and fellow-servant, who with you fights the good fight in the Lord.

1: Story of Susannah 2: Ps. 55:13 - Consessu substituted for consensu of the Vulgate 3: Virgil, Aen. 12:603 4: Compare Letter LII 5: Cicero, pro Murena, V 6: Only the second sentence was spoken in the temple: the first was uttered in the chamber of the last supper 7: Hadrian died in 138 a.d.; Constantine became Emperor in 306 a.d 8: For the tradition that Christ was born in a cave Justin Martyr is the earliest authority (dial. 100:Try. 78)

9: Adonis, killed by a boar and spending half his time in the upper, half in the lower world, is a type of summer overcoming and overcome by winter 10: Cf. Luke, vi

11:

Castella

12:

Monachus, lit. "a solitary." Men frequently at this time made vows, especially those of celibacy, without entering a monastery

13: Jer. xxxv 14: This title occurs only in the LXX 15: Therasia, the wife of Paulinus is meant 16: Cicero, de Off. 11. xv 17: Probably a quotation from memory incorrectly made up from Lucan's 'Nomina vana Catonis O' (i. 313) 18: Persius, 3:30 19: Quintilian, Inst. Or. 8:Procm 20: i.e., the new testament as well as the old may have its true meaning concealed from some 21: Cf. Letter LXX. 5 22: Afterwards noted as an assailant of Jerome's ascetic doctrines. See the introduction to Letter LXI

23:

The allusion seems to be to the behaviour of Vigilantius during an earthquake which occurred when he was at Bethlehem. His fright on the occasion exposed him to the ridicule of the community there. (Against Vig., 1:11.

24:

As before, Therasia, the wife of Paulinus is meant

Letters - letter_059

Letter 59. To Marcella. An answer to five questions put to Jerome by Marcella in a letter not preserved. The questions are as follows.

(1) What are the things which eye hath not seen nor ear heard (1 Cor. ii. 9)? Jerome answers that they are spiritual things which as such can only be spiritually discerned.

(2) Is it not a mistake to identify the sheep and the goats of Christ's parable (Matt. xxv. 31 sqq.) with Christians and heathens? Are they not rather the good and the bad? For an answer to this question Jerome refers Marcella to his treatise against Jovinian (II. §§18-23).

(3) Paul says that some shall be "alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord;" and that they shall be "caught up to meet the Lord in the air" (1 Thess. iv. 15, 17). Are we to suppose this assumption to be corporeal and that those assumed will escape death? Yes, Jerome answers, but their bodies will be glorified.

(4) How is John xx. 17, "touch me not," to be reconciled with Matt. xxviii. 9, "they came and held him by the feet"? In the one case, Jerome replies, Mary Magdalen failed to recognize the divinity of Jesus; in the other the women recognized it. Accordingly they were admitted to a privilege which was denied to her.

(5) Was the risen Christ before His ascension present only with the disciples, or was He in heaven and elsewhere as well? The latter according to Jerome is the true doctrine. "The Divine Nature," he writes, "exists everywhere in its entirety. Christ, therefore, was at one and the same time with the apostles and with the angels; in the Father and in the uttermost parts of the sea. So afterwards he was with Thomas in India, with Peter at Rome, with Paul in Illyricum, with Titus in Crete, with Andrew in Achaia." The date of the letter is a.d. 395 or a.d. 396.

Letters - letter_060

Letter 60. To Heliodorus

One of Jerome's finest letters, written to console his old friend, Heliodorus, now Bp. of Altinum, for the loss of his nephew Nepotian who had died of fever a short time previously. Jerome tries to soothe his friend's grief (1) by contrasting pagan despair or resignation with Christian hope, (2) by an eulogy of the departed both as man and presbyter, and (3) by a review of the evils which then beset the Empire and from which, as he contended, Nepotian had been removed. The letter is marked throughout with deep and sincere feeling. Its date is 396 a.d.

1. Small wits cannot grapple large themes but venturing beyond their strength fail in the very attempt; and, the greater a subject is, the more completely is he overwhelmed who cannot find words to unfold its grandeur. Nepotian who was mine and yours and ours-or rather who was Christ's and because Christ's all the more ours-has forsaken us his elders so that we are smitten with pangs of regret and overcome with a grief which is past bearing. We supposed him our heir, yet now his corpse is all that is ours. For whom shall my intellect now labour? Whom shall my poor letters desire to please? Where is he, the impeller of my work, whose voice was sweeter than a swan's last song? My mind is dazed my hand trembles, a mist covers my eyes, stammering seizes my tongue. Whatever my words, they seem as good as unspoken seeing that he no longer hears them. My very pen seems to feel his loss, my very wax tablet looks dull and sad; the one is covered with rust, the other with mould. As often as I try to express myself in words and to scatter the flowers of this encomium upon his tomb, my eyes fill with tears, my grief returns, and I can think of nothing but his death. It was a custom in former days for children over the dead bodies of their parents publicly to proclaim their praises and (as when pathetic songs are sung) to draw tears from the eyes and sighs from the breasts of those who heard them. But in our case, behold, the order of things is changed: to deal us this blow nature has forfeited her rights. For the respect which the young man should have paid to his elders, we his elders are paying to him.

2. What shall I do then? Shall I join my tears to yours? The apostle forbids me for he speaks of dead Christians as "them which are asleep." [1 Thess. 4:13] So too in the gospel the Lord says, "the damsel is not dead but sleepeth," [Mark 5:39] and Lazarus when he is raised from the dead is said to have been asleep. [John. 11:11] No, I will be glad and rejoice that "speedily he was taken away lest that wickedness should alter his understanding" for "his soul pleased the Lord." [Wisd. 4:11, Wisd. 4:14] But though I am loth to give way and combat my feelings, tears flow down my cheeks, and in spite of the teachings of virtue and the hope of the resurrection a passion of regret crushes my too yielding mind. O death that dividest brothers knit together in love, how cruel, how ruthless thou art so to sunder them! "The Lord hath fetched a burning wind that cometh up from the wilderness: which hath dried thy veins and hath made thy well spring desolate." [Hos. 13:15, LXX] Thou didst swallow up our Jonah, but even in thy belly He still lived. Thou didst carry Him as one dead, that the world's storm might be stilled and our Nineveh saved by His preaching. He, yes He, conquered thee, He slew thee, that fugitive prophet who left His home, gave up His inheritance and surrendered his dear life into the hands of those who sought it. He it was who of old threatened thee in Hoses: "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." [Hos. 13:14] By His death thou art dead; by His death we live. Thou hast swallowed up and thou art swallowed up. Whilst thou art smitten with a longing for the body assumed by Him, and whilst thy greedy jaws fancy it a prey, thy inward parts are wounded with hooked fangs.

3. To Thee, O Saviour Christ, do we Thy creatures offer thanks that, when Thou wast slain, Thou didst slay our mighty adversary. Before Thy coming was there any being more miserable than man who cowering at the dread prospect of eternal death did but receive life that he might perish! For "death reigned from Adam to Moses even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." [Rom. 5:14] If Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob be in hell, who can be in the kingdom of heaven? If Thy friends-even those who had not sinned themselves-were yet for the sins of another liable to the punishment of offending Adam, what must we think of those who have said in their hearts "There is no God;" who "are corrupt and abominable" [Ps. 14:1] in their self-will, and of whom it is said "they are gone out of the way, they are become unprofitable; there is none that doeth good, no not one"? [Rom. 3:12] Even if Lazarus is seen in Abraham's bosom and in a place of refreshment, still the lower regions cannot be compared with the kingdom of heaven. Before Christ's coming Abraham is in the lower regions: after Christ's coming the robber is in paradise. And therefore at His rising again "many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and were seen in the heavenly Jerusalem." [Matt. 27:52, Matt. 27:53] Then was fulfilled the saying: "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." [Eph. 5:14] John the Baptist cries in the desert: "repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." [Matt. 3:2] For "from the days of John the Baptist the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence and the violent take it by force." [Matt. 11:12] The flaming sword that keeps the way of paradise and the cherubim that are stationed at its doors [Gen. 3:24] are alike quenched and unloosed by the blood of Christ.¹ It is not surprising that this should be promised us in the resurrection: for as many of us as living in the flesh do not live after the flesh,² have our citizenship in heaven, [Phi. 3:20] and while we are still here on earth we are told that "the kingdom of heaven is within us." [Luke 17:21]

4. Moreover before the resurrection of Christ God was "known in Judah" only and "His name was great in Israel" alone. [Ps. 76:1] And they who knew Him were despite their knowledge dragged down to hell. Where in those days were the inhabitants of the globe from India to Britain, from the frozen zone of the North to the burning heat of the Atlantic ocean? Where were the countless peoples of the world? Where the great multitudes?

"Unlike in tongue, unlike in dress and arms?" [Virg. A. 8:723]

They were crushed like fishes and locusts, like flies and gnats. For apart from knowledge of his Creator every man is but a brute. But now the voices and writings of all nations proclaim the passion and the resurrection of Christ. I say nothing of the Jews, the Greeks, and the Romans, peoples which the Lord has dedicated to His faith by the title written on His cross. [Luke 23:38] The immortality of the soul and its continuance after the dissolution of the body-truths of which Pythagoras dreamed, which Democritus refused to believe, and which Socrates discussed in prison to console himself for the sentence passed upon him-are now the familiar themes of Indian and of Persian, of Goth and of Egyptian. The fierce Bessians³ and the throng of skinclad savages who used to offer human sacrifices in honour of the dead have broken out of their harsh discord into the sweet music of the cross and Christ is the one cry of the whole world.

5. What can we do, my soul? Whither must we turn? What must we take up first? What must we pass over? Have you forgotten the precepts of the rhetoricians? Are you so preoccupied with grief, so overcome with tears, so hindered with sobs, that you forget all logical sequence? Where are the studies you have pursued from your childhood? Where is that saying of Anaxagoras and Telamon (which you have always commended) "I knew myself to have begotten a mortal"?⁴ I have read the books of Crantor which he wrote to soothe his grief and which Cicero has imitated.⁵ I have read the consolatory writings of Plato, Diogenes, Clitomachus, Carneades, Posidonius, who at different times strove by book or letter to lessen the grief of various persons. Consequently, were my own wit to dry up, it could be watered anew from the fountains which these have opened. They set before us examples without number; and particularly those of Pericles and of Socrates's pupil Xenophon. The former of these after the loss of his two sons put on a garland and delivered a harangue; [Val. Max. 5:10] while the latter, on hearing when he was offering sacrifice that his son had been slain in war, is said to have laid down his garland; and then, on learning that he had fallen fighting bravely, is said to have put it on his head again. What shall I say of those Roman generals whose heroic virtues glitter like stars on the pages of Latin history? Pulvillus was dedicating the capitol⁶ when receiving the news of his son's sudden death, he gave orders that the funeral should take place without him. Lucius Paullus⁷ entered the city in triumph in the week which intervened between the funerals of his two sons. I pass over the Maximi, the Catos, the Galli, the Pisos, the Bruti, the Scaevolus, the Metelli, the Scauri, the Marii, the Crassi, the Marcelli, the Aufidii, men who shewed equal fortitude in sorrow and war, and whose bereavements Tully has set forth in his book Of consolation. I pass them over lest I should seem to have chosen the words and woes of others in preference to my own. Yet even these instances may suffice to ensure us mortification if our faith fails to surpass the achievements of unbelief.

6. Let me come then to my proper subject. I will not beat my breast with Jacob and with David for sons dying in the Law, but I will receive them rising again with Christ in the Gospel. The Jew's mourning is the Christian's joy. "Weeping may endure for a night but joy cometh in the morning." [Ps. 30:5] "The night is far spent, the day is at hand." [Rom. 13:12] Accordingly when Moses dies, mourning is made for him, [Deut. 34:8] but when Joshua is buried, it is without tears or funeral pomp. [Josh. 24:30] All that can be drawn from scripture on the subject of lamentation I have briefly set forth in the letter of consolation which I addressed to Paula at Rome.⁸ Now I must take another path to arrive at the same goal. Otherwise I shall seem to be walking anew in a track once beaten but now long disused.

7. We know indeed that our Nepotian is with Christ and that he has joined the choirs of the saints. What here with us he groped after on earth afar off and sought for to the best of his judgment, there he sees nigh at hand, so that he can say: "as we have heard so have we seen in the city of the Lord of hosts, in the city of our God." [Ps. 48:8] Still we cannot bear the feeling of his absence, and grieve, if not for him, for ourselves. The greater the happiness which he enjoys, the deeper the sorrow in which the loss of a blessing so great plunges us. The sisters of Lazarus could not help weeping for him, although they knew that he would rise again. And the Saviour himself-to shew that he possessed true human feeling-mourned for him whom He was about to raise. [John. 11:35] His apostle also, though he says: "I desire to depart and to be with Christ," [Phi. 1:23] and elsewhere "to me to live is Christ and to die is gain," [Phi. 1:21] thanks God that Epaphras⁹ (who had been "sick nigh unto death") has been given back to him that he might not have sorrow upon sorrow. [Phi. 2:27] Words prompted not by the fear that springs of unbelief but by the passionate regret that comes of true affection. How much more deeply must you who were to Nepotian both uncle and bishop, (that is, a father both in the flesh and in the spirit), deplore the loss of one so dear, as though your heart were torn from you. Set a limit, I pray you, to your sorrow and remember the saying "in nothing overmuch."¹⁰ Bind up for a little while your wound and listen to the praises of one in whose virtue you have always delighted. Do not grieve that you have lost such a paragon: rejoice rather that he has once been yours. As on a small tablet men depict the configuration of the earth, so in this little scroll of mine you may see his virtues if not fully depicted at least sketched in outline. I beg that you will take the will for the performance.

8. The advice of the rhetoricians in such cases is that you should first search out the remote ancestors of the person to be eulogized and recount their exploits, and then come gradually to your hero; so as to make him more illustrious by the virtues of his forefathers, and to show either that he is a worthy successor of good men, or that he has conferred lustre upon a lineage in itself obscure. But as my duty is to sing the praises of the soul, I will not dwell upon those fleshly advantages which Nepotian for his part always despised. Nor will I boast of his family, that is of the good points belonging not to him but to others; for even those holy men Abraham and Isaac had for sons the sinners Ishmael and Esau. And on the other hand Jephthah who is reckoned by the apostle in the roll of the righteous [Heb. 11:32] is the son of a harlot. [Judg. 11:1] It is said "the soul that sinneth, it shall die." [Ezek. 18:4] The soul therefore that has not sinned shall live. Neither the virtues nor the vices of parents are imputed to their children. God takes account of us only from the time when we are born anew in Christ. Paul, the persecutor of the church, who is in the morning the ravening wolf of Benjamin, [Gen. 49:27] in the evening "gave food,"¹¹ that is yields himself up to the sheep Ananias. [Acts 9:17. (Cf. Letter LXIX.)] Let us likewise reckon our Nepotian a crying babe and an untutored child who has been born to us in a moment fresh from the waters of Jordan.

9. Another would perhaps describe how for his salvation you left the east and the desert and how you soothed me your dearest comrade by holding out hopes of a return: and all this that you might save, if possible, both your sister, then a widow with one little child, or, should she reject your counsels, at any rate your sweet little nephew. It was of him that I once used the prophetic words: "though your little nephew cling to your neck."¹² Another, I say, would relate how while Nepotian was still in the service of the court, beneath his uniform and his brilliantly white linen,¹³ his skin was chafed with sackcloth; how, while standing before the powers of this world, his lips were discoloured with fasting; how still in the uniform of one master he served another; and how he wore the sword-belt only that he might succour widows and wards, the afflicted and the unhappy. For my part I dislike men to delay the complete dedication of themselves to God. When I read of the centurion Cornelius¹⁴ that he was a just man I immediately hear of his baptism.

10. Still we may approve these things as the swathing bands of an infant faith. He who has been a loyal soldier under a strange banner is sure to deserve the laurel when he comes to serve his own king. When Nepotian laid aside his baldrick and changed his dress, he bestowed upon the poor all the pay that he had received. For he had read the words: "if thou wilt be perfect, sell that thou hast, and give to the poor and follow me," [Matt. 19:21] and again: "ye cannot serve two masters, God and Mammon." [Matt. 6:24] He kept nothing for himself but a common tunic and cloak to cover him and to keep out the cold. Made in the fashion of his province his attire was not remarkable either for elegance or for squalor. He burned daily to make his way to the monasteries of Egypt, or to visit the communities of Mesopotamia, or at least to live a lonely life in the Dalmatian islands,¹⁵ separated from the mainland only by the strait of Altinum. But he had not the heart to forsake his episcopal uncle in whom he beheld a pattern of many virtues and from whom he could take lessons without going abroad. In one and the same person he both found a monk to imitate and a bishop to revere. What so often happens did not happen here. Constant intimacy did not produce familiarity, nor did familiarity breed contempt. He revered him as a father and every day admired him for some new virtue. To be brief, he became a clergyman, and after passing through the usual stages was ordained a presbyter. Good Jesus! how he sighed and groaned! how he fasted and fled the eyes of all! For the first and only time he was angry with his uncle, complaining that the burthen laid upon him was too heavy for him and that his youth unfitted him for the priesthood. But the more he struggled against it, the more he drew to himself the hearts of all: his refusal did but prove him worthy of an office which he was reluctant to assume, and all the more worthy because he declared himself unworthy. We too in our day have our Timothy; we too have seen that wisdom which is as good as gray hairs; [Wisd. 4:9] our Moses has chosen an elder whom he has known to be an elder indeed.¹⁶ Nepotian regarded the clerical state less as an honour than a burthen. He made it his first care to silence envy by humility, and his next to give no cause for scandal that such as assailed his youth might marvel at his continence. He helped the poor, visited the sick, stirred men up to hospitality, soothed them with soft words, rejoiced with those who rejoiced and wept with those who wept. [Rom. 12:15] He was a staff to the blind, food to the hungry, hope to the dejected, consolation to the bereaved. Each single virtue was as conspicuous in him as if he possessed no other. Among his fellow-presbyters while ever foremost in work, he was ever satisfied with the lowest place. Any good that he did he ascribed to his uncle: but if the result did not correspond to his expectations, he would say that his uncle knew nothing of it, that it was his own mistake. In public he recognized him as a bishop; at home he looked upon him as a father. The seriousness of his disposition was mitigated by a cheerful expression. But while his laughter was joyous it was never loud. Christ's virgins and widows he honoured as mothers and exhorted as sisters "with all purity." [1 Tim. 5:2] When he returned home he used to leave the clergyman outside and to give himself over to the hard rule of a monk. Frequent in supplication and watchful in prayer he would offer his tears not to man but to God. His fasts he regulated-as a driver does the pace of his horses-according to the weariness or vigour of his body. When at his uncle's table he would just taste what was set before him, so as to avoid superstition and yet to preserve self-control. In conversing at entertainments his habit was to propose some topic from scripture, to listen modestly, to answer diffidently, to support the right, to refute the wrong, but both without bitterness; to instruct his opponent rather than to vanquish him. Such was the ingenuous modesty which adorned his youth that he would frankly confess from what sources his several arguments came; and in this way, while disclaiming a reputation for learning, he came to be held most learned. This he would say is the opinion of Tertullian, that of Cyprian; this of Lactantius, that of Hilary; to this effect speaks Minucius Felix, thus Victorinus, after this manner Arnobius. Myself too he would sometimes quote, for he loved me because of my intimacy with his uncle. Indeed by constant reading and long-continued meditation he had made his breast a library of Christ.

11. How often in letters from beyond the sea he urged me to write something to him! How often he reminded me of the man in the gospel who sought help by night [Luke 11:5, Luke 11:8] and of the widow who importuned the cruel judge! [Luke 18:1, Luke 18:5] And when I silently ignored his request and made my petitioner blush by blushing to reply, he put forward his uncle to enforce his suit, knowing that as the boon was for another he would more readily ask it, and that as I held his episcopal office in respect he would more easily obtain it. Accordingly I did what he wished and in a brief essay¹⁷ dedicated our mutual friendship to everlasting remembrance. On receiving this Nepotian boasted that he was richer than Croesus and wealthier than Darius. He held it in his hands, devoured it with his eyes, kept it in his bosom, repeated it with his lips. And often when he unrolled it upon his couch, he fell asleep with the cherished page upon his breast. When a stranger came or a friend, he rejoiced to let them know my witness to him. The deficiencies of my little book he made good by careful punctuation and varied emphasis, so that when it was read aloud it was always he not I who seemed to please or to displease. Whence came such zeal, if not from the love of God? Whence came such untiring study of Christ's law, if not from a yearning for Him who gave it? Let others add coin to coin till their purses are chock-full; let others demean themselves to sponge on married ladies; let them be richer as monks than they were as men of the world; let them possess wealth in the service of a poor Christ such as they never had in the service of a rich devil; let the church lose breath at the opulence of men who in the world were beggars. Our Nepotian spurns gold and begs only for written books. But while he despises himself in the flesh and walks abroad more splendid than ever in his poverty, he still seeks out everything that may adorn the church.

12. In comparison with what has gone before what I am now about to say may appear trivial, but even in trifles the same spirit makes itself manifest. For as we admire the Creator not only as the framer of heaven and earth, of sun and ocean, of elephants, camels, horses, oxen, pards, bears, and lions; but also as the maker of the most tiny creatures, ants, gnats, flies, worms, and the like, whose shapes we know better than their names, and as in all alike we revere the same creative skill; so the mind that is given to Christ shews the same earnestness in things of small as of great importance, knowing that it must render an account of every idle word. [Matt. 12:36] Nepotian took pains to keep the altar bright, the church walls free from soot and the pavement duly swept. He saw that the doorkeeper was constantly at his post, that the doorhangings were in their places, the sanctuary clean and the vessels shining. The careful reverence that he shewed to every rite led him to neglect no duty small or great. Whenever you looked for him in church you found him there. In Quintus Fabius¹⁸ antiquity admired a nobleman and the author of a history of Rome, yet his paintings gained him more renown than his writings. Our own Bezaleel [Ex. 31:2, Ex. 31:3] also and Hiram, the son of a Tyrian woman,¹⁹ are spoken of in scripture as filled with wisdom and the spirit of God because they framed, the one the furniture of the tabernacle, the other that of the temple. For, as it is with fertile tillage-fields and rich plough-lands which at times go out into redundant growths of stalk or ear, so is it with distinguished talents and a mind filled with virtue. They are sure to overflow into elegant and varied accomplishments. Accordingly among the Greeks we hear of a philosopher²⁰ who used to boast that everything he wore down to his cloak and ring was made by himself. We may pass the same eulogy on our friend, for he adorned both the basilicas of the church and the halls²¹ of the martyrs with sketches of flowers, foliage, and vine-tendrils, so that everything attractive in the church, whether made so by its position or by its appearance, bore witness to the labour and zeal of the presbyter set over it.

13. Go on blessed in thy goodness! What kind of ending should we expect after such a beginning! Ah! hapless plight of mortal men and vanity of all life that is not lived in Christ! Why, O my words, do you shrink back? Why do you shift and turn? I fear to come to the end, as if I could put off his death or make his life longer. "All flesh is as grass and all the glory of man as the flower of grass." [1 Pet. 1:24] Where now are that handsome face and dignified figure with which as with a fair garment his beautiful soul was clothed? The lily began to wither, alas! when the south wind blew, and the purple violet slowly faded into paleness. Yet while he burned with fever and while the fire of sickness was drying up the fountains of his veins, gasping and weary he still tried to comfort his sorrowing uncle. His countenance shone with gladness, and while all around him wept he and he only smiled. He flung aside his cloak, put out his hand, saw what others failed to see, and even tried to rise that he might welcome new comers. You would have thought that he was starting on a journey instead of dying and that in place of leaving all his friends behind him he was merely passing from some to others.²² Tears roll down my cheeks and, however much I steel my mind, I cannot disguise the grief that I feel. Who could suppose that at such an hour he would remember his intimacy with me, and that while he struggled for life he would recall the sweetness of study? Yet grasping his uncle's hand he said to him: "Send this tunic that I wore in the service of Christ to my dear friend, my father in age, but my brother in office, and transfer the affection hitherto claimed by your nephew to one who is as dear to you as he is to me." With these words he passed away holding his uncle's hand and with my name upon his lips.

14. I know how unwilling you were to prove the affection of your people at such a cost, and that you would have preferred to win your countrymen's love while retaining your happiness. Such expressions of feeling, pleasant as they are when all goes well, are doubly welcome in time of sorrow. All Altinum, all Italy mourned Nepotian. The earth received his body; his soul was given back to Christ. You lost a nephew, the church a priest. He who should have followed you went before you. To the office which you held, he in the judgment of all deserved to succeed. And so one family has had the honour of producing two bishops, the first to be congratulated because he has held the office, the second to be lamented because he has been taken away too soon to hold it. Plato thinks that a wise man's whole life ought to be a meditation of death;²³ and philosophers praise the sentiment and extol it to the skies. But much more full of power are the words of the apostle: "I die daily through your glory." [1 Cor. 15:31, Vulgate] For to have an ideal is one thing, to realize it another. It is one thing to live so as to die, another to die so as to live. The sage and Christian must both of them die: but the one always dies out of his glory, the other into it. Therefore we also should consider beforehand the end which must one day overtake us and which, whether we wish it or not, cannot be very far distant. For though we should live nine hundred years or more, as men did before the deluge, and though the days of Methuselah [Gen. 5:27] should be granted us, yet that long space of time, when once it should have passed away and come to an end, would be as nothing. For to the man who has lived ten years and to him who has lived a thousand, when once the end of life comes and death's inexorable doom, all the past whether long or short is just the same; except that the older a man is, the heavier is the load of sin that he has to take with him.

"First hapless mortals lose from out their life The fairest days: disease and age come next; And lastly cruel death doth claim his prey." [Virg. G. 3:66-68] The poet Naevius too says that "Mortals must many woes perforce endure."

Accordingly antiquity has feigned that Niobe because of her much weeping was turned to stone and that other women were metamorphosed into beasts. Hesiod also bewails men's birthdays and rejoices in their deaths, and Ennius wisely says:

"The mob has one advantage o'er its king:

For it may weep while tears for him are shame."

If a king may not weep, neither may a bishop; indeed a bishop has still less license than a king. For the king rules over unwilling subjects, the bishop over willing ones. The king compels submission by terror; the bishop exercises lordship by becoming a servant. The king guards men's bodies till they die; the bishop saves their souls for life eternal. The eyes of all are turned upon you. Your house is set on a watchtower; your life fixes for others the limits of their self-control. Whatever you do, all think that they may do the same. Do not so commit yourself that those who seek ground for cavil may be thought to have rightly assailed you, or that those who are eager to imitate you may be forced to do wrong. Overcome as much as you can-nay even more than you can-the sensitiveness of your mind and check the copious flow of your tears. Else your deep affection for your nephew may be construed by unbelievers as indicating despair of God. You must regeth him not as dead but as absent. You must seem lobe looking for him rather than have lost him.

15. But why do I try to heal a sorrow which has already, I suppose, been assuaged by time and reason? Why do I not rather unfold to you-they are not far to seek-the miseries of our rulers and the calamities of our time? He who has lost the light of life is not so much to be pitied as he is to be congratulated who has escaped from such great evils. Constantius,²⁴ the patron of the Arian heresy, was hurrying to do battle with his enemy²⁵ when he died at the village of Mopsus and to his great vexation left the empire to his foe. Julian²⁶, the betrayer of his own soul, the murderer of a Christian army, felt in Media the hand of the Christ whom he had previously denied in Gaul. Desiring to annex new territories to Rome, he did but lose annexations previously made. Jovian²⁷ had but just tasted the sweets of sovereignty when a coal-fire suffocated him: a good instance of the transitoriness of human power. Valentinian²⁸ died of a broken blood vessel, the land of his birth laid waste, and his country un-avenged. His brother Valens²⁹ defeated in Thrace by the Goths, was buried where he died. Gratian, betrayed by his army and refused admittance by the cities on his line of march, became the laughing-stock of his foe; and your walls, Lyons, still bear the marks of that bloody hand.³⁰ Valentinian was yet a youth-I may say, a mere boy-when, after flight and exile and the recovery of his power by bloodshed, he was put to death³¹ not far from the city which had witnessed his brother's end. And not only so but his lifeless body was gibbeted to do him shame. What shall I say of Procopius, of Maximus, of Eugenius,³² who while they held sovereign sway were a terror to the nations, yet stood one and all as prisoners in the presence of their conquerors, and- cruellest wound of all to the great and powerful - felt the pang of an ignominious slavery before they fell by the edge of the sword.

16. Some one may say: such is the lot of kings: The lightning ever smites the mountain-tops. [Hor. C. II. 10:11, 12]

I will come therefore to persons of private position, and in speaking of these I will not go farther back than the last two years. In fact I will content myself-omitting all others-with recounting the respective fates of three recent consulars. Abundantius is a beggared exile at Pityus.³³ The head of Rufinus has been carried on a pike to Constantinople, and his severed hand has begged alms from door to door to shame his insatiable greed.³⁴ Timasius,³⁵ hurled suddenly from a position of the highest rank thinks it an escape that he is allowed to live in obscurity at Assa. I am describing not the misfortunes of an unhappy few but the thread upon which human fortunes as a whole depend. I shudder when I think of the catastrophes of our time. For twenty years and more the blood of Romans has been shed daily between Constantinople and the Julian Alps. Scythia, Thrace, Macedonia, Dardania, Dacia, Thessaly, Achaia, Epirus, Dalmatia, the Pannonias—each and all of these have been sacked and pillaged and plundered by Goths and Sarmatians, Quades and Alans, Huns and Vandals and Marchmen. How many of God's matrons and virgins, Virtuous and noble ladies, have been made the sport of these brutes! Bishops have been made captive, priests and those in minor orders have been put to death. Churches have been overthrown, horses have been stalled by the altars of Christ, the relics of martyrs have been dug up.

"Mourning and fear abound on every side And death appears in countless shapes and forms." [Virg. A. 2:369] The Roman world is falling: yet we hold up our heads instead of bowing them. What courage, think you, have the Corinthians now, or the Athenians or the Lacedaemonians or the Arcadians, or any of the Greeks over whom the barbarians bear sway? I have mentioned only a few cities, but these once the capitals of no mean states. The East, it is true, seemed to be safe from all such evils: and if men were panic-stricken here, it was only because of bad news from other parts. But lo! in the year just gone by the wolves (no longer of Arabia but of the whole North³⁶) were let loose upon us from the remotest fastnesses of Caucasus and in a short time overran these great provinces. What a number of monasteries they captured! What many rivers they caused to run red with blood! They laid siege to Antioch and invested other cities on the Halys, the Cydnus, the Orontes, and the Euphrates. They carried off troops of captives. Arabia, Phenicia, Palestine and Egypt, in their terror fancied themselves already enslaved.

"Had I a hundred tongues, a hundred lips, A throat of iron and a chest of brass, I could not tell men's countless sufferings." [Virg. A. 6:625-7] And indeed it is not my purpose to write a history: I only wish to shed a few tears over your sorrows and mine. For the rest, to treat such themes as they deserve, Thucydides and Sallust would be as good as dumb.

17. Nepotian is happy who neither sees these things nor hears them. We are unhappy, for either we suffer ourselves or we see our brethren suffer. Yet we desire to live, and regard those beyond the reach of these evils as miserable rather than blessed. We have long felt that God is angry, yet we do not try to appease Him. It is our sins which make the barbarians strong, it is our vices which vanquish Rome's soldiers: and, as if there were here too little material for carnage, civil wars have made almost greater havoc among us than the swords of foreign foes. Miserable must those Israelites have been compared with whom Nebuchadnezzar was called God's servant. [Jer. 27:6] Unhappy too are we who are so displeasing to God that He uses the fury of the barbarians to execute His wrath against us. Still when Hezekiah repented, one hundred and eighty-five thousand Assyrians were destroyed in one night by a single angel. [2 K. 19:35] When Jehosaphat sang the praises of the Lord, the Lord gave His worshipper the victory. [2 Chr. 20:5-25] Again when Moses fought against Amalek, it was not with the sword but with prayer that he prevailed. [Ex. 17:11] Therefore, if we wish to be lifted up, we must first prostrate ourselves. Alas! for our shame and folly reaching even to unbelief! Rome's army, once victor and lord of the world, now trembles with terror at the sight of the foe and accepts defeat from men who cannot walk afoot and fancy themselves dead if once they are unhorsed.³⁷ We do not understand the prophet's words: "One thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one." [Isa. 30:17] We do not cut away the causes of the disease, as we must do to remove the disease itself. Else we should soon see the enemies' arrows give way to our javelins, their caps to our helmets, their palfreys to our chargers.

18. But I have gone beyond the office of a consoler, and while forbidding you to weep for one dead man I have myself mourned the dead of the whole world. Xerxes the mighty king who rased mountains and filled up seas, looking from high ground upon the untold host, the countless army before him, is said³⁸ to have wept at the thought that in a hundred years not one of those whom he then saw would be alive. Oh! if we could but get up into a watch-tower so high that from it we might behold the whole earth spread out under our feet, then I would shew you the wreck of a world, nation warring against nation and kingdom in collision with kingdom; some men tortured, others put to the sword, others swallowed up by the waves, some dragged away into slavery; here a wedding, there a funeral; men born here, men dying there; some living in affluence, others begging their bread; and not the army of Xerxes, great as that was, but all the inhabitants of the world alive now but destined soon to pass away. Language is inadequate to a theme so vast and all that I can say must fall short of the reality.

19. Let us return then to ourselves and coming down from the skies let us look for a few moments upon what more nearly concerns us. Are you conscious, I would ask, of the stages of your growth? Can you fix the time when you became a babe, a boy, a youth, an adult, an old man? Every day we are changing, every day we are dying, and yet we fancy ourselves eternal. The very moments that I spend in dictation, in writing, in reading over what I write, and in correcting it, are so much taken from my life. Every dot that my secretary makes is so much gone from my allotted time. We write letters and reply to those of others, our missives cross the sea, and, as the vessel ploughs its furrow through wave after wave, the moments which we have to live vanish one by one. Our only gain is that we are thus knit together in the love of Christ. "Charity suffereth long and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Charity never faileth." [1 Cor. 13:4, 1 Cor. 13:7, 1 Cor. 13:8] It lives always in the heart, and thus our Nepotian though absent is still present, and widely sundered though we are has a hand to offer to each. Yes, in him we have a hostage for mutual charity. Let us then be joined together in spirit, let us bind ourselves each to each in affection and let us who have lost a son shew the same fortitude with which the blessed pope Chromatius³⁹ bore the loss of a brother. Let every page that we write echo his name, let all our letters ring with it. If we can no longer clasp him to our hearts, let us hold him fast in memory; and if we can no longer speak with him, let us never cease to speak of him.

1:

Cf. Letter XXXIX

2: 2 Cor. x 3 3: A Thracian tribe

4: The words are quoted by Cicero (T. Q. 3:13) apparently from the Telamon of Ennius. They are ascribed to Anaxagoras by Diog. Laert 5: In his De consolatione of which only a few fragments remain 6: In the first year of the Republic. Acc. to Livy (ii. 8) his son was not really dead 7: The conqueror of Macedonia. He celebrated his triumph 167 b.c

8: Letter XXXIX 9: i.e. Epaphroditus 10: mhden agan, ne quid nimis. A saying of one of the Seven Wise Men of Greece, 6th cent. b.c. See Grote 4:127

11:

Dedit escam. This is the reading of the LXX. The Vulgate, like the A.V., has "shall divide the spoil." Compare Letter LXIX 6

12: Letter XIV 13: For other allusions to a Roman officer's uniform see Letters LXXIX. and CXVIII

14: Acts x 15: Like Bonosus (Letter III. 4) 16: Nu. 11:16. Presbyterum. This name (afterwards contracted into Priest) is taken from that of the Elders of Israel

17: Letter LII 18: Jerome here confounds two distinct persons: C. Fabius Pictor was the painter; his grandson Q. Fabius the historian 19: 1 K. 7:14. A mistake of Jerome. It was Hiram's father who was a Tyrian 20: Hippias of Elis. See Cic. Or. 3:32 21: Conciliabula 22: A similar phrase occurs in Letter CXVIII 23: Plato, Phaedo 12:Cic. T. Q. 1. 31 24: Died 361 a.d

25: Julian 26: Died 363 a.d 27: Died 364 a.d 28: Died 375 a.d 29: Burned to death in a hut after the battle of Adrianople, 378 a.d 30: Died 383 a.d. by the hand of Andragathius 31: Strangled by Arbogastes at Vienne, 392 a.d 32: Aspirants to the purple who were put to death, the first by Valens, the second and third by Theodosius 33: Banished by Eutropius who had owed his advancement to him

34: The prime minister of Theodosius I. Shortly after the accession of Arcadius Gainas the Goth procured his assassination 35: One of the generals of Theodosius I., banished to the Oasis at the instigation of Eutropius 36: i.e. the Huns have taken the place of the Chaldaeans described in Hab. 1:8, LXX 37: Jornandes corroborates the account of the Huns here given by Jerome 38: Herod. 7:cc. 45, 46 39: Bishop of Aquileia. His brother Eusebius was also a bishop

Letters - letter_061

Letter 61. To Vigilantius.

Vigilantius on his return to the West after his visit to Jerusalem (whither he had gone as the bearer of letters from Paulinus of Nola-see Letter 58.) had openly accused Jerome of a leaning to the heresy of Origen. Jerome now writes to him in the most severe tone repudiating the charge of Origenism and fastening upon his opponent those of ignorance and blasphemy. He singles out for especial reprobation Vigilantius's explanation of 'the stone cut out without hands' in Daniel and urges him to repent of his sins in which case he will have as much chance of forgiveness as the devil has according to Origen! The letter is often referred to as showing Jerome's way of dealing with Origen's works. Jerome subsequently wrote a refutation of Vigilantius's work, of all his controversial writings the most violent and the least reasonable. See the translation of it in this volume. See also Letter 109. The date of this letter is 396 a.d.

1. Since you have refused to believe your own ears, I might justly decline to satisfy you by a letter; for, if you have failed to credit the living voice, it is not likely that you will give way to a written paper. But, since Christ has shown us in Himself a pattern of perfect humility, bestowing a kiss upon His betrayer and receiving the robber's repentance upon the cross, I tell you now when absent as I have told you already when present, that I read and have read Origen only as I read Apollinaris, or other writers whose books in some things the Church does not receive. I by no means say that everything contained in such books is to be condemned, but I admit that there are things in them deserving of censure. Still, as it is my task and study by reading many authors to cull different flowers from as large a number as possible, not so much making it an object to prove all things as to choose what are good. I take up many writers that froth the many I may learn many things; according to that which is written "reading all things, holding fast those that are good." [1 Th. 5:21] Hence I am much surprised that you have tried to fasten upon me the doctrines of Origen, of whose mistaken teaching on many points you are up to the present altogether unaware. Am I a heretic? Why pray then do heretics dislike me so? And are you orthodox, you who either against your convictions and the words of your own mouth signed¹ unwillingly and are consequently a prevaricator, or else signed deliberately and are consequently a heretic? You have taken no account of Egypt; you have relinquished all those provinces where numbers plead freely and openly for your sect; and you have singled out me for assault, me whom not only censure but publicly condemn all doctrines that are contrary to the church.

2. Origen is a heretic, true; but what does that take from me who do not deny that on very many points he is heretical? He has erred concerning the resurrection of the body, he has erred concerning the condition of souls, he has erred by supposing it possible that the devil may repent, and-an error more important than these-he has declared in his commentary upon Isaiah that the Seraphim mentioned by the prophet [Isa. 6:2. See Letter XVIII] are the divine Son and the Holy Ghost. If I did not allow that he has erred or if I did not daily anathematize his errors I should be partaker of his fault. For while we receive what is good in his writings we must on no account bind ourselves to accept also what is evil. Still in many passages he has interpreted the scriptures well, has explained obscure places in the prophets, and has brought to light very great mysteries, both in the old and in the new testament. If then I have taken over what is good in him and have either cut away or altered or ignored what is evil, am I to be regarded as guilty on the score that through my agency those who read Latin receive the good in his writings without knowing anything of the bad? If this be a crime the confessor Hilary must be convicted; for he has rendered from Greek into Latin Origen's Explanation of the Psalms and his Homilies on Job. Eusebius of Vercellae, who witnessed a like confession, must also be held in fault; for he has translated into our tongue the Commentaries upon all the Psalms of his heretical namesake, omitting however the unsound portions and rendering only those parts which are profitable. I say nothing of Victorinus of Petavium and others who have merely followed and expanded Origen in their explanation of the scriptures. Were I to do so, I might seem less anxious to defend myself than to find for myself companions in guilt. I will come to your own case: Why do you keep copies of his treatises on Job? In these, while arguing against the devil and concerning the stars and heavens, he has said certain things which the Church does not receive. Is it for you alone, with that very wise head of yours, to pass sentence upon all writers Greek and Latin, with a wave of your censor's wand to eject some from our libraries and to admit others, and as the whim takes you to pronounce me either a Catholic or a heretic? And am I to be forbidden to reject things which are wrong and to condemn what I have often condemned already? Read what I have written upon the epistle to the Ephesians, read my other works, particularly my commentary upon Ecclesiastes, and you will clearly see that from my youth up I have never been terrified by any man's influence into acquiescence in heretical pravity.

3. It is no small gain to know your own ignorance. It is a man's wisdom to know his own measure, that he may not be led away at the instigation of the devil to make the whole world a witness of his incapacity. You are bent, I suppose, on magnifying yourself and boast in your own country that I found myself unable to answer your eloquence and that I dreaded in you the sharp satire of a Chrysippus.² Christian modesty holds me back and I do not wish to lay open the retirement of my poor cell with biting words. Otherwise I should soon shew up all your bravery and your parade of triumph.³ But these I leave to others either to talk of or to laugh at; while for my own part as a Christian speaking to a Christian I beseech you my brother not to pretend to know more than you do, lest your pen may proclaim your innocence and simplicity, or at any rate those qualities of which I say nothing but which, though you do not see them in yourself others see in you. For then you will give everyone reason to laugh at your folly. From your earliest childhood you have been taught other lessons and have been used to a different kind of schooling. One and the same person can hardly be a tester both of gold coins on the counter and also of the scriptures, or be a connoisseur of wines and an adept in expounding prophets or apostles.⁴ As for me, you tear me limb from limb, our reverend brother Oceanus you charge with heresy, you dislike the judgment of the presbyters Vincent and Paulinian, and our brother Eusebius also displeases you. You alone are to be our Cato, the most eloquent of the Roman race, and you wish us to accept what you say as the words of prudence herself. Pray call to mind the day when I preached on the resurrection and on the reality of the risen body, and when you jumped up beside me and clapped your hands and stamped your feet and applauded my orthodoxy. Now, however, that you have taken to sea travelling the stench of the bilge water has affected your head, and you have called me to mind only as a heretic. What can I do for you? I believed the letters of the reverend presbyter Paulinus, and it did not occur to me that his judgment concerning you could be wrong. And although, the moment that you handed me the letter, I noticed a certain incoherency in your language, yet I fancied this due to want of culture and knowledge in you and not to an unsettled brain. I do not censure the reverend writer who preferred, no doubt, in writing to me to keep back what he knew rather than to accuse in his missive one who was both under his patronage and entrusted with his letter; but I find fault with myself that I have rested in another's judgment rather than my own, and that, while my eyes saw one thing, I believed on the evidence of a scrap of paper something else than what I saw.

4. Wherefore cease to worry me and to overwhelm me with your scrolls. Spare at least your money with which you hire secretaries and copyists, employing the same persons to write for you and to applaud you. Possibly their praise is due to the fact that they make a profit out of writing for you. If you wish to exercise your mind, hand yourself over to the teachers of grammar and rhetoric, learn logic, have yourself instructed in the schools of the philosophers; and when you have learned all these things you will perhaps begin to hold your tongue. And yet I am acting foolishly in seeking teachers for one who is competent to teach everyone, and in trying to limit the utterance of one who does not know how to speak yet cannot remain silent. The old Greek proverb is quite true "A lyre is of no use to an ass."⁵ For my part I imagine that even your name was given you out of contrariety.⁶ For your whole mind slumbers and you actually snore, so profound is the sleep-or rather the lethargy-in which you are plunged. In fact amongst the other blasphemies which with sacrilegious lips you have uttered you have dared to say that the mountain in Daniel [Dan. 2:34, Dan. 2:45] out of which the stone was cut without hands is the devil, and that the stone is Christ, who having taken a body from Adam (whose sins had before connected him with the devil) is born of a virgin to separate mankind from the mountain, that is, from the devil. Your tongue deserves to be cut out and torn into fragments. Can any true Christian explain this image of the devil instead of referring it to God the Father Almighty, or defile the ears of the whole world with so frightful an enormity? If your explanation has ever been accepted by any-I will not say Catholic but-heretic or heathen, let your words be regarded as pious. If on the other hand the Church of Christ has never yet heard of such an impiety, and if yours has been the first mouth through which he who once said "I will be like the Most High" [Isa. 14:14] has declared that he is the mountain spoken of by Daniel, then repent, put on sackcloth and ashes, and with fast-flowing tears wash away your awful guilt; if so be that this impiety may be forgiven you, and, supposing Origen's heresy to be true, that you may obtain pardon when the devil himself shall obtain it, the devil who has never been convicted of greater blasphemy than that which he has uttered through you. Your insult offered to myself I bear with patience: your impiety towards God I cannot bear. Accordingly I may seem to have been somewhat more acrid in this latter part of my letter than I declared I would be at the outset. Yet having once before repented and asked pardon of me, it is extremely foolish in you again to commit a sin for which you must anew do penance. May Christ give you grace to hear and to hold your peace, to understand and so to speak.

1:

Probably Aterbius (for whom see Jerome Apol. 3:33, and note on Letter LXXXVI.) had brought with him some test-formula of orthodoxy which he called upon all anti-Origenists to sign

2: A disciple of Cleanthes and Zeno, and after them the leading teacher of the Stoic school at Athens. He was born in 280 a.d 3: This expression is given in Greek 4: The father of Vigilantius is said by Jerome to have been an inn-keeper

5:

onw lur

6:

Jerome subsequently (Letter CIX.) nicknamed his opponent Dormitantius ('the Sleepy One'), his own name Vigilantius meaning 'the Wakeful. 0

Letters - letter_062

Letter 62. To Tranquillinus.

Tranquillinus, one of Jerome's Roman friends, had written (1) to tell him of the stand that Oceanus was making against the Origenists at Rome, and (2) to ask whether any parts of Origen's works might be studied with safety and profit. Jerome welcomes the tidings about Oceanus and answers the question of Tranquillinus in the affirmative. He classes Origen with Tertullian, Apollinaris and others whose works continued to be read in spite of their heresies. Written in 396 or 397 a.d.

I. Though I formerly doubted the fact, I have now proved that the links which bind spirit to spirit are stronger than any physical bond. For you, my reverend friend, cling to me with all your soul, and I am united to you by the love of Christ. I speak simply and sincerely to your spotless heart: the very paper on which you write, the very letters which you have formed-voiceless though they are-in-spire in me a sense of your affection.

2. You tell me that many have been deceived by the mistaken teaching of Origen, and that that saintly man, my son Oceanus, is doing battle with their madness. I grieve to think that simple folk have been thrown off their balance, but I am rejoiced to know that one so learned as Oceanus is doing his best to set them right again. Moreover you ask me, insignificant though I am, for an opinion as to the advisability of reading Origen's works. Are we, you say, to reject him altogether with our brother Faustinus, or are we, as others tell us, to read him in part? My opinion is that we should sometimes read him for his learning just as we read Tertullian, Novatus, Arnobius, Apollinarius and some other church writers both Greek and Latin, and that we should select what is good and avoid what is bad in their writings according to the words of the Apostle, "Prove all things: hold fast that which is good" [1 Th. 5:21] Those, however, who are led by some perversity in their dispositions to conceive for him too much fondness or toomuch aversion seem to me to lie under the curse of the Prophet:-"Woe unto them that call evil good and good evil; that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter!" [Is. 5:20] For while the ability of his teaching must not lead us to embrace his wrong opinions, the wrongness of his opinions should not cause us altogether to reject the useful commentaries which he has published on the holy scriptures. But if his admirers and his detractors are bent on having a tug of war one against the other, and if, seeking no mean and observing no moderation, they must either approve or disapprove his works indiscriminately, I would choose rather to be a pious boor than a learned blasphemer. Our reverend brother, Tatian the deacon, heartily salutes you.

Letters - letter_063

Letter 63. To Theophilus. When the dispute arose between Jerome and Epiphanius on the one side and Rufinus and John of Jerusalem on the other (see Letter 51.), Theophilus bishop of Alexandria, being appealed to by the latter sent the presbyter Isidore to report to him on the matter. Isidore reported against Jerome and consequently Theophilus refused to answer several of his letters. Finally he wrote counselling him to obey the canons of the church. Jerome replies that to do this has always been his first object. He then remonstrates with Theophilus on his too great leniency towards the Origenists and declares it to be productive of the worst results. The date of the letter is probably 397 a.d.

Jerome to the most blessed pope Theophilus.

I. Your holiness will remember that at the time when you kept silence towards me, I never ceased to do my duty by writing to you, not taking so much into account what you in the exercise of your discretion were then doing as what it became me to do. And now that I have received a letter from your grace, I see that my reading of the gospel has not been without fruit. For if the frequent prayers of a woman changed the determination of an unyielding judge, [Luke 18:2-5] how much more must my constant appeals have softened a fatherly heart Auks yours?

2. I thank you for your reminder concerning the canons of the Church. Truly, "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." [Heb. 12:6] Still I would assure you that nothing is more my aim than to maintain the rights of Christ, to keep to the lines laid down by the fathers, and always to remember the faith of Rome; that faith which is praised by the lips of an apostle, [Rom. 1:8] and of which the Alexandrian church boasts to be a sharer.

3. Many religious persons are displeased that you are so long-suffering in regard to that shocking heresy,¹ and that you suppose yourself able by such lenity to amend those who are attacking the Church's vitals. They believe that, while you are waiting for the penitence of a few, your action is fostering the boldness of abandoned men and making their party stronger. Farewell in Christ.

1:

That of the Origenists

Letters - letter_064

Letter 64. To Fabiola.

Fabiola's visit to Bethlehem had been shortened by the threatened invasion of the Huns which compelled Jerome and his friends to take refuge for a time on the seaboard of Palestine. Fabiola here took leave of her companions and set sail for Italy, but not until Jerome had completed this letter for her use (§22). It contains a mystical account of the vestments of the High Priest worked out with Jerome's usual ingenuity and learning. Similar treatises are ascribed to Tertullian and to Hosius bishop of Cordova, but these have long since perished. Its date is 396 or 397 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. Until this day, when Moses is read, the veil is over their heart. But when they will be converted to the Lord, the veil will be taken away. For the letter kills, but the spirit quickens. Now the Lord is a Spirit. And where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. But we all beholding the glory of the Lord with open face, are transformed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord (2 Cor. 3:15-18). For neither is he that planteth any thing, nor he that watereth: but God that giveth the increase (1 Cor. 3:7). Doth God take care for oxen? Much more from the liver of an ox, ram, and goat, and from the right arm, breast, and belly, in which the dung is digested; two of which are taken by the priests for eating: the third Phinehas deserves as a reward. Of the salvific victims, the fat with which the breast is covered, and the wings of the liver are offered upon the altar, but the breast itself and the right arm are given to Aaron and his sons as a legitimate and permanent portion by the children of Israel (Leviticus 7). The sense is in the heart, the dwelling-place of the heart in the breast. It is asked where the principal of the soul may be. Plato says, "In the brain"; Christ shows it in the heart: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." And from the heart proceed wicked thoughts. "And what evil thoughts do you have in your hearts?" (Matthew 5:8 and 15:18 and 9:4). Pleasure and desire, according to those who argue about physics, reside in the liver. The priests offer its wing fluttering in various directions and bursting out through the windows of the eyes to God: so that after they have said to God, "let your burnt offering be fat," in Psalm 19, they may merit to receive the reward of a pure heart and arm. In the heart, there are clean thoughts, knowledge of the law, and truth of dogma: in the arm, good works and a fight against the devil with an armed hand: so that what they have conceived in their mind, they may prove by their example. For Jesus 'began to do and to teach' (Acts 1). Also, this small chest is called an ■π■θεμῶ, that is, an addition, or a principal and excellent one, for this term sounds better. From this we understand, according to Malachi: 'The lips of a priest guard knowledge, and they seek instruction from his mouth' (Malachi 1:7): that the priests should possess knowledge of the law and doctrine as their principal duty, and, by an addition of spiritual grace, should be established as men who can resist those who contradict them (Titus 1), and have nothing in their work to lead them to Tartarus, but have a right arm and are separate, so that, compared to the virtues of the priest's work, all other men are separated.

2. Moreover, three other parts, except for the first fruits of the sacrifices, and those from private individuals, and from the public butcher's stall where the motive is not religion, but necessity of food, are given to the priests: the arm, the jaw, and the stomach. We have already spoken of the arm. The jaw indicates an eloquent and learned speaker, so that we may express with the mouth what we conceive in our heart. The stomach is the receptacle of food, and pierced by the sacred priestly point in the belly of a Madianitish harlot (Num. 25), it condemns all the labours of men and the fleeting pleasures of gluttony to be rejected as dung; and it shows to those who are consecrated in mind to God that all we care for and all we eat ought to be thrown aside in the privacy of meditation. Hence the Apostle says: "Food for the stomach, and the stomach for food; but God will destroy both this and them" (1 Cor. 6:13), while he speaks of the luxurious as follows: "Whose belly is their god, and their glory in their shame" (Phil. 3:19). The people accepted the dust of calves which Israel had adored, into a drink of contemptuous superstition, that they might learn to despise what they saw cast into seclusion. It is commanded to the priests that they drink no wine or cider while ministering in the temple, lest their hearts be weighed down by drunkenness, excess, and the cares of this life: nor have any share in the land, except God alone (Leviticus 10); that they may be distinguished by no weakness: nor by cut-off ears, injured eyes, flattened noses, lame feet, or changed skin color, all of which are referred to the vices of the soul. The will indeed, not nature, is condemned in man. If someone among the priests has an issue of semen, he is prohibited from approaching the priestly table; and on the contrary the widow, whose feminine impulses died with Sarah, is received into the father's house on account of her self-control and chastity: and is supported from the temple treasury. And if she has children, they are required to take care of their parents, so that they may minister to them "who are truly widows" (1 Tim. 5. 3): and so that she who is sustained on priestly food is subject to no one else's love. Neighbors and hired laborers are excluded from the banquet of the priests, and the remains of the servants' food are granted. At that time, Phygelus and Hermogenes were rejected, and Onesiphorus was received. The first fruits of food and all kinds of fruits are offered to the Antistes: so that, having food and clothing, he may serve the Lord secure and free from any hindrance. The priests receive the firstborn of the animals of the world: the price of the unclean. Also the firstborn of men are redeemed, and because the condition of birth is the same, the price is offered equally moderate and light: so that neither the rich swells, nor the thin is burdened. The temple servants and janitors receive tithes: and in turn they offer tithes of tithes to the priests (Num. 18 and 35): as much less to them as they are greater than the people. Forty-eight cities are set apart for the Levites and priests to dwell in: six cities of fugitives are chosen beyond Jordan and within Jordan: and the end of the exile is the death of the High Priest. All that the hasty word portrays and which I merely touched upon, and did not reveal the mysteries of, belong to all priests: but I will briefly explain how great are the privileges of the High Priest.

3. "My head," he says, "I will not cover" (Lev. 21). He wears a turban and carries the name of God on his forehead. He is adorned with a royal diadem, he has come to the perfect age of Christ, he is always to be protected by his glory, and his garments he will not tear because they are white, pure and follow the Lamb, and made from the wool of slaughtered sheep. Tamar, having lost her modesty, tore her tunic (Gen. 38). Caiphas having lost his priesthood, tore his garments openly (Matt. 26). "He shall not enter upon any soul that is dead" (Lev. 21:11). Wherever there is sin, and in sin there is death, the Priest does not approach. «The soul that sins shall die» (Ezek. 18). Although he may be rich, although he may be powerful, and offer a multitude of victims, if he is dead, he is not touched by the Priest, he is not seen. But if he rises again, and goes forth from the tomb at the voice of the Savior, and walks with the bonds of sin loosed (Jn. 11:12), the Priest will enter to him: and there he will make a dwelling place, and will dine with the risen.

4. "He will not be defiled by his father or mother" (Leviticus 21:11). Our emotions drive us to do many things, and when we focus on physical closeness, we offend the Creator of the body and soul. Anyone who loves their father or mother more than Christ is not worthy of Him (Luke 9). When a disciple desires to go bury his father, he is prohibited by the Savior's command. How many monks have lost their souls by feeling sorry for their father and mother! We cannot defile ourselves with regards to our father, mother, brother, sisters, cousins, family or slaves. We are of royalty and a priestly species. Let us look to him, our father, who never dies, or who dies for us: and who, in living, died so that he could give life to us who are dead. If we have anything from Egypt that the prince of the world can recognize, let us leave it to the one who holds Egypt with his cloak (Gen. 39). A young man, covered with a cloth, followed the bound Lord (Mark 14): he would have fallen into the snares if he had not, freed and naked, dodged the attack of his persecutors. Let us repay to our parents what belongs to our parents, if they are still alive: if they serve the Lord, let them boast that their sons are preferred to them.

5. "And from the holy he shall not go out, nor shall he defile the sanctuary of his God" (Leviticus 21:12). We will also give an account for every idle word we speak: "And all that doth not edify, proveth hearing." If I do or say anything worthy of blame, I would be departing from the path of the holy, and defiling the name of Christ, which I ought to love all the more. How much more so the Pontiff and Bishop, who must be without blame (Titus 1:7), abound in virtues, and always reside among the saints; ever ready to offer sacrifices for their people, bridging the gap between God and humanity, enshrining Christ's lamb, saying, "For the holy oil of Christ his God is upon him"; he shall never stray from that which is holy, lest he defile the garments with which he is clothed. For as many as have been baptized in Christ, have put on Christ (Gal. 3). Let us keep the tunic which we received, let us guard the holy [robe] in holiness. That inhabitant of the mountain, who was coming down from Jerusalem to Jericho, was not wounded before being stripped. A gentle healing balm is poured into him, tempered by mercy, and because he should have felt the pain of neglect, he is stung by the harshness of wine (Luke 10): so that he may be provoked to repentance by the oil, and may feel the severity of the judge through the wine.

6. "He shall take a wife in her virginity. A widow or one divorced or defiled by prostitution, he shall not marry; but he shall take as his wife a virgin of his own people, so that he shall not profane his offspring among his people. For I am the Lord who sanctifies him." (Lev. 21:14) I know that the high priest is understood by many to mean Christ, to whom these commands are now given, and that what is said, "he shall not defile himself, being a chief man among his people" is expounded of the virginal birth of Mary, and it is far easier to understand it of the Lord, who hears in the Psalm: "Thou art a priest forever, after the order of Melchizedek." (Ps. 110:4) And in Zechariah: "Hear, O Jesus, great priest." (Zech. 3:8) and to whom the filthy garments of our sins are taken away, that they may receive the glory He had with the Father before the world was.

7. But lest anyone think that I am doing violence to the Scriptures, and thus loving Christ, so as to take away the truth of history, I will interpret in the members what is related to the head: I will understand the servants as being fulfilled in the Lord. Although the glory of the Lord is the glory of the servants, and wherever the opportunity of the place may have led, I will so argue from the true light, that it may be derived to those to whom Christ has given that they may be a light. This high priest, whom the Mosaic text describes, does not take a widow who has been put away and a harlot for a wife. A widow is one whose husband is dead. A woman is put away who has been cast off by her living husband. A prostitute, who is open to the lust of many. But he will receive, he says, a virgin wife of his own kind, not a foreigner, so that in a bad land the grain of noble seed may not degenerate. Not a prostitute, who has been exposed to many lovers. Not an outcast, who was unworthy of her first marriage. Not a widow, lest she remember her former pleasures: but rather that soul which has no blemish, nor wrinkle, which, being reborn with Christ, is renewed from day to day, of which the Apostle speaks: For I have espoused you to one man, to present a chaste virgin to Christ (1 Corinthians 11:2). I do not want the disciple to be considered as the spouse of the Pontiff when anything is concerned with the old man. If we have risen with Christ, let us seek those things which are above. Forgetting the past, desiring the future. Unhappy Simon, because after baptism he thought of the old marriage, and did not come to the purity of the virgin, he was unworthy of the fellowship of Peter.

8. You compelled me, Fabiola, through your letters, to write to you about Aaron's priesthood and garments. I have offered more, in constructing a little preface, concerning the foods and firstfruits of the priests and the observance of the High Priest. Leaving Sodom, and hastening to the mountains, you do not want to live in the small city of Segor. Beyond the proselytes, passing by the Israelites, leaving behind the Levitical order, and flying like a bird, you arrive at the priest. But while you carefully inspect his clothing and the breastplate on his chest, our companionship displeases you. And indeed, you enjoy the desired leisure: and perhaps you long for the countryside near Bethlehem, next to Babylon. We, in Ephrata, finally restored to peace, hear the wailing child from the manger: and we want his lamentations and crying to reach your ears.

9. We read in Exodus, the tabernacle, table, candlestick, altar, pillars, tents, scarlet, linen, hyacinth, purple of gold, silver, and brass vessels, the tabernacle divided into three, twelve loaves placed on the table each week, seven lamps on the candlestick, the altar exposed to burnt offerings and sacrifices, cups, bowls, censers, basins, small mortars, skin bottles, and goat hair pillows, and incorruptible wood. So great and such things are presented in the tabernacle of God that no one despairs of salvation. One exhibits the gold of sense, another the silver of speech, another the voice of air. The whole world is described in the mystery of the tabernacle. The first and second vestibule was open to all, for water and earth have been given to all mortals. But in the holy of holies, as if to the sky and heaven, the entrance and flight of a few is. The twelve loaves signify the twelve months in a circle. The seven lamps demonstrate the wandering stars. And not to make it long (for it is not my purpose now to write about the tabernacle), I come to the priestly garments: and before I examine their mystical significance according to the Jewish custom, I will explain briefly what is written. So after you have seen the priest's clothing and have viewed all its ornamentation with your eyes, then we will investigate the meaning of each detail.

10. Let us first learn about the common vestments of priests and pontiffs. The genitalia are covered by the femoral lines, which reach the knees and the calves, and the upper part is tightly cinched below the navel: so that if they need to sacrifice victims, they can drag bulls and rams, carry loads, and serve in their office, even if they have stumbled and have revealed their thighs, what is covered up is not exposed. Hence, the steps of the altar are not allowed to be made, lest the lower people see the genitalia of those ascending: and this kind of garment is called Machnase in the Hebrew language, in Greek περισκελ■, in our language feminalia, or breeches that reach the knees. Josephus reports (for in his time the temple was still standing, and Jerusalem had not yet been destroyed by Vespasian and Titus, and he himself was of priestly stock; and what is seen with the eyes is understood more easily than what is perceived by the ears) that these female garments used to be woven with byssus and then turned back for strength, and after they had been cut, sewn with a needle. For it is impossible to weave such things in a loom.

11. The second tunic made of linen is the ποδ■ρης, that is, the talaris, made of double sindon, which Josephus himself calls byssinam, and is called Chotonath, that is, χετ■ν, which in Hebrew is translated into linen. This clings to the body and is so tight and strict with sleeves, that there is not a single wrinkle in the garment: and it descends to the ankles. For the convenience of the reader, I want to use the common language. Soldiers usually have linen tunics, which they call camisias, that are fitted to the limbs and tight to the bodies, so that they are unencumbered either when running or in battle, directing a spear, holding a shield, wielding a sword, and wherever necessity leads them. Therefore, even the priests prepared for the service of God, use this tunic, so that having the beauty of clothes, they may run quickly while naked.

12. The third kind of garment is called by them the Abanet, we can say belt or girdle, or zone. The Babylonians call it by a new word, Hemian. We use different words so that no one will make a mistake in the name. This belt is woven into a circular shape like the skin of a snake, which sloughs off its old age: it is so woven that you would think it is longer than it is wide. But it is a fabric of scarlet, purple, hyacinth, and fine linen, artfully woven and embroidered, appearing like a piece of work consisting of various flowers and settings of precious stones. This tunic is held together at the waist by a belt, four fingers in width, and extending down to the feet, with the exception of the left upper arm, thus forming a loop, when it is needed for the purpose of sacrificing or military expeditions.

13. The fourth type of clothing is the round cap, which we see painted on Ulysses, as if a sphere were divided in the middle and one part placed on the head: this the Greeks and our people call a "tiara," some call it a "galerum," the Hebrews call it "Misnefeth": it has no point at the top and does not cover the whole head down to the hair, but leaves the front third uncovered; and so it is bound on the back by a ribbon, so that it does not easily slip off the head. It is made of linen so skillfully woven that no seam appears on the outside.

14. These four are the vestments, that is, the breeches, the linen tunic, the belt, which is covered with purple, scarlet, byssus, and hyacinth, and the cap, of which we have just spoken, which both priests and pontiffs use. The remaining four belong properly to the pontiffs, of which the first is the Mail, that is, the ankle-length tunic, entirely hyacinth, having sleeves sewn from the same color on the sides, and in the upper part, where it is worn around the neck, open, which is commonly called the "capitium", with the strongest borders woven from itself, so that they may not easily break. At the very end, that is, at the feet, there are seventy-two bells and as many pomegranates, woven with the same colors as the belt above. Among two bells there is a pomegranate; among two pomegranates there is a bell, so that each is in the middle of the others, and the reason is given. Therefore, the bells are placed on the garment, so that when the High Priest enters the Holy of Holies, he walks entirely vocally, immediately dying if he does not do this.

15. The sixth garment is called the Ephod in Hebrew language. The Septuagint calls it ■πωμ■δα, that is, "superhumerales." Aquila calls it ■π■νδομα, but we use the name Ephod. And wherever the term superhumerales is mentioned in Exodus or Leviticus, we know that it is called the Ephod in Hebrew. This is the garment of the High Priest and in a certain Epistle (to Marcellinus, xxix), as I remember writing, and all of Scripture testifies that it is a sacred item, and suitable for High Priests alone. Moreover, it is not immediately apparent that Samuel, who was a Levite, is written in the first book of Kings, to have worn a linen ephod when he was still a boy, just as it is reported that David also wore the same before the ark of the Lord. For one thing is to have been woven of the four above-mentioned colors, namely hyacinth, white linen, scarlet, and purple, and of gold; something simpler and of linen, like the robes of the priests. Leaves of gold, that is, thin sheets, are stretched out with incredible thinness, from which fibers are twisted, with an undergarment of three colors, hyacinth, scarlet, and purple, and with a linen warp; and a garment of marvelous beauty is created, dazzling the eyes like a garment of Caracalla's but without a hood. Nothing is woven opposite the chest, and that place is left for the future breastplate. He has on each shoulder single stones enclosed and bound in gold; they are called in Hebrew Soom, according to Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, onyx gems according to the Septuagint. Josephus calls them sardonyxes, in agreement with the Hebrew and Aquila, whether to indicate the color of the stones or their place of origin. And on each of the stones are engraved the names of six Patriarchs by which the Israelite people are divided. On the right shoulder are written the names of the elder sons of Jacob, on the left the names of the younger, so that when the High Priest enters the Holy of Holies he bears on his shoulders the names of the people for whom he is to pray to the Lord.

16. The seventh garment is a small measure, but more sacred than all those mentioned above. Pay attention, please, so that you may understand what is being said. It is called "Hosen" in Hebrew, but in Greek, λ■γιον, and we can call it Rationale, so that from the name itself you may know that what is being said is mystical. It is a short cloth made of gold and four woven colors, that is, the same ones as the Superhumerales, having a size of a hand per square; and it is double, so that it does not easily break. Twelve stones of amazing size and value are woven into it in four rows: so that in each verse, three stones are placed. In the first order, sardius, topazius, and smaragdus are placed. Symmachus dissents in the smaragdus, transferring it for ceraunium. In the second order, carbunculus, sapphirus, and jaspis. In the third order, ligurius, achates, and amethystus. In the fourth order, chrysolithus, onychinus, and berillus. And I wonder that the precious stone, hyacinthus, is not included in their number; unless perhaps it is otherwise called a ligurius. In each of the stones, according to the twelve ages of the tribes, names are sculpted. We read about these stones in the diadem of the prince of Tyre and in John's Apocalypse, from which the heavenly Jerusalem is constructed (Ezek. 28; Rev. 21): and under their names and appearances, the power, order, or diversity is indicated. Through the four Rational angles, there are four golden rings, having other four opposite to them on the Superhumeral, so that when the λ■γιον is placed in the place which we have called vacant in the Ephod, the ring comes against the ring, and they are joined together with hyacinthine ribbons. Furthermore, so that the size and weight of the stones would not break the woven threads, they were bound and enclosed with gold. This was not enough for the firmness, unless also chains of gold were made, which were covered for beauty with golden tubes, and had above two larger rings on the Rational, which were connected with golden hooks of the Superhumerales, and beneath two others: for behind, on the Superhumerales, against the chest and stomach, there were golden rings on both sides, which were joined to the chains with the lower rings of the Rational: and so it happened, that both the Rational Superhumere and the Superhumere Rational were tightened, so that it would appear to the viewers as one woven texture.

17. [This number is missing from the Latin source]

18. The eighth plate is golden, that is, Sis Zaab, in which the name of God is written in Hebrew with four letters, Yod, He, Vav, He, which among them is called ineffable. This is added to the linen headdress common to all priests, and more so in the high priest, so that it is bound around the hyacinth forehead and crowned with the name of God, protecting the entire beauty of the high priest.

19. We have learned, both what is common to the priests and what are the special vestments of the high priest: and if there was so much difficulty in earthenware vessels, what majesty will be in the treasure that lies hidden within? Let us therefore first say what we have received from the Hebrews: and afterwards, according to our custom, we will unfold the veils of spiritual understanding. Four colors and four elements are referred to, from which all things subsist. Fine linen is assigned to the earth, because it is produced from the earth. Purple is assigned to the sea, because it is dyed with its shells. "Hyacinthus" means "hyacinth" in English, due to the similarity in color. "Coccus" means both "scarlet" and "purple" and is referred to as "Sani" in Hebrew. The word "Tholath" meaning "worm" is sometimes used to describe the red color in Latin. It is proper to remember that the Creator's Pontiff (Jewish High Priest) not only prays for Israel but also for the whole world, as the world consists of earth, water, air, and fire, which are the elements of all. Whereas the first linen garment represents the earth, the second hyacinthine [garment] shows the color of the air (or shows the air itself): for from earthly things we are gradually raised up to heights. And the garment itself, which reaches from the head down to the ankles, indicates that the air is diffused from heaven to earth. But the evil pomegranates and bells placed in lower positions show lightning and thunder: whether it is the harmony of earth and water and all the elements between them: and so everything is perplexed, so that everything is found in each one. But what is interwoven above with gold threads: they want to signify that the vital heat and providence of divine perception permeate everything. A shoulder garment and two stones, either emerald or onyx, which are on top and cover each shoulder, are interpreted as two hemispheres: one of which is above the earth, the other is below the earth, namely the sun and the moon, which shine from above. They interpret the ocean as that belt, by which the priest's chest is tightened, and the line of the tunic, namely, the earth, is enclosed. They have placed the earth, which is in the middle like a point, though it contains all things, nevertheless encompassed by all elements. Twelve stones, or the zodiac circle is interpreted, or twelve months, and each verse assigns individual times, and they appoint three months to them. And let no one seem that the explanation is to the pagans. For if the heavenly and God's arrangement, they have defamed with idols' names, therefore the providence of God must not be denied, which runs and is carried according to a certain law and governs all things. For in Job, we read the names of Arcturus and Orion, and the Mazuroth, that is, the zodiac circle and the names of the other stars (Job. 9 and 39). Not because the same words are used by the Hebrews, but because we cannot understand what is said unless familiar words are used. But the very thing which is in the midst is called the Rational; for everything is full of reason, and earthly things are attached to heavenly things: indeed, the reasoning of earthly things and times, of heat and cold, and the double temperance between both, descends from the course and reasoning of heaven. Wherefore the Rational is more strongly bound with the Ephod. Moreover, what is said to be in the Rational itself is a declaration and truth, that is, a manifestation, and doctrine, or truth, which signifies that there is never falsehood in the reasoning of God, but the truth itself is shown to men by many signs and arguments, and comes even to mortal beings. From that which it was made, so that we might understand the reckoning of the sun and the moon, the year and the months and the times and the hours, and also the storms, calmness and winds, and knowledge of all things, taking inborn wisdom from God, both the inhabitant and the teacher, the knowledge of His dwelling and His construction showing to us. Above all, the sky shows a starry crown and a hyacinth ribbon: and the golden plate which is on the forehead of the Pontiff, with the name of God inscribed, indicates that everything which is underneath is governed by the will of God. By the same token, I think that it is represented under other names and in the figures of the Cherubim and the four Animals, which are so mixed and blended with each other that they are found in one another, and the rest: and that they proceed steadfastly, and go before them, and do not return. For time flows on, leaving past events behind, and hastening towards the future. But what is always in motion signifies that which, as philosophers suspect, runs the world with its own order, and is never-ending, twisted like a wheel on its axis: hence the wheel is on the wheel, that is, time in time, and the year revolves in itself: and the wheels themselves are raised up to the heaven, and above the crystal the throne is of sapphire, and above the throne a likeness of one sitting: the lower parts of whom are fiery, the upper parts are of amber; so as to show that those things which are below need fire and purification, and those that are above persist in the purity of their own condition. And just as here in the clothing of the priest, there is a golden plate from above, so in Ezekiel electrum is placed on the chest and on the head (Ezek. 1.8). It was therefore right (as we have said in part above) that the High Priest of God, carrying in his vestments the type of all creatures, should show that all things require the mercy of God. And when he sacrificed to him, the universal condition would be expiated, so that he would pray not only for children, parents, and relatives, but for all creatures, with voice and clothing.

20. We have touched the Hebrew exposition and having reserved an infinite forest of meanings for another time, we have laid the foundations of some future house. Concerning the female line, they are accustomed to say this: "Reason belongs to seed and generation pertaining to the flesh, the earth is appointed through it." Thus God also speaks to Adam, "Dust you are, and to dust you shall return" (Gen. 3. 19). And the reasons for this, how such beauty arises from a small seed and the most foul beginnings, neither is it clear, nor does it reveal itself to human eyes. We read in Leviticus (Lev. 8), according to the command of God, that Moses washed Aaron and his sons: already then the sacraments of Baptism signified the purification of the world, and the holiness of all things. They do not receive garments unless they have first washed off the dirt, neither are they adorned for the sacred rites unless they are reborn in Christ as new men. For new wine is put into new wineskins. But what Moses washes, this is a mark of the law. Let them heed Moses and the Prophets. And from Adam to Moses, all have sinned. "We are commanded by God to wash, and when we are prepared for the clothing of Christ, we shall put off our hairy tunics and be clothed with the linen garment, having nothing of death in itself but wholly white: so that when we rise from baptism, we may gird ourselves in truth, and all the sordidness of our former sins may be covered. Hence also David [says], 'Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered'" (Psalm 32:1).

21. After wearing the feminalia and linen tunic, we put on this hyacinth-colored garment and begin to ascend from earthly things to high things. This same hyacinthine tunic, called subucula by the Septuagint, is properly the Priest's and signifies that the reason for sublime things is not open to everyone, but to the greater and perfect ones. Moses and Aaron, the Prophets, and all those to whom it is said, "Ascend to a high mountain, you who bring good news to Zion" (Isaiah 40.9) had this. Nor is it enough for us to have the washing away of sins from the past, the grace of baptism, and secret doctrine, unless we also have works. Hence the ephod, that is, the Superhumale, is joined to it, which is coupled with the Rational garment: so that it is not loose, nor dissolute, but clings to each other and is of assistance. For both reason and works need each other: so that we may carry out by action what we perceive by mind. And two stones in the Superhumeral signify either Christ and the Church, the names of the twelve Apostles who were sent out to preach, or the letter and the spirit, in which all the mysteries of the law are contained. In the right is the spirit, in the left is the letter. Through letters we descend to words, through words we come to understanding. What a beautiful order, and from this very habit demonstrating the sacraments. In the shoulders are the works, in the breast is the reason. Hence priests also eat a small breast. But this is a twofold Rational thing, open and hidden, simple and mystical, having within itself twelve stones and four orders, which four I think are virtues, Prudence, Fortitude, Justice, and Temperance, which cling to each other; and while they are mixed together, they make the number twelve; or the four Gospels, which in the Apocalypse are described as full of eyes (Apoc. 14:6) and radiant with the light of the Lord, they illuminate the world. In one [there are] four, and in four [there are] each one. Therefore, the manifestation, and the truth, that is, the doctrine and truth, are in the heart of the priest. For when someone is dressed in multiple garments, it follows that he speaks the truth that he holds in his heart, and therefore in the Rational [mind] there is truth, that is, knowledge, so that he may know what is to be taught, and there is manifestation and teaching, so that he may instruct others what he has conceived in his mind. Where are those who say that innocence can suffice for a priest? The old law agrees with the new: what Moses did, so did the Apostle. He [Moses] adorns the priest's knowledge in his garments, and he [the Apostle] instructs Timothy and Titus in disciplines. But the order of garments also has its importance. Let us read Leviticus. Not first the Rational, and then the Superhumale, but first the Superhumale, and afterwards the Rational (Leviticus 8). "From your commands," he says, "I have gained understanding" (Psalm 118:104): let us first do, and then teach, so that the authority of teaching may not be undermined by lack of action. This is what we read in the Prophet: "Sow with righteousness, and reap the fruits of life; illuminate yourselves with the light of knowledge" (Hosea 10:12). First sow in righteousness, and harvest the fruits of eternal life, then seek knowledge. Yet absolute perfection is not immediate even if someone possesses the Superhumale and the Rational: unless these are firmly united to one another and interconnected: so that operation attaches to reason, and reason to action: and following these, there may be doctrine and truth.

22. The four elements about which we have spoken above, and the two stones, either onychinos or emerald, and twelve gems, which are placed in the Biblical breastplate, if there were time for me to discuss them, I would explain to you the nature and causes of each one, and what each one is worth, and how they are compared to each other in terms of virtues, having carefully investigated them, and having demonstrated it more fully. It is sufficient that even the Holy Pope Epiphanius has published an excellent book on this topic, and if you read it, you will acquire the fullest knowledge. I already understand that I am exceeding the limit of a letter, and I see that the wax of the recipient is full. Therefore, I move on to the rest, so that the speech may finally be concluded. The golden plate gleams on the forehead: for knowledge of all things is of no use to us, unless we are crowned with the knowledge of God. We are clothed in lines, adorned with hyacinths, girded with a sacred belt, works are given to us, the Rationale is placed in our hearts: we receive truth, the word brings doctrine: all things are imperfect, unless a worthy charioteer is sought for such a beautiful chariot, and the Creator himself, standing on his creatures, governs those things he created. What was once shown on a plate is now shown in the sign of the Cross. The gold of the law, the blood of the Gospel is more precious. Then, a mark was made on the foreheads of those moaning, according to the voice of Ezekiel (Ezek. 9:4): now, carrying the cross, we say 'The light of your face, Lord, has been marked upon us' (Ps. 4:7). Twice in Exodus (Ex. 28 and 29), we read of the eight kinds of clothing for the High Priest, as commanded by the Lord and carried out by Moses. In Leviticus about seven (.....) are written (Lev. 8), and refer to how Moses clothed his brother Aaron. About female garments, nothing is said, for, as I believe, the law does not lay a hand on our genitalia and private parts. We must instead cover and veil these secret and shame-worthy parts and reserve the purity and conscience of women for the judgment of God. Of the other virtues, for example, wisdom, fortitude, justice, temperance, humility, meekness, generosity, others can judge; only conscience knows purity, and human eyes cannot be certain judges of this thing, without those who are exposed everywhere, like the animals' lust. Hence the apostle says: 'Concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord', as though Moses said: 'I do not clothe women, nor do I impose a necessity on anyone; whoever wants to be a priest, let him clothe himself.' Oh how many maidens, and how great purity hoped for will be dishonored on the day of judgment; how great infamy of others' purity will be crowned by God the judge. Therefore, let us ourselves assume the female dress, let us cover our privates; let us not seek the eyes of others. Let the genitals be covered so that they are not exposed to anyone's eyes: otherwise, if any indecency is seen when we enter the Holy of Holies, let us die.

23. Now my speech is ending, and I withdraw to higher things. The knowledge and learning of the Pontiff of God must be so great that even his steps and movements and all his vocal expressions should be knowledgeable. He must comprehend truth in his mind and it should echo and adorn his entire being, so that everything he does and says may be the teaching of the people. Without bells and different colors, and gems and flowers of virtues, she cannot enter the Holy Church nor possess the name of Bishop. When this short composition was being hurriedly dictated to the shore, as the rope was already being loosed, and the sailors were calling out for it more frequently, I quickly dictated with the language that I was able to remember and what I had gathered by reading continually in the Reasoning of my heart: aware enough that I flowed more from the impetus of speaking, rather than from the judgment of a writer, and that I was producing a tumultuous speech in the manner of a raging torrent. There is said to be a book of Tertullian about Aaron's vestments in the index, which as of today has not been found by me. If it has been found by you on account of the city's fame, I ask that my little drop not be compared to the river. For I am to be valued by my own abilities, not by those of great men.

Letters - letter_065

Letter 65. To Principia. A commentary on Ps. XLV. addressed to Marcella's friend and companion Principia (see Letter 127.). Jerome prefaces what he has to say by a defence of his practice of writing for women, a practice which had exposed him to many foolish sneers. He deals with the same subject in his dedication of the Commentary of Sophronius. The date of the letter is 397 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. I know that I, Principia, in Christ am a daughter, and am criticized by many for sometimes writing to women and preferring the weaker sex to men. And therefore I must first respond to my detractors, and thus come to the debate you requested. If men were to inquire about the Scriptures, I would not speak to women. If Barak wished to go to battle, Deborah would not have triumphed over the defeated enemies (Jude. 5). Jeremiah is imprisoned (Jer. 36), and because Israel, about to perish, did not receive the prophet who was a man, a woman named Huldah was raised up for them (2 Kings 22). The priests and Pharisees crucify the Son of God (Matthew 27), and Mary Magdalene weeps at the cross, prepares ointments, searches in the tomb (Mark 16), asks the gardener, recognizes the Lord (John 2), goes to the apostles, and tells them what she has found. They doubt, but she trusts. Truly a tower, truly a tower of brightness and Lebanon, which looks out on the face of Damascus (Song of Solomon 7), namely the blood of the Savior calling for repentance. Sara's womanliness had failed, and therefore Abraham was subject to her and it was said to him: Everything that Sara says to you, listen to her voice (Genesis 18). Their womanliness had failed, but you have never experienced womanliness. Gender is devoured by a virgin, she carries Christ in her body. She already possesses what is to come. Rebecca goes to inquire of God and hears proper replies to her questions: "Two nations are in your womb, and two peoples born of you shall be divided" (Gen. 25: 23). She gives birth to two who are at odds with each other; you daily conceive, give birth, and generate one who is fruitful in union, multiple in majesty, and harmonious in Trinity. Mary, the sister of Moses, sings the Lord's victories (Exod. 15), and Rachel marks our Bethlehem and Ephratha through the line of her name in her descendants (Gen. 35). The daughters of Salphaad deserve to receive the inheritance among brothers (Num. 27). Ruth, Esther, and Judith are of such great glory that they have been given names in sacred volumes. The Prophetess Anna gives birth to a son, Levite, Prophet, Judge, venerable with sacred hair, and offers him in the tabernacle of God (I. Reg. 1. 2). Thecuities woman concludes the questioning of King David, teaches in riddles, and, by the example of God, mitigates. We read of another wise woman, who when her city was besieged and the army commander Joab was attacking the walls with a ram because of one traitor, spoke to the people with her wisdom, and by her feminine authority calmed the danger of the large crowd (3 Kings 10). What shall I say of the queen of Sheba, who came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and by the testimony of the Lord condemned all the men of Jerusalem? Elizabeth prophesies by her womb and voice (Matt 2). Anna, daughter of Phanuel, in the temple, becomes a temple of God, and by daily fasting finds heavenly bread (Luke 1). Women follow the Savior and minister to him of their substance. He who fed five thousand men with five loaves, not counting women and children, does not refuse the food of holy women. When talking to the Samaritan woman at the well, and satisfied with her conversion, he neglects the food that had been bought. Apollo, a male apostle and most learned in the law, is instructed and taught by Aquila and Priscilla on the way of the Lord. If it was not shameful for the Apostle to be taught by a woman, then why should it be shameful for me to teach both men and women?

2. I have briefly touched on matters such as these, most noble daughter, so that neither should you be ashamed of your sex, nor should men arrogate to themselves their own name, to the condemnation of whom the lives of women are praised in Holy Scripture. I am rejoicing and my soul is lifted up with exultation when I read of Daniel, Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, found in Babylon. How many elderly men and judges of Israel were stewed in the Babylonian kitchen! How many Susannas, which means lilies, there are, who with the purity of their chastity make their spouses happy, and who exchange the crown of thorns for the glory of triumph. You have Marcella and Asella there in the study of the Scriptures, and in the sanctity of mind and body: one of whom may lead you through green meadows and various flowers of divine Volumes to him who says in the Song of Solomon, "I am the flower of the field and the lily of the valley." (Song of Solomon 2:1); the other herself may deserve to hear the flower of the Lord with you: "As a lily among the thorns, so is my love among the daughters." (ibid. 2) And since we have begun to speak of flowers and lilies, and virginity is always compared to flowers, it seems appropriate to me, writing about the flower of Christ, to discuss many flowers.

3. Reading Psalm 44 in the title, I found: For the end, to them that shall be changed, for the sons of Core, a canticle for the beloved. It is written in Hebrew, Lamanasse Al Sosannim Labne Core Meschil Sir Ididoth: which we translate into Latin as; A victory for the lilies of the sons of Core, a loving song of instruction. Symmachus, in his own way, interpreted more manifestly triumph for flowers. So Sosannim, whether for those who are to be exchanged, or for those who are to be changed into lilies and flowers, means Meschil as well as instruction and extremely learned music; sir, it is an ancient hymn of Solomon, named from another sense as peaceful. However, four Psalms, though they differ in the latter part of the titles, are noted by this beginning, the forty-fourth, fifty-ninth, sixty-eighth, and seventy-ninth, of which the two middle ones are inscribed, David; the first and last, of both the Sons of Core and Asaph. It is not possible in the time of which we have begun to explain all.

4. "Rightly, those who at the end of the ages are to be changed, of whom the Apostle speaks: We will all sleep, but we will not all be changed (1 Cor. 15:51), are referred to the end. And this mystery itself prepares the reader for spiritual understanding. For where the sense is simple and clear, what is the need to forewarn the listener of understanding, and to say to him, 'He who has ears to hear, let him hear' (Matth. 13)? A song is also sung for the most beloved and beloved, because through him the promised change will come to the saints." Which can indeed be understood in this life, when we strip off the old man, and put on the new, which is renewed in knowledge according to the image of the Creator, and contemplating the glory of the Lord, we are transformed into the same image as if from glory to glory. There is no time when the Holy One does not change, forgetting the past and extending into the future, as our inner person is renewed from day to day. And the unchanging God who speaks through the prophet: I am God, and I do not change (Malachi 5:6), because of us he changed his face, took on the form of a servant, and transmigrated from Judea to the Philistines, who interpret as those falling by the cup (for they had been intoxicated by the golden cup of Babylon), he was first ridiculed because of the foolishness of the cross, then accepted because of the glory of triumphs. But that one is most beloved, of whom Isaiah sings: I will sing a song to my beloved about his vineyard (Isaiah 5:1); and the Gospel: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, listen to him (Matthew 17:5). To whom not one prophet, but the whole choir of the sons of Core, now sing praises. And who the sons of Core are, that is, of Calvary, is more fittingly discussed in the forty-first psalm. And so that we may know that the title of the Song is fitting, he speaks of a change from one thing to another, as if the daughter is commanded to forget her ancient parent and submit herself to the embraces of the king. But he is the victor who says, "Have confidence, I have conquered the world" (John 16:33); and the one to whom this young man's prayer is addressed: "From You comes victory, wisdom, glory; and I am your servant" (3 Ezra 4:59), certainly knows who, with the Lord conquering, has conquered, and is a sharer in His triumphs, and who has woven an incorruptible crown of glory from the brightness of good deeds and the variety of virtues for the Savior.

5. "My heart has brought forth a good word." Symmachus interpreted it as "My heart was stirred by a good word," indicating that the heart of the speaker was moved by the discourse of another, and that, as the Holy Spirit revealed the future sacraments of Christ, this person also spoke clearly, so that, just as others spoke about His coming, this person spoke. "Eructavit," however, properly signifies the digestion of food and the expulsion of digested food into the wind. For just as belching rises from the stomach according to the quality of the food, a sign of good or bad odor, so do the thoughts of the inner man bring forth words, and the mouth speaks out of the abundance of the heart (Matthew 12). The righteous one, having filled himself with food, fills his soul, and when he is satisfied with holy doctrines, he brings forth from the treasure of his good heart words that are good, and when he speaks with the Apostle: "Do you seek a proof of Him who speaks in me Christ?" (2 Cor. 13. 3) Some understand it to be said in the person of the Father, that from the lowest vital parts and secret places of the heart, he uttered His Word which was always in Him, according to the prophecy of another Psalm: "Before Lucifer, I have begotten you from the womb" (Ps. 109. 3). Just as the word "womb" does not mean a womb (for God is not divided into limbs), but shows the same substance of the Father and the Son, so too, the heart and the word which is brought forth from the heart reveal the Father and the Son. And what follows: "I will tell of my works to the king" (Ps. 32:9), they fit to the intelligence: "He said and they were made, he commanded and they were created" (John. 14): when the Father says it, the Son operates. For everything that the Father does, the Son does similarly, with the Father working through the Son in everything.

6. "I declare my works to the king." The prophetic choir of Christ and the Church, about to speak of sacred mysteries, lest it seem unworthy in song, and on account of the conscience of sinners, says to him: "Why do you declare my justice and take my testament in your mouth?" (Ps. 49:16). He confesses his works to the king, whom he will praise, so that either he may accept them if they are good, or he may cleanse them if they are bad; and he does what he is commanded: "Declare your iniquities that you may be justified" (Isaiah 43:26). And, 'The just accuser of himself is at the beginning of the discourse' (Prov. 18.17). However, this language is not only of the Hebrew but also of the Latin tongue, in order to declare treatises and writings. Therefore, even he who is about to sing praises to the Lord devotes his poem and work to Him, and for the sake of the Muses of the Gentiles, he invokes at the beginning the very one whom he is about to praise.

7. "My tongue is the pen of a quick writing scribe." This is what we have interpreted: "My tongue is the pen of a swift scribe." It is from the last part of the prologue, and connect with what follows: "My heart hath uttered a good word; I speak of my works to the king." Therefore, I must also prepare my tongue as a pen and stylus, so that the Holy Spirit may write through it in the hearts and ears of listeners. For my role is to provide an instrument in my tongue, so that it may sound like through an instrument what is its own. The pen writes on wax: a reed either on paper or on parchment, or on whatever material is suitable for writing. But my tongue, like a swift writer, whom we can understand as a notary, by a certain compendium of signs, has engraved in the tables of the carnal heart the concise and strict message of the Gospel. For if the Law was written by the finger of God, through the hand of the Mediator, and that which was destroyed was glorified, by how much more will the Gospel, which will endure, be written through my tongue by the Holy Spirit, so that the praises of Him of whom it is said in Isaiah, 'Take spoils quickly, plunder swiftly' (Isaiah 8:1), let the speech of believers be swift in the heart.

8. "Beautiful in appearance among the sons of men." In Hebrew: "You are more beautiful than the sons of men." The introduction being finished, the beginning of the narrative is approached, and an address is made to the beloved, and the king, to whom the words spoken are consecrated. But it is asked how he is more beautiful than all the sons of men we read about in Isaiah: "We saw him, and he had no form or majesty that we should look at him, and no beauty that we should desire him. He was despised and rejected by men, a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief; and as one from whom men hide their faces he was despised, and we esteemed him not." (Isaiah 53:2-3) Nor does the writing seem immediately discordant: for there the lowliness of the body is recorded on account of the lashes and spitting and slaps and nails, and the injustices of the gibbet: here the loveliness of virtues is in the sacred and venerable body. Not that the divinity of Christ is more beautiful than men; for She has no comparison: but without the passions of the cross, it is more beautiful than all. Virgin of a virgin, who was born not from the will of man, but from God. For if he had not had something in his countenance and eyes like stars, the Apostles would not have followed him immediately, nor would those who came to apprehend him have fallen (John 18). And finally, in the present testimony, in which it says "a man stricken and knowing how to endure infirmity," he gives the reasons why he has suffered these things. "Because he turned his face away," that is, with a little of his divinity removed, he abandoned his body to injury. Some connect this verse with the previous ones, so that "fairer in form than the children of men" refers not to Christ, but to the pen.

9. "Grace has been poured out on your lips, therefore God has blessed you forever. " In the Vulgate edition, we read "he blessed" instead of "he anointed." But it should be known that the error of the Septuagint translators should not be blamed, as they agree with the Hebrew truth in this place. Reading it, "Jesus increased in age and wisdom and grace with God and men" (Luke 2:52): and in another place: "They were amazed at the words of his grace that came out of his mouth" (Matthew 7:16): And that "He had the power of speech" (Mark 6:7) we can understand in what sense it was said: "Grace has been poured out on your lips." Noah found grace before the Lord in his days, and Moses, and the remaining prophets. But the entire multitude of grace was poured forth on the lips of the Savior, which in a short time filled the whole world. And he himself, as a bridegroom, proceeded from his chamber. 'His going forth is from the end of heaven, and his circuit even to the end thereof' (Psalm 18). For even holy Mary, because she had conceived him in whom all the fullness of divinity dwells bodily, is greeted full of grace (Luke 1). And the Apostle, knowing that his preaching, not in secular eloquence, but in the power of God, had surpassed all the teachings of the world, says: 'And my speech and my preaching was not in the persuasive words of human wisdom, but in shewing of the Spirit and power; That our faith might not be in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God' (1 Thessalonians 1:5). Rebuking himself for saying "I have laboured more than they all", he immediately added, "Yet not I, but the grace of God with me." And again, "But by the grace of God I am what I am" (1 Cor. 15:10). The word "effusion" historically pertains to the Savior as a sign of the abundance of grace according to the saying, "I will pour out My Spirit on all flesh" (Joel 2:28). And, "the love of God has been poured out in our hearts" (Rom. 5:5). Note that understanding of all this should be referred to the person who was born of Mary and may be said to be eternally blessed by reason of the grace of his lips. It is this that the Apostle likewise preaches: "He humbled himself becoming obedient unto death, even to death on a cross." "Therefore God exalted him and gave him a name above all names" (Philippians 2:8). For just as the form of a servant is a disgrace to his passion, and the exaltation and gift of a name return to the Father, so too the pouring forth of grace and blessings here must be referred to him who can be humbled and grow.

10. "Gird your sword upon your thigh, most mighty one, with your beauty and your splendor." In Hebrew: "Gird your sword upon your thigh, O most mighty one, with your glory and your majesty." I believe you understand this passage very well, [it speaks of] being girded with the sword of Christ to fight. But so that you always know that virginity has the sword of chastity by which it cuts off the works of the flesh and overcomes pleasures; even the pagan error imagined armed virgin goddesses. Peter also girded his loins and had a burning lamp in his hands. But in what manner the thigh signifies the work of weddings, you will be taught briefly by these examples. When Abraham sent his servant to seek a wife for his son Isaac, he said to the chief servant of his household, "Put your hand under my thigh, and I will make you swear by the Lord God of heaven" (Gen. 24:2). No doubt through him who was to be born from his seed. After Jacob wrestled with a man who appeared to him at the Jaboc stream, leaving Mesopotamia and entering the land of the Promise, he did not obtain the name Israel until the nerve of his thigh was withered. And to his son: "The prince shall not fail from Juda, nor the ruler from his thigh" (Genesis 49:50). And again he, Joseph about to die, adjures him in his thigh not to bury him in Egypt. In the Book of Judges we also read: "Gedeon had seventy sons, who came out of his loins" (Judges 8:30). In Canticles, it is said, "Behold the bed of Solomon, sixty valiant men round about it, of the valiant of Israel. All holding swords, and most expert in war: every man's sword upon his thigh, because of fears in the night" (Canticles 3:7-8). Therefore, he mortified the works of the flesh by his glory and beauty, or the appearance and beauty of his divinity; and he who was born of a virgin was the prince of virginity for future virgins.

11. And attend with success, proceed and reign. For truth, meekness, and justice; and your right hand will lead you wonderfully. In Hebrew: "Ascend prosperously in your beauty; for the sake of truth, meekness of justice, and your right hand will lead you wonderfully." Secondly it is written among the Hebrews, in your beauty, in order to avoid anyone thinking that it was repeated by the error of copyists. And it is a figure that among rhetoricians is called repetition. Therefore, the panegyrist encourage the armed ones whom they extol with their speeches to fight: that having once seized the wars they do not abandon them, and that, striding victoriously over the ruins of the enemy, they prepare a kingdom for themselves in those whom, having snatched from the power of the devil, they have joined to their own rule; and let them say: "But as for me, I have been established king by him over his holy Sion mount" (Psalm 2:6). And there is no doubt that Christ is called the Truth, Modesty, and Justice, who said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life" (John 14:6). And, "Learn from me, for I am meek and humble of heart" (Matthew 11:29). And, "He has become for us the righteousness and redemption and sanctification from God" (1 Corinthians 1:36). But all these things are said in the body so that they may be demanded in the members. The victory of the Lord is a triumph for his servants. The education of masters is the progress of students. And what follows, Your right hand will guide you in a wondrous way, either from the signs you committed in the Gospel, or tropically from the slaughter you exercised on your enemies, must be felt. The heart of the wise is on the right, and the heart of the fool is on the left. Christ is entirely on the right: Antichrist is in the left. The Hebrew interpretation differs in words, not in meaning.

12. Your arrows are sharp, most powerful. Peoples will fall under you into the hearts of the enemies of the king. In Hebrew, everything else is similarly without the most powerful. And this verse is particularly suited to you, who were wounded by the dart of the Lord, When the Bride in the Song sings, "I am wounded by love". No wonder your husband has many arrows, of which the 119th Psalm says, "The sharp arrows of the mighty with coals that lay waste", since he, Himself, is the arrow, and speaks through Isaiah, "He made me like a chosen arrow, he hid me in his quiver". (Isai. 49. 2). With these arrows, Cleopas on the journey, having been wounded with another, said, "Was not our heart burning within us while He spoke on the road and opened the Scriptures to us?" (Luke 24:39) And in another place, we read: "As arrows in the hand of the mighty, so are the children of them that have been shaken" (Psalm 126:4). With these arrows, the whole world was wounded and captured. Paul was the arrow of the Lord, who, after being sent by the Lord's bow from Jerusalem to Illyricum, flew here and there and hastened to go to Spain, so that, like a swift arrow under the feet of his Lord, he might overthrow the east and the west. And since there are many powerful enemies of the king who have been wounded by the burning arrows of the devil and are like deer struck by a spear in the liver; The arrows of the Lord are sent with blazing coals of desolation, so that whatever vice is in the heart of the king's enemies, may be burned away and the saving fire may cast out the destroyer.

13. "Your throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptre of your kingdom is a sceptre of uprightness. You have loved righteousness and hated wickedness; therefore God, your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your fellows." In Hebrew: "Your throne, O God, is forever and ever, the scepter of uprightness is the scepter of your kingdom. You have loved righteousness and hated wickedness; therefore God, your God, has anointed you with the oil of gladness beyond your companions." Understand two persons, he who is anointed of God, and He who anoints. And from where also the Hebrew word for God, Eagle of God, is not interpreted in the nominative case but in the vocative, saying, 'O God,' and we have put it for the understanding of God, which the Latin language does not accept; lest anyone wrongly think that God is named twice Father, beloved and loving and King. For although the Father is in the Son and the Son is in the Father, and both are a dwelling and throne for themselves, yet in this place, the word is directed to the King, who is God, and it is said to him that his kingdom (for this is what I understand by throne, according to what is written, 'I will place on your throne the fruit of your womb' (Ps. 131:11)) shall have no end. Indeed, the angel also announced to Mary: 'The Lord God will give her the throne of David her father, and she will reign over the house of Jacob forever, and her kingdom will not end.' (Luke 1:32). Nor should we think this is contrary to what the Apostle wrote to the Corinthians, saying that the Son will deliver the kingdom to God the Father, and subject all things to the One who has subjected everything to him, so that God may be all in all. (1 Corinthians 15). For the Apostle did not say that the Son would deliver the kingdom to the Father, as if to seem to separate the Son, but that He would deliver it to God, that is, to God dwelling in assumption of the body, so that God may be all in all, and Christ, who was previously in each through a few virtues, may dwell through all in each. But the scepter and staff are symbols of the ruling power, as the Prophet himself indicates when he says, 'The scepter of your kingdom is a scepter of uprightness' (Isaiah 11:1). Those who cite the testimony of Isaiah about the man who is taken from the root of Jesse, and from whose root a flower will arise, understand that he is the one to whom power is given and who is said to reign for the sake of beloved justice and against wickedness, being anointed with oil of rejoicing over his fellows, as if he were about to receive the reward of love and hatred of wickedness in his unction. But we are taught that both the seeds of love and hate are within us, since he himself who raised up the firstfruits of our bodies to heaven, loved justice and hated iniquity. Hence David said, 'Do not I hate them, O lord, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee? I hate them with perfect hatred.' (Ps. 138: 21.) Which is followed by, 'God hath anointed thee, thy God.' The first name of God must be understood in the vocative case, the following in the nominative. It is surprising to me that Aquila did not interpret it in the vocative case like he did in the first verse, but in the nominative, naming God who anointed the aforesaid God. Photinus is suppressed in this place, but Arrius lifts his head, giving testimony about the Gospel: "I am ascending to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God." (John 20:17). But when he hears his beloved, girded with a sword on his thigh, will reign for the sake of truth and meekness, he is anointed because of beloved righteousness and hated iniquity, and anointed among his companions, about whom it is written: "We have become Christ's partners if we hold on to our original conviction firmly to the end." (Hebrews 3:14). I wonder why he calls only God of God to slander, as if everything that was said was suitable for the divinity of the Word and not for the humility of man. Let the Acts of the Apostles be heard: "Jesus of Nazareth, whom God anointed with the Holy Spirit" (Acts 10:38). Let the Gospel be heard: "The Holy Spirit will come upon you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you; therefore, the holy offspring to be born will be called the Son of God" (Luke 1:35). Let them feel the Lord himself thundering: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me" (Isaiah 61:1). But this signifies the Apostles and the believers who, having believed, were given the name of the anointed, that is, Christians, from Christ who was anointed.

14. "Myrrha and droplets and cassia from your clothing of ivory houses, from which the daughters of kings delighted in your honor." In Hebrew, "Myrrha and stacte and cassia in all your clothing from ivory houses, which made the daughters of kings rejoice in your honor." The preface itself taught you, therefore I wished to explain this Psalm to you, writing for a virgin, because I found the title for lilies and flowers. Therefore, I will relate these verses to you subsequently, to whom this book is written. You have mortified your members upon earth, and daily you offer myrrh to Christ. You are a good scent of Christ, and therefore you exhibit gum, that is, a drop or teardrop to the Lord. Those who know the powers of spices also tell that gum is the flower of myrrh. But what follows, cassia, is the plant which is called σμύκη by others, that is, a pipe, vocal in the praises of God, and cooking all phlegm and mucus with its heat of pleasures. Where it is written in our books,

"drop" or "teardrop," it is read "Maloth" in Hebrew. Therefore, Nicodemus prepared a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes to bury the Lord. And the bridegroom speaks to the bride: Myrrh and aloes with all the finest ointments. And she responds: My hands dripped myrrh; my hands were filled with myrrh. Cast away the works of death you do. Buried with Christ in baptism, may you be dead to this world and think only of heavenly things, speaking to your spouse: My hands dripped myrrh; my hands were filled with myrrh. We also read of the priestly ointment, which is mentioned by David: It is like the precious oil on the head, which ran down on the beard, on the beard of Aaron, which ran down to the collar of his robes. In which when mixed with other aromatics and storax, the Magi offer myrrh. And in this place, the beginning of Christ's garments is to take on his death, and to demonstrate it in his flesh. Prepare these garments for your spouse: let him walk adorned in these clothes by you. And when you have woven such garments for him, you yourself will become the temple of God, and you will make him joyful with houses of ivory, or as it is better written in Hebrew, with a temple of teeth; and you will sing praises to the Lord, imitating the choirs of the Angels of the whole world, dead though they are. For ivory and teeth are marks of death, and the very nature of the names of things bears witness to this. And consequently it is added: 'From these things the daughters of kings delighted; in your honor.' Your spouse is the King of kings and Lord of lords. These kings who are under such a king are your fathers, who bore you by the Gospel doctrine. You, their daughter, are adorned with all kinds of clothing and good scents, and in the ivory temple you are the one of whom it was said: 'Grace has been poured upon your lips'; and, 'Gird your sword upon your thigh, O most mighty, with your arrows sharp'; and, 'Your throne, O God, is forever and ever.' Because we have translated to ivory buildings, since in Greek it is written "■π■ βαρ■ων ■λεφαντ■νων," some Latin speakers, due to the ambiguity of the word, interpreted it as "gravibus," when "β■ρις" is a local word of Palestine: and even today, houses completely enclosed on all sides and built in the manner of public towers and walls are called "β■ρεις."

15. "Your queen stands at your right hand, arrayed in a robe of gold"; and what follows: "arrayed in variety", except in the Vulgate edition, none of the interpreters have translated. In Hebrew, "Your mate stood at your right hand, wearing a crown of gold." Where we translate mate, she is called Segal among the Hebrews. For which Aquila has translated σ■γκοιτον, i.e., concubine; Symmachus and the Fifth Version have translated παλλακ■ν, i.e., mistress; the Septuagint, Theodotion, and the Sixth Version have translated queen. Then, where I placed it, Symmachus transferred it to a golden diadem, in the first gold: The Eagle, Fifth and Sixth Editions, in pigment, or in Ophir gold. Which are the daughters of kings, and are prepared for the embrace of the bridegroom, through myrrh and drops and cassia and ivory houses they delight, whose throne is forever and ever. But the Catholic church, which is now established on a firm rock in Christ, stands as one dove, perfect and next to him on the right, and has nothing on its left. It stands in golden robes, passing from the words of Scriptures into meaning, and full of all virtues: or as we have translated, in a golden diadem. For it is queen and reigns with the king: whose daughters we can understand to be both the souls of the faithful in common and the choirs of virgins in particular. Ophir is a type of gold, from a place in India or from a color given that name. For indeed there are seven words for gold in Hebrew. Let us also understand wife and concubine from the Song of Solomon, who cannot sleep without her spouse or husband.

16. "Listen, daughter, and see, and incline your ear, and forget your people and your father's house, and the king will desire your beauty, because he is the Lord your God, and they will adore him." In Hebrew, "Listen, daughter, and see, and incline your ear, and forget your people and your father's house, and the king will desire your beauty; for he is your Lord, and adore him." Thus through the prophet's language, which the Holy Spirit speaks, comparing it quickly to the writer's pen, he speaks to the king himself, and warrior, and God, addressing him as the bridegroom. Here the person of the Father speaking to the bride of his Son is introduced, and encourages her to first pay attention to what is said, with contempt for the errors of old gentility and idolatry, and for the reason why she is named daughter of a foreigner; then to see either the things that are said themselves, or the whole situation, understanding the invisible from visible things, and sensing the Creator from the created things, and to incline her ear diligently so that she may remember what is said. And when she hears, sees, and inclines her ear, surrendering herself entirely to the teaching and understanding what is said, let her forget her own people at first: and like Abraham leaving Chaldea, let her leave the land of her birth and her relatives. No one doubts that our father, before we were adopted by God, was the devil, from whom the Savior says: "You are born of the father of the devil" (John 8. 44). Therefore, he says, when you have forgotten the father of old, and have shown yourself to be such, laying aside your former filth, so that you may ascend adorned over your brother, and my Son may love you, then the king will desire your beauty. And lest you think you are one of the crowd, from whom you are to be loved, he is your King and Lord. But since sometimes, those who are kings and lords, are indeed kings and lords by power, still of the same nature, to whom they rule and reign; I tell you that he is your God, and you ought to worship Him. The seventy translators did not say "you shall worship him," but rather "they shall worship him," to make sense: He who will love you and treasure your beauty is God, and to be worshiped by all. Let each person refer to himself what we have explained about the Church gathered from the nations, and the soul of the believer, left behind by previous vices, should be adopted as a daughter; let him incline his ear and forget his old way of life. And, following the Apostle, let him lay his dead father to rest and present himself as one who is loved by the king. For he is the Lord of him who should bow the knee, and, having set aside pride, he should assume the yoke of humility.

17. Let us ask the Jews who this daughter is to whom God speaks. I have no doubt that they will respond the Synagogue. And how is it said to the Synagogue and the Jewish people, 'Leave your people and the house of your father'? Will he leave the Hebrew nation and Abraham, the ancient father? If they say that Abraham, who left the Chaldeans, is meant by the calling, who is this king who will love the splendor of Abraham? Certainly, there is another who speaks: 'Hear daughter,' and another of whom it is said: 'The king will desire your beauty.' This other is not only a king, but also the Lord and God, who is to be adored.

18. Daughter of Tyre, the rich people of the crowd will implore your face in gifts. In Hebrew it is: 'Oh daughter of the strongest, in gifts the rich people of the population will implore your face.' The Hebrew word Sor, which we read in Ezekiel according to the Septuagint, can be interpreted as Tyre, tribulation, strongest, or strongest, and Flint, that is, the hardest stone. Hence the error arose in the present location: for Aquila, Septuagint, Theodotion, and the Fifth Edition have interpreted Tyre. On the sixth day Symmachus interpreted the Hebrew word as κραται■ν, meaning, "strongest." We apply this to God, and as the woman [in the biblical passage] had said, "Listen daughter, and see, the daughter is called strongest." Or, she indeed is the strongest, because she had imitated a powerful Father, whose face will be invoked by the wealthy people of the crowd in various gifts. Wealthy in all good works and knowledge; either those who are considered wealthy in this century, who are wise in this world and educated in the disciplines of philosophers; or, better yet, those who had been rich before, who held the speeches of God, and the Covenants, and the Prophets, that is, from the people of Israel. For just as, before the coming of the Savior, those from Tyre, that is from the people of the Gentiles, who wished to become proselytes, prayed to the rich people of Israel and through them were introduced into the Temple; so after the coming of the Lord, whoever from Israel wish to believe (once rich in the intimacy and protection of God), they will come to the daughter of Tyre and, offering various gifts of virtues and confession in Christ, pray to her that they may find the salvation they have lost in Judea among the Gentiles.

19. "All the glory of the daughter of the king is from within, adorned with various golden fringes." In Hebrew: "All the glory of the daughter of the king is within, dressed in golden bands." Because it is written in the Septuagint as "inside," and we have interpreted it as "within"; in some copies, "Esebon" is found, which means "thoughts." From which is demonstrated every glory of the Church, of which it is said above, "Hear, daughter, and see," and "O daughter of Tyre," and now she is called the daughter of the king, to be intrinsic, and in thoughts, that is, in the interior man, and in an unmanufactured circumcision, but in the spirit; having confidence of conscience before God and all beauty placed more in the name of the senses than in the flower of words. However, just as in the warp from which the fringes hang, the undergarment is woven, and all the power of the garment is in the warp, so in various senses of the Scriptures, in which the whole garment of the Church is woven, some things are mixed of nature and manners, and this is also signified by the garment of Aaron woven from gold, purple, scarlet, fine linen, and hyacinth (Exodus 28:39), which the women made, to whom God gave wisdom for weaving. And so that we can understand all the adornment of the king's daughter within, she speaks in the Song: 'The king brought me into his chamber' (Song of Solomon 1:15, Matthew 6:9) in which, with the door of our lips closed, we are commanded to pray to God the Father. The title of the ninth Psalm is also inscribed, 'For hidden things of the Son.' Joseph also had a diverse coat (Gen 37) which the mother Church wove for him. Of these fringes, the woman with the issue of blood touched one of the Savior's and was healed (Matt 9, Mark 5, Luke 8). And what is written in Hebrew, 'she was clothed in golden fringes,' means the same as what was said above: 'All the glory of the king's daughter is within;' with the fringes of divine senses, the inner members of the Church are wrapped and the whole uterus of pride is covered. The bride cannot forget these fringes, according to Jeremiah (ch. 2), which bind the breasts and protect the chest, where the thoughts are.

20. "Virgins will be brought to the king after her, her neighbors will be brought to you. They will be brought with joy and exultation, they will be led into the temple of the king." The prior verse in the Septuagint still sings about the decoration of the daughter; the following is directed to the groom and king himself. Furthermore, according to the Hebrew, everything is said to the bride up to the point where it is written: "You will set them as leaders throughout the land." And it is read; "In embroidered garments she is led to the king, her virgin companions following her. Those brought in her train are led to you. They are brought in with gladness and rejoicing; they enter the palace of the king." The difference in souls of believers in Christ is shown to be great in the Song of Songs, in which it is written: "Sixty queens there may be, and eighty concubines, and virgins beyond number." She is my dove, my perfect one; she is the only one of her mother, she is the darling of her who bore her. The young women saw her and called her blessed; the queens and concubines also, and they praised her. (Song of Solomon 6:7 and following verses). Therefore, she was worthy to be called perfect and holy in body and spirit, and to be called a dove and a companion. This is the daughter, of whom it was said above, 'There is the queen, standing in her gold attire.' But those who have passed beyond the six days of the world and yearn for future kingdoms are called queens. And if any has circumcision on the eighth day but has not yet come to the marriage, she is called a concubine. But the diverse multitude of believers, who are not yet able to be united in the embrace of the bridegroom, nor to bear children from him, are called adolescentula. I think of those virgins who follow the Church, and are placed in the first rank, and of you and all those who persevere in the virginity of body and soul. But the next and intimate ones should be widows and remain continent in marriage: all of whom are led with joy and exultation to the temple and into the chamber of the king. In the temple, as priests of God: in the chamber, as the bride and groom's spouses. This temple John saw in the Apocalypse (Rev. 21), and the prophet desired it. 'I have asked one thing from the Lord; this I will seek: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life' (Ps. 26:4). And again: 'O Lord, I have loved the beauty of your house, and the place of dwelling of your glory' (Ps. 25:8). And in another place: 'For I shall pass over into the place of tabernacle of admirable, even to the house of God; With the voice of joy and praise; the noise of one feasting' (Ps. 41:5). But the shields, with which the queen is adorned as she is united to her spouse, are the same as we read in the Septuagint 'arrayed in a variety of colors.'

21. "For your fathers have begotten thee sons, thou shalt make them princes over all the earth." In Hebrew: "For thy fathers have begotten thee sons, thou shalt set them princes over the whole earth." And from the person of the Father it is certainly not spoken of the daughter, but again, the discourse can be understood as referring to the daughter; and from the Holy Spirit, and from the sons of Korah. If, therefore, the discourse is directed to the daughter as a bride, but the bride is gathered from the nations, of whom it is said above: "Forget thy people and thy father's house," we must know the bride's fathers, in order that we may consequently know the sons also. For your ancestors, about whom you spoke in Jeremiah: 'How falsely our fathers possessed idols, and there is no rain in them' (Jeremiah 14. 22 and 16. 19). For Plato, and for other teachers of diverse dogmas and errors, sons were born to you, whom you made your rulers, and you made them teachers among the people. Or rather, O Church, your sons whom you have begotten will turn into fathers, when you have made disciples into teachers, and placed them in the priestly rank as a testimony of all. But if we understand the Fathers of the Church to be Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the rest of the Patriarchs; let us understand the Apostles as their sons, who were born to them in honor of their fathers and who were sent by the Lord to preach to the ends of the earth, and to baptize believers in the name of the Trinity. But it is asked how the Church could have fathers from among the gentiles, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, when it is said of them: "Forget your people and your father's house." Let us read the Gospel: "Do not say that we have Abraham as our father: God is able from these stones," that is, from the hard hearts of the Gentiles, "to raise up children to Abraham" (Matthew 2:9). And elsewhere: "If you were Abraham's children, you would do the works of Abraham" (John 8:39). And in Genesis, God himself speaks to Abraham, "All nations will be blessed in your offspring" (Gen. 12:3). For just as he was justified by faith in circumcision, so we will also be justified in the same faith, if we have the faith and works of our Father Abraham. This can be said of the Savior himself, or by the Father, or by the prophetic choir and Holy Spirit. For your fathers, namely the Jews who rejected and denied you, you have begotten sons, the Apostles, and believers from the nations whom you have established as leaders in all the earth.

22. I will remember your name in every generation and generation. Therefore, peoples will confess to you forever, and into the age of ages." In Hebrew: "I will remember your name in every generation and generation. Therefore peoples will praise you forever and ever. "What we have interpreted as 'they will praise you', Symmachus translated as 'they will commend you.' The queen, who stood at the right hand of the king in a robe of gold, and had been ordered to forget her people and her father's house; and again it had been said to her: 'For your fathers, sons were born to you, you shall make them princes over all the earth,' understanding how great was the glory to be adorned and with what rewards to be lifted up, turns her voice to her bridegroom and promises to always remember the name of her spouse, in every generation. What he promised, we see fulfilled. Christian herself imposed on us all the name of Christians: a new name, in which "all families of the nations will be blessed". But she remembers not in one generation, but in all: signifying either all nations, or two generations, of Jews and Gentiles. And because this is not enough if the name of the Lord is remembered in two generations, therefore the peoples who have been in the Church will confess and praise the Lord forever and ever. When you too, O daughter of the Princes, are led amidst the choir of saints, and delight your spouse in your ivory palace, remember me, who by the revelation of the Lord have given you an understanding of this Psalm and say, 'I will be mindful of your name,' so that if life accompanies you, you may understand the whole Canticle of Canticles.

Letters - letter_066

Letter 66. To Pammachius.

Pammachius a Roman senator, had lost his wife Paulina one of Paula's daughters, while she was still in the flower of her youth. It was not till two years had elapsed that Jerome ventured to write to him; and when he did so he dwelt but little on the life and virtues of Paulina. Probably there was but little to tell. The greater part of the letter is taken up with commendation of Pammachius himself who, in spite of his high rank and position, had become a monk and was now living a life of severe self-denial. Jerome speaks approvingly of the Hospice for Strangers which, in conjunction with Fabiola, Pammachius had set up at Portus, and describes his own somewhat similar institutions at Bethlehem. He also mentions Paula, Eustochium, and the dead Blaesilla, all in terms of the highest praise. The date of the letter is 397 a.d.

I. Supposing a wound to be healed and a scar to have been formed upon the skin, any course of treatment designed to remove the mark must in its effort to improve the appearance renew the smart of the original wound. After two years of inopportune silence my condolence now comes rather late; yet even so I am afraid that my present speech may be still more inopportune. I fear lest in touching the sore spot in your heart I may by my words inflame afresh a wound which time and reflection have availed to cure. For who can have ears so dull or hearts so flinty as to hear the name of your Paulina without weeping? Even though reared on the milk of Hyrcanian tigresses¹ they must still shed tears. Who can with dry eyes see thus untimely cut down and withered an opening rose, an undeveloped bud,² which has not yet formed itself into a cup nor spread forth the proud display of its crimson petals? In her a most priceless pearl is broken. In her a vivid emerald is shattered. Sickness alone shews us the blessedness of health. We realize better what we have had when we cease to have it.

2. The good ground of which we read in the parable brought forth fruit, some an hundred-fold, some sixtyfold, and some thirtyfold. [Matt. 13:8] In this threefold yield I recognize an emblem of the three different rewards of Christ which have fallen to three women³ closely united in blood and moral excellence. Eustochium culls the flowers of virginity. Paula sweeps the toilsome threshing floor of widowhood. Paulina keeps the bed undefiled of marriage. A mother with such daughters wins for herself on earth all that Christ has promised to give in heaven. Then to complete the team-if I may so call it-of four saints turned out by a single family, and to match the women's virtues by those of a man, the three have a fit companion in Pammachius who is a cherub such as Ezekiel describes, [Ezek. 10:8-22] brother-in-law to the first. son-in-law to the second, husband to the third. Husband did I say? Nay, rather a most devoted brother; for the language of marriage is inadequate to describe the holy bonds of the Spirit. Of this team Jesus holds the reins, and it is of steeds like these that Habakkuk sings: "ride upon thy horses and let thy riding be salvation." [Hab. 3:8, LXX] With like resolve if with unlike speed they strain after the victor's palm. Their colours are different; their object is the same. They are harnessed in one yoke, they obey one driver, not waiting for the lash but answering the call of his voice with fresh efforts.

3. Let me use for a moment the language of philosophy. According to the Stoics there are four virtues so closely related and mutually coherent that he who lacks one lacks all. They are prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance. [Cf. Wisdom, 8:7] While all of you possess the four, yet each is remarkable for one. You have prudence, your mother has justice, your virgin sister has fortitude, your wedded wife has temperance. I speak of you as wise, for who can be wiser than one who, despising the folly of the world, has followed Christ "the power of God and the wisdom of God"? [1 Cor. 1:24] Or what better instance can there be of justice than your mother, who having divided her substance among her offspring has taught them by her own contempt of riches the true object on which to fix their affections? Who has set a better example of courage than Eustochium, who by resolving to be a virgin has breached the gates of the nobility and broken down the pride of a consular house? The first of Roman ladies, she has brought under the yoke the first of Roman families. Has there ever been temperance greater than that of Paulina, who, reading the words of the apostle: "marriage is honourable in all and the bed unde filed," [Heb. 13:4] and not presuming to aspire to the happiness of her virgin sister or the continence of her widowed mother, has preferred to keep to the safe track of a lower path rather than treading on air to lose herself in the clouds? When once she had entered upon the married state, her one thought day and night was that, as soon as her union should be blessed with offspring, she would live thenceforth in the second degree of chastity,⁴ and "Though woman, foremost in the high emprise," [Virg. A. 1:494] would induce her husband to follow a like course. She would not forsake him but looked for the day when he would become a companion in salvation. Finding by several miscarriages that her womb was not barren, she could not give up all hope of having children and had to allow her own reluctance to give way to the eagerness of her mother-in-law and the chagrin of her husband. Thus she suffered much as Rachel suffered, [Gen. 35:16] although instead of bringing forth like her a son of pangs and of the right hand,⁵ the heir she had longed for was no other than her husband. I have learned on good authority that her wish in submitting herself to her husband was not to take advantage of God's primitive command "Be faithful and multiply and replenish the earth" [Gen. 1:28] but that she only desired children that she might bring forth virgins to Christ.

4. We read that the wife of Phinehas the priest, on hearing that the ark of the Lord had been taken, was seized suddenly with the pains of travail and that she brought forth a son Ichabod and died a mother in the hands of the women who nursed her. [1 Sam. 4:19-22] Rachel's son is called Benjamin, that is 'son of excellence' Or 'of the right hand'; but the son of the other, afterwards to be a distinguished priest of God, derives his name from the ark.⁶ The same thing has come to pass in our own day, for since Paulina fell asleep the Church has posthumously borne the monk Pammachius, a patrician by his parentage and marriage, rich in alms, and lofty in lowliness. The apostle writes to the Corinthians, "Ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men, not many noble are called." [1 Cor. 1:26] The conditions of the nascent church required this to be so that the grain of mustard seed might grow up little by little into a tree, [Matt. 13:31] and that the leaven of the gospel might gradually raise more and more the whole lump of the church. [Matt. 13:33] In our day Rome possesses what the world in days gone by knew not of. Then few of the wise or mighty or noble were Christians; now many wise powerful and noble are not Christians only but even monks. And among them all my Pammachius is the wisest, the mightiest, and the noblest; great among the great, a leader among leaders, he is the commander in chief of all monks. He and others like him are the offspring which Paulina desired to have in her life time and which she has given us in her death. "Sing, O barren, thou that didst not bear; break forth into singing and cry aloud, thou that didst not travail with child"; [Isa. 54:1] for in a moment thou hast brought forth as many sons as there are poor men in Rome.

5. The glowing gems which in old days adorned the neck and face of Paulina now purchase food for the needy. Her silk dresses and gold brocades are exchanged for soft woollen garments intended to keep out the cold and not to expose the body to vain admiration. All that formerly ministered to luxury is now at the service of virtue. That blind man holding out his hand, and often crying aloud when there is none to hear, is the heir of Paulina, is co-heir with Pammachius. That poor cripple who can scarcely drag himself along, owes his support to the help of a tender girl. Those doors which of old poured forth crowds of visitors, are now beset only by the wretched. One suffers from a dropsy, big with death; another mute and without the means of begging, begs the more appealingly because he cannot beg; another maimed from his childhood implores an alms which he may not himself enjoy. Still another has his limbs rotted with jaundice and lives on after his body has become a corpse. To use the language of Virgil:

"Had I a hundred tongues, a hundred lips,

I could not tell men's countless sufferings." [Virg. A. 6:625, 627]

Such is the bodyguard which accompanies Pammachius wherever he walks; in the persons of such he ministers to Christ Himself; and their squalor serves to whiten his soul. Thus he speeds on his way to heaven, beneficent as a giver of games to the poor, and kind as a provider of shows for the needy. Other husbands scatter on the graves of their wives violets, roses, lilies, and purple flowers; and assuage the grief of their hearts by fulfilling this tender duty. Our dear Pammachius also waters the holy ashes and the revered bones of Paulina, but it is with the balm of almsgiving. These are the confections and the perfumes with which he cherishes the dead embers of his wife knowing that it is written: "Water will quench a flaming fire; and alms maketh an atonement for sins." [Ecclus. 3:30] What great power compassion has and what high rewards it is destined to win, the blessed Cyprian sets forth in an extensive work.⁷ It is proved also by the counsel of Daniel who desired the most impious of kings-had he been willing to hear him-to be saved by shewing mercy to the poor. [Dan. 4:27] Paulina's mother may well be glad of Paulina's heir. She cannot regret that her daughter's wealth has passed into new hands when she sees it still spent upon the objects she had at heart. Nay, rather she must congratulate herself that without any exertion of her own her wishes are being carried out. The sum available for distribution is the same as before: only the distributor is changed.

6. Who can credit the fact that one, who is the glory of the Furian stock and whose grandfathers and great grandfathers have been consuls, moves amid the senators in their purple clothed in sombre garb, and that, so far from blushing when he meets the eyes of his companions, he actually derides those who deride him! "There is a shame that leadeth to death and there is a shame that leadeth to life."⁸ It is a monk's first virtue to despise the judgments of men and always to remember the apostle's words:-"If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ." [Gal. 1:10] In the same sense the Lord says to the prophets that He has made their face a brazen city and a stone of adamant and an iron pillar, [Cf. Jer. 1:18. Ezek. 3:8, Ezek. 3:9] to the end that they shall not be afraid of the insults of the people but shall by the sternness of their looks discompose the effrontery of those who sneered at them. A finely strung mind is more readily overcome by contumely than by terror. And men whom no tortures can overawe are sometimes prevailed over by the fear of shame. Surely it is no small thing for a man of birth, eloquence, and wealth to avoid the company of the powerful in the streets, to mingle with the crowd, to cleave to the poor, to associate on equal terms with the untaught, to cease to be a leader and to become one of the people. The more he humbles himself, the more he is exalted. [Cf. Luke 14:11]

7. A pearl will shine in the midst of squalor and a gem of the first water will sparkle in the mire. This is what the Lord promised when He said: "Them that honour me I will honour." [1 S. 2:30] Others may understand this of the future when sorrow shall be turned into joy and when, although the world shall pass away, the saints shall receive a crown which shall never pass. But I for my part see that the promises made to the saints are fulfilled even in this present life. Before he began to serve Christ with his whole heart, Pammachius was a well known person in the senate. Still there were many other senators who wore the badges of proconsular rank. The whole world is filled with similar decorations. He was in the first rank it is true, but there were others in it besides him. Whilst he took precedence of some, others took precedence of him. The most distinguished privilege loses its prestige when lavished on a crowd, and dignities themselves become less dignified in the eyes of good men when held by persons who have no dignity. Thus Tully finely says of Caesar, when he wished to advance some of his adherents, "he did not so much honour them as dishonour the honourable positions in which he placed them."⁹ To-day all the churches of Christ are talking of Pammachius. The whole world admires as a poor man one whom heretofore it ignored as rich. Can anything be more splendid than the consulate? Yet the honour lasts only for a year and when another has succeeded to the post its former occupant gives way. Each man's laurels are lost in the crowd and sometimes triumphs themselves are marred by the shortcomings of those who celebrate them. An office which was once handed down from patrician to patrician, which only men of noble birth could hold, of which the consul Marius-victor though he was over Numidia and the Teutons and the Cimbri-was held unworthy on account of the obscurity of his family, and which Scipio won before his time as the reward of valour,-this great office is now obtained by merely belonging to the army; and the shining robe of victory¹⁰ now envelops men who a little while ago were country boors. Thus we have received more than we have given. The things we have renounced are small; the things we possess are great. All that Christ promises is duly performed and for what we have given up we have received an hundredfold. [Cf. Matt. 19:29] This was the ground in which Isaac sowed his seed, [Gen. 26:12] Isaac who in his readiness to die [Gen. 22] bore the cross of the Gospel before the Gospel came.

8. "If thou wilt be perfect," the Lord says, "go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor.... and come and follow me." [Matt. 19:21] If thou wilt be perfect. Great enterprises are always left to the free choice of those who hear of them. Thus the apostle refrains from making virginity a positive duty, because the Lord in speaking of eunuchs who had made themselves such for the kingdom of heaven's sake finally said: "He that is able to receive it, let him receive it." [Matt. 19:12] For, to quote the apostle, "it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy." [Rom. 9:1] If thou wilt be perfect. There is no compulsion laid upon you: if you are to win the prize it must be by the exercise of your own free will. If therefore you will to be perfect and desire to be as the prophets, as the apostles, as Christ Himself, sell not a part of your substance (lest the fear of want become an occasion of unfaithfulness, and so you perish with Ananias and Sapphira [Acts v]) but all that you have. And when you have sold all, give the proceeds not to the wealthy or to the high-minded but to the poor. Give each man enough for his immediate need but do not give money to swell what a man has already. "Thou shall not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn," [1 Cor. 9:9] and "the labourer is worthy of his reward." [1 Tim. 5:18] Again "they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar." [1 Cor. 9:13] Remember also these words: "having, food and raiment let us be therewith content." [1 Tim. 6:8] Where you see smoking dishes, steaming pheasants, massive silver plate, spirited nags, long-haired boy-slaves, expensive clothing, and embroidered hangings, give nothing there. For he to whom you would give is richer than you the giver. It is moreover a kind of sacrilege to give what belongs to the poor to those who are not poor. Yet to be a perfect and complete Christian it is not enough to despise wealth or to squander and fling away one's money, a thing which can be lost and found in a single moment. Crates the Theban¹¹ did this, so did Antisthenes and several others, whose lives shew them to have had many faults. The disciple of Christ must do more for the attainment of spiritual glory than the philosopher of the world, than the venal slave of flying rumours and of the people's breath. It is not enough for you to despise wealth unless you follow Christ as well. And only he follows Christ who forsakes his sins and walks hand in hand with virtue. We know that Christ is wisdom. He is the treasure which in the scriptures a man finds in his field. [Matt. 13:44] He is the peerless gem which is bought by selling many pearls. [Matt. 13:45] But if you love a captive woman, that is, worldly wisdom, and if no beauty but hers attracts you, make her bald and cut off her alluring hair, that is to say, the graces of style, and pare away her dead nails. [Cf. Dt. 21:11, Dt. 21:12] Wash her with the nitre of which the prophet speaks, [Jer. 2:22] and then take your ease with her and say "Her left hand is under my head, and her right hand doth embrace me." [Cant. 2:6] Then shall the captive bring to you many children; from a Moabitess¹² she shall become an Israelitish woman. Christ is that sanctification without which no man shall see the face of God. Christ is our redemption, for He is at once our Redeemer and our Ransom. [1 Cor. 1:30, Heb. 12:14] Christ is all, that he who has left all for Christ may find One in place of all, and may be able to proclaim freely. "The Lord is my portion." [Ps. 73:26]

9, I see clearly that you have a warm affection for divine learning and that far from trying-like some rash persons-to teach that of which you are yourself ignorant you make it your first object to learn what you are going to teach. Your letters in their simplicity are redolent of the prophets and savour strongly of the apostles. You do not affect a stilted eloquence, nor boylike balance shallow sentences in clauses neatly-turned. The quickly frothing foam disappears with equal quickness; and a tumour though it enlarges the size of the body is injurious to health. It is moreover a shrewd maxim, this of Cato, "Fast enough if well enough." Long ago it is true in the days of our youth we laughed outright at this dictum when the finished orator¹³ used it in his exordium. I fancy you remember the mistake¹⁴ shared by the speaker in our Athenaeum and how the whole room resounded with the cry taken up by the students "Fast enough if well enough." According to Fabius¹⁵ crafts would be sure to prosper if none but craftsmen were allowed to criticise them. No man can adequately estimate a poet unless he is competent himself to write verse No man can comprehend philosophers, unless he is acquainted with the various theories that they have held. Material and visible products are best appraised by those who make them. To what a cruel lot we men of letters are exposed you may gather from the fact that we are forced to rely on the judgment of the public; and many a man is in company a formidable opponent who would certainly be despised could he be seen alone. I have touched on this in passing to make you content, if possible, with the ear of the learned. Disregard the remarks which uneducated persons make concerning your ability; but day by day imbibe the marrow of the prophets, that you may know the mystery of Christ and share this mystery with the patriarchs.

10. Whether you read or write, whether you wake or sleep, let the herdsman's horn of Amos¹⁶ always ring in your ears. Let the sound of the clarion arouse your soul, let the divine love carry you out of yourself; and then seek upon your bed him whom your soul loveth, [Cant. 3:1] and boldly say: "I sleep, but my heart waketh." [Cant. 5:2] And when you have found him and taken hold of him, let him not go. And if you fall asleep for a moment and He escapes from your hands, do not forthwith despair. Go out into the streets and charge the daughters of Jerusalem: then shall you find him lying clown in the noontide weary and drunk with passion, or wet with the dew of night by the flocks of his companions, or fragrant with many kinds of spices, amid the apples of the garden. [Cf. Cant. 1:7, Cant. 2:5, Cant. 5:2] There give to him your breasts, let him suck your learned bosom, let him rest in the midst of his heritage, [Ps. 68:13] his feathers as those of a dove overlaid with silver and his inward parts with the brightness of gold. This young child, this mere boy, who is fed on butter and honey, [Isa. 7:14, Isa. 7:15] and who is reared among curdled mountains,¹⁷ quickly grows up to manhood, speedily spoils all¹⁸ that is opposed to him in you, and when the time is ripe plunders [the spiritual] Damascus and puts in chains the king of [the spiritual] Assyria.

11. I hear that you have erected a hospice for strangers at Portus and that you have planted a twig from the tree of Abraham¹⁹ upon the Ausonian shore. Like neas you are tracing the outlines of a new encampment; only that, whereas he, when he reached the waters of the Tiber, under pressure of want had to eat the square flat cakes which formed the tables spoken of by the oracle, [Virg. Aen. 7:112-129] you are able to build a house of bread to rival this little village of Bethlehem²⁰ wherein I am staying; and here after their long privations you propose to satisfy travellers with sudden plenty. Well done. You have surpassed my poor beginning.²¹ You have reached the highest point. You have made your way from the root to the top of the tree. You are the first of monks in the first city of the world: you do right therefore to follow the first of the patriarchs. Let Lot, whose name means 'one who turns aside' choose the plain [Gen. 13:5-11] and let him follow the left and easy branch of the famous letter of Pythagoras.²² But do you make ready for yourself a monument like Sarah's [Gen. 23:19] on steep and rocky heights. Let the City of Books be near;²³ and when you have destroyed the giants, the sons of Anak, [Cf. Jos. 15:14] make over your heritage to joy and merriment.²⁴ Abraham was rich in gold and silver and cattle, in substance and in raiment: his household was so large that on an emergency he could bring a picked body of young men into the field, and could pursue as far as Dan and then slay four kings who had already put five kings to flight. [Gen. 14:13-16] Frequently exercising hospitality and never turning any man away from his door, he was accounted worthy at last to entertain God himself. He was not satisfied with giving orders to his servants and hand-maids to attend to his guests, nor did he lessen the favour he conferred by leaving others to care for them; but as though he had found a prize, he and Sarah his wife gave themselves to the duties of hospitality. With his own hands he washed the feet of his guests, upon his own shoulders he brought home a fat calf from the herd. While the strangers dined he stood by to serve them, and set before them the dishes cooked by Sarah's hands-though meaning to fast himself.

12. The regard which I feel for you, my dear brother, makes me remind you of these things; for you must offer to Christ not only your money but yourself, to be a "living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service," [Rom. 12:1] and you must imitate the son of man who "came not to be ministered unto but to minister." [Matt. 20:28] What the patriarch did for strangers that our Lord and Master did for His servants and disciples. "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. But," says the devil, "touch his flesh and he will curse thee to thy face." [Job 2:4, Job 2:5] The old enemy knows that the battle with impurity is a harder one than that with covetousness. It is easy to cast off whatclings to us from without, but a war within our borders involves far greater peril. We have to unfasten things joined together, we have to sunder things firmly united. Zacchus was rich while the apostles were poor. He restored fourfold all that he had taken and gave to the poor the half of his remaining substance. He welcomed Christ as his guest, and salvation came unto his house. [Luke 19:2-9] And yet because he was little of stature and could not reach the apostolic standard of height, he was not numbered with the twelve apostles. Now as regards wealth the apostles gave up nothing at all, but as regards will they one and all gave up the whole world. If we offer to Christ our souls as well as our riches, he will gladly receive our offering. But if we give to God only those things which are without while we give to the devil those things which are within, the division is not fair, and the divine voice says: "Hast thou not sinned in offering aright, and yet not dividing aright?" [Gen. 4:7, LXX]

13. That you, the leader of the patrician order, first set the example of turning monk should not be to you an occasion of boasting but rather one of humility, knowing as you do that the Son of God became the Son of man. However low you may abase yourself, you cannot be more lowly than Christ. Even supposing that you walk barefooted, that you dress in sombre garb, that you rank yourself with the poor, that you condescend to enter the tenements of the needy, that you are eyes to the blind, hands to the weak, feet to the lame, that you carry water and hew wood and make fires-even supposing that you do all this, where are the chains, the buffets, the spittings, the scourgings, the gibbet, the death which the Lord endured? And even when you have done all the things I have mentioned, you are still surpassed by your sister Eustochium as well as by Paula: for considering the weakness of their sex they have done more work relatively if less absolutely, than you. I myself was not at Rome but in the desert-would that I had continued there-at the time when your father-in-law Toxotius was still alive and his daughters were still given up to the world. But I have heard that they were too dainty to walk in the muddy streets, that they were carried about in the arms of eunuchs, that they disliked crossing uneven ground, that they found a silk dress a burthen and felt sunshine too scorching. But now, squalid and sombre in their dress, they are positive heroines in comparison with what they used to be. They trim lamps, light fires, sweep floors, clean vegetables, put heads of cabbage in the pot to boil, lay tables, hand cups, help dishes and run to and fro to wait on others. And yet there is no lack of virgins under the same roof with them. Is it then that they have no servants upon whom they can lay these duties? Surely not. They are unwilling that others should surpass them in physical toil whom they themselves surpass in rigour of mind. I say all this not because I doubt your mental ardour but that I may quicken the pace at which you are running, and in the heat of battle may add warmth to your warmth.

14. I for my part am building in this province a monastery and a hospice close by; so that, if Joseph and Mary chance to come to Bethlehem, they may not fail to find shelter and welcome. Indeed, the number of monks who flock here from all quarters of the world is so overwhelming that I can neither desist from my enterprise nor bear so great a burthen. The warning of the gospel has been all but fulfilled in me, for I did not sufficiently count the cost of the tower I was about to build; [Luke 14:28] accordingly I have been constrained to send my brother Paulinian²⁵ to Italy to sell some ruinous villas which have escaped the hands of the barbarians, and also the property inherited from our common parents. For I am loth, now that I have begun it, to give up ministering to the saints, lest I incur the ridicule of carping and envious persons.

15. Now that I have come to the conclusion of my letter I recall my metaphor of the four-horse team, and recollect that Baesilla would have made a fifth had she been spared to share your resolve. I had almost forgotten to mention her, the first of you all to go to meet the Lord. You who once were five I now see to be two and three. Baesilla and her sister Paulina rest in sweet sleep: you with the two others on either side of you will fly upward to Christ more easily.

1: Virgil, Aen. 4:367 2: Quoted from a poet in the Latin Anthology 3: Paula and her two daughters, Paulina and Eustochium 4: i.e., continence in marriage 5: The respective meanings of Benoni and Benjamin 6: Ichabod means 'there is no glory'; glory being (apparently) a synonym for the ark 7: Viz. the treatise entitled Of Work and Alms

8: Eccclus. 4:25. Est confusio adducens peccatum: et est confusio adducens gloriam et gratiam, Vulg. Jerome probably quotes from memory. AV. follows the Greek and the Vulg 9: Cf. the remark of Aeneas Silvius that "men should be given to places not places, to men.

10: Palma, i.e. tunica palmata 11: Cf. Letter LVIII 12: Jerome is thinking of Ruth

13: Quintilian 14: What was the mistake? Did the orator say, "Well enough if fast enough"? The text seems obscure 15: Fabius Pietor 16: Cf. Letter XLVI

17: Ps. 68:14, Vulg. (acc. to some mss.). Intermedios cleros-the lot or inheritance-with an allusion perhaps to the word clergy formed from clerus 18: Perhaps an allusion to Isa. 8:1. Mahershalal-hash-baz 'Spoil speedeth, prey hasteth. O 19: i.e. the oak of Mature under which he entertained the three angels (Gen. 18:1-8) 20: Beth-lehem means 'house of bread. O 21: v. §14 below 22: The letter Y. Cf. Pers. 3:56, 57 and Conington's note 23: i.e. Kirjathsepher close to Hebron (Josh. 15:13-15) where Sarah was buried 24: An allusion to the name of Abraham's heir, Isaac or 'laughter O' (Gen. 21:3, Gen. 21:6) 25: See Letter 60

Letters - letter_067

Letter 67. From Augustine.

Jerome having written him a short letter (no longer extant) Augustine now replies. He speaks with approval of Jerome's treatise On Famous Men, incorrectly called the Epitaph (see Letter 112). He also repeats his objections to Jerome's account of the quarrel between Paul and Peter at Antioch and then concludes with a request that he will draw up a short notice of the principal heresies condemned by the Church.

Like the preceding letter of Augustine (Letter 56.) this also failed to reach Jerome. It was however published in the West, but without Augustine's knowledge and by degrees its contents found their way to Bethlehem where they caused much annoyance and pain. The date of the letter is 397 a.d. In collections labeled Augustine's Letter 40, or Jerome's Letter 67. To My Lord Much Beloved, and Brother Worthy of Being Honoured and Embraced with the Most Sincere Devotion of Charity, My Fellow-Presbyter Jerome, Augustine Sends Greeting.

1. I thank you that, instead of a mere formal salutation, you wrote me a letter, though it was much shorter than I would desire to have from you; since nothing that comes from you is tedious, however much time it may demand. Wherefore, although I am beset with great anxieties about the affairs of others, and that, too, in regard to secular matters, I would find it difficult to pardon the brevity of your letter, were it not that I consider that it was written in reply to a yet shorter letter of my own. Address yourself, therefore, I entreat you, to that exchange of letters by which we may have fellowship, and may not permit the distance which separates us to keep us wholly apart from each other; though we are in the Lord bound together by the unity of the Spirit, even when our pens rest and we are silent. The books in which you have laboured to bring treasures from the Lord's storehouse give me almost a complete knowledge of you. For if I may not say, "I know you," because I have not seen your face, it may with equal truth be said that you do not know yourself, for you cannot see your own face. If, however, it is this alone which constitutes your acquaintance with yourself, that you know your own mind, we also have no small knowledge of it through your writings, in studying which we bless God that to yourself, to us, to all who read your works, He has given you as you are.

2. It is not long since, among other things, a certain book of yours came into my hands, the name of which I do not yet know, for the manuscript itself had not the title written, as is customary, on the first page. The brother with whom it was found said that its title is Epitaphium, a name which we might believe you to have approved, if we found in the work a notice of the lives or writings of those only who are deceased. Inasmuch, however, as mention is there made of the works of some who were at the time when it was written, or are even now, alive, we wonder why you either gave this title to it, or permitted others to believe that you had done so. The book itself has our complete approval as a useful work.

3. In your exposition of the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians I have found one thing which causes me much concern. For if it be the case that statements untrue in themselves, but made, as it were, out of a sense of duty in the interest of religion,¹ have been admitted into the Holy Scriptures, what authority will be left to them? If this be conceded, what sentence can be produced from these Scriptures, by the weight of which the wicked obstinacy of error can be broken down? For as soon as you have produced it, if it be disliked by him who contends with you, he will reply that, in the passage alleged, the writer was uttering a falsehood under the pressure of some honourable sense of duty. And where will any one find this way of escape impossible, if it be possible for men to say and believe that, after introducing his narrative with these words, "The things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not," [Gal. 1:20] the apostle lied when he said of Peter and Barnabas, "I saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel"? [Gal. 2:14] For if they did walk uprightly, Paul wrote what was false; and if he wrote what was false here, when did he say what was true? Shall he be supposed to say what is true when his teaching corresponds with the predilection, of his reader, and shall everything which runs counter to the impressions of the reader be! reckoned a falsehood uttered by him under a sense of duty? It will be impossible to prevent men from finding reasons for thinking that he not only might have uttered a falsehood, but was bound to do so, if we admit this canon of interpretation. There is no need for many words in pursuing this argument, especially in writing to you, for whose wisdom and prudence enough has already been said. I would by no means be so arrogant as to attempt to enrich by my small coppers² your mind, which by the divine gift is golden; and none is more able than yourself to revise and correct that work to which I have referred.

4. You do not require me to teach you in what sense the apostle says, "To the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews," [1 Cor. 9:20] and other such things in the same passage, which are to be ascribed to the compassion of pitying love, not the artifices of intentional deceit. For he that ministers to the sick becomes as if he were sick himself; not, indeed, falsely pretending to be under the fever, but considering, with the mind of one truly sympathizing, what he would wish done for himself if he were in the sick man's place. Paul was indeed a Jew; and when he had become a Christian, he had not abandoned those Jewish sacraments which that people had received in the right way, and for a certain appointed time. Therefore, even although he was an apostle of Christ, he took observing these; but with this view, that he might show that they were in no wise hurtful to those who, even after they had believed in Christ, desired to retain the ceremonies which by the law they had learned from their fathers; provided only that they did riot build on these their hope of salvation, since the salvation which was foreshadowed in these has now been brought in by the Lord Jesus. For the same reason, he judged that these ceremonies should by no means be made binding on the Gentile converts, because, by imposing a heavy and superfluous burden, they might turn aside from the faith those who were unaccustomed to them.

5. The thing, therefore, which he rebuked in Peter was not his observing the customs handed down from his fathers-which Peter, if he wished, might do without being chargeable with deceit or inconsistency, for, though now superfluous, these customs were not hurtful to one who had been accustomed to them-but his compelling the Gentiles to observe Jewish ceremonies, [Gal. 2:14] which he could not do otherwise than by so acting in regard to them as if their observance was, even after the Lord's coming, still necessary to salvation, against which truth protested through the apostolic office of Paul. Nor was the Apostle Peter ignorant of this, but he did it through fear of those who were of the circumcision. Manifestly, therefore, Peter was truly corrected, and Paul has given a true narrative of the event, unless, by the admission of a falsehood here, the authority of the Holy Scriptures given for the faith of all coming generations is to be made wholly uncertain and wavering. For it is neither possible nor suitable to state within the compass of a letter how great and how unutterably evil must be the consequences of such a concession. It might, however, be shown seasonably, and with less hazard, if we were conversing together.

6. Paul had forsaken everything peculiar to the Jews that was evil, especially this: "That, being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, they had not submitted themselves unto the righteousness of God." [Rom. 10:3] In this, moreover, he differed from them: that after the passion and resurrection of Christ, in whom had been given and made manifest the mystery of grace, according to the order of Melchizedek, they still considered it binding on them to celebrate, not out of mere reverence for old customs, but as necessary to salvation, the sacraments of the old economy, which were indeed at one time necessary, else had it been unprofitable and vain for the Maccabees to suffer martyrdom, as they did, for their adherence to them. [2 Macc. 7:1] Lastly, in this also Paul differed from the Jews: that they persecuted the Christian preachers of grace as enemies of the law. These and all similar errors and sins he declares that he "counted but loss and dung that he might win Christ;" [Phil. 3:8] but he does not, in so saying, disparage the ceremonies of the Jewish law, if only they were observed after the custom of their fathers, in the way in which he himself observed them, without regarding them as necessary to salvation, and not in the way in which the Jews affirmed that they must be observed, nor in the exercise of deceptive dissimulation such as he had rebuked in Peter. For if Paul observed these sacraments in order, by pretending to be a Jew, to gain the Jews, why did he not also take part with the Gentiles in heathen sacrifices, when to them that were without law he became as without law, that he might gain them also? The explanation is found in this, that he took part in the Jewish sacrifices, as being himself by birth a Jew; and that when he said all this which I have quoted, he meant, not that he pretended to be what he was not, but that he felt with true compassion that he must bring such help to them as would be needful for himself if he were involved in their error. Herein he exercised not the subtlety of a deceiver, but the sympathy of a compassionate deliverer. In the same passage the apostle has stated the principle more generally: "To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things to all men, that I might by all means save some," [1 Cor. 9:22] - the latter clause of which guides us to understand the former as meaning that he showed himself one who pitied the weakness of another as much as if it had been his own. For when he said, "Who is weak, and I am not weak?" [2 Cor. 11:29] he did not wish it to be supposed that he pretended to suffer the infirmity of another, but rather that he showed it by sympathy.

7. Wherefore I beseech you, apply to the correction and emendation of that book a frank and truly Christian severity, and chant what the Greeks call palinw/dia. For incomparably more lovely than the Grecian Helen is Christian truth: In her defence, our martyrs have fought against Sodom with more courage than the heroes of Greece displayed against Troy for Helen's sake. I do not say this in order that you may recover the faculty of spiritual sight,³ -far be it from me to say that you have lost it!-but that, having eyes both clear and quick in discernment, you may turn them towards that from which, in unaccountable dissimulation, you have turned them away, refusing to see the calamitous consequences which would follow on our once admitting that a writer of the divine books could in any part of his work honourably and piously utter a falsehood.

8. I had written some time ago a letter to you on this subject,⁴ which was not delivered to you, because the bearer to whom it was entrusted did not finish his journey to you. From it I may quote a thought which occurred to me while I was dictating it, and which I ought not to omit in this letter, in order that, if your opinion is still different from mine, and is better, you may readily forgive the anxiety which has moved me to write. It is this: If your opinion is different, and is according to truth (for only in that case can it be better than mine), you will grant that "a mistake of mine, which is in the interest of truth, cannot deserve great blame, if indeed it deserves blame at all, when it is possible for you to use truth in the interest of falsehood without doing wrong."⁵

9. As to the reply which you were pleased to give me concerning Origen, I did not need to be told that we should, not only in ecclesiastical writers, but in all others, approve and commend what we find right and true, but reject and condemn what we find false and mischievous. What I craved from your wisdom and learning (and I still crave it), was that you should acquaint us definitely with the points in which that remarkable man is proved to have departed from the belief of the truth. Moreover, in that book in which you have mentioned all the ecclesiastical writers whom you could remember, and their works, it would, I think, be a more convenient arrangement if, after naming those whom you know to be heretics (since you have chosen not to pass them without notice), you would add in what respect their doctrine is to be avoided. Some of these heretics also you have omitted, and I would fain know on what grounds. If, however, perchance it has been from a desire not to enlarge that volume unduly that you refrained from adding to a notice of heretics, the statement of the things in which the Catholic Church has authoritatively condemned them, I beg you not to grudge bestowing on this subject, to which with humility and brotherly love I direct your attention, a portion of that literary labour by which already, by the grace of the Lord our God, you have in no small measure stimulated and assisted the saints in the study of the Latin tongue, and publish in one small book (if your other occupations permit you) a digest of the perverse dogmas of all the heretics who up to this time have, through arrogance, or ignorance, or self-will, attempted to subvert the simplicity of the Christian faith; a work most necessary for the information of those who are prevented, either by lack of leisure or by their not knowing the Greek language, from reading and understanding so many things. I would urge my request at greater length, were it not that this is commonly a sign of misgivings as to the benevolence of the party from whom a favour is sought. Meanwhile I cordially recommend to your goodwill in Christ our brother Paulus, to whose high standing in these regions I bear before God willing testimony.

1: [Velut officiosa mendacia.] 2: [Obolis meis.]

3:

The reference here is to the story of the poet Stesichorus, who, having lost his sight as a judgment for writing an attack on Helen, was miraculously healed when he wrote a poem in retractation.

4: [Epist. 28.] 5: See Letter 28. sec. 5.

Letters - letter_068

Letter 68. To Castrutius.

Castrutius, a blind man of Pannonia, had set out for Bethlehem to visit Jerome. However, on reaching Cissa (whether that in Thrace or that on the Adriatic is uncertain) he was induced by his friends to turn back. Jerome writes to thank him for his intention and to console him for his inability to carry it out. He then tries to comfort him in his blindness (1) by referring to Christ's words concerning the man born blind (Joh. ix. 3) and (2) by telling him the story of Antony and Didymus. The date of the letter is 397 a.d.

1. My reverend son Heraclius the deacon has reported to me that in your eagerness to see me you came as far as Cissa, and that, though a Pannonian and consequently a land animal, you did not quail before the surges of the Adriatic and the dangers of the Aegean and Ionian seas. He tells me that you would have actually accomplished your purpose, had not our brethren with affectionate care held you back. I thank you all the same and regard it as a kindness shewn. For in the case of friends one must accept the will for the deed. Enemies often give us the latter, but only sincere attachment can bring us the former. And now that I am writing to you I beseech you do not regard the bodily affliction which has befallen you as due to sin. When the Apostles speculated concerning the man that was born blind from the womb and asked our Lord and Saviour: "Who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" they were told "Neither hath this man sinned nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him." [John. 9:2, John. 9:3] Do we not see numbers of heathens, Jews, heretics and men of various opinions rolling in the mire of lust, bathed in blood, surpassing wolves in ferocity and kites in rapacity, and for all this the plague does not come nigh their dwellings? [Ps. 91:10] They are not smitten as other men, and accordingly they wax insolent against God and lift up their faces even to heaven. We know on the other hand that holy men are afflicted with sicknesses, miseries, and want, and perhaps they are tempted to say "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency." Yet immediately they go on to reprove themselves, "If I say, I will speak thus; behold I should offend against the generation of thy children." [Ps. 73:13, Ps. 73:15] If you suppose that your blindness is caused by sin, and that a disease which physicians are often able to cure is an evidence of God's anger, you will think Isaac a sinner because he was so wholly sightless that he was deceived into blessing one whom he did not mean to bless. [Gen. 27] You will charge Jacob with sin, whose vision became so dim that he could not see Ephraim and Manasseh, [Gen. 48:10] although with the inner eye and the prophetic spirit he could foresee the distant future and the Christ that was to come of his royal line. [Gen. 49:10] Were any of the kings holier than Josiah? Yet he was slain by the sword of the Egyptians. [2 K. 23:29] Were there ever loftier saints than Peter and Paul? Yet their blood stained the blade of Nero. And to say no more of men, did not the Son of God endure the shame of the cross? And yet you fancy those blessed who enjoy in this world happiness and pleasure? God's hottest anger against sinners is when he shews no anger. Wherefore in Ezekiel he says to Jerusalem: "My jealousy will depart from thee and i will be quiet and will be no more angry." [Ezek. 16:42] For "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom

He receiveth." [Heb. 12:6] The father does not instruct his son unless he loves him. The master does not correct his disciple unless he sees in him signs of promise. When once the doctor gives over caring for the patient, it is a sign that he despairs. You should answer thus: "as Lazarus in his lifetime [Luke 16:25] received evil things so will I now gladly suffer torments that future glory may be laid up for me." For "affliction shall not rise up the second time." [Nahum 1:9] If Job, a man holy and spotless and righteous in his generation, suffered terrible afflictions, his own book explains the reason why.

2. That I may not make myself tedious or exceed the due limits of a letter by repeating old stories, I will briefly relate to you an incident which happened in my childhood. The saintly Athanasius bishop of Alexandria had summoned the blessed Antony to that city to confute the heretics there. Hereupon Didymus, a man of great learning who had lost his eyes, came to visit the hermit and, the conversation turning upon the holy scriptures, Antony could not help admiring his ability and eulogizing his insight. At last he said: You do not regret, do you, the loss of your eyes? At first Didymus was ashamed to answer, but when the question had been repeated a second time and a third, he frankly confessed that his blindness was a great grief to him. Whereupon Antony said: "I am surprised that a wise man should grieve at the loss of a faculty which he shares with ants and flies and gnats, and not rejoice rather in having one of which only saints and apostles have been thought worthy." From this story you may perceive how much better it is to have spiritual than carnal vision and to possess eyes into which the mote of sin cannot fall. [Luke 6:42]

Though you have failed to come this year, I do not yet despair of your coming. If the reverend deacon¹ who is the bearer of this letter is again caught in the toils of your affection, and if you come hither in his company I shall be delighted to welcome you and shall readily acknowledge that the delay in payment is made up for by the largeness of the interest.

1:

Heraclius, a deacon of Pannonia, who had been sent to Bethlehem by his bishop Amabilis to procure from Jerome a long promised commentary on the Visions of Isaiah. This, which Jerome subsequently incorporated as book V. in his complete work on the prophet, Heraclius succeeded in obtaining from him. See the Preface to the Commentary

Letters - letter_069

Letter 69. To Oceanus.

Oceanus, a Roman nobleman zealous for the faith, had asked Jerome to back him in a protest against Carterius a Spanish bishop who contrary to the apostolic rule that a bishop is to be "the husband of one wife" had married a second time. Jerome refuses to take the line suggested on the ground that Carterius's first marriage having preceded his baptism cannot be taken into account. He therefore advises Oceanus to let the matter drop. The date of the letter is 397 a.d.

1. I never supposed, son Oceanus, that the clemency of the Emperor would be assailed by criminals, or that persons just released from prison would after their own experience of its filth and fetters complain of relaxations allowed to others. In the gospel he who envies another's salvation is thus addressed: "Friend, is thine eye evil because I am good?" [Matt. 20:15] "God hath concluded them all in sin¹ that he might have mercy upon all." [Rom. 11:32] "When sin abounded grace did much more abound." [Rom. 5:20] The first born of Egypt are slain and not even a beast belonging to Israel is left behind in Egypt. [Ex. 12:29, Ex. 12:30, Ex. 12:38] The heresy of the Cainites rises before me and the once slain viper lifts up its shattered head, destroying not partially as most often hitherto but altogether the mystery of Christ.² This heresy declares that there are some sins which Christ cannot cleanse with His blood, and that the scars left by old transgressions on the body and the soul are sometimes so deep that they cannot be effaced by the remedy which He supplies. What else is this but to say that Christ has died in vain? He has indeed died in vain if there are any whom He cannot make alive. When John the Baptist points to Christ and says: "Behold the lamb of God which taketh away the sins³ of the world" [John. 1:29] he utters a falsehood if after all there are persons living whose sins Christ has not taken away. For either it must be shewn that they are not of the world whom the grace of Christ thus ignores: or, if it be admitted that they are of the world, we have to choose between the horns of a dilemma. Either they have been delivered from their sins, in which case the power of Christ to save all men is proved; or they remain undelivered and as it were still under the charge of misdoing, in which case Christ is proved to be powerless. But far be it from us to believe of the Almighty that He is powerless in aught. For "what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise." [John. 5:19] To ascribe weakness to the Son is to ascribe it to the Father also. The shepherd carries the whole sheep and not only this or that part of it: all the epistles of the apostle⁴ speak continually of the grace of Christ. And, lest a single announcement of this grace might seem a little thing, Peter says: "Grace unto you and peace be multiplied." [1 Pet. 1:2] The Scripture promises abundance; yet we affirm scarcity.

2. To what does all this tend, you ask. I reply; you remember the question that you proposed. It was this. A Spanish bishop named Carterius, old in years and in the priesthood has married two wives, one before he was baptized, and, she having died, another since he has passed through the laver; and you are of opinion that he has violated the precept of the apostle, who in his list of episcopal qualifications commands that a bishop shall be "the husband of one wife." [1 Tim. 3:2] I am surprised that you have pilloried an individual when the whole world is filled with persons ordained in similar circumstances; I do not mean presbyters or clergy of lower rank, but speak only of bishops of whom if I were to enumerate them all one by one I should gather a sufficient number to surpass the crowd which attended the synod of Ariminum.⁵ Still it does not become me to defend one by incriminating many; nor if reason condemns a sin, to make the number of those who commit it an excuse for it. At Rome an eloquent pleader caught me, as the phrase goes, between the horns of a dilemma: whichever way I turned I was held fast. Is it sinful, said he, to marry a wife, or is it not sinful? I in my simplicity, not being wary enough to avoid the snare laid for me, replied that it was not sinful. Then he propounded another question: Is it good deeds which are done away with in baptism or is it evil? Here again my simplicity induced me to say that it was sins which were forgiven. At this point, just as I began to fancy myself secure, the horns of the dilemma commenced to close in on me from this side and from that and their points hidden before began to shew themselves. If, said he, to marry a wife is not sinful, and if baptism forgives sins, all that is not done away with is held over. On the instant a dark mist rose before my eyes as though I had been struck by a strong boxer. Yet recalling the sophism attributed to Chrysippus:⁶ "Whether you lie or whether you speak the truth, in either case you lie," I came to myself again and turned upon my opponent with a dilemma of my own. Pray tell me, I said, does baptism make a new man or does it not? He grudgingly admitted that it did. I pursued my advantage by saying. Does it make him wholly new or only partially so? He replied, Wholly. Then I asked, Is there nothing then of the old man held over in baptism? He assented. Hereupon I propounded the argument; If baptism makes a man new and creates a wholly new being, and if there is nothing of the old man held over in the new, that which once was in the old cannot be imputed to the new. At first my thorny friend held his tongue; afterwards however, making Piso's mistake,⁷ though he had nothing to say he could not remain silent. Sweat stood upon Iris brow, his cheeks turned pale, his lips trembled, his tongue clove to his mouth, his throat became dry; and fear (not age) made him cower. At last he broke out in these words, Have you not read how the apostle permits none to be ordained priest save the husband of one wife, and that what he lays stress upon is the fact of the marriage and not the time at which it is contracted? Now as the fellow had challenged me with syllogisms, and as I saw that he was feeling his way towards some intricate and awkward questions, I proceeded to turn his own weapons against him. I said therefore, Whom did the apostle select for the episcopate, baptized persons or catechumens? He refused to reply. I however made a fresh onslaught repeating my question a second time and a third. You would have taken him for Niobe changed to stone by excessive weeping. I turned to the audience and said: It is all the same to me, good people, whether I bind my opponent awake or sleeping; but it is easier to fetter a man who offers no resistance. If those whom the apostle admits into the ranks of the clergy are not catechumens but the faithful, and if he who is ordained bishop is always one of the faithful, being one of the faithful he cannot have the faults of a catechumen imputed to him. Such were the darts I hurled at my paralysed opponent. Such the quivering spears I cast at him. At last his mouth opened and he vomited forth the contents of his mind. Certainly, he blurted out, that is the doctrine of the apostle Paul.

3. Accordingly I bring out two epistles of the apostle, the first to Timothy, and the second to Titus. In the first is the following passage: "If a man desire the office of a bishop he desireth a good work. A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach, not given to wine, no striker ...but patient, not a brawler, not covetous; one that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity. (For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?) Not a novice lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil. Moreover he must have a good report of them which are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil." [1 Tim. 3:1-7] While immediately at the commencement of the epistle to Titus the following behests are laid down: "For this cause left I thee in Crete that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee: if any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children not accused of riot or unruly. For a bishop must be blameless as the steward of God; not self-willed, not soon angry, not given to wine, no striker, not given to filthy lucre; but a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate; holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers." [Tit. 1:5-9] In both epistles commandment is given that only monogamists should, be chosen for the clerical office whether as bishops or as presbyters.⁸ Indeed with the ancients these names were synonymous, one alluding to the office, the other to the age of the clergy. No one at any rate can doubt that the apostle is speaking only of those who have been baptized. If therefore it in no wise prejudices the case of one who is to be ordained bishop that before his baptism he has not possessed all the requisite qualifications (for it is asked what he is and not what he has been), why should a previous marriage—the one thing which is in itself not sinful—prove a hindrance to his ordination? You argue that as his marriage was not a sin it was not done away with at his baptism. This is news to me indeed, that what in itself was not a sin is to be reckoned as such. All fornication and contamination with open vice, impiety towards God, parricide and incest, the change of the natural use of the sexes into that which is against nature [Cf. Rom. 1:26, Rom. 1:27] and all extraordinary lusts are washed away in the fountain of Christ. Can it be possible that the stains of marriage are indelible, and that harlotry is judged more leniently than honourable wedlock? I do not, Carterius might say, hold you to blame for the hosts of mistresses and the troops of favourites⁹ that you have kept; I do not charge you with your bloodshedding and sow-like wallowings in the mire of uncleanness: yet you are ready to drag from her grave for my confusion my poor wife, who has been dead long years, and whom I married that I might be kept from those sins into which you have fallen. Tell this to the heathen who form the church's harvest with which she stores her granaries; tell this to the catechumens who seek admission to the number of the faithful; tell them, I say, not to contract marriages before their baptism, not to enter upon honourable wedlock, but like the Scots and the Atacotti¹⁰ and the people of Plato's republic¹¹ to have community of wives and no discrimination of children, nay more, to beware of any semblance even of matrimony; lest, after they have come to believe in Christ, He shall tell them that those whom they have had have not been concubines or mistresses but wedded wives.

4. Let every man examine his own conscience and let him deplore the violence he has done to it at every period of his life; and then when he has brought himself to deliver a true judgment on his own former misdeeds, let him give ear to the chiding of Jesus: "Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shall thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye." [Matt. 7:5] Truly like the scribes and pharisees we strain out the gnat and swallow the camel, we pay tithe of mint and anise, and we omit the just judgment which God requires. [Matt. 23:23, Matt. 23:24, RV] What parallel can be drawn between a wife and a prostitute? Is it fair to make a marriage now dissolved by death a ground of accusation, while dissolute living wins for itself a garland of praise? He, had his former wife lived, would not have married another; but as for you, how can you defend the bestial unions you indiscriminately make? Perhaps indeed you will say that you feared to contract marriage lest by so doing you might disqualify yourself for ordination. He took a wife that he might have children by her; you by taking a harlot have lost the hope of children. He withdrew into the privacy of his own chamber when he sought to obey nature and to win God's blessing: "Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth." [Gen. 1:28] You on the contrary outraged public decency in the hot eagerness of your lust. He covered a lawful indulgence beneath a veil of modesty; you pursued an unlawful one shamelessly before the eyes of all. For him it is written "Marriage is honourable and the bed undefiled." while to you the words are read, "but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge," [Heb. 13:4] and "if any man destroyeth the temple of God, him shall God destroy." [1 Cor. 3:17, RV] All iniquities, we are told, are forgiven us at our baptism, and when once we have received God's mercy we need not afterwards dread from Him the severity of a judge. The apostle says: "And such were some of you: but ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." [1 Cor. 6:11] All sins then are forgiven; it is an honest and faithful saying. But I ask you, how comes it that, while your uncleanness is washed away, my cleanness is made unclean? You reply, "No, it is not made unclean, it remains just what it was. Had it been uncleanness, it would have been washed away like mine." I want to know what you mean by this shuffling. Your remarks seem to have no more point in them than the round end of a pestle. Is a thing sin because it is not sin? or is a thing unclean because it is not unclean? The Lord, you say, has not forgiven because He had nothing to forgive; yet because He has not forgiven, that which has not been forgiven still remains.

5. What the true effect of baptism is, and what is the real grace conveyed by water hallowed in Christ, I will presently tell you; meantime I will deal with this argument as it deserves. 'An ill knot,' says the common proverb, 'requires but an ill wedge to split it.' The text quoted by the objector, "a bishop must be the husband of one wife," admits of quite another explanation. The apostle came of the Jews and the primitive Christian church was gathered out of the remnants of Israel. Paul knew that the Law allowed men to have children by several wives, [Ex. 21:10] and was aware that the example of the patriarchs had made polygamy familiar to the people. Even the very priests might at their own discretion enjoy the same license. [Lev. 21:7, Lev. 21:13] He gave commandment therefore that the priests of the church should not claim this liberty, that they should not take two wives or three together, but that they should each have but one wife at one time. Perhaps you may say that this explanation which I have given is disputed; in that case listen to another. You must not have a monopoly of bending the Law to suit your will instead of bending your will to suit the Law. Some by a strained interpretation say that wives are in this passage to be taken for churches and husbands for their bishops. A decree was made by the fathers assembled at the council of Nicaea¹² that no bishop should be translated from one church to another, lest scorning the society of a poor yet virgin see he should seek the embraces of a wealthy and adulterous one. For as the word "λογισμῶν", that is, "disputings," refers to the fault and misdoing of sons in the faith, [Cf. Ph. 2:14, Ph. 2:15] and as the precept concerning the management of a house refers to the right direction of body and of soul, [1 Tim. 3:4] so by the wives of the bishops we are to understand their churches. Concerning whom it is written in Isaiah, "Make haste ye women and come from the show, for it is a people of no understanding." [Isa. 27:11, LXX. AV. follows the Hebrew] And again "Rise up, ye women that are wealthy,¹³ and hear my voice." [Isa. 32:9] And in the Book of Proverbs, "Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her." [Prov. 31:10, Prov. 31:11] In the same book too it is written, "Every wise woman buildeth her house: but the foolish plucketh it down with her hands." [Prov. 14:1] Nor does this, say they, derogate from the dignity of the episcopate; for the same figure is used in relation to God. Jeremiah writes: "As a wife treacherously departeth from her husband, so have ye dealt treacherously with me, O house of Israel." [Jer. 3:20] And the apostle employs the same comparison: "I have espoused you," he says to his converts, "to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ." [2 Cor. 11:2] The word woman is in the Greek ambiguous and should in all these places be understood as meaning wife. You will say that this interpretation is harsh and does violence to the sense. In that case give back to the scripture its simple meaning and save me from the necessity of fighting you on your own ground.¹⁴ I will ask you the following question, Can a man who before his baptism has kept a concubine, and after her death has received baptism and has taken a wife, become a clergyman or not? You will answer me that he can, because his first partner was a concubine and not a wife. What the apostle condemns then, it would seem, is not mere sexual intercourse but marriage contracts and conjugal rights. Many persons, we see, because of narrow circumstances refuse to take upon them the burthen of matrimony. Instead of taking wives they live with their maid-servants and bring up as their own the children which these bear to them. Thus, if through the bounty of the Emperor they gain for their mistresses the right of wearing a matron's robes,¹⁵ they will at once come beneath the yoke of the apostle and sorely against their will will have to receive their partners as their wedded wives. But, if their poverty prevents them from obtaining an imperial rescript such as I have mentioned, the decrees of the Church will vary with the laws of Rome. Be careful therefore not to interpret the words "the husband of one wife," that is, of one woman, as approving indiscriminate intercourse and condemning only contracts of marriage.

I bring forward all these explanations not for the purpose of resisting the true and simple sense of the words in question but to shew you that you must take the holy scriptures as they are written, and that you must not empty of its efficacy the baptismal rite ordained by the Saviour, or render vain the whole mystery of the cross.

6. Let me now fulfil the promise I made a little while ago and with all the skill of a rhetorician sing the praises of water and of baptism. In the beginning the earth was without form and void, there was no dazzling sun or pale moon, there were no glittering stars. There was nothing but matter inorganic and invisible, and even this was lost in abysmal depths and shrouded in a distorting gloom. The Spirit of God above moved, as a charioteer, over the face of the waters, [Gen. 1:2] and produced from them the infant world, a type of the Christian child that is drawn from the laver of baptism. A firmament is constructed between heaven and earth, and to this is allotted the name heaven,-in the Hebrew Shamayim or 'what comes out of the waters,'¹⁶ and the waters which are above the heavens are parted from the others to the praise of God. Wherefore also in the vision of the prophet Ezekiel there is seen above the cherubim a crystal stretched forth, [Ezek. 1:22] that is, the compressed and denser waters. The first living beings come out of the waters; and believers soar out of the layer with wings to heaven. Man is formed out of clay [Gen. 2:7] and God holds the mystic waters in the hollow of his hand.¹⁷ In Eden a garden¹⁸ is planted, and a fountain in the midst of it parts into four heads. [Gen. 2:8, Gen. 2:10] This is the same fountain which Ezekiel later on describes as issuing out of the temple and flowing towards the rising of the sun, until it heals the bitter waters and quickens those that are dead. [Ezek. 47:1, Ezek. 47:8] When the world falls into sin nothing but a flood of waters can cleanse it again. But as soon as the foul bird of wickedness is driven away, the dove of the Holy Spirit comes to Noah [Gen. 8:8, Gen. 8:11] as it came afterwards to Christ in the Jordan, [Matt. 3:16] and, carrying ill its beak a branch betokening restoration and light, brings tidings of peace to the whole world. Pharaoh and his host, loth to allow God's people to leave Egypt, are overwhelmed in the Red Sea figuring thereby our baptism. His destruction is thus described in the book of Psalms: "Thou didst endow the sea with virtue through thy power: thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters: thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces." [Ps. 74:13, 14 LXX] For this reason adders and scorpions haunt dry places [Deut. 8:15] and whenever they come near water behave as if rabid or insane.¹⁹ As wood sweetens Marah so that seventy palm-trees are watered by its streams, so the cross makes the waters of the law lifegiving to the seventy who are Christ's apostles. [Exod. 15:23-27; Luke 10:i] It is Abraham and Isaac who dig wells, the Philistines who try to prevent them. [Gen. 26:15, Gen. 26:18] Beersheba too, the city of the oath, [Gen. 21:31] and [Gihon], the scene of Solomon's coronation, [1 Kings 1:38; 2 Chron. 32:30] derive their names from springs. It is beside a well that Eliezer finds Rebekah. [Gen. 24:15, Gen. 24:16] Rachel too is a drawer of water and wins a kiss thereby [Gen. 29:10, Gen. 29:11] from the supplanter [Gen. 27:36] Jacob. When the daughters of the priests of Midian are in a strait to reach the well, Moses opens a way for them and delivers them from outrage. [Exod. 2:16, Exod. 2:17] The Lord's forerunner at Salem (a name which means peace or perfection) makes ready the people for Christ with spring-water. [John. 3:23] The Saviour Himself does not preach the kingdom of heaven until by His baptismal immersion He has cleansed the Jordan. [Matt. 3:13, Matt. 3:17] Water is the matter of His first miracle²⁰ and it is from a well that the Samaritan woman is bidden to slake her thirst. [John. 4:13, John. 4:14] To Nicodemus He secretly says: "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of God." [John. 3:5] As His earthly course began with water, so it ended with it. His side is pierced by the spear, and blood and water flow forth, twin emblems of baptism and of martyrdom.²¹ After His resurrection also, when sending His apostles to the Gentiles, He commands them to baptize these in the mystery of the Trinity. [Matt. 28:19] The Jewish people repenting of their misdoing are sent forthwith by Peter to be baptized. [Acts 2:38] Before Sion travails she brings forth children, and a nation is born at once. [Isa. 66:7, Isa. 66:8] Paul the persecutor of the church, that ravening wolf out of Benjamin, [Gen. 49:27] bows his head before Ananias one of Christ's sheep, and only recovers his sight when he applies the remedy of baptism.²² By the reading of the prophet the eunuch of Candace the queen of Ethiopia is made ready for the baptism of Christ. [Acts 8:27-38] Though it is against nature the Ethiopian does change his skin and the leopard his spots. [Jer. 13:23] Those who have received only John's baptism and have no knowledge of the Holy Spirit are baptized again, lest any should suppose that water unsanctified thereby could suffice for the salvation of either Jew or Gentile. [Acts 19:1-7] "The voice of the Lord is upon the waters ...The Lord is upon many waters ...the Lord maketh the flood to inhabit it." [Ps. 29:3, Ps. 29:10] His "teeth are like a flock of sheep that are even shorn which came up from the washing; whereof everyone bear twins, and none is barren among them." [Cant. 4:2] If none is barren among them, all of them must have udders filled with milk and be able to say with the apostle: "Ye are my little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you;" [Gal. 4:19] and "I have fed you with milk and not with meat." [1 Cor. 3:2] And it is to the grace of baptism that the prophecy of Micah refers: "He will turn again, he will have compassion upon us: he will subdue our iniquities, and will cast all our sins²³ into the depths of the sea." [Mic. 7:19]

7. How then can you say that all sins are drowned in the baptismal layer if a man's wife is still to swim on the surface as evidence against him? The psalmist says: "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." [Ps. 32:1-2] It would seem that we must add something to this song and say "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputeth not a wife." Let us hear also the declaration which Ezekiel the so called "son of man" [Ezek. 2:1] makes concerning the virtue of him who is to be the true son of man, the Christian: "I will take you," he says, "from among the heathen ... then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean from all your filthiness; a new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit."²⁴ "From all your filthiness" he says, "will I cleanse you." If all is taken away nothing can be left. If filthiness is cleansed, how much more is cleanness kept from defilement. "A new heart also will I give you and a new spirit." Yes, for "in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision but a new nature." [Gal. 6:15] Wherefore the song also which we sing is a new song, [Rev. 14:3] and putting off the old man [Eph. 4:22] we walk not in the oldness of the letter but in the newness of the spirit. [Rom. 7:6] This is the new stone wherein the new name is written, "which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." [Rev. 2:17] "Know ye not," says the apostle, "that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into his death? Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." [Rom. 6:3, Rom. 6:4] Do we read so often of newness and of making new and yet can no renewing efface the stain which the word wife brings with it? We are buried with Christ by baptism and we have risen again by faith in the working of God who hath called Him from the dead. And "when we were dead in our sins and in the uncircumcision of our flesh, God hath quickened us together with Him, having forgiven us all trespasses; blotting out the handwriting of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way nailing it to His cross." [Col. 2:13, Col. 2:14] Can it be that when our whole being is dead with Christ and when all the sins noted down in the old "handwriting" are blotted out, the one word "wife" alone lives on? Time would fail me were I to try to lay before you in order all the passages in the Holy Scriptures which relate to the efficacy of baptism or to explain the mysterious doctrine of that second birth which though it is our second is yet our first in Christ.

8. Before I make an end of dictating (for I perceive that I have already exceeded the just limits of a letter) I wish to give a brief explanation of the previous verses of the epistle in which the apostle describes the life of him that is to be made a bishop. We shall thus recognize him as Doctor of the Nations²⁵ not only for his praise of monogamy but also for all his precepts. At the same time I beg that no one will suppose that in what I write my design is to blacken the priests of the present day. My one object is to promote the interest of the church. Just as orators and philosophers in giving their notions of the perfect orator and the perfect philosopher do not detract from Demosthenes and Plato but merely set forth abstract ideals; so, when I describe a bishop and explain the qualifications laid down for the episcopate, I am but supplying a mirror for priests. Every man's conscience will tell him that it rests with himself what image he will see reflected there, whether one that will grieve him by its deformity or one that will gladden him by its beauty. I turn now to the passage in question. [1 Tim. 3:1-7] "If a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good, work." Work, you see, not rank; toil not pleasure; work that he may increase in lowliness, not grow proud by reason of elevation. "A bishop then must be blameless." The same thing that he says to Titus, "if any be blameless." [Tit. 1:6] All the virtues are comprehended in this one word; thus he seems to require an impossible perfection. For if every sin, even every idle word, is deserving of blame, who is there in this world that is sinless and blameless? Still he who is chosen to be shepherd of the church must be one compared with whom other men are rightly regarded as but a flock of sheep. Rhetoricians define an orator as a good man able to speak. To be worthy of so high an honour he must be blameless in life and lip. For a teacher loses all his influence whose words are rendered null by his deeds. "The husband of one wife." Concerning this requirement I have spoken above. I will now only warn you that If monogamy is insisted on before baptism the other conditions laid down must be insisted on before baptism too. For it is impossible to regard the remaining obligations as binding only on the baptized and this alone as binding also on the unbaptized. "Vigilant (or "temperate" for "νηφάλιος" means both) wise,²⁶ of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach." The priests who minister in God's temple are forbidden to drink wine and strong drink, [Lev. 10:9] to keep their wits from being stupefied with drunkenness and to enable their understanding to do its duty in God's service. By the word 'wise' those are excluded who plead simplicity as an excuse for a priest's folly. For if the brain be not sound, all the members will be amiss. The phrase "of good behaviour" is an extension of the previous epithet "blameless." One who has no faults is called "blameless;" one who is rich in virtues is said to be "of good behaviour." Or the words may be differently explained in accord with Tully's maxim,²⁷ 'the main thing is that what you do you should do gracefully.' For some persons are so ignorant of their own measure [Cf. 2 Cor. 10:14] and so stupid and foolish that they make themselves laughing stocks to those who see them because of their gesture or gait or dress or conversation. Fancying that they knew what is and what is not good taste they deck themselves out with finery and bodily adornments and give banquets which profess to be elegant: but all such attempts at dress and display are nastier than a beggar's rags. As regards the obligation of priests to be teachers we have the precepts of the old Law [Cf. Dt. 17:9-11] and the fuller instructions given on the subject to Titus. [Tit. 1:9-14] For an innocent and unobtrusive conversation does as much harm by its silence as it does good by its example. If the ravaging wolves are to be frightened away it must be by the barking of dogs and by the staff of the shepherd. "Not given to wine, no striker." With the virtues they are to aim at he contrasts the vices they are to avoid.

9. We have learned what we ought to be: let us now learn what priests ought not to be Indulgence in wine is the fault of diners out and revellers. When the body is heated with drink it soon boils over with lust. Wine drinking means self-indulgence, self-indulgence means sensual gratification, sensual gratification means a breach of chastity. He that lives in pleasure is dead while he lives, [Cf. 1 Tim. 5:6] and he that drinks himself drunk is not only dead but buried. One hour's debauch makes Noah uncover his nakedness which through sixty years of sobriety he had kept covered. [Gen. 9:20, Gen. 9:21] Lot in a fit of intoxication unwittingly adds incest to incontinence, and wine overcomes the man whom Sodom failed to conquer. [Gen. 19:30-38] A bishop that is a striker is condemned by Him who gave His back to the smiters, [Isa. 50:6] and when He was reviled reviled not again. [1 Pet. 2:23] "But moderate";²⁸ one good thing is set over against two evil things. Drunkenness and passion are to be held in check by moderation. "Not a brawler, not covetous." Nothing is more overweening than the assurance of the ignorant who fancy that incessant chatter will carry conviction with it and are always ready for a dispute that they may thunder with turgid eloquence against the flock committed to their charge. That a priest must avoid covetousness even Samuel teaches when he proves before all the people that he has taken nothing from any man. [1 Sam. 12:3-5] And the same lesson is taught by the poverty of the apostles who used to receive sustenance and refreshment from their brethren and to boast that they neither had nor wished to have anything besides food and raiment. [Cf. 1 Tim. 6:8] What the epistle to Timothy calls covetousness, that to Titus openly censures as the desire for filthy lucre. [Tit. 1:7] "One that ruleth well his own house." Not by increasing riches, not by providing regal banquets, not by having a pile of finely-wrought plates, not by slowly steaming pheasants so that the heat may reach the bones without melting the flesh upon them; no, but by first requiring of his own household the conduct which he has to inculcate in others. "Having his children in subjection with all gravity." They must not, that is, follow the example of the sons of Eli who lay with the women in the vestibule of the Temple and, supposing religion to consist in plunder, diverted to the gratification of their own appetites all the best parts of the victims. [1 Sam. 2:12-17, 1 Sam. 2:22] "Not a novice lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil." I cannot sufficiently express my amazement at the great blindness which makes men discuss such questions as that of marriage before baptism and causes them to charge people with a transaction which is dead in baptism, nay even quickened into a new life with Christ, while no one regards a commandment so clear and unmistakable as this about bishops not being novices. One who was yesterday a catechumen is to-day a bishop²⁹; one who was yesterday in the amphitheatre is to-day in the church; one who spent the evening in the circus stands in the morning at the altar: one who a little while ago was a patron of actors is now a dedicator of virgins. Was the apostle ignorant of our shifts and subterfuges? did he know nothing of our foolish arguments? He not only says that a bishop must be the husband of one wife, but he has given commandment that he must be blameless, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach, moderate,³⁰ not given to wine, no striker, not a brawler, not covetous, not a novice. Yet to all these requirements we shut our eyes and notice nothing but the wives of the aspirants. Who cannot give instances to shew the need of the warning: "lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil?" A priest³¹ who is made such in a moment knows nothing of the lowliness and meekness which mark the meanest of the faithful, he knows nothing of Christian courtesy, he is not wise enough to think little of himself. He passes from one dignity to another, yet he has not fasted, he has not wept, he has not taken himself to task for his life, he has not striven by constant meditation to amend it, he has not given his substance to the poor. Yet he is moved from one see³² to another, he passes, that is, from pride to pride. There can be no doubt that arrogance is what the Apostle means when he speaks of the condemnation and downfall of the devil. And all men fall into this who are in a moment made masters, actually before they are disciples. "Moreover he must have a good report of them which are without." The last requirement is like the first. One who is really "blameless" obtains the unanimous approval not only of his own household but of outsiders as well. By aliens and persons outside the church we are to understand Jews, heretics and Gentiles. A Christian bishop then must be such that they who cavil at his religion may not venture to cavil at his life. At present however we see but too many bishops who are willing, like the charioteers in the horse races, to bid money for the popular applause; while there are some so universally hated that they can wring no money from their people, a feat which clowns accomplish by means of a few gestures.

10. Such are the conditions, son Oceanus, which the master-teachers of the church ought with anxiety and fear to require of others and to observe themselves. Such too are the canons which they should follow in the choice of persons for the priesthood; for they must not interpret the law of Christ to suit private animosities and feuds or to gratify ill-feeling which is sure to recoil on the man who cherishes it. Consider how unimpeachable is the character of Carterius in whose life his ill-wishers can find nothing to censure except a marriage contracted before baptism. "He that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. If we commit no adultery yet if we kill, we are become transgressors of the law." [Jas. 2:11] "Whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." [Jas. 2:10] Accordingly when they cast in our teeth a marriage entered into before baptism, we must require of them compliance with all the precepts which are given to the baptized. For they pass over much that is not allowable while they censure much that is allowed.

1: AV. `unbelief. 0 2: The Cainites appear to have denied the efficacy of the atonement

3:

AV. `sin. 0

4:

i.e. Paul

5:

This synod held in 359 a.d. was attended by about 450 bishops. It put forth an Arian formula which caused general consternation. "The whole world," says Jerome, "groaned and was astonished to find itself Arian.

6: See note on Letter 61. 3 7: Cf. Cic. In Pis. 1 8: Rendered `elders 0' in AV

9: Exoleti 10: A Scottish tribe, cannibals according to Jerome (Against Jov. 2:7.

11:

Bk. 5. 457

12: Canon 15 13: AV. that are at ease 14: i.e. that of strained interpretations 15: V. Dict. Ant. s. 5:stola and cf. Cic. Phil. 2:18, 44 16: It is hardly necessary to remark that this derivation is purely fanciful and has no foundation in fact 17: Query a reference to Isa. 40:12, the Latin is obscure 18: Paradisus 19: udrofobouj et lymphaticos faciunt 20: The turning of the water into wine at Cana (John. 2:1, John. 2:11) 21: John. 19:34 - Jerome here follows Tertullian and Cyril of Jerusalem 22: Acts 9:17, Acts 9:18. Comp. Letter LX. 8 23: AV. "though wilt cast all their sins.

24: Ezek. 36:24-26. AV. punctuates differently 25: Doctor Gentium 26: AV. `sober. 0 27: Cic. de Or. i 29 28: AV. `patient. 0 29: The case of Ambrose 30: AV. `patient. 0 31: Sacerdos: as usual a bishop is meant 32: Lit. `chair. 0

Letters - letter_070

Letter 70. Tomagnus an Orator of Rome.

Jerome thanks Magnus. a Roman orator, for his services in bringing a young man named Sebesius to apologize to him for some fault that he had committed. He then replies to a criticism of Magnus on his fondness, for making quotations from profane writers, a practice which he defends by the example of the fathers of the church and of the inspired penmen of scripture. He ends by hinting that the objection really comes not from Magnus himself but from Rufinus (here nicknamed Calpurnius Lanarius). The date of the letter is 397 a.d.

1. That our friend Sebesius has profited by your advice I have learned less from your letter than from his own penitence. And strange to say the pleasure which he has given me since his rebuke is greater than the pain he caused me from his previous waywardness. There has been indeed a conflict between indulgence in the father, and affection in the son; while the former is anxious to forget the past, the latter is eager to promise dutiful behaviour in the future. Accordingly you and I must equally rejoice, you because you have successfully put a pupil to the test, I because I have received a son again.

2. You ask me at the close of your letter why it is that sometimes in my writings I quote examples from secular literature and thus defile the whiteness of the church with the foulness of heathenism. I will now briefly answer your question. You would never have asked it, had not your mind been wholly taken up with Tully; you would never have asked it had you made it a practice instead of studying Volcatius¹ to read the holy scriptures and the commentators upon them. For who is there who does not know that both in Moses and in the prophets there are passages cited from Gentile books and that Solomon proposed questions to the philosophers of Tyre and answered others put to him by them.² In the commencement of the book of Proverbs he charges us to understand prudent maxims and shrewd adages, parables and obscure discourse, the words of the wise and their dark sayings; [Prov. 1:1-6] all of which belong by right to the sphere of the dialectician and the philosopher. The Apostle Paul also, in writing to Titus, has used a line of the poet Epimenides: "The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies." [Tit. 1:12] Half of which line was afterwards adopted by Callimachus. It is not surprising that a literal rendering of the words into Latin should fail to preserve the metre, seeing that Homer when translated into the same language is scarcely intelligible even in prose. In another epistle Paul quotes a line of Menander: "Evil communications corrupt good manners." [1 Cor. 15:33] And when he is arguing with the Athenians upon the Areopagus he calls Aratus as a witness citing from him the words "For we are also his offspring;" [Acts 17:28] in Greek "το■ γ■ρ κα■ γ■νος ■σμεν", the close of a heroic verse. And as if this were not enough, that leader of the Christian army, that unvanquished pleader for the cause of Christ, skilfully turns a chance inscription into a proof of the faith. [Acts 17:22] For he had learned from the true David to wrench the sword of the enemy out of his hand and with his own blade to cut off the head of the arrogant Goliath. [Cf. 1 Sam. 17:50, 1 Sam. 17:51] He had read in Deuteronomy the command given by the voice of the Lord that when a captive woman had had her head shaved, her eyebrows and all her hair cut off, and her nails pared, she might then be taken to wife. [Deut. 21:10-13] Is it surprising that I too, admiring the fairness of her form and the grace of her eloquence, desire to make that secular wisdom which is my captive and my handmaid, a matron of the true Israel? Or that shaving off and cutting away all in her that is dead whether this be idolatry, pleasure, error, or lust, I take her to myself clean and pure and beget by her servants for the Lord of Sabaoth? My efforts promote the advantage of Christ's family, my so-called defilement with an alien increases the number of my fellow-servants. Hosea took a wife of whoredoms, Gomer the daughter of Diblaim, and this harlot bore him a son called Jezreel or the seed of God. [Hos. 1:2-4] Isaiah speaks of a sharp razor which shaves "the head of sinners and the hair of their feet;" [Isa. 7:20] and Ezekiel shaves his head as a type of that Jerusalem which has been an harlot, [Ezek. 5:1-5] in sign that whatever in her is devoid of sense and life must be removed.

3. Cyprian, a man renowned both for his eloquence and for his martyr's death, was as-sailed-so Firmian tells us³ -for having used in his treatise against Demetrius passages from the Prophets and the Apostles which the latter declared to be fabricated and made up, instead of passages from the philosophers and poets whose authority he, as a heathen, could not well gainsay. Celsus⁴ and Porphyry⁵ have written against us and have been ably answered, the former by Origen, the latter by Methodius, Eusebius, and Apollinaris.⁶ Origen wrote a treatise in eight books, the work of Methodius⁷ extended to ten thousand lines while Eusebius⁸ and Apollinaris⁹ composed twenty-five and thirty volumes respectively. Read these and you will find that compared with them I am a mere tyro in learning, and that, as my wits have long lain fallow, I can barely recall as in a dream what I have learned as a boy. The emperor Julian¹⁰ found time during his Parthian campaign to vomit forth seven books against Christ and, as so often happens in poetic legends, only wounded himself with his own sword. Were I to try to confute him with the doctrines of philosophers and stoics you would doubtless forbid me to strike a mad dog with the club of Hercules. It is true that he presently felt in battle the hand of our Nazarene or, as he used to call him, the Galilaean,¹¹ and that a spear-thrust in the vitals paid him due recompense for his foul calumnies. To prove the antiquity of the Jewish people Josephus¹² has written two books against Appio a grammarian of Alexandria; and in these he brings forward so many quotations from secular writers as to make me marvel how a Hebrew brought up from his childhood to read the sacred scriptures could also have perused the whole library of the Greeks. Need I speak of Philo¹³ whom critics call the second or the Jewish Plato?

4. Let me now run through the list of our own writers. Did not Quadratus¹⁴ a disciple of the apostles and bishop of the Athenian church deliver to the Emperor Hadrian (on the occasion of his visit to the Eleusinian mysteries) a treatise in defence of our religion. And so great was the admiration caused in everyone by his eminent ability that it stilled a most severe persecution. The philosopher Aristides,¹⁵ a man of great eloquence, presented to the same Emperor an apology for the Christians composed of extracts from philosophic writers. His example was afterwards followed by Justin¹⁶ another philosopher who delivered to Antoninus Plus and his sons¹⁷ and to the senate a treatise Against the Gentiles, in which he defended the ignominy of the cross and preached the resurrection of Christ with all freedom. Need I speak of Melito¹⁸ bishop of Sardis, of Apollinaris¹⁹ chief-priest of the Church of Hierapolis, of Dionysius²⁰ bishop of the Corinthians, of Tatian,²¹ of Bardesanes,²² of Irenaeus²³ successor to the martyr Pothinus;²⁴ all of whom have in many volumes explained the uprisings of the several heresies and tracked them back, each to the philosophic source from which it flows. Pantaenus,²⁵ a philosopher of the Stoic school, was on account of his great reputation for learning sent by Demetrius bishop of Alexandria to India, to preach Christ to the Brahmans and philosophers there. Clement,²⁶ a presbyter of Alexandria, in my judgment the most learned of men, wrote eight books of Miscellanies²⁷ and as many of Outline Sketches,²⁸ a treatise against the Gentiles, and three volumes called the Pedagogue. Is there any want of learning in these, or are they not rather drawn from the very heart of philosophy? Imitating his example Origen²⁹ wrote ten books of Miscellanies, in which he compares together the opinions held respectively by Christians and by philosophers, and confirms all the dogmas of our religion by quotations from Plato and Aristotle, from Numenius³⁰ and Cornutus.³¹ Miltiades³² also wrote an excellent treatise against the Gentiles. Moreover Hippolytus³³ and a Roman senator named Apollonius³⁴ have each compiled apologetic works. The books of Julius Africanus³⁵ who wrote a history of his own times are still extant, as also are those of Theodore who was afterwards called Gregory,³⁶ a man endowed with apostolic miracles as well as with apostolic virtues. We still have the works of Dionysius³⁷ bishop of Alexandria, of Anatolius³⁸ chief priest of the church of Laodicea, of the presbyters Pamphilus,³⁹ Pierius,⁴⁰ Lucian,⁴¹ Malchion;⁴² of Eusebius⁴³ bishop of Caesarea, Eustathius⁴⁴ of Antioch and Athanasius⁴⁵ of Alexandria; of Eusebius⁴⁶ of Emesa, of Triphyllius⁴⁷ of Cyprus, of Asterius⁴⁸ of Scythopolis, of the confessor Serapion,⁴⁹ of Titus⁵⁰ bishop of Bostra; and of the Cappadocians Basil,⁵¹ Gregory,⁵² and Amphilochius.⁵³ All these writers so frequently interweave in their books the doctrines and maxims of the philosophers that you might easily be at a loss which to admire most, their secular erudition or their knowledge of the scriptures.

5. I will pass on to Latin writers. Can anything be more learned or more pointed than the style of Tertullian?⁵⁴ His Apology and his books Against the Gentiles contain all the wisdom of the world. Minucius Felix⁵⁵ a pleader in the Roman courts has ransacked all heathen literature to adorn the pages of his Octavius and of his treatise Against the astrologers (unless indeed this latter is falsely ascribed to him). Arnobius⁵⁶ has published seven books against the Gentiles, and his pupil Lactantius⁵⁷ as many, besides two volumes, one on Anger and the other on the creative activity of God. If you read any of these you will find in them an epitome of Cicero's dialogues. The Martyr Victorinus⁵⁸ though as a writer deficient in learning is not deficient in the wish to use what learning he has. Then there is Cyprian.⁵⁹ With what terseness, with what knowledge of all history, with what splendid rhetoric and argument has he touched the theme that idols are no Gods! Hilary⁶⁰ too, a confessor and bishop of my own day, has imitated Quintilian's twelvebooks both in number and in style, and has also shewn his ability as a writer in his short treatise against Dioscorus the physician. In the reign of Constantine the presbyter Juvenius⁶¹ set forth in verse the story of our Lord and Saviour, and did not shrink from forcing into metre the majestic phrases of the Gospel. Of other writers dead and living I say nothing. Their aim and their ability are evident to all who read them.⁶²

6. You must not adopt the mistaken opinion, that while in dealing with the Gentiles one may appeal to their literature in all other discussions one ought to ignore it; for almost all the books of all these writers-except those who like Epicurus⁶³ are no scholars-are extremely full of erudition and philosophy. I incline indeed to fancy-the thought comes into my head as I dictate-that you yourself know quite well what has always been the practice of the learned in this matter. I believe that in putting this question to me you are only the mouthpiece of another who by reason of his love for the histories of Sallust might well be called Calpurnius Lanarius.⁶⁴ Please beg of him not to envy eaters their teeth because he is toothless himself, and not to make light of the eyes of gazelles because he is himself a mole. Here as you see there is abundant material for discussion, but I have already filled the limits at my disposal.

1: Either a teacher of civil law mentioned by Pliny (viii. 40), or else one of the writers of the Augustan History 2: The authority for this is Josephus 3: i.e. Lactantius, vide Inst. 5:4

4: The author of a polemical treatise against Christianity, fragments of which still persuaded in Origen's reply. He was a Platonist 5: A neoplatonist writer who flourished in the third century 6: See note on Letter 48 7: Contemporary with Eusebius the historian. His Symposium still extant proves him to have been a warm admirer of Plato

8: The learned bishop of Caesarea (a.d. 260-340). His Church History and other works are translated or described in Vol. 1: of this series 9: Probably the learned Bishop of Laodicea, whose views were condemned at Constantinople in 381

10: Julian was emperor from a.d. 261 to a.d. 263. He reverted from Christianity to paganism and did all in his power to harass the Church 11: According to Theodoret (H. E. 3:25) Julian's last words were "Though hast conquered, O Galilaean.

12: A Jew born at Jerusalem a.d. 37. His historical works, still extant, are of great value 13: See note on Letter 22

14:

The author of an apology for the Christians presented to the Emperor Hadrian. Only small fragments of the work are now extant. See for him and Aristides Jerome's Book on Famous Men, in Vol. 3: of this series, 100:xix. xx

15:

Another Athenian apologist contemporary with Quadratus. His Apology has lately been published. Cambridge, Eng., 1891

16: Commonly called Justin Martyr. Born in Samaria of Greek parents, he is said to have undergone martyrdom at Rome. Fl. a.d. 140-150 17: Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus 18: Fl. a.d. 170. He composed an Apology addressed to the Emperor Marcus Aurelius

19: A highly esteemed writer, from 171 a.d. onwards, who wrote many treatises, amongst which were an apology addressed to Marcus Aurelius, and several works against Montanism 20: Fl. a.d. 171, the writer of several pastoral letters to other churches famous in their day but no longer extant 21: See note on Letter XLVIII

22:

Born at Edessa 100:155 a.d. died 223 a.d. A mystical theologian of a gnostic type who held a high position at the court of the Abgars. His writings have perished

23: Bishop of Lyons in the latter half of the second century. He was a native of Asia Minor and his younger days had known Polycarp 24: Bishop of Lyons, suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius

25: A convert from stoicism to Christianity in the latter part of the second century who as the head of the catechetical school at Alexandria was the instructor of Clement 26: Head of the catechetical school at Alexandria a.d. 190-203

27:

strwmateij

28:

upotupwseij

29: See Letter 33. Of Origen's Miscellanies only a few fragments remain. `They appear to have discussed various topics in the light of ancient philosophy and scripture. O'-Westcott 30: A neoplatonic and neopythagorean philosopher who flourished in the age of the Antonines

31: A Stoic philosopher, the friend and teacher of the poet Persius. Having criticised Nero's literary style too freely he was banished by that emperor 32: An active Christian writer of the reign of Commodus 33: Fl. a.d. 200-225, the first antipope. His Refutation of All Heresies is of great interest and value 34: Fl. a.d. 186. accused of being a Christian, he delivered in the senate an apology for the faith

35:

A writer of the third century who compiled a Chronicle of the world's history from the creation to his own day. It has long since perished

36: Surnamed Thaumaturgus or Wonderworker. One of Origen's pupils, he wrote a Panegyric (extant) on his master. Fl. 233-270 37: Head of the catechetical school, and afterwards bishop, of Alexandria. He died a.d. 265 38: Trained in the school of Alexandria and praised by Eusebius for his great learning 39: The intimate friend of Eusebius of Caesarea and founder of the famous library in that city 40: See note on Letter 48 41: A presbyter of Antioch and apparently a pupil of Malchion. He suffered martyrdom at Nicomedia a.d. 311 42: A presbyter of Antioch in the reign of Aurelian. He took part in the proceedings against Paul of Samosata 43: See note on above 44: Bishop of Antioch at the time of the Nicene Council. One of the earliest and most vigorous opponents of Arianism

45:

Bishop of Alexandria from a.d. 326 to a.d. 373. The great champion of the diversity of Christ against Arius and the followers

46: Flor. a.d. 341-359. After studying at Alexandria he lived for some time at Antioch where he took part in an Arian council 47: A famous lawyer of Berytus converted to Christianity by Spyridon a bishop in Cyprus 48: Bishop of Amasea in Pontus, a constant student of Demosthenes and himself no mean orator 49: An Egyptian bishop the friend of Antony and Athanasius. Some of his writings are still extant 50: This bishop is best known through the Emperor Julian's vain attempt to expel him from his see 51: a.d. 329-379. Bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia and a strenuous champion of orthodoxy. His works are still extant 52: Gregory of Nazianzus. Bishop of Sasima and for a short time of Constantinople (a.d. 379-381) 53: Flor. a.d. 350-400. Archbishop of Iconium. A friend of Basil and of Gregory Nazianzen 54: An African writer who in his last days became a Montanist. Flor. a.d. 175-225 55: A Roman lawyer of the second century. His Apology-a Dialogue entitled Octavius-is extant

56: Fl. a.d. 300. A professor of rhetoric at Sicca in Africa and a heathen. He composed his apology to prove the reality of his conversion 57: An African rhetorician and apologist of the fourth century. His works are extant

58: A celebrated man of letters at Rome in the middle of the fourth century, the story of whose conversion is told in Augustine's Confessions (viii. 2-5) 59: Bishop of Carthage. He suffered martyrdom a.d. 358. His works are extant 60: Bishop of Poitiers (died a.d. 368). A champion of the orthodox faith against Arianism

61:

A Spanish Christian of the fourth century. His "Story of the Gospels," a life of Christ in hexameter verse, still exists

62: For most of the writers mentioned in this section see also Jerome's Book of Famous Men translated in Vol. 3: of this series 63: For an account of Epicurus see Letter V. note. He professed to have read but little

64:

That Rufinus is the person meant is plain from a reference made to this passage in Apol. adv. Rufinum, 1:30 and also from Letter CII. Jerome is however mistaken in connecting this Calpurnius with Sallust. He is mentioned by Plutarch as a treacherous friend. Sallust does mention a certain Calpurinus Bestia, and Jerome has probably confounded the two

Letters - letter_071

Letter 71. To Lucinius.

Lucinius was a wealthy Spaniard of Btica who in conformity with the ascetic ideas of his time had made a vow of continence with his wife Theodora. Being much interested in the study of scripture he proposed to visit Bethlehem, and in a.d. 397 sent several scribes thither to transcribe for him Jerome's principal writings. To these on their return home Jerome now entrusts the following letter. In it he encourages Lucinius to fulfil his purpose of coming to Bethlehem, describes the books Which he is sending to him, and answers two questions relating to ecclesiastical usage. He also sends him some trilling presents.

Shortly after receiving the letter (written in 398 a.d.) Lucinius died and Jerome wrote to Theodora to console her for her loss (letter LXXV.

1. Your letter which has suddenly arrived was not expected by me, and coming in an unlooked for way it has helped to rouse me from my torpor by the glad tidings which it conveys. I hasten to embrace with the arms of love one whom my eyes have never seen, and silently say to myself:—"oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I flee away and be at rest." [Ps. 55:6. PBV] Then would I find him "whom my soul loveth." [Cant. 3:1] In you the Lord's words are now truly fulfilled: "many shall come from the east and west and shall sit down with Abraham." [Matt. 8:11] In those days the faith of my Lucinius was foreshadowed in Cornelius, "centurion of the band called the Italian band." [Acts 10:1] And when the apostle Paul writes to the Romans: "whensoever I take my journey into Spain I will come to you: for I trust to see you in my journey, and to be brought on my way thitherward by you;" [Rom. 15:24] he shews by the tale of his previous successes what he looked to gain from that province.¹ Laying in a short time the foundation of the gospel "from Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum," [Rom. 15:19] he enters Rome in bonds, that he may free those who are in the bonds of error and superstition. Two years he dwells in his own hired house [Acts 28:30] that he may give to us the house eternal which is spoken of in both the testaments.² The apostle, the fisher of men, [Matt. 4:19] has cast forth his net, and, among countless kinds of fish, has landed you like a magnificent gilt-bream. You have left behind you the bitter waves, the salt tides, the mountain-fissures; you have despised Leviathan who reigns in the waters. [Cf. Ps. 104:26] Your aim is to seek the wilderness with Jesus and to sing the prophet's song: "my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land where no water is; to see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary." [Ps. 63:1, Ps. 63:2] or, as he sings in another place, "lo, then would I wander far off and remain in the wilderness. I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest." [Ps. 55:7, Ps. 55:8] Since you have left Sodom and are hastening to the mountains, I beseech you with a father's affection not to look behind you. Your hands have grasped the handle of the plough, [Luke 9:62] the hem of the Saviour's garment, [Matt. 9:20] and His locks wet with the dew of night; [Cant. 5:2] do not let them go. Do not come down from the housetop of virtue to seek for the clothes which you wore of old, nor return home from the field. [Matt. 24:17, Matt. 24:18] Do not like Lot set your heart on the plain or upon the pleasant gardens; [Gen. 13:10] for these are watered not, as the holy land, from heaven but by Jordan's muddy stream made salt by contact with the Dead Sea.

2. Many begin but few persevere to the end. "They which run in a race run all, but one receiveth the crown."³ But of us on the other hand it is said: "So run that ye may obtain." [1 Cor. 9:24] Our master of the games is not grudging; he does not give the palm to one and disgrace another. His wish is that all his athletes may alike win garlands. My soul rejoices, yet the very greatness of my joy makes me feel sad. Like Ruth [Ruth 1:14] when I try to speak I burst into tears. Zacchus, the convert of an hour, is accounted worthy to receive the Saviour as his guest. [Luke 19:5] Martha and Mary make ready a feast and then welcome the Lord to it. [John. 12:2] A harlot washes His feet with her tears and against His burial anoints His body with the ointment of good works. [Mark 14:8] Simon the leper invites the Master with His disciples and is not refused. [Matt. 26:6] To Abraham it is said: "Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee." [Gen. 12:1] He leaves Chaldaea, he leaves Mesopotamia; he seeks what he knows not, not to lose Him whom he has found. He does not deem it possible to keep both his country and his Lord; even at that early day he is already fulfilling the prophet David's words: "I am a stranger with thee and a sojourner, as all my fathers were." [Ps. 39:12] He is called "a Hebrew," in Greek "περπατης", a passer-over, for not content with present excellence but forgetting those things which are behind he reaches forth to that which is before. [Phil. 3:13] He makes his own the words of the psalmist: "they shall go from strength to strength." [Ps. 84:7] Thus his name has a mystic meaning and he has opened for you a way to seek not your own things but those of another. You too must leave your home as he did, and must take for your parents, brothers, and relations only those who are linked to you in Christ. "Whosoever," He says, "shall do the will of my father ...the same is my brother and sister and mother." [Matt. 12:50]

3. You have with you one who was once your partner in the flesh but is now your partner in the spirit; once your wife but now your sister; once a woman but now a man; once an inferior but now an equal.⁴ Under the same yoke as you she hastens toward the same heavenly kingdom. A too careful management of one's income, a too near calculation of one's expenses-these are habits not easily laid aside. Yet to escape the Egyptian woman Joseph had to leave his garment with her. [Gen. 39:12] And the young man who followed Jesus having a linen cloth cast about him, when he was assailed by the servants had to throw away his earthly covering and to flee naked. [Mark 14:51, Mark 14:52] Elijah also when he was carried up in a chariot of fire to heaven left his mantle of sheepskin on earth. [2 Kings 2:11, 2 Kings 2:13] Elisha used for sacrifice the oxen and the yokes which hitherto he had employed in his work. [1 Kings 19:21] We read in Ecclesiasticus: "he that toucheth pitch shall be defiled therewith." [Ecclus. 13:1] As long as we are occupied with the things of the world, as long as our soul is fettered with possessions and revenues, we cannot think freely of God. "For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" [2 Cor. 6:14, 2 Cor. 6:15] "Ye cannot," the Lord says, "serve God and Mammon." [Matt. 6:24] Now the laying aside of money is for those who are beginners in the way, not for those who are made perfect. Heathens like Antisthenes⁵ and Crates⁶ the Theban have done as much before now. But to offer one's self to God, this is the mark of Christians and apostles. These like the widow out of their penury cast their two mites into the treasury, and giving all that they have to the Lord are counted worthy to hear his words: "ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." [Matt. 19:28]

4. You can see for yourself why I mention these things; without expressly saying it I am inviting you to take up your abode at the holy places. Your abundance has supported the want of many that some day their riches may abound to supply your want; [2 Cor. 8:14] you have made to yourself "friends of the mammon of unrighteousness that they may receive you into everlasting habitations." [Luke 16:9] Such conduct deserves praise and merits to be compared with the virtue of apostolic times. Then, as you know, believers sold their possessions and brought the prices of them and laid them down at the apostles' feet: [Acts 4:34, Acts 4:35] a symbolic act designed to shew that men must trample on covetousness. But the Lord yearns for believers' souls more than for their riches. We read in the Proverbs: "the ransom of a man's soul are his own riches." [Prov. 13:8, LXX] We may, indeed, take a man's own riches to be those which do not come from some one else, or from plunder; according to the precept: "honour God with thy just labours." [Prov. 3:9, LXX] But the sense is better if we understand a man's "own riches" to be those hidden treasures which no thief can steal and no robber wrest from him. [Cf. Matt. 6:20]

5. As for my poor works which from no merits of theirs but simply from your own kindness you say that you desire to have; I have given them to your servants to transcribe, I have seen the paper-copies made by them, and I have repeatedly ordered them to correct them by a diligent comparison with the originals. For so many are the pilgrims passing to and fro that I have been unable to read so many volumes. They have found me also troubled by a long illness from which this Lent I am slowly recovering as they are leaving me. If then you find errors or omissions which interfere with the sense, these you must impute not to me but to your own servants; they are due to the ignorance or carelessness of the copyists, who write down not what they find but what they take to be the meaning, and do but expose their own mistakes when they try to correct those of others. It is a false rumour which has reached you to the effect that I have translated the books of Josephus⁷ and the volumes of the holy men Papias⁸ and Polycarp.⁹ I have neither the leisure nor the ability to preserve the charm of these masterpieces in another tongue. Of Origen¹⁰ and Didymus¹¹ I have translated a few things, to set before my countrymen some specimens of Greek teaching. The canon of the Hebrew verity¹² -except the octateuch¹³ which I have at present in hand-I have placed at the disposal of your slaves and copyists. Doubtless you already possess the version from the septuagint¹⁴ which many years ago I diligently revised for the use of students. The new testament I have restored to the authoritative form of the Greek original.¹⁵ For as the true text of the old testament can only be tested by a reference to the Hebrew, so the true text of the new requires for its decision an appeal to the Greek.

6. You ask me whether you ought to fast on the Sabbath¹⁶ and to receive the eucharist daily according to the custom-as currently reported-of the churches of Rome and Spain.¹⁷ Both these points have been treated by the eloquent Hippolytus,¹⁸ and several writers have collected passages from different authors bearing upon them. The best advice that I can give you is this. Church-traditions-especially when they do not run counter to the faith-are to be observed in the form in which previous generations have handed them down; and the use of one church is not to be annulled because it is contrary to that of another.¹⁹ As regards fasting, I wish that we could practise it without intermission as-according to the Acts of the Apostles²⁰ -Paul did and the believers with him even in the season of Pentecost and on the Lord's Day. They are not to be accused of manichism, for carnal food ought not to be preferred before spiritual. As regards the holy eucharist you may receive it at all times²¹ without qualm of conscience or disapproval from me. You may listen to the psalmist's words: "O taste and see that the Lord is good;" [Ps. 34:8] you may sing as he does: "my heart poureth forth a good word." [Ps. 45:1, Vulg] But do not mistake my meaning. You are not to fast on feast-days, neither are you to abstain on the week days in Pentecost.²² In such matters each province may follow its own inclinations, and the traditions which have been handed down should be regarded as apostolic laws.

7. You send me two small cloaks and a sheepskin mantle from your wardrobe and ask me to wear them myself or to give them to the poor. In return I send to you and your sister²³ in the Lord four small haircloths suitable to your religious profession and to your daily needs, for they are the mark of poverty and the outward witness of a continual penitence. To these I have added a manuscript containing Isaiah's ten most obscure visions which I have lately elucidated with a critical commentary. When you look upon these trifles call to mind the friend in whom you delight and hasten the voyage which you have for a time deferred. And because "the way of man is not in himself" but it is the Lord that "directeth his steps;" [Jer. 10:23] if any hindrance should interfere-I hope none may-to prevent you from coming, I pray that distance may not sever those united in affection and that I may find my Lucinius present in absence through an interchange of letters.

1:

Italy

2: Utriusque instrumenti aeternam domum. The 'twofold record 0' is that of the old and new testaments both of which speak of the church under the figure of a house. For the term "instrument" see note on Lette 3: Jerome quoting from memory substitutes 'crown 0' for 'prize. 0 4: His wife Theodora 5: A disciple of Socrates, subsequently the founder of the Cynic School. Fl. 366 b.c 6: See note on Letter 66 7: See note on Letter 22

8:

A writer of the sub-apostolic age who had been a disciple of the apostle John. He was bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia

9: Another sub-apostolic writer who was also a disciple of John. He became bishop of Smyrna and underwent martyrdom at the age of 86 10: See note on Letter 33 11: The blind theologian of Alexandria by whose teaching Jerome had himself profited. See Letter 34 12: The old testament as translated direct from the Hebrew 13: The first eight books 14: This work Jerome accomplished between the years 383 and 390 a.d. Only the Psalter and Job are extant 15: This task he undertook at the request of pope Damasus in 383 a.d. See Letter 27 16: i.e. on Saturday

17:

At this time the communion was celebrated daily at Constantinople, in Africa, and in Spain. At Rome it was celebrated on every day of the week except Saturday (the Sabbath). See Socrates, H.E. 5:22

18: A leading Roman churchman, bishop of Portus, in the early part of the third century, the rival and enemy of pope Callistus and author of many theological treatises, one of which-the Refutation of all Heresies-has recently become famous 19: Compare the similar advice given by Gregory the Great to Augustine of Canterbury (Bede, H. E. 1. 27) 20: Nothing in the book of Acts bears out this statement. Fasting at the times mentioned was forbidden in Jerome's day 21: Daily if you will and on fast days as well as on feast days 22: i.e. the period of fifty days between Easterday and Whitsunday. See Letter XLI 23: i.e. his wife Theodora

Letters - letter_072

Letter 72. To Vitalis.

Vitalis had asked Jerome "Is Scripture credible when it tells us that Solomon and Ahaz became fathers at the age of eleven?" The difficulty had previously occurred to Jerome himself (Letter 36. 10, whence perhaps Vitalis took it) and in this letter he suggests several ways in which it may be met. He is quite prepared, if necessary, to accept the alleged fact on the grounds that "there are many things in Scripture which sound incredible and yet are true" and that "nature cannot resist the Lord of nature" (§2). He is disposed, however, to regard the question as trivial and of no importance. The date of the letter is 398 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. Zenon the sailor, through whom you say letters of your sanctity were transmitted to me, delivered only a short and brief letter from the blessed Pope Amabilis, containing the usual gifts. And I am quite surprised as to what could be the reason that, although he had been faithful in conveying your blessings as well as those of the Pope, he is found to be negligent in delivering the letter. For, I do not think that you can be deceived, a disciple of truth, unless perhaps the Latin language has strayed among the Greek man's papers. Therefore, I am replying to the second letter, which was brought to me by my holy son, Heraclius the deacon, in which, among other things, you beg me to explain to you the reasons why Solomon and Ahaz, being only eleven years old, are said to have begotten sons. For if Solomon received the empire over Israel in the twelfth year, and reigned in Jerusalem forty years; and his son Roboam, when he was in the fortieth year of his age, succeeded him in the kingdom, it is clear that Solomon was either eleven or ten years old, because his mother claims that she carried him in her womb for ten months from conception to birth. Again, when Ahaz, the son of Joathan, was twenty years old, he was made king over two tribes, that is, Judah and Benjamin (4 Kings 16), and he reigned sixteen years (2 Chronicles 28): upon his death, when Ezechias was in the twenty-fifth year of his age, he succeeded his father in the kingdom (4 Kings 18). Whence it is understood that Achaz also begot Ezechias in his eleventh or tenth year.

2. And indeed, if in the histories, the Septuagint interpreters had something different from the Hebrew truth, we could resort to the usual defenses: and to hold fast to the fortress of the vernacular tongue: but now, there is difficulty not in the Scripture, but in the sense, as the true one itself and the other interpreters agree with equal authority. For who would believe that a boy of eleven years could generate a son? Many other things are said in the Scriptures which seem incredible, and yet are true. Nor does nature prevail against the Lord of nature: nor can a vessel say to the potter: Why have you made me thus, or thus? Although what is done for a miracle, as a sign and wonder, cannot make a law of nature. Is it because in our age a two-headed, four-handed, one-bellied, and two-legged man was born at Lydda, that it is necessary for all men to be born in the same way? Let us read the old histories, especially the Greek and Latin ones, and we shall find, cleansed by expiatory offerings, according to the error of the ancients, portentous offspring in both human beings, and in cattle and beasts. I have heard, and I do not lie according to the testimony of the Lord, that a certain little woman, when she nursed the exposed infant and fed it, and performed the duties of a nursemaid, and slept with the little boy who had already reached the age of ten years, it happened that she indulged in more than chastity, and being excited by passion, she led the child to sexual intercourse with obscene movements. The first drunkenness of another night and subsequently made a habit of the rest. Not yet two months had passed, and behold the woman's uterus swelled. What more? By God's dispensation, it was done so that what was being abused against nature with the simplicity of a little child in contempt of God, should be produced by the Lord of nature, the word being fulfilled which says: nothing is hidden that will not be made manifest (Matthew 10).

3. Meanwhile we consider that the Scripture accuses both Solomon and Achaz of pleasure and impiety secretly. For both, because they were of the lineage of David, turned away from the Lord: and one so much followed after voluptuousness, that he had seven hundred wives, and three hundred concubines, and they withdrew his heart. And Solomon's wives turned away his heart. For when he was old, his heart was not right with the Lord his God, as the heart of David his father. And he had idols built, through the wickedness of his wives, and he worshipped all the idols which his wives made. And Joas made an alliance with the king of the Assyrians, when he saw him to be powerful, and he went to Damascus and took captive the same as his fathers had done. He increased his contempt towards the Lord in the time of his affliction, and sacrificed to the gods of Damascus that saved him; and he set up against God the gods of the people of Damascus, and he built altars in their cities, and burnt incense to idols. And he committed a grievous crime and destroyed the vessels of the house of the Lord, which were for the service of the house of the Lord. Since it is clear that people who are devoted to lust from a young age are shown to have immaturity of offspring, and they begin to sin even at a time when nature does not allow it.

4. At the sum of it, it can be said that in the kingdom of David, Solomon obtained the throne at twelve years old, and afterwards, because the Scripture left it uncertain, David lived for a few years while his son was already reigning, which were attributed to him and not to Solomon. Moreover, after the father had died, the son reigns for forty years, which he reigned without a parent. Thus, the beginning of Solomon's reign and the time when he himself reigned alone were demonstrated by history. However, not all the fifty years of his life were contained within the circles of fifty-two years. But if you doubt that, while their sons are reigning and their fathers are still alive, the time of their rule is attributed not to the sons but to the parents, read the volume of the Kingdom itself, and you will find that after King Uzziah of Judah was struck with leprosy, he lived in a separate house, and his son Jotham ruled the empire and judged the people of the land until the day of his father's death (4 Kings 5). And yet, after his death, at the age of twenty-five, he is said to have reigned sixteen years, which he alone governed. What we have understood about Solomon should also be understood about Ahaz, who was the father of Hezekiah, Jotham's son (2 Chronicles 27:28). I have heard the story told by the Jews in this way, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, which I recently interpreted among ten visions: that when Ahaz died, the Philistines rejoiced, and the Scripture afterwards warns and states: 'Do not rejoice, all Philistia: For the rod of him who struck you is broken. For out of the serpent's root will come forth a king, and his offspring will devour the bird.'" (Isaiah 14): this means that from Ahaz would come forth King Hezekiah. From this it is understood that his son was not immediately placed in power after the death of his father, but that his kingdom was delayed by popular uprisings, certain interregna, or certainly pressing evils, and wars arising from all sides.

5. In obscure matters we hold diverse opinions, so that we seem to be speaking before you rather than writing. Otherwise, in forbidding endless genealogies and Jewish fables, the Apostle seems to me to be prohibiting such questions. For what profit is it to adhere to a letter, and either to blame the mistake of the writer, or the series of years, when it is most clearly written: The letter kills, but the spirit gives life? (2 Cor. 3) Read over all the books of both the Old and New Testaments, and you will find so great a difference among the years, and the number between Judah and Israel, that to dwell on questions of this kind seems to belong not so much to a studious as to a idle person. I have willingly received the gifts sent by you, and I pray that you may continue to persist until the end in the love which you have begun to pursue. For it is not the beginning, but the remaining which is the fruit of virtue. Receive, in turn, the gifts which we have sent through Desiderius (Put Aquitanian Presbyter).

Letters - letter_073

Letter 73. To Evangelus.

Evangelus had sent Jerome an anonymous treatise in which Melchisedek was indentified with the Holy Ghost, and had asked him what he thought of the theory. Jerome in his reply repudiates the idea as absurd and insists that Melchisedek was a real man, possibly, as the Jews said, Shem the eldest son of Noah. The date of the letter is 398 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. You sent me the volume ■ν■νυμον ■δ■οσποτον, anonymous and authorless, and I do not know whether you have removed the author's name from the title, or whether the writer himself, to avoid the danger of controversy, did not want to confess his authorship. When I read it, I realized that the most famous question about High Priest Melchizedek had been discussed there with many arguments, in an attempt to teach that he who blessed the great Patriarch was of a more divine nature and should not be considered among men. And in the end, he dared to say that the Holy Spirit appeared to Abraham, and that he was the one who appeared in the form of a man. However, the Holy Spirit, when he brought forth bread and wine, and received the tithes of the spoils that Abraham had brought back from the victory over four kings, did not want to touch them at all: and you ask me to respond to what seems to me, either about the writer or about the question. I confess that I wanted to conceal my opinion, nor to mix myself in dangerous and contentious discourse, in which I would have had reprovers whatever I had said. But again, when I read the letter and found myself adjured with remarkable entreaties in the last little page not to spurn the petitioner, I searched through the books of the Ancients to see what each one said, and I answered you, as it were, with the counsel of many.

2. And immediately on the first page of Genesis I found an exegesis by Origen concerning Melchizedek, in which he discusses the matter in many words and comes to the conclusion that he was an angel. With almost the same arguments your author has employed on the Holy Spirit, he speaks on the heavenly powers. I went on to his follower Didymus, and came to a like result. I turned to Hippolytus, Irenaeus, Eusebius of Caesarea, and Emisenus, Apollinaris also, and our Eustathius, who first sang the war trumpet against Arius as the Bishop of Antioch's Church: and I found that all of their opinions, with different arguments and byways, had arrived at one intersection, to say that Melchizedek was a Canaanite man, the king of the city of Jerusalem, which was first called Salem, then Jebus, and finally Jerusalem. It is not surprising if a priest of the most high God is described without circumcision and legal ceremonies, and without being of the family of Aaron, since Abel, Enoch, and Noah also pleased God and offered sacrifices, and in the book of Job we read that he himself was an offerer of gifts and a priest, and daily sacrificed offerings for his sons (Job. 1). And they say that Job himself was not from the tribe of Levi, but from the lineage of Esau: although the Hebrews think otherwise.

3. But how Noah, being intoxicated in his house and stripped and ridiculed by his middle son, offered a figure of the Savior and of the synagogue of the Jews; and Samson also, the lover of the harlot and poor Delilah, killed many more of his enemies after he was dead than when alive, to represent the passion of Christ; and nearly all the holy patriarchs and prophets expressed a figure of the Savior in some way. So also Melchizedek, because he was a Canaanite and not of the Jewish race, offered a type of the priesthood of the Son of God, of whom it is said in the 109th Psalm: You are a priest forever, according to the order of Melchizedek. However, his order is interpreted in many ways, in that he alone was king and priest, and served as a priest before circumcision: so that not the Gentiles from the Jews, but the Jews from the Gentiles received the priesthood; Nor was he anointed with priestly oil, as the precepts of Moses set forth (Lev. 8: 1): but with the oil of exultation, and by the purity of faith; nor did he sacrifice the flesh and blood of victims, and take in the entrails of brute animals: but, he dedicated the sacrament of Christ with bread and wine, a simple and pure sacrifice; and many other things which brevity of an epistle does not contain.

4. Furthermore (perhaps overlooking) it is treated more thoroughly in the Epistle to the Hebrews (Chapter 7), which all Greeks receive, and some Latins, that this Melchizedek, that is, the righteous king, was the king of Salem, that is, the king of peace, without father, without mother, and how this is to be understood, summed up in one word ἄγονε ἀλφειας, not that he was without a father and mother, since Christ also had both a father and a mother according to both natures, but that he suddenly appears in Genesis as Abraham returns from the slaughter of the enemy; and not before. And his name shall not be mentioned afterwards. But the Apostle affirms that Aaron had the priesthood, that is, the people of the Jews, both as its beginning and end, whereas Melchizedek, that is, of Christ and the Church, is eternal, having no author, and that with the change of the priesthood, there is also a change of the law, so that the word of God may not go forth from Hagar the handmaid and Mount Sinai, but from Sarah the free woman and the citadel of Zion, and the law of God from Jerusalem. And he exaggerates the difficulty of the matter at first, saying: On which there is much talk amongst us, and it is ininterpretable (Hebrews 5:11): not because the Apostle could not interpret it, but because it was not the time for it. For he was persuading the Hebrews, that is, the Jews, not anymore the Faithful, among whom the sacrament was everywhere evident. Nevertheless, if the vessel of election is struck by the mystery and confesses the ineffable concerning what it is discussing; how much more do we worms and fleas need to confess only the knowledge of ignorance and to show the most ample house through a small opening: so that we may say, "Two priesthoods have been compared to each other by the Apostle, that of the former people and that of the latter?" And he accomplishes this by his whole discussion so that Melchizedek, a priest from among the Gentiles, would be prior to Levi and Aaron, whose merit is so great that he blessed Abraham in his loins before the future priests of the Jews. And everything that follows in praise of Melchizedek is referred to the type of Christ, of whom the sacraments of the Church are the progress.

5. I have read these things in the books of the Greeks. And since the vast extent of the world cannot be compressed within brief limits, I have wished to show, in a shortened sketch, these points beyond the field of ordinary knowledge... However, since you ask kindly, and because everything that I have learned must be poured into faithful ears, I will also give the opinion of the Hebrews. And lest you should miss anything in your eagerness for knowledge, I will add the Hebrew words themselves: 'And Melchizedek, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine, for he was the priest of the most high God. And he blessed him and said, "Blessed be Abram of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth. And blessed be the most high God, who hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand." (Genesis, 14:18-20). Which is translated into Latin in this way: And Melchizedek, king of Salem, brought out bread and wine; and he was a priest of the Most High God. And he blessed him and said, "Blessed be Abram to God Most High, Creator of heaven and earth. And blessed be God Most High, who delivered your enemies into your hand." And he gave him a tenth of all. And they say that this was Shem, the first son of Noah, and at the time when Abram was born, he was 390 years old, reckoning them thus. After the flood, in the second year, Shem, having lived for 100 years, begot Arphaxad; And after Arphaxad was born, he lived for 500 years, that is, a total of 600 years. And when Arphaxad was thirty-five years old, he begot Salah, who also thirty years old, begot Eber, and we read that Eber begot Peleg at the age of 34. Again, Phaleg, having completed thirty years, begot Rehu: who himself, after his thirty-second year from his birth, begot Serug: of whom, when he had arrived at his thirtieth year, was born Nachor: who, when he was twenty-nine years old, begot Thare: whom we read, at the age of seventy, to have begotten Abram, and Nachor, and Aran. Calculate the number of years through each age, and you will find from the birth of Shem to the generation of Abram, three hundred and ninety years. Now Abraham died in the hundred and seventy-fifth year of his age. By calculation, it is found that Shem, his tenth-degree grandson, survived Abraham by thirty-five years.

6. At the same time they relate this, that until the priesthood of Aaron, all the firstborn of the race of Noah, whose series and order are described, were priests, and offered victims to God: and that these were the firstborn, which Esau sold to his brother Jacob (Gen. 27). It is not surprising if Melchizedek went out to meet the victorious Abram and brought out bread and wine for refreshment, for himself as well as his fighters, and blessed him, since he owed this right to his great-nephew: and received tithes of the spoils and victory from him: either because it is uncertain, he gave him tithes of his substance, and showed avuncular generosity to his nephew. For both indeed can be understood, both according to the Hebrews and according to the Septuagint interpreters, that he himself also received tithes of spoils, and gave tithes of his substance to Abraham: although the Apostle in his Epistle to the Hebrews (Ch. 7) most clearly defines that not Abraham had received tithes of his riches from Melchizedek, but had received a part of the spoils of the enemies from the High Priest.

7. But Salem, as Josephus and all of us think, is not Jerusalem, but a name composed of Greek and Hebrew, which shows it to be absurd, a mixture of foreign languages: it is a town next to Scythopolis, which until today is called Salem, and the palace of Melchizedek is shown there, showing the magnificence of the old work from the ruins' size: about which it is also written in the later part of Genesis. Jacob came to Socoth, that is, to the tents, and made houses and tents for himself there, and went to Salem, a city in the region of Sichem, which is in the land of Canaan. (Genesis 33:17-18)

8. "Also to be taken into consideration is the fact that, when Abraham returned from fighting against the enemy whom he pursued as far as Dan (Gen. 14), which today is called Paneas (Pameas), he was not off the route to Jerusalem but was in the city of Sichem, a metropolis; and in the Gospel we also read: 'Now John also was baptizing at Aenon near Salem, because there was an abundance of water there'" (John 3). It doesn't matter whether it is called Salem or Salim, since the Hebrews rarely use vowels in the middle of words and the same words can be pronounced differently in different regions, depending on the reader's preference and accent.

9. These things we have learned from the most learned of that nation, who hold that the Holy Spirit or Angel was Melchizedek, so they even attribute the most certain human name to him.

And truly it is foolish, what is said in typology: because the priesthood of Christ has no end; and he himself has given us both king and priest, so that we may be a royal and priestly lineage (1 Peter 2:9), and as if an angular stone (Isaiah) has joined both walls, and the good shepherd of the two flocks has made one flock (Ephesians 2:16); thus some refer to the ■ναγωγην, so that they may take away the truth from the stories, and say that there was not a king, but an image of a man demonstrated by an angel: since the Hebrews so try to show Melchizedek, the king of Salem, the son of Noah, Sem, that they refer to it like this before this scripture: Now the king of Sodom went out to meet him (no doubt, Abraham) after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer, and the kings who were with him in the valley of Save: this is the valley of the king; immediately followed by: And Melchizedek, king of Salem, brought forth bread and wine (Genesis 14), and so forth. Therefore, if this is the city of the king, and the valley of the king, or as the Septuagint translated it, the plain, which is called Aulon of the Philistines today, it is clear that there was a man who ruled (or had ruled) in both the earthly valley and the city.

10. You have what I have heard, what I have read about Melchizedek. It was my responsibility to cite (or repeat) witnesses; it is your responsibility to judge the credibility of the witness. But if you should reject all of them, you certainly will not receive that spiritual interpreter who, without eloquence or profound knowledge, pronounced with such arrogance and authority that Melchizedek had the Holy Spirit, in order to support that most true statement sung among the Greeks, "Ignorance creates confidence; knowledge creates fear." After a long illness, I could hardly be without fever during the forty days of Lent, and when I prepared for another task, I spent the few remaining days in an exposition of Matthew: and I resumed my studies with such avidity that what had benefited my language practice was harmful to the health of my body.

Letters - letter_074

Letter 74. To Rufinus of Rome.

Rufinus, a Roman Presbyter (to be carefully distinguished from Rufinus of Aquileia and Rufinus the Syrian), had written to Jerome for an explanation of the judgment of Solomon (1 Kings 3:16-28). This Jerome gives at length, treating the narrative as a parable and making the false and true mothers types of the Synagogue and the Church. The date of the letter is 398 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. Rumor frequently lies much in both directions, and, in false reports, proclaims both bad things about good people, and good things about bad people. Hence, indeed, I rejoice concerning the testimony of your holiness toward me, and the love of Saint Presbyter Eusebius; nor do I doubt that you will publicly proclaim me, but I fear the silent judgment of your prudence. Therefore, I beseech you, to remember me more, and to make worthy your praise. That which you prompted me first to do, and the second part of writing was given to me, came not from neglect of friends, but from ignorance; for if I had known, I would have anticipated your conversation.

2. The interpretation of Solomon's judgment on the quarrel of two harlot women (1 Kings 3) is clear as far as the simple history is concerned: that a boy of twelve years judged with an affection beyond his age for the depths of human nature. Hence, he was both admired and feared by all Israel, because he would not miss what was so skillfully concealed. But regarding typical understanding, as the Apostle says: All these things were written to happen to them by way of example, and they were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages have come. (1 Corinthians 10:11) Some Greeks hold that this should be understood in reference to the Synagogue and the Church, and that all things should be referred to that time when, after the crucifixion and resurrection, the true Solomon, that is, the peaceful one, began to reign both in Israel and among the Gentile people. But that adulteresses and prostitutes are called Synagogue and Church in the Scriptures, there is no doubt.

3. And this seems blasphemous at first glance; but if we turn to the Prophets, to Hosea namely, who took a prostitute as his wife and begot sons of fornication (Hos. 1), and then took an adulteress; and to Ezekiel, who accuses Jerusalem of being like a harlot because she followed her lovers and spread her legs for everyone who passed by, and built a brothel in a prominent place (Ezek. 16); we will note that Christ came in order to give marriage to prostitutes, and to make one flock out of two flocks, and by destroying the middle wall (Ephes. 2), to gather into the same sheep-pens the sheep that had previously been sick. These are the two rods which are joined in Ezekiel (chapter 37), and of which the Lord speaks through Zachariah: And I took two rods to myself, one I called Beauty, and the other I called Cord, and I fed the flock (Zach. 11.8) . Also that harlot woman in the Gospel, who washes the feet of Jesus with tears, wipes them with her hair, and to whom all sins are forgiven, clearly depicts the Church gathered from the Gentiles (Luc. 7) . I repeated this on the first page so that no one may find it incongruous if the synagogue and the church are called prostitutes, of which one has been given possession by the judgment of Solomon's son. A wise listener would ask how the church could be like a prostitute, which has neither blemish nor wrinkle? (Ephesians 5) We do not say that the Church has remained a prostitute, but that it was. For even in the house of Simon the leper, the Savior is written to have entered a feast (Matthew 26), not because he was a leper at the time when he had the Savior as a guest, but because he had been a leper before. Matthew also says in the list of the Apostles that he was called a publican, not because he remained a publican after his apostolic dignity, but because he had been one before, so that where sin abounded, grace superabounded.

4. And at the same time consider what the Church says against the slanderous Synagogue: "I and this woman lived in one house" (3 Kings 3:17). For after the resurrection of the Lord and Savior, one Church was gathered from both peoples, and how beautifully: "I gave birth to her in the chamber." For the Church from the Gentiles, which previously had neither the Law nor the Prophets, gave birth in the house of the Synagogue; nor did she come out of the chamber, but enter it. Where it says in the Song of Songs: The king has brought me into his chamber (Cant. 1:3). And again: Indeed, I will not reject you. I will take you up and bring you to my mother's house, the chamber of the one who gave birth to me (Cant. 3:4). On the third day, however, she gave birth to a child after I had given birth. If you consider Pilate washing his hands and saying, 'I am innocent of the blood of this just person' (Matth. 27.24), if [you consider] the Centurion confessing in front of the gallows, 'Truly this was the Son of God' (Mark 15.39), if [you consider] those who before the Passion desired to see the Lord through Philip, you will not hesitate to say that [they were] the first fruits of the Church, and thereafter the Jewish people, for whom the Lord prayed, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do' (Luke 23.34). And one day three thousand believed: and the next day about five thousand (Acts 2 and 4). And we were together (for the assembly of believers was of one heart and soul) and no one else was in our midst, except the two of us: those who did not blaspheme against the Jews, and those who did not serve idols of the Gentiles. But the son of this woman died tonight. For while he followed the observance of the law and coupled the yoke of the grace of the Gospel with the doctrine of Moses, he was covered by the error of darkness. And his sleeping mother oppressed him, who could not say: I sleep, and my heart is awake (Song of Solomon 5: 2). Rising in the middle of the night, she took the son from the side (of the Church) sleeping, and placed him in her own bosom. Reread the entire Epistle of the Apostle to the Galatians, and you will see how the Synagogue is eager to make its own children, and the Apostle says: My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, until Christ be formed in you (Gal. 4. 19) . She bore a living child, not that she might possess it, but that she might kill it. For she did not do this out of love for her son, but out of jealous hatred, and she placed her own dead child in the bosom of the Church by the ceremonies of the Law.

5. It would be long if I wanted to go through each point; as the church understood through the Apostle Paul, and the men of the Church, the one who was held under the Law was not their son, and in the light he was known whom they could not see in the darkness. Hence an argument arose, in the presence of the king, one saying 'Your son is dead, while mine lives,' the other responding, 'You lie, for my son lives and yours is dead,' and in this way they argued in front of the king. Then King Solomon, who is clearly understood as the Savior (according to Psalm 71, which is inscribed with the title of Solomon; where there is no doubt that everything that is said, does not belong to Solomon who is dead, but rather to the majesty of Christ) feigned ignorance, and lied about human emotions for the dispensation of the flesh, just as in another place: Where have you put Lazarus? (John 11:34) and to the woman with the issue of blood, Who touched me? (Matthew 9) He demands a sword, about which he had said: Do not think that I have come to bring peace on earth; I have not come to bring peace but a sword. For I have come to set a man against his father, and a daughter against her mother, and a daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household. (Matthew 10) And the Lord tries the nature of nature, and wishes to divide the living son into Law and Grace according to the will of each, not that He may approve, but that He may say this for the purpose of reproofing the calumny of the Synagogue. She, who did not want the son of the Church to live in grace, nor to be set free through baptism, is happy to have the child divided: not to possess him, but to kill him. The Church, which knows him to be her own, willingly grants him to the rival, if only he may live with her adversary, lest he be struck by the sword of the Savior, divided between the Law and Grace. Hence the Apostle says: Behold, I Paul say to you, that if you observe the Law, Christ will profit you nothing (Gal. 5).

6. These things have been said under the cover of a metaphorical cloud. Furthermore, your wisdom knows very well that the same rules do not apply in the shadows of the tropic figures as apply in the truth of history. And if, in any place, we stumble and it seems trivial to the discerning reader what we have written, let them place the blame on the author. For even these things we, lying in bed and worn out by drawn-out illness, with difficulty dictated to the notary quickly: not to fulfill a subject, but so that we might not appear to refuse you anything at the beginning of our friendship. Pray for our safety from the Lord, so that after twelve months, in which I have been weakened by constant illness, I may be able to write something worthy of your desire, and forgive me if my speech, which is usually fluent, does not flow. For we do not dictate with the same elegance as we write: because in one we often sharpen the style, again writing what is worthy of reading; in the other, we roll forward anything that comes to our tongue with quick speech. I saw Caninius willingly, who can tell you how difficult and dangerous it has been for my right hand, up to the present day, when I dictated this.

Letters - letter_075

Letter 75. To Theodora.

Theodora the wife of the learned Spaniard Lucinius (for whom see Letter 71.) had recently lost her husband, a bereavement which suggested the present letter. In it Jerome recounts the many virtues of Lucinius and especially his zeal in resisting the gnostic heresy of Marcus which during his life was prevalent in Spain. The date of the letter is 399 a.d.

1. So overpowered am I by the sad intelligence of the falling asleep of the holy and by me deeply revered Lucinius that I am scarcely able to dictate even a short letter. I do not, it is true, lament his fate, for I know that he has passed to better things: like Moses he can say: "I will now turn aside and see this great sight." [Exod. 3:3] but I am tormented with regret that I was not allowed to look upon the face of one, who was likely, as I believed, in a short time to come hither. True indeed is the prophetic warning concerning the doom of death that it divides brothers,¹ and with harsh and cruel hand sunders those whose names are linked together in the bonds of love. But we have this consolation that it is slain by the word of the Lord. For it is said: "O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction," and in the next verse: "An east wind shall come, the wind of the Lord shall come up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry, and his fountain shall be dried up." [Hos. 13:14, Hos. 13:15] For, as Isaiah says, "there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots": [Isa. 11:1, Vulg] and He says Himself in the Song of Songs, "I am the rose of Sharon and the lily of the valley." [Cant. 2:1] Our rose is the destruction of death, and died that death itself might die in His dying. But, when it is said that He is to be brought "from the wilderness," the virgin's womb is indicated, which without sexual intercourse or impregnation has given to us God in the form of an infant able to quench by the glow of the Holy Spirit the fountains of lust and to sing in the words of the psalm: "as in a dry and pathless and waterless land, so have I appeared unto thee in the sanctuary." [Ps. 63:1, 2, Vulg] Thus when we have to face the hard and cruel necessity of death, we are upheld by this consolation, that we shall shortly see again those whose absence we now mourn. For their end is not called death but a slumber and a falling asleep. Wherefore also the blessed apostle forbids us to sorrow concerning them which are asleep, [1 Thess. 4:13] telling us to believe that those whom we know to sleep now may hereafter be roused from their sleep, and when their slumber is ended may watch once more with the saints and sing with the angels: "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace among men of good will." [Luke 2:14, Vulg] In heaven where there is no sin, there is glory and perpetual praise and unwearied singing; but on earth where sedition reigns, and war and discord hold sway, peace must be gained by prayer, and it is to be found not among all but only among men of good will, who pay heed to the apostolic salutation: "Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ." [Rom. 1:7] For "His abode is in peace and His dwelling place is in Zion,"² that is, on a watch-tower,³ on a height of doctrines and of virtues, in the soul of the believer; for the angel of this latter daily beholds the face of God, [Matt. 18:10] and contemplates with unveiled face the glory of God.

2. Wherefore, though you are already running in the way, I urge a willing horse, as the saying goes, and implore you, while you regret in your Lucinius a true brother, to rejoice as well that he now reigns with Christ. For, as it is written in the book of Wisdom, he was "taken away lest that wickedness should alter his understanding ...for his soul pleased the Lord ...and he ...in a short time fulfilled a long time." [Wisd. 4:11-14] We may with more right weep for ourselves that we stand daily in conflict with our sins, that we are stained with vices, that we receive wounds, and that we must give account for every idle word. [Matt. 12:36] Victorious now and free from care he looks down upon you from on high and supports you in your struggle, nay more, he prepares for you a place near to himself; for his love and affection towards you are still the same as when, disregarding his claim on you as a husband, he resolved to treat you even on earth as a sister, or indeed I may say as a brother, for difference of sex while essential to marriage is not so to a continent tie. And since even in the flesh, if we are born again in Christ, we are no longer Greek and Barbarian, bond and free, male and female, but are all one in Him, [Gal. 3:28] how much more true will this be when this corruptible has put on incorruption and when this mortal has put on immortality. [1 Cor. 15:53] "In the resurrection," the Lord tells us, "they neither marry nor are given in marriage but are as the angels ...in heaven." [Matt. 22:30] Now when it is said that they neither marry nor are given in marriage but are as the angels in heaven, there is no taking away of a natural and real body but only an indication of the greatness of the glory to come. For the words are not "they shall be angels" but "they shall be as the angels": thus while likeness to the angels is promised identity with them is refused. "They shall be," Christ tells us, "as the angels," that is like the angels; therefore they will not cease to be human. Glorious indeed they shall be, and graced with angelic splendour, but they will still be human; the apostle Paul will still be Paul, Mary will still be Mary. Then shall confusion overtake that heresy⁴ which holds out great but vague promises only that it may take away hopes which are at once modest and certain.

3. And now that I have once mentioned the word "heresy," where can I find a trumpet loud enough to proclaim the eloquence of our dear Lucinius, who, when the filthy heresy of Basilides⁵ raged in Spain and like a pestilence ravaged the provinces between the Pyrenees and the ocean, upheld in all its purity the faith of the church and altogether refused to embrace Armagil, Barbelon, Abraxas, Balsamum, and the absurd Leusibora. Such are the portentous names which, to excite the minds of unlearned men and weak women, they pretend to draw from Hebrew sources, terrifying the simple by barbarous combinations which they admire the more the less they understand them.⁶ The growth of this heresy is described for us by Irenaeus, bishop of the church of Lyons, a man of the apostolic times, who was a disciple of Papias the hearer of the evangelist John. He informs us that a certain Mark,⁷ of the stock of the gnostic Basilides, came in the first instance to Gaul, that he contaminated with his teaching those parts of the country which are watered by the Rhone and the Garonne, and that in particular he misled by his errors high-born women; to whom he promised certain secret mysteries and whose affection he enlisted by magic arts and hidden indulgence in unlawful intercourse. Irenaeus goes on to say that subsequently Mark crossed the Pyrenees and occupied Spain, making it his object to seek out the houses of the wealthy, and in these especially the women, concerning whom we are told that they are "led away with divers lusts, ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." [2 Tim. 3:6, 2 Tim. 3:7] All this he wrote about three hundred years ago⁸ in the extremely learned and eloquent books which he composed under the title Against all heresies.

4. From these facts you in your wisdom will realize how worthy of praise our dear Lucinius shewed himself when he shut his ears that he might not have to hear the judgement passed upon blood shedders,⁹ and dispersed all his substance and gave to the poor that his righteousness might endure for ever. [Ps. 112:9] And not satisfied with bestowing his bounty upon his own country, he sent to the churches of Jerusalem and Alexandria gold enough to alleviate the want of large numbers. But while many will admire and extol in him this liberality, I for my part will rather praise him for his zeal and diligence in the study of the scriptures. With what eagerness he asked for my poor works! He actually sent six copyists (for in this province there is a dearth of scribes who understand Latin) to copy for him all that I have ever dictated from my youth until the present time. The honour was not of course paid to me who am but a little child, the least of all Christians, living in the rocks near Bethlehem because I know myself a sinner; but to Christ who is honoured in his servants [Luke 9:48] and who makes this promise to them, "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." [Matt. 10:40]

5. Therefore, my beloved daughter, regard this letter as the epitaph which love prompts me to write upon your husband, and if there is any spiritual work of which you think me to be capable, boldly command me to undertake it: that so ages to come may know that He who says of Himself in Isaiah, "He hath made me a polished shaft; in his quiver hath he hid me," [Isa. 49:2] has with His sharp arrow so wounded two men severed by an immense interval of sea and land, that, although they know each other not in the flesh, they are knit together in love in the spirit. May you be kept holy both in body and spirit by the Samaritan—that is, saviour and keeper-of whom it is said in the psalm, "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." [Ps. 121:4] May the watcher and the holy one who came down to Daniel¹⁰ come also to you, that you too may be able to say, "I sleep but my heart waketh." [Cant. 5:2] 1: Hos. 13:15, Vulg. Quia ipse inter fratres dividet. AV. follows the Hebrew 2: Ps. 76:2. "Salem" (A.V.), the Hebrew word for peace 3: See Jerome's Book of Hebrew Names Cf. also Letter CVIII

4: Origenism 5: Probably as revived by Priscillian, who was put to death 385. See Jerome On Illustrious Men, 100:121

6:

These terms, the meanings of which are very uncertain, are either the names of aeons or magical formulae used by the Marcosians in the celebration of their mysteries

7: A gnostic of the school of Valentinus, who taught in the middle of the second century. Jerome is in error when he describes him as a disciple of Basilides 8: An error for two hundred years ago. 0

9: Is. 33:15. Jerome's allusion may be to the execution of Priscillian in 385. Lucinius may have shared the views of Ambrose and Martin against the shedding of blood 10: Dan. 4:13. Lit. May Hir, that is the watcher, Hir being the Hebrew word

Letters - letter_076

Letter 76. To Abigaus.

Abigaus the recipient of this letter was a blind presbyter of Baetica in Spain. He had asked the help of Jerome's prayers in his struggles with evil and Jerome now writes to cheer and to console him. He concludes his remarks by commending to his especial care the widow Theodora. The letter should be compared with that addressed to Castrutius (LXVIII.). It was written at the same time with the preceding.

1. Although I am conscious of many sins and every day pray on bended knees, "Remember not the sins of my youth nor my transgressions, [Ps. 25:7] yet because I know that it has been said by the Apostle "let a man not be lifted up with pride lest he fall into the condemnation of the devil," [1 Tim. 3:6. AV. adapted] and that it is written in another passage, "God resisteth the proud but giveth grace to the humble," [James 4:6] there is nothing I have striven so much to avoid from my boyhood up as a swelling mind and a stiff neck, [Cf. Ps. 75:5] things which always provoke against themselves the wrath of God. For I know that my master and Lord and God has said in the lowliness of His flesh: "Learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart," [Matt. 11:29] and that before this He has sung by the mouth of David: "Lord, remember David and all his gentleness.¹ Again we read in another passage, "Before destruction the heart of man is haughty; and before honour is humility." [Prov. 18:12] Do not, then, I implore you, suppose that I have received your letter and have passed it over in silence. Do not, I beseech you, lay to my charge the dishonesty and negligence of which others have been guilty. For why should I, when called on to respond to your kind advances, continue dumb and repel by my silence the friendship which you offer? I who am always forward to seek intimate relations with the good and even to thrust myself upon their affection. "Two," we read, "are better than one.... for if they fall, the one will lift up his fellow.... a three fold cord is not quickly broken, and a brother that helps his brother shall be exalted."² Write to me, therefore, boldly, and overcome the effect of absence by frequent colloquies.

2. You should not grieve that you are destitute of those bodily eyes which ants, flies, and creeping things have as well as men; rather you should rejoice that you possess that eye of which it is said in the Song of Songs, "Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse; thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes." [Cant. 4:9] This is the eye with which God is seen and to which Moses refers when he says:-"I will now turn aside and see this great sight." [Ex. 3:3] We even read of some philosophers of this world³ that they have plucked out their eyes in order to turn all their thoughts upon the pure depths of the mind. And a prophet has said "Death has entered through your windows." [Jer. 9:21. LXX] Our Lord too tells the Apostles: "Whosoever looketh upon a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart." [Matt. 5:28] Consequently they are commanded to lift up their eyes and to look on the fields, for these are white and ready for harvest. [John. 4:35]

3. You request me by my exhortations to slay in you Nebuchadnezzar and Rabshakeh and Nebuzar-adan and Holofernes.⁴ Were they alive in you, you would never have sought my aid. No, they are dead within you, and you have begun to build up the ruins of Jerusalem with the help of Zerubbabel and of Joshua the son of Josedech the high priest, of Ezra and of Nehemiah. You do not put your wages into a bag with holes, [Hagg. 1:6] but you lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, [Matt. 6:20] and if you seek my friendship, it is because you believe me to be a servant of Christ.

I commend to you-although she needs no commendation but her own-my holy daughter Theodora, formerly the wife or rather the sister of Lucinius of blessed memory. Tell her that she must not grow weary of the path upon which she has entered, and that she can only reach the Holy Land by toiling through the wilderness. Warn her against supposing that the work of virtue is perfected when she has made her exodus from Egypt. Remind her that she must pass through snares innumerable to arrive at mount Nebo and the River Jordan, [Nu. 33:47, Nu. 33:48] that she must receive circumcision anew at Gilgal, [Josh. 5:2, Josh. 5:9] that Jericho must fall before her, overthrown by the blasts of priestly trumpets, [Josh. 6:20] that Adoni-zedec must be slain, [Josh. 10:1, Josh. 10:26] that Ai and Hazor, once fairest of cities, must both fall. [Josh. 8:10, Josh. 11:10] The brothers who are with me in the monastery salute you, and I through you earnestly salute those reverend persons who deign to bestow upon me their regard.

1: Ps. 132:1, Vulg. AV. has `afflictions. 0 2: Eccl. 4:9-12. The last clause is Jerome's own 3: Cicero ascribes this piece of fanaticism to Democritus and Metrodorus 4: The legendary oppressor of the Jews, whose fate is described in the Book of Judith Letter 77. To Oceanus. The eulogy of Fabiola whose restless life had come to an end in 399 a.d. Jerome tells the story of her sin and of her penitence (for which see Letter 55.), of the hospital established by her at Portus, of her visit to Bethlehem, and of her earnestness in the study of scripture. He relates how he wrote for her his account of the vestments of the high priest (Letter 64.) and how at the time of her death he was at her request engaged upon a commentary on the forty-two halting-places of the Israelites in the wilderness (Letter 79.). This last he now sends along with this letter to Oceanus. Jerome also bestows praise upon Pammachius as the companion of all Fabiola's labours. The date of the letter is 399 a.d.

Letters - letter_077

1. Several years since I consoled the venerated Paula, whilst her affliction was still recent for the falling asleep of Blaesilla.¹ Four summers ago I wrote for the bishop Heliodorus the epitaph of Nepotian, and expended what ability I possessed in giving expression to my grief at his loss.² Only two years have elapsed since I sent a brief letter to my dear Pammachius on the sudden flitting of his Paulina.³ I blushed to say more to one so learned or to give him back his own thoughts: lest I should seem less the consoler of a friend than the officious instructor of one already perfect. But now, Oceanus my son, the duty that you lay upon me is one that I gladly accept and would even seek unasked. For when new virtues have to be dealt with, an old subject itself becomes new. In previous cases I have had to soften and restrain a mother's affection, an uncle's grief, and a husband's yearning; according to the different requirements of each I have had to apply from scripture different remedies.

2. To-day you give me as my theme Fabiola, the praise of the Christians, the marvel of the gentiles, the sorrow of the poor, and the consolation of the monks. Whatever point in her character I choose to treat of first, pales into insignificance compared with those which follow after. Shall I praise her fasts? Her alms are greater still. Shall I commend her lowliness? The glow of her faith is yet brighter. Shall I mention her studied plainness in dress, her voluntary choice of plebeian costume and the garb of a slave that she might put to shame silken robes? To change one's disposition is a greater achievement than to change one's dress. It is harder for us to part with arrogance than with gold and gems. For, even though we throw away these, we plume ourselves sometimes on a meanness that is really ostentatious, and we make a bid with a saleable poverty for the popular applause. But a virtue that seeks concealment and is cherished in the inner consciousness appeals to no judgement but that of God. Thus the eulogies which I have to bestow upon Fabiola will be altogether new: I must neglect the order of the rhetoricians and begin all I have to say only from the cradle of her conversion and of her penitence. Another writer, mindful of the school, would perhaps bring forward Quintus Maximus, "the man who by delaying rescued Rome,"⁴ and the whole Fabian family; he would describe their struggles and battles and would exult that Fabiola had come to us through a line so noble, shewing that qualities not apparent in the branch still existed in the root. But as I am a lover of the inn at Bethlehem and of the Lord's stable in which the virgin travailed with and gave birth to an infant God, I shall deduce the lineage of Christ's handmaid not from a stock famous in history but from the lowliness of the church.

3. And because at the very outset there is a rock in the path and she is overwhelmed by a storm of censure, for having forsaken her first husband and having taken a second, I will not praise her for her conversion till I have first cleared her of this charge. So terrible then were the faults imputed to her former husband that not even a prostitute or a common slave could have put up with them. If I were to recount them, I should undo the heroism of the wife who chose to bear the blame of a separation rather than to blacken the character and expose the stains of him who was one body with her. I will only urge this one plea which is sufficient to exonerate a chaste matron and a Christian woman. The Lord has given commandment that a wife must not be put away "except it be for fornication, and that, if put away, she must remain unmarried." [Matt. 19:9. 1 Cor. 7:11] Now a commandment which is given to men logically applies to women also. For it cannot be that, while an adulterous wife is to be put away, an incontinent husband is to be retained. The apostle says: "he which is joined to an harlot is one body." [1 Cor. 6:16] Therefore she also who is joined to a whoremonger and unchaste person is made one body with him. The laws of Caesar are different, it is true, from the laws of Christ: Papinianus⁵ commands one thing; our own Paul another. Earthly laws give a free rein to the unchastity of men, merely condemning seduction and adultery; lust is allowed to range unrestrained among brothels and slave girls, as if the guilt were constituted by the rank of the person assailed and not by the purpose of the assailant. But with us Christians what is unlawful for women is equally unlawful for men, and as both serve the same God both are bound by the same obligations. Fabiola then has put away-they are quite right-a husband that was a sinner, guilty of this and that crime, sins-I have almost mentioned their names-with which the whole neighbourhood resounded but which the wife alone refused to disclose. If however it is made a charge against her that after repudiating her husband she did not continue unmarried, I readily admit this to have been a fault, but at the same time declare that it may have been a case of necessity. "It is better," the apostle tells us, "to marry than to burn." [1 Cor. 7:9] She was quite a young woman, she was not able to continue in widowhood. In the words of the apostle she saw another law in her members warring against the law of her mind; [Rom. 7:23] she felt herself dragged in chains as a captive towards the indulgences of wedlock. Therefore she thought it better openly to confess her weakness and to accept the semblance of an unhappy marriage than, with the flame of a monogamist, to ply the trade of a courtesan. The same apostle wills that the younger widows should marry, bear children, and give no occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully. [1 Tim. 5:14] And he at once goes on to explain his wish: "for some are already turned aside after Satan." [1 Tim. 5:15] Fabiola therefore was fully persuaded in her own mind: she thought she had acted legitimately in putting away her husband, and that when she had done so she was free to marry again. She did not know that the rigour of the gospel takes away from women all pretexts for re-marriage so long as their former husbands are alive; and not knowing this, though she contrived to evade other assaults of the devil, she at this point unwittingly exposed herself to a wound from him.

4. But why do I linger over old and forgotten matters, seeking to excuse a fault for which Fabiola has herself confessed her penitence? Who would believe that, after the death of her second husband at a time when most widows, having shaken off the yoke of servitude, grow careless and allow themselves more liberty than ever, frequenting the baths, flitting through the streets, shewing their harlot faces everywhere; that at this time Fabiola came to herself? Yet it was then that she put on sackcloth to make public confession of her error. It was then that in the presence of all Rome (in the basilica which formerly belonged to that Lateranus who perished by the sword of Caesar⁶) she stood in the ranks of the penitents and exposed before bishop, presbyters, and people-all of whom wept when they saw her weep-her dishevelled hair, pale features, soiled hands and unwashed neck. What sins would such a penance fail to purge away? What ingrained stains would such tears be unable to wash out? By a threefold confession Peter blotted out his threefold denial. [John. 18:15-27: John. 21:15-17] If Aaron committed sacrilege by fashioning molten gold into the head of a calf, his brother's prayers made amends for his transgressions. [Ex. 32:30-35] If holy David, meekest of men, committed the double sin of murder and adultery, he atoned for it by a fast of seven days. He lay upon the earth, he rolled in the ashes, he forgot his royal power, he sought for light in the darkness. [2 Sam. 12:16] And then, turning his eyes to that God whom he had so deeply offended, he cried with a lamentable voice: "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight," and "Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation and uphold me with thy free spirit." [Ps. 51:4, Ps. 51:12] He who by his virtues teaches me how to stand and not to fall, by his penitence teaches me how, if I fall, I may rise again. Among the kings do we read of any so wicked as Ahab, of whom the scripture says: "there was none like unto Ahab which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord"? [1 Kings 21:25] For shedding Naboth's blood Elijah rebuked him, and the prophet denounced God's wrath against him: "Hast thou killed and also taken possession? ...behold I will bring evil upon thee and will take away thy posterity" [1 K. 21:19, 1 K. 21:21] and so on. Yet when Ahab heard these words "he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted ...in sackcloth, and went softly." [1 K. 21:27] Then came the word of God to Elijah the Tishbite saying: "Seest thou how Ahab humbleth himself before me? Because he humbleth himself before me, I will not bring the evil in his days." [1 K. 21:28, 1 K. 21:29] O happy penitence which has drawn down upon itself the eyes of God, and which has by confessing its error changed the sentence of God's anger! The same conduct is in the Chronicles [2 Chr. 33:12, 2 Chr. 33:13] attributed to Manasseh, and in the book of the prophet Jonah [Jon. 3:5-10] to Nineveh, and in the gospel to the publican. [Luke 18:13] The first of these not only was allowed to obtain forgiveness but also recovered his kingdom, the second broke the force of God's impending wrath, while the third, smiting his breast with his hands, "would not lift up so much as his eyes to heaven." Yet for all that the publican with his humble confession of his faults went back justified far more than the Pharisee with his arrogant boasting of his virtues. This is not however the place to preach penitence, neither am I writing against Montanus and Novatus.⁷ Else would I say of it that it is "a sacrifice ...well pleasing to God," [Ph. 4:18] I would cite the words of the psalmist: "the sacrifices of God are a broken spirit," [Ps. 51:17] and those of Ezekiel "I prefer the repentance of a sinner rather than his death," [Cf. Ezek. 18:23] and those of Baruch, "Arise, arise, O Jerusalem," [Bar. 5:5, cf. Isa. 60:1] and many other proclamations made by the trumpets of the prophets.

5. But this one thing I will say, for it is at once useful to my readers and pertinent to my present theme. As Fabiola was not ashamed of the Lord on earth, so He shall not be ashamed of her in heaven. [Luke 9:26] She laid bare her wound to the gaze of all, and Rome beheld with tears the disfiguring scar which marred her beauty. She uncovered her limbs, bared her head, and closed her mouth. She no longer entered the church of God but, like Miriam the sister of Moses, [Nu. 12:14] she sat apart without the camp, till the priest who had cast her out should himself call her back. She came down like the daughter of Babylon from the throne of her daintiness, she took the millstones and ground meal, she passed barefooted through rivers of tears. [Isa. 47:1, Isa. 47:2] She sat upon the coals of fire, and these became her aid. [Isa. 47:14, Vulg] That face by which she had once pleased her second husband she now smote with blows; she hated jewels, shunned ornaments and could not bear to look upon fine linen.⁸ In fact she bewailed the sin she had committed as bitterly as if it had been adultery, and went to the expense of many remedies in her eagerness to cure her one wound.

6. Having found myself aground in the shallows of Fabiola's sin, I have dwelt thus long upon her penitence in order that I might open up a larger and quite unimpeded space for the description of her praises. Restored to communion before the eyes of the whole church, what did she do? In the day of prosperity she was not forgetful of affliction; [Ecclus. 11:25] and, having once suffered shipwreck she was unwilling again to face the risks of the sea. Instead therefore of re-embarking on her old life, she broke up⁹ and sold all that she could lay hands on of her property (it was large and suitable to her rank), and turning it into money she laid out this for the benefit of the poor. She was the first person to found a hospital, into which she might gather sufferers out of the streets, and where she might nurse the unfortunate victims of sickness and want. Need I now recount the various ailments of human beings? Need I speak of noses slit, eyes put out, feet half burnt, hands covered with sores? Or of limbs dropsical and atrophied? Or of diseased flesh alive with worms? Often did she carry on her own shoulders persons infected with jaundice or with filth. Often too did she wash away the matter discharged from wounds which others, even though men, could not bear to look at. She gave food to her patients with her own hand, and moistened the scarce breathing lips of the dying with sips of liquid. I know of many wealthy and devout persons who, unable to overcome their natural repugnance to such sights, perform this work of mercy by the agency of others, giving money instead of personal aid. I do not blame them and am far from construing their weakness of resolution into a want of faith. While however I pardon such squeamishness, I extol to the skies the enthusiastic zeal of a mind that is above it. A great faith makes little of such trifles. But I know how terrible was the retribution which fell upon the proud mind of the rich man clothed in purple for not having helped Lazarus. [Luke 16:19-24] The poor wretch whom we despise, whom we cannot so much as look at, and the very sight of whom turns our stomachs, is human like ourselves, is made of the same clay as we are, is formed out of the same elements. All that he suffers we too may suffer. Let us then regard his wounds as though they were our own, and then all our insensibility to another's suffering will give way before our pity for ourselves. Not with a hundred tongues or throat of bronze Could I exhaust the forms of fell disease" [Virg. Aen. 6:625-627.] which Fabiola so wonderfully alleviated in the suffering poor that many of the healthy fell to envying the sick. However she showed the same liberality towards the clergy and monks and virgins. Was there a monastery which was not supported by Fabiola's wealth? Was there a naked or bedridden person who was not clothed with garments supplied by her? Were there ever any in want to whom she failed to give a quick and unhesitating supply? Even Rome was not wide enough for her pity. Either in her own person or else through the agency of reverend and trustworthy men she went from island to island and carried her bounty not only round the Etruscan Sea, but throughout the district of the Volscians, as it stands along those secluded and winding shores where communities of monks are to be found.

7. Suddenly she made up her mind, against the advice of all her friends, to take ship and to come to Jerusalem. Here she was welcomed by a large concourse of people and for a short time took advantage of my hospitality. Indeed, when I call to mind our meeting, I seem to see her here now instead of in the past. Blessed Jesus, what zeal, what earnestness she bestowed upon the sacred volumes! In her eagerness to satisfy what was a veritable craving she would run through Prophets, Gospels, and Psalms: she would suggest questions and treasure up the answers in the desk of her own bosom. And yet this eagerness to hear did not bring with it any feeling of satiety: increasing her knowledge she also increased her sorrow, [Eccl. 1:18] and by casting oil upon the flame she did but supply fuel for a still more burning zeal. One day we had before us the book of Numbers written by Moses, and she modestly questioned me as to the meaning of the great mass of names there to be found. Why was it, she inquired, that single tribes were differently associated in this passage and in that, how came it that the soothsayer Balaam in prophesying of the future mysteries of Christ [Nu. 24:15-19] spoke more plainly of Him than almost any other prophet? I replied as best I could and tried to satisfy her enquiries. Then unrolling the book still farther she came to the passage¹⁰ in which is given the list of all the halting-places by which the people after leaving Egypt made its way to the waters of Jordan. And when she asked me the meaning and reason of each of these, I spoke doubtfully about some, dealt with others in a tone of assurance, and in several instances simply confessed my ignorance. Hereupon she began to press me harder still, expostulating with me as though it were a thing unallowable that I should be ignorant of what I did not know, yet at the same time affirming her own unworthiness to understand mysteries so deep. In a word I was ashamed to refuse her request and allowed her to extort from me a promise that I would devote a special work to this subject for her use. Till the present time I have had to defer the fulfilment of my promise: as I now perceive, by the Will of God in order that it should be consecrated to her memory. As in a previous work¹¹ I clothed her with the priestly vestments, so in the pages of the present¹² she may rejoice that she has passed through the wilderness of this world and has come at last to the land of promise.

8. But let me continue the task which I have begun. Whilst I was in search of a suitable dwelling for so great a lady, whose only conception of the solitary life included a place of resort like Mary's inn; suddenly messengers flew this way and that and the whole East was terror-struck. For news came that the hordes of the Huns had poured forth all the way from Maeotis¹³ (they had their haunts between the icy Tanais¹⁴ and the rude Massagetae¹⁵ where the gates of Alexander keep back the wild peoples behind the Caucasus); and that, speeding hither and thither on their nimble-footed horses, they were filling all the world with panic and bloodshed. The Roman army was absent at the time, being detained in Italy on account of the civil wars. Of these Huns Herodotus [Hdt. 1:106, (of the Scythians)] tells us that under Darius King of the Medes they held the East in bondage for twenty years and that from the Egyptians and Ethiopians they exacted a yearly tribute. May Jesus avert from the Roman world the farther assaults of these wild beasts! Everywhere their approach was unexpected, they outstripped rumour in speed, and, when they came, they spared neither religion nor rank nor age, even for wailing infants they had no pity. Children were forced to die before it could be said that they had begun to live; and little ones not realizing their miserable fate might be seen smiling in the hands and at the weapons of their enemies. It was generally agreed that the goal of the invaders was Jerusalem and that it was their excessive desire for gold which made them hasten to this particular city. Its walls uncared for in time of peace were accordingly put in repair. Antioch was in a state of siege. Tyre, desirous of cutting itself off from the land, sought once more its ancient island. We too were compelled to marl our ships and to lie off the shore as a precaution against the arrival of our foes. No matter how hard the winds might blow, we could not but dread the barbarians more than shipwreck. It was not, however, so much for our own safety that we were anxious as for the chastity of the virgins who were with us. Just at that time also there was dissension among us,¹⁶ and our intestine struggles threw into the shade our battle with the barbarians. I myself clung to my long-settled abode in the East and gave way to my deep-seated love for the holy places. Fabiola, used as she was to moving from city to city and having no other property but what her baggage contained, returned to her native land; to live in poverty where she had once been rich, to lodge in the house of another, she who in old days had lodged many guests in her own, and-not unduly to prolong my account-to bestow upon the poor before the eyes of Rome the proceeds of that property which Rome knew her to have sold.

9. This only do I lament that in her the holy places lost a necklace of the loveliest. Rome recovered what it had previously parted with, and the wanton and slanderous tongues of the heathen were confuted by the testimony of their own eyes. Others may commend her pity, her humility, her faith: I will rather praise her ardour of soul. The letter¹⁷ in which as a young man I once urged Heliodorus to the life of a hermit she knew by heart, and whenever she looked upon the walls of Rome she complained that she was in a prison. Forgetful of her sex, unmindful of her frailty, and only desiring to be alone she was in fact there¹⁸ where her soul lingered. The counsels of her friends could not hold her back; so eager was she to burst from the city as from a place of bondage. Nor did she leave the distribution of her alms to others; she distributed them herself. Her wish was that, after equitably dispensing her money to the poor, she might herself find support from others for the sake of Christ. In such haste was she and so impatient of delay that you would fancy her on the eve of her departure. As she was always ready, death could not find her unprepared.

10. As I pen her praises, my dear Pammachius seems suddenly to rise before me. His wife Paulina sleeps that he may keep vigil; she has gone before her husband that he remaining behind may be Christ's servant. Although he was his wife's heir, others-I mean the poor-are now in possession of his inheritance. He and Fabiola contended for the privilege of setting up a tent like that of Abraham¹⁹ at Portus. The contest which arose between them was for the supremacy in shewing kindness. Each conquered and each was overcome. Both admitted themselves to be at once victors and vanquished for what each had desired to effect alone both accomplished together. They united their resources and combined their plans that harmony might forward what rivalry must have brought to nought. No sooner was the scheme broached than it was carried out. A house was purchased to serve as a shelter, and a crowd flocked into it. "There was no more travail in Jacob nor distress in Israel." [Num. 23:21. LXX] The seas carried voyagers to find a welcome here on landing. Travellers left Rome in haste to take advantage of the mild coast before setting sail. What Publius once did in the island of Malta for one apostle and-not to leave room for gainsaying-for a single ship's crew, [Acts 28:7] Fabiola and Pammachius have done over and over again for large numbers; and not only have they supplied the wants of the destitute, but so universal has been their munificence that they have provided additional means for those who have something already. The whole world knows that a home for strangers has been established at Portus; and Britain has learned in the summer what Egypt and Parthia knew in the spring.

11. In the death of this noble lady we have seen a fulfilment of the apostle's words:-"All things work together for good to them that fear God."²⁰ Having a presentiment of what would happen, she had written to several monks to come and release her from the burthen under which she laboured;²¹ for she wished to make to herself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness that they might receive her into everlasting habitations. [Luke 16:9] They came to her and she made them her friends; she fell asleep in the way that she had wished, and having at last laid aside her burthen she soared more lightly up to heaven. How great a marvel Fabiola had been to Rome while she lived came out in the behaviour of the people now that she was dead. Hardly had she breathed her last breath, hardly had she given back her soul to Christ whose it was when "Flying Rumour heralding the woe" [Virg. A. 11:139] gathered the entire city to attend her obsequies. Psalms were chaunted and the gilded ceilings of the temples were shaken with uplifted shouts of Alleluia.

"The choirs of young and old extolled her deeds And sang the praises of her holy soul." [Virg. A. 8:287, 288] Her triumph was more glorious far than those won by Furius over the Gauls, by Papirius over the Samnites, by Scipio over Numantia, by Pompey over Pontus. They had conquered physical force, she had mastered spiritual iniquities. [Eph. 6:12] I seem to hear even now the squadrons which led the van of the procession, and the sound of the feet of the multitude which thronged in thousands to attend her funeral. The streets, porches, and roofs from which a view could be obtained were inadequate to accommodate the spectators. On that day Rome saw all her peoples gathered together in one, and each person present flattered himself that he had some part in the glory of her penitence. No wonder indeed that men should thus exult in the salvation of one at whose conversion there was joy among the angels in heaven. [Luke 15:7, Luke 15:10]

12. I give you this, Fabiola,²² the best gift of my aged powers, to be as it were a funeral offering. Oftentimes have I praised virgins and widows and married women who have kept their garments always white [Eccl. 9:8; Rev. 3:4] and who follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth. [Rev. 14:4] Happy indeed is she in her encomium who throughout her life has been stained by no defilement. But let envy depart and censoriousness be silent. If the father of the house is good why should our eye be evil? [Matt. 20:15] The soul which fell among thieves has been carried home upon the shoulders of Christ. [Luke 10:30; Luke 15:5] In our father's house are many mansions. [John. 14:2] Where sin hath abounded, grace hath much more abounded. [Rom. 5:20] To whom more is forgiven the same loveth more. [Luke 7:47]

1:

Letter XXXIX

2:

Letter LX

3:

Letter LXVI

4:

Ennius

5:

A Roman jurist of great renown who held high legal office first under Marcus Aurelius and afterwards under Severus. He was put to death by Caracalla

6: A senator who having conspired against Nero was by that emperor put to death. His palace on the Aelian Hill was long afterwards bestowed by Constantine upon pope Silvester who made it a church which it has ever since remained 7: Rigourists who denied the power of the Church to absolve persons who had fallen into sin

8: Linteamina 9: Dilapidare, vendre pierre à pierre-Goelzer

10:

Nu. xxxiii

11: Letter LXIV 12: Letter LXXVIII. on the Mansions or Halting-places of Israel in the Desert 13: The Sea of Azov

14: The Don 15: An Asiatic tribe to the East of the Caspian Sea

16:

The Origenistic controversy in which Jerome, Paula and Epiphanius took one side, John bishop of Jerusalem, Rufinus, and Melania the other

17: Letter XIV 18: i.e. in the desert where many women lived as solitaries 19: Like that in which Abraham entertained the angels. See Letter LXVI. 11 20: Rom. 8:28 - note that Jerome substitutes 'fear O' for 'love. O 21: The remnant of her fortune 22: i.e. Letter LXXVIII. q. v

Letters - letter_078

Letter 78. To Fabiola. A treatise on the Forty-two Mansions or Halting-places of the Israelites, originally intended for Fabiola but not completed until after her death. Sent to Oceanus along with the preceding letter. These Mansions are made an emblem of the Christian's pilgrimage, the true Hebrew hastening to pass from earth to heaven. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. In the seventy-seventh Psalm, which we believe was spoken by the Lord's person according to the Evangelist Matthew (Chapter 13, verse 35), the story is narrated of the ten plagues in Egypt and the departure of Israel into the wilderness. And since it is certain that what has been written has been done, as if one letter sounds one thing, while the closed spirit holds another: 'I will open my mouth in a parable: I will utter propositions from the beginning. What we have heard and seen, the same we have received and our fathers have told us' (Psalm 77, 2 and 3). And so the Apostle in the same words, because of the same spirit: "Now all these things happened to them in figure, and they are written for our correction, upon whom the ends of the world are come." (1 Corinthians 10:11); and "For I would not have you ignorant, brethren, that our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea. And all in Moses were baptized, in the cloud, and in the sea: And all did eat the same spiritual food, And all drank the same spiritual drink; (and they drank of the spiritual rock that followed them, and the rock was Christ.)" (I Corinthians 10:1 et seqq.). Therefore, if a part of the history of the journey from Egypt is understood spiritually, and the other things which were omitted by the Apostle due to the shortage of time are understood to be of the same meaning. For the same Prophet who said in another place, "I have dwelt with the inhabitants of Cedar: My soul has been too long a sojourner" (Psalm 119:5): not being able to bear the absence of the Holy Land, he laments most bitterly and says: "I remembered these things, and poured out my soul within me, that I might pass into the place of the wondrous tabernacle, even to the house of God: With the voice of joy and praise, of the multitude keeping holiday" (Psalm 41:5). And in another Psalm: "Open my eyes, and I will consider the wonders of your law" (Psalm 118:18). Paul also said, "The law is spiritual" (Rom. 7:14). And the Lord himself said, "If you believed Moses, you would believe me, for he wrote of me" (John 5:47). And the Gospel according to Luke: "Then beginning with Moses and all the Prophets, [Jesus] interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself" (Luke 24:27). Therefore, let Jewish children and those who cannot swallow solid food, but are still nourished by milk in infancy (1 Cor. 3), read about Pharaoh's flesh and the Red Sea, through which one sails to India: and the manna like coriander: and let them hear all that is written, the leprosy of houses and of skin, and of fabric; the ox that kills and the animal guilty of adultery; and the Hebrews who, because they desire to serve a wife and children, have their ears pierced with a bodkin. But we, abandoning Capernaum, once a beautiful land, and going with Jesus into the wilderness, are fed by his loaves (Matthew 14; and Mark 6): if we are foolish and like beasts, [we eat] barley; but if rational animals, [we eat] wheat, and [bread] made from the corn. The [grain], when it falls to the ground and dies, brings forth many fruits. Egypt was struck by nine plagues, and Pharaoh was broken, so that he might dismiss the people of God. At last the firstborn were destroyed so that the firstborn of Israel might be consecrated to the Lord. Those who before desired to possess them, instantly expelled them. The exterminator passes by, and he does not dare to touch the land of Goshen, the pastoral land that had been watered by rains; for their doorposts were marked with the blood of the lamb, and they spoke by their deeds: "The light of Your countenance, O Lord, is marked upon us" (Ps. 4:7). Hence it is that the feast itself is called the Passover, which we can also call the passage, because, advancing from worse to better things, we leave dark Egypt. But now the time has come for us to fulfill the promises and follow the order of the Israelite dwellings.

2. It is written in the last part of the book of Numbers (Chapter 33), which is called Vaydabber among the Hebrews: 'These are the encampments of the children of Israel, who came out of the land of Egypt by their troops in the hand of Moses and Aaron'; which the Greeks call ■π■ρσεις, we, because of the property of the language, more significantly turned to 'mansions,' or because it is said of the army, we translate 'camps.' However, there is a list of Mansions from the first to the last; and altogether forty-two are numbered, of which Matthew speaks: "From Abraham to David there were fourteen generations, and from David to the exile to Babylon fourteen generations; and from the exile to Babylon to Christ fourteen generations, that is, altogether forty-two generations" (Matthew 1.17). Through these, the true Hebrew runs, who hastens to pass from earth to heaven: and having forsaken the world of Egypt, he enters the land of promise. It is not surprising if we arrive at the kingdom of heaven by means of the sacrament of numbers in that [sacrament], under which the Lord and Savior came from the first Patriarch to the Virgin, as if to the Jordan, which, flowing in a full stream, was overflowing with the graces of the Holy Spirit. What is written as having come forth from the hand of Moses and Aaron, understand as the law and the priesthood, the works, and the worship of God; one needs the other. For exercising virtues is useless, if you do not know the Creator; and the worship of God does not benefit salvation, if you do not fulfill the precepts of the Creator. With these two hands, as if with two Seraphim, we burst forth in confession of the Holy Trinity, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts.

Letters - letter_079

Letter 79. To Salvina. A letter of consolation addressed by Jerome to Salvina (a lady of the imperial court) on the death of her husband Nebridius. After excusing his temerity in addressing a complete stranger Jerome eulogizes the virtues of Nebridius, particularly his chastity and his bounty to the poor. He next warns Salvina (in no courtier-like terms) of the dangers that will beset her as a widow and recommends her to devote all her energies to the careful training of the son and daughter who are now her principal charge. The tone of the letter is somewhat arrogant and it can hardly be regarded as one of Jerome's happiest efforts. Salvina, however, consecrated her life to deeds of piety, and became one of Chrysostom's deaconesses. Its date is 400 a.d.

1. My desire to do my duty may, I fear, expose me to a charge of self-seeking; and although I do but follow the example of Him who said: "learn of me for I am meek and lowly of heart," [Matt. 11:29] the course that I am taking may be attributed to a desire for notoriety. Men may say that I am not so much trying to console a widow in affliction as endeavouring to creep into the imperial court; and that, while I make a pretext of offering comfort, I am really seeking the friendship of the great. Clearly this will not be the opinion of any one who knows the commandment: "thou shalt not respect the person of the poor," [Lev. 19:15] a precept given lest under pretext of shewing pity we should judge unjust judgment. For each individual is to be judged not by his personal importance but by the merits of his case. His wealth need not stand in the way of the rich man, if he makes a good use of it; and poverty can be no recommendation to the poor if in the midst of squalor and want he fails to keep clear of wrong doing. Proofs of these things are not wanting either in scriptural times or our own; for Abraham, in spite of his immense wealth, was "the friend of God" [Isa. 41:8; Jas. 2:23] and poor men are daily arrested and punished for their crimes by law. She whom I now address is both rich and poor so that she cannot say what she actually has. For it is not of her purse that I am speaking but of the purity of her soul. I do not know her face but I am well acquainted with her virtues; for report speaks well of her and her youth makes her chastity all the more commendable. By her grief for her young husband she has set an example to all wives; and by her resignation she has proved that she believes him not lost but gone before. The greatness of her bereavement has brought out the reality of her religion. For while she forgets her lost Nebridius, she knows that in Christ he is with her still. But why do I write to one who is a stranger to me? For three reasons. First, because (as a priest is bound to do) I love all Christians as my children and find my glory in promoting their welfare. Secondly because the father of Nebridius was bound to me by the closest ties.¹ Lastly-and this is a stronger reason than the others-because I have failed to say no to my son Avitus.² With an importunacy surpassing that of the widow towards the unjust judge [Luke 18:1-5] he wrote to me so frequently and put before me so many instances in which I had previously dealt with a similar theme, that he overcame my modest reluctance and made the resolve to do not what would best become me but what would most nearly meet his wishes.

2. As the mother of Nebridius was sister to the empress³ and as he was brought up in the bosom of his aunt, another might perhaps praise him for having so much endeared himself to the unvanquished emperor. Theodosius, indeed, procured him from Africa a wife of the highest rank,⁴ who, as her native land at this time was distracted by civil wars, became a kind of hostage for its loyalty. I ought to say at the very outset that Nebridius seems to have had a presentiment that he would die early. For amid the splendour of the palace and in the high positions to which his rank and not his years entitled him he lived always as one who believed that he must soon go to meet Christ. Of Cornelius, the centurion of the Italian band, the sacred narrative tells us that God so fully accepted him as to send to him an angel; and that this angel told him that to his merit was due the mystery whereby Peter from the narrow limits of the circumcision was conveyed to the wide field of the uncircumcision. He was the first Gentile baptized by the apostle, and in him the Gentiles were set apart to salvation. Now of this man it is written: "there was a certain man in Caesarea called Cornelius, a centurion of the band called the Italian band, a devout man and one that feared God with all his house, which gave much alms to the people, and prayed to God alway." [Acts 10:1, Acts 10:2] All this that is said of him I claim-with a change of name only-for my dear Nebridius. So "devout" was this latter and so enamoured of chastity that at his marriage he was still pure. So truly did he "fear God with all his house" that forgetting his high position he spent all his time with monks and clergymen. So profuse were the alms which he gave to the people that his doors were continually beset with swarms of sick and poor. And assuredly he "prayed to God alway" that what was for the best might happen to him. Therefore "speedily was he taken away lest that wickedness should alter his understanding ...for his soul pleased the Lord." [Wisdom 4:11, Wisdom 4:14] Thus I may truthfully apply to him the apostle's words: "Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him." [Acts 10:34, Acts 10:35] As a soldier Nebridius took no harm from his cloak and sword-belt and troops of orderlies; for while he wore the uniform of the emperor he was enlisted in the service of God. On the other hand nothing is gained by men who while they affect coarse mantles, sombre tunics, dirt, and poverty, belie by their deeds their lofty pretensions. Of another centurion we find in the gospel this testimony from our Lord: "I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel." [Matt. 8:10] And, to go back to earlier times, we read of Joseph who gave proof of his integrity both when he was in want and when he was rich, and who inculcated freedom of soul both as slave and as lord. He was made next to Pharaoh and invested with the emblems of royalty; [Gen. 41:42-44] yet so dear was he to God that, alone of all the patriarchs, he became the father of two tribes. [Gen. 41:50-52] Daniel and the three children were set over the affairs of Babylon and were numbered among the princes of the state; yet although they wore the dress of Nebuchadnezzar, in their hearts they served God. Mordecai also and Esther amid purple and silk and jewels overcame pride with humility; and although captives were so highly esteemed as to be able to impose commands upon their conquerors.

3. These remarks are intended to shew that the youth of whom I speak used his kinship to the royal family, his abundant wealth, and the outward tokens of power, as helps to virtue. For, as the preacher says, "wisdom is a defence and money is a defence" [Eccl. 7:12] also. We must not hastily conclude that this statement conflicts with that of the Lord: "verily I say unto you that a rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven; and again I say unto you, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." [Matt. 19:23, Matt. 19:24] Were it so, the salvation of Zacchaeus the publican, described in scripture as a man of great wealth, would contradict the Lord's declaration. But that what is impossible with men is possible with God [Mark 10:27] we are taught by the counsel of the apostle who thus writes to Timothy:-"charge them that are rich in this world that they be not highminded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God who giveth us richly all things to enjoy, that they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute. willing to communicate, laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come that they may lay hold on the true life."⁵ We have learned how a camel can pass through a needle's eye, how an animal with a hump on its back,⁶ when it has laid down its packs, can take to itself the wings of a dove [Ps. 55:6] and rest in the branches of the tree which has grown from a grain of mustard seed. [Matt. 13:31, Matt. 13:32] In Isaiah we read of camels, the dromedaries of Midian and Ephah and Sheba, which carry gold and incense to the city of the Lord. [Isa. 60:6] On like typical camels the Ishmaelitic merchantmen [Gen. 37:25] bring down to the Egyptians perfume and incense and balm (of the kind that grows in Gilead good for the healing of wounds [Jer. 8:22]); and so fortunate are they that in the purchase and sale of Joseph they have for their merchandise the Saviour of the world.⁷ And Aesop's fable tells us of a mouse which after eating its fill can no longer creep out as before it crept in. [Horace, Epist. I. 7:30, 31]

4. Daily did my dear Nebridius revolve the words: "they that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare" of the devil "and into many lusts." [1 Tim. 6:9] All the money that the Emperor's bounty gave him or that his badges of office procured him he laid out for the benefit of the poor. For he knew the commandment of the Lord: "If thou wilt be perfect go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and come and follow me." [Matt. 19:21] And because he could not literally fulfil these directions, having a wife and little children and a large household, he made to himself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness that they might receive him into everlasting habitations. [Luke 16:9] He did not once for all cast away his brethren, as did the apostles who forsook father and nets and ship, [Matt. 4:18-22] but by an equality he ministered to the want of others out of his own abundance that afterwards their wealth might be a supply for his own want. [2 Cor. 8:14] The lady to whom this letter is addressed knows that what I narrate is only known to me by hearsay, but she is aware also that I am no Greek writer repaying with flattery some benefit conferred upon me. Far be such an imputation from all Christians. Having food and raiment we are therewith content. [1 Tim. 6:8] Where there is cheap cabbage and household bread, a sufficiency to eat and a sufficiency to drink, these riches are superfluous and no place is left for flattery with its sordid calculations. You may conclude therefore that, where there is no motive to tell a falsehood, the testimony given is true.

5. It must not, however, be supposed that I praise Nebridius only for his liberality in alms-giving, although we are taught the great importance of this in the words: "water will quench a flaming fire; and alms maketh an atonement for sins." [Ecclus. 3:30] I will pass on now to his other virtues each one of which is to be found but in few men. Who ever entered the furnace of the King of Babylon without being burned? [Cf. Dan. 3:25] Was there ever a young man whose garment his Egyptian mistress did not seize? [Gen. 39:12] Was there ever a eunuch's⁸ wife contented with a childless marriage bed? Is there any man who is not appalled by the struggle of which the apostle says: "I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members?" [Rom. 7:23] But wonderful to say Nebridius, though bred up in a palace as a companion and fellow pupil of the Augusti⁹ (whose table is supplied by the whole world and ministered to by land and sea); Nebridius, I say, though in the midst of abundance and in the flower of his age, shewed himself more modest than a girl and never gave occasion, even the slightest, for scandalous rumours. Again though he was the friend, companion, and cousin of princes and had been educated along with them—a thing which makes even strangers intimate—he did not allow pride to inflate him or frown with contempt upon others who were less fortunate than he: no, he was kind to all, and while he loved the princes as brothers he revered them as sovereigns. He used to avow that his own health and safety were dependent upon theirs. Their attendants and all those officers of the palace who by their numbers add to the grandeur of the imperial court he had so well conciliated by shewing his regard for them, that men who were in reality inferior to him were led by his attention to believe themselves his peers. It is no easy task to throw one's rank into the shade by one's virtue, or to gain the affection of men who are forced to yield you precedence. What widow was not supported by his help? What ward did not find in him a father? To him the bishops of the entire East used to bring the prayers of the unfortunate and the petitions of the distressed. Whenever he asked the Emperor for a boon, he sought either alms for the poor or ransom for captives or clemency for the afflicted. Accordingly the princes also used gladly to accede to his requests, for they knew well that their bounty would benefit not one man but many.

6. Why do I farther postpone the end? "All flesh is grass and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field." [Isa. 40:6] The dust has returned to the dust. [Gen. 3:19] He has fallen asleep in the Lord and has been laid with his fathers, full of days and of light and fostered in a good old age. For "wisdom is the grey hair unto men." [Wisd. 4:9] "In a short time he" has "fulfilled a long time." [Wisd. 4:13] In his place we now have his charming children. His wife is the heir of his chastity. To those who miss his father the tiny Nebridius shews him once more, for "Such were the eyes and hands and looks he bore." [Virg. A. 3:490] A spark of the parent's excellence shines in the son: the child's face betrays like a mirror a resemblance in character.

"That narrow frame contains a hero's heart." [Virg. G. 4:82] And with him there is his sister, a basket of roses and lilies, a mixture of ivory and purple. Her face though it takes after that of her father inclines to be still more attractive; and, while her complexion is that of her mother, she is so like both her parents that the lineaments of each are reflected in her features. So sweet and honied is she that she is the pride of all her kinsfolk. The Emperor¹⁰ does not disdain to hold her in his arms, and the Empress¹¹ likes nothing better than to nurse her on her lap. Everyone runs to be the first to catch her up. Now she clings to the neck of one, and now she is fondled in the arms of another. She prattles and stammers, and is all the sweeter for her faltering tongue.

7. You have, therefore, Salvina, those to nurse who may well represent to you your absent husband: "Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord; and the fruit of the womb is his reward." [Ps. 127:3] In the place of one husband you have received two children, and thus your affection has more objects than before. All that was due to him you can give to them. Temper grief with love, for if he is gone they are still with you. It is no small merit in God's eyes to bring up children well. Hear the apostle's counsel: "Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man, well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work." [1 Tim. 5:9, 1 Tim. 5:10] Here you learn the roll of the virtues which God requires of you, what is due to the name of widow which you bear, and by what good deeds you can attain to that second degree of chastity¹² which is still open to you. Do not be disturbed because the apostle allows none to be chosen as a widow under threescore years old, neither suppose that he intends to reject those who are still young. Believe that you are indeed chosen by him who said to his disciple, "Let no man despise thy youth," [1 Tim. 4:12] your want of age that is, not your want of continence. If this be not his meaning, all who become widows under threescore years will have to take husbands. He is training a church still untaught in Christ, and making provision for people of all stations but especially for the poor, the charge of whom had been committed to himself and Barnabas. [Gal. 2:9, Gal. 2:10] Thus he wishes only those to be supported by the exertions of the church who cannot labour with their own hands, and who are widows indeed, [Cf. 1 Tim. 5:3] approved by their years and by their lives. The faults of his children made Eli the priest an offence to God. On the other hand He is appeased by the virtues of such as "continue in faith and charity and holiness with chastity."¹³ "O Timothy," cries the apostle, "keep thyself pure." [1 Tim. 5:22] Far be it from me to suspect you capable of doing anything wrong; still it is only a kindness to admonish one whose youth and opulence lead her into temptation. You must take what I am going to say as addressed not to you but to your girlish years. A widow "that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth." [1 Tim. 5:6] So speaks the "chosen vessel" [Acts 9:15] and the words are brought out from his treasure who could boldly say: "Do ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me?" [2 Cor. 13:3, Vulg] Yet they are the words of one who in his own person admitted the weakness of the human body, saying: "The good that I would I do not: but the evil which I would not that I do." [Rom. 7:19] And again: Therefore "I keep under my body and bring it into subjection lest that by any means when I have preached to others I myself should be a castaway." [1 Cor. 9:27] If Paul is afraid, which of us can venture to be confident? If David the friend of God and Solomon who loved God [1 K. 3:3] were overcome like other men, if their fall is meant to warn us and their penitence to lead us to salvation, who in this slippery life can be sure of not falling? Never let pheasants be seen upon your table, or plump turtledoves or black cock from Ionia, or any of those birds so expensive that they fly away with the largest properties. And do not fancy that you eschew meat diet when you reject pork, hare, and venison and the savoury flesh of other quadrupeds.¹⁴ It is not the number of feet that makes the difference but delicacy of flavour. I know that the apostle has said: "every creature of God is good and nothing to be refused if it be received with thanksgiving." [1 Tim. 4:4] But the same apostle says: "it is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine," [Rom. 14:21] and in another place: "be not drunk with wine wherein is excess." [Eph. 5:18] "Every creature of God is good"-the precept is intended for those who are careful how they may please their husbands. [1 Cor. 7:34] Let those feed on flesh who serve the flesh, whose bodies boil with desire, who are tied to husbands, and who set their hearts on having offspring. Let those whose wombs are burthened cram their stomachs with flesh. But you have buried every indulgence in your husband's tomb: over his bier you have cleansed with tears a face stained with rouge and whitelead; you have exchanged a white robe and gilded buskins for a sombre tunic and black shoes; and only one thing more is needed, perseverance in fasting. Let paleness and squalor be henceforth your jewels. Do not pamper your youthful limbs with a bed of down or kindle your young blood with hot baths. Hear what words a heathen poet [Virgil, Aen. 4:28, 29] puts into the mouth of a chaste widow:¹⁵ "He, my first spouse, has robbed me of my loves. So be it: let him keep them in the tomb."

If common glass is worth so much, what must be the value of a pearl of price?¹⁶ If in deference to a law of nature a Gentile widow can condemn all sensual indulgence, what must we expect from a Christian widow who owes her chastity not to one who is dead but to one with whom she shall reign in heaven?

8. Do not, I pray you, regard these general remarks-applying as they do to all young women-as intended to insult you or to take you to task. I write in a spirit of apprehension, yet pray that you may never know the nature of my fears. A woman's reputation is a tender plant; it is like a fair flower which withers at the slightest blast and fades away at the first breath of wind. Especially is this so when she is of an age to fall into temptation and the authority of a husband is wanting to her. For the very shadow of a husband is a wife's safeguard. What has a widow to do with a large household or with troops of retainers? As servants, it is true, she must not despise them, but as men she ought to blush before them. If a grand establishment requires such domestics, let her at least set over them an old man of spotless morals whose dignity may guard the honour of his mistress. I know of many widows who, although they live with closed doors, have not escaped the imputation of too great intimacy with their servants. These latter become objects of suspicion when they dress above their degree, or when they are stout and sleek, or when they are of an age inclined to passion, or when knowledge of the favour in which they are secretly held betrays itself in a too confident demeanour. For such pride, however carefully concealed, is sure to break out in a contempt for fellow-servants as servants. I make these seemingly superfluous remarks that you may keep your heart with all diligence [Prov. 4:23] and guard against every scandal that may be broached concerning you.

9. Take no well-curved steward to walk with you, no effeminate actor, no devilish singer of poisoned sweetness, no spruce and smooth-shorn youth. Let no theatrical compliments, no obsequious adulation be associated with you. Keep with you bands of widows and virgins; and let your consolers be of your own sex. The character of the mistress is judged by that of the maid. So long as you have with you a holy mother, so long as an aunt vowed to virginity is at your side, you ought not to neglect them and at your own risk to seek the company of strangers. Let the divine scripture be always in your hands, and give yourself so frequently to prayer that such shafts of evil thoughts as ever assail the young may thereby find a shield to repel them. It is difficult, nay more it is impossible, to escape the beginnings of those internal motions which the Greeks with much significance call "προπαιθεῖαι" that is 'predispositions to passion.' The fact is that suggestions of sin tickle all our minds, and the decision rests with our own hearts either to admit or to reject the thoughts which come. The Lord of nature Himself says in the gospel: "out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies." [Matt. 15:19] It is clear from the testimony of another book that "the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth," [Gen. 8:21] and that the soul wavers between the works of the flesh and of the spirit enumerated by the apostle, [Gal. 5:19-23] desiring now the former and now the latter. For "From faults no mortal man is wholly free; The best is he who has but few of them." [Horace, Sat. I 3:68, 69] And, to quote the same poet, "At moles men cavil when they mark fair skins." [Horace, Sat. I. 6:66] To the same effect in different words the prophet says: "I am so troubled that I cannot speak," [Ps. 77:4] and in the same book, "Be ye angry and sin not." [Ps. 4:4, LXX. Quoted Eph. 4:26] So Archytas of Tarentum¹⁷ once said to a careless steward: "I should have flogged you to death had I not been in a passion." For "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." [Jas. 1:20] Now what is here said of one form of perturbation may be applied to all. Just as anger is human and the repression of it Christian, so it is with other passions. The flesh always lusts after the things of the flesh, and by its allurements draws the soul to partake of deadly pleasures; but it is for us Christians to restrain the desire for sensual indulgence by an intenser love for Christ. It is for us to break in the mettlesome brute within us by fasting, in order that it may desire not lust but food and amble easily and steadily forward having for its rider the Holy Spirit.

10. Why do I write thus? To shew you that you are but human and subject, unless you guard against them, to human passions. We are all of us made of the same clay and formed of the same elements. Whether we wear silk or rags we are all at the mercy of the same desire. It does not fear the royal purple; it does not disdain the squalor of the mendicant. It is better then to suffer in stomach than in soul to rule the body than to serve it, to lose one's balance than to lose one's chastity. Let us not lull ourselves with the delusion that we can always fall back on penitence. For this is at best but a remedy for misery. Let us shrink from incurring a wound which must be painful to cure. For it is one thing to enter the haven of salvation with ship safe and merchandise uninjured, and another to cling naked to a plank and, as the waves toss you this way and that, to be dashed again and again on the sharp rocks. A widow should be ignorant that second marriage is permitted; she should know nothing of the apostle's words: "It is better to marry than to burn." [1 Cor. 7:9] Remove what is said to be worse, the risk of burning, and marriage will cease to be regarded as good. Of course I repudiate the slanders of the heretics; I know that "marriage is honourable ...and the bed undefiled." [Heb. 13:4] Yet Adam even after he was expelled from paradise had but one wife. The accursed and blood-stained Lamech, descended from the stock of Cain, was the first to make out of one rib two wives; and the seedling of digamy then planted was altogether destroyed by the doom of the deluge. It is true that in writing to Timothy the apostle from fear of fornication is forced to countenance second marriage. His words are these: "I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully." But he immediately adds as a reason for this concession; "for some are already turned aside after Satan." [1 Tim. 5:14, 1 Tim. 5:15] Thus we see that he is offering not a crown to those who stand but a helping hand to those who are down. What must a second marriage be if it is looked on merely as an alternative to the brothel! "For some," he writes, "are already turned aside after Satan." The upshot of the whole matter is that, if a young widow cannot or will not contain herself, she had better take a husband to her bed than the devil. A noble alternative truly which is only to be embraced in preference to Satan! In old days even Jerusalem went a-whoring and opened her feet to every one that passed by. [Ezek. 16:25] It was in Egypt that she was first deflowered and there that her teats were bruised. [Ezek. 23:3] And afterwards when she had come to the wilderness and, impatient of the delays of her leader Moses, had said when maddened by the stings of lust: "these be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt," [Exod. 32:4] she received statutes that were not good and commandments that were altogether evil whereby she should not live [Ezek. 20:25] but should be punished through them. Is it surprising then that when the apostle had said in another place of young widows: "when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ they will marry, having damnation because they have cast off their first faith," [1 Tim. 5:11, 1 Tim. 5:12] he granted to such as should wax wanton statutes of digamy that were not good and commandments that were altogether evil? For the reason which he gives for allowing a second husband would justify a woman in marrying a third or even, if she liked, a twentieth. He evidently wished to shew them that he was not so much anxious that they should take husbands as that they should avoid paramours. These things, dearest daughter in Christ, I impress upon you and frequently repeat, that you may forget those things which are behind and reach forth unto those things which are before. [Phil. 3:13] You have widows like yourself worthy to be your models, Judith renowned in Hebrew story and Anna the daughter of Phanuel famous in the gospel. Both these lived day and night in the temple and preserved the treasure of their chastity by prayer and by fasting. One was a type of the Church which cuts off the head of the devil¹⁸ and the other first received in her arms the saviour of the world and had revealed to her the holy mysteries which were to come. [Luke 2:36-38] In conclusion I beg you to attribute the shortness of my letter not to want of language or scarcity of matter but to a deep sense of modesty which makes me fear to force myself too long upon the ears of a stranger, and causes me to dread the secret verdict of those who read my words.

1: Also named Nebridius, Prefect of Gaul, then of the East 2: See letter CXXIV 3: Aelia Flaccilla, the wife of Theodosius who is here called "the unvanquished emperor.

4: Salvina was the daughter of Gildo who at the time was tributary king of Mauritania 5: 1 Tim. 6:17-19: AV. has "eternal life" in the last verse 6: Animal tortuosum. The epithet recurs in Letter CVII 7: So the Vulgate renders Zaphnath-Paaneah the name given to Joseph by Pharaoh. (Gen. 41:45) 8: The allusion is to the word "officer" in Gen. 37:36. See AV. margin 9: Arcadius and Honorius

10:

Arcadius

11: Eudoxia 12: The three degrees of chastity are those of a virgin, a widow, and a wife 13: 1 Tim. 2:15. AV. has `sobriety 0' for `chastity. 0

14: Many drew a distinction between the flesh of quadrupeds and that of birds, abstaining from the former but using the latter 15: Dido, queen of Carthage 16: Quoted from Tertullian (ad Mart. IV.). The same words recur in Letters CVII. and CXXX 17: A pythagorean philosopher, mathematician, general, and statesman. He was a contemporary of Plato 18: As Judith cut off the head of Holofernes (Judith xiii.)

Letters - letter_080

Letter 80. From Rufinus to Macarius.

Rufinus on his return from Bethlehem to Rome published a Latin version of Origen's treatise "περί Ἀρχῆς", On First Principles. To this he prefixed the preface which is here printed among Jerome's letters. Professing to take as his model Jerome's own translations of Origen's commentaries which he greatly praises, he declares that, following his example, he has paraphrased the obscure passages of the treatise and has paraphrased the obscure passages of the treatise and has omitted as due to interpolators such parts as seem heretical. This preface with its insincere praise of Jerome (whose name, however, is not mentioned) and its avowed manipulation of Origen's text caused much perplexity at Rome (see Letters LXXXI., LXXXIII., and LXXXIV.), and gave rise to the controversy between Rufinus and Jerome described in the Prolegomena, and given at length in vol. iii. of this Series. The date is 398 a.d.

1. Large numbers of the brethren have, I know, in their zeal for the knowledge of the scriptures begged learned men skilled in Greek literature to make Origen a Roman by bringing home his teaching to Latin ears. One of these scholars, a dear brother and associate,¹ at the request of bishop Damasus translated from Greek into Latin his two homilies on the Song of Songs and prefaced the work with an eloquent and eulogistic introduction such as could not fail to arouse in all an ardent desire to read and to study Origen. To the soul of that just man-so he declared-the words of the Song were applicable: "the king hath brought me into his chambers;"² and he went on to speak thus: "while in his other books Origen surpasses all former writers, in dealing with the Song of Songs he surpasses himself." In his preface he pledges himself to give to Roman ears these homilies of Origen and as many of his other works as he can. His style is certainly attractive but I can see that he aims at a more ambitious task than that of a mere translator. Not content with rendering the words of Origen he desires to be himself the teacher.³ I for my part do but follow up an enterprise which he has sanctioned and commenced, but I lack his vigorous eloquence with which to adorn the sayings of this great man. I am even afraid lest my deficiencies and inadequate command of Latin may detract seriously from the reputation of one whom this writer has deservedly termed second only to the apostles as a teacher of the Church in knowledge and in wisdom.

2. Often turning this over in my mind I held my peace and refused to listen to the brethren when-as frequently happened-they urged me to undertake the work. But your persistence, most faithful brother Macarius, is so great that even want of ability cannot resist it. Thus, to escape the constant importunings to which you subject me, I have given way contrary to my resolution; yet only on these terms that, so far as is possible, I am to be free to follow the rules of translation laid down by my predecessors, and particularly those acted upon by the writer whom I have just mentioned. He has rendered into Latin more than seventy of Origen's homiletical treatises and a few also of his commentaries upon the apostle;⁴ and in these wherever the Greek text presents a stumbling block, he has smoothed it down in his version and has so emended the language used that a Latin writer can find no word that is at variance with our faith. In his steps, therefore, I propose to walk, if not displaying the same vigorous eloquence at least observing the same rules. I shall not reproduce passages in Origen's books which disagree with or contradict his own statements elsewhere. The reason of these inconsistencies I have put more fully before you in the defence of Origen's writings composed by Pamphilianus⁵ which I have supplemented by a short treatise of my own. I have given what I consider plain proofs that his books have been corrupted in numbers of places by heretics and ill-disposed persons, and particularly those which you now urge me to translate. The books "περὶ Ἀρχῶν", that is of Principles or of Powers, are in fact in other respects extremely obscure and difficult. For they treat of subjects on which the philosophers have spent all their days and yet have been able to discover nothing. In dealing with these themes Origen has done his best to make belief in a Creator and a rational account of things created subservient to religion and not, as with the philosophers, to irreligion. Wherever then in his books I have found a statement concerning the Trinity contrary to those which in other places he has faithfully made on the same subject, I have either omitted the passage as garbled and misleading or have substituted that view of the matter which I find him to have frequently asserted. Again, wherever-in haste to get on with his theme-he is brief or obscure relying on the skill and intelligence of his readers, I, to make the passage clearer, have sought to explain it by adding any plainer statements that I have read on the point in his other books. But I have added nothing of my own. The words used may be found in other parts of his writings: they are his, not mine. I mention this here to take from cavillers all pretext for once more⁶ finding fault. But let such perverse and contentious persons look well to what they are themselves doing.

3. Meantime I have taken up this great task-if so be that God will grant your prayers-not to stop the mouths of slanderers (an impossible feat except perhaps to God) but to give to those who desire it the means of making progress in knowledge. In the sight of God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost,⁷ I adjure and require everyone who shall either read or copy these books of mine, by his belief in a kingdom to come, by the mystery of the resurrection from the dead, by the eternal fire which is "prepared for the devil and his angels;" [Matt. 25:41] as he hopes not to inherit eternally that place where "there is weeping and gnashing of teeth," [Matt. 22:13] and where "their worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched," [Mark 9:44] let him add nothing to what is written, let him subtract nothing, let him insert nothing, let him alter nothing, but let him compare his transcript with the copies from which it is made, let him correct it to the letter, and let him punctuate it aright. Every manuscript that is not properly corrected and punctuated he must reject: for otherwise the difficulties in the text arising from the want of punctuation will make obscure arguments still more obscure to those who read them.

1: i.e. Jerome 2: Cant. 1:4. See the Preface to Origen on the Canticles translated in this volume 3: Rem maioris gloriae sequitur ut pater verbi sit potius quam interpres 4: i.e. St. Paul

5:

Or Pamphilus

6: See this treatise in vol. 3: of this series. Rufinus with John of Jerusalem had been already accused of Origenism. See Letter LI. 6 7: For this adjuration comp. Rev. 22:18, Rev. 22:19, and Stieren's Irenaeus 1:821

Letters - letter_081

Letter 81. To Rufinus. A friendly letter of remonstrance written by Jerome to Rufinus on receipt of his version of the "περὶ τῆς ἀρχῆς" (see the preceding letter). Being sent in the first instance to Pammachius this latter treacherously suppressed it and thus put an end to all hope of the reconciliation of the two friends. The date of the letter is 399 a.d.

1. That you have lingered some time at Rome your own language shews. Yet I feel sure that a yearning to see your spiritual parents¹ would have drawn you to your native country,² had not grief for your mother deterred you lest a sorrow scarce bearable away might have proved unbearable at home. As to your complaint that men listen only to the dictates of passion and refuse to acquiesce in your judgement and mine; the Lord is witness to my conscience that since our reconciliation I have harboured no rancour in my breast to injure anyone; on the contrary I have taken the utmost pains to prevent any chance occurrence being set down to ill-will. But what can I do so long as everyone supposes that he has a right to do as he does and thinks that in publishing a slander he is requiting not originating a calumny? True friendship ought never to conceal what it thinks. The short preface to the books "περὶ τῆς ἀρχῆς" which has been sent to me I recognize as yours by the style. You know best with what intention it was written; but even a fool can see how it must necessarily be understood. Covertly or rather openly I am the person aimed at. I have often myself reigned a controversy to practise declamation.³ Thus I might now recall this well-worn artifice and praise you in your own method.⁴ But far be it from me to imitate what I blame in you. In fact I have so far restrained my feelings that I make no charge against you, and, although injured, decline for my part to injure a friend. But another time, if you wish to follow any one, pray be satisfied with your own judgement. The objects which we seek are either good or bad. If they are good, they need no help from another; and if they are bad, the fact that many sin together is no excuse. I prefer thus to expostulate with you as a friend rather than to give public vent to my indignation at the wrong I have suffered. I want you to see that when I am reconciled to anyone I become his sincere friend and do not-to borrow a figure from Plautus [Plautus, Aul. 2:2, 18] -while offering him bread with one hand, hold a stone in the other.

2. My brother Paulinian has not yet returned from home and I fancy that you will see him at Aquileia at the house of the reverend pope Chromatius.⁵ I am also sending the reverend presbyter Rufinus⁶ on business to Milan by way of Rome, and have requested him to communicate to you my feelings and respects. I am sending the same message to the rest of my friends; lest, as the apostle says, ye bite and devour one another, ye be consumed one of another. [Gal. 5:15] It only remains for you and your friends to shew your moderation by giving no offence to those who are disinclined to put up with it. For you will hardly find everyone like me. There are few who can be pleased with pretended eulogies.

1: Chromatius and Eusebius of Aquileia 2: Concordia, near Aquileia 3: See the introduction to Letter CXVII 4: i.e. insincerely Paulinian (of whose ordination an account is given in Letter LI.) had been sent to Italy by Jerome in a.d. 398 partly to counteract the proceedings of Rufinus and partly to sell the family property at Stridon (see Letter LXVI

5:

6:

Rufinus the Syrian, to be carefully distinguished from his more famous namesake (to whom this letter is addressed) of Aquileia. He was a monk in Jerome's monastery at Bethlehem

Letters - letter_082

Letter 82. To Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria.

Two years after his former attempt (see Letter 63.) Theophilus again wrote to Jerome urging him to be reconciled with John of Jerusalem. Jerome replies that there is nothing he desires more earnestly than peace but that this must be real and not a hollow truce. He speaks very bitterly of John who has, he alleges, intrigued to procure his banishment from Palestine. He also deals with the ordination of his brother Paulinian (for which see Letter 51.) and defends himself for having translated Origen's commentaries by adducing the example of Hilary of Poitiers. This letter should be compared with the Treatise "Against John of Jerusalem" in this volume. Its date is 399 a.d.

1. Your letter shews you to possess that heritage of the Lord of which when going to the Father he said to the apostles, "peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you," [John. 14:27] and to own the happiness described in the words, "blessed are the peace-makers." [Matt. 5:9] You coax as a father, you teach as a master, you enjoin as a bishop. You come to me not with a rod and severity but in a spirit of kindness, gentleness, and meekness. [1 Cor. 4:21] Your opening words echo the humility of Christ who saved men not with thunder and lightning [Cf. Heb. 12:18] but as a wailing babe in the manger and as a silent sufferer upon the cross. You have read the prediction made in one who was a type of Him, "Lord, remember David and all his meekness," [Ps. 132:1, LXX] and you know how it was fulfilled afterwards in Himself. "Learn of me," He said, "for I am meek and lowly in heart."¹ You have quoted many passages from the sacred books in praise of peace, you have flitted like a bee over the flowery fields of scripture, you have culled with cunning eloquence all that is sweet and conducive to concord. I was already running after peace, but you have made me quicken my pace: my sails were set for the voyage but your exhortation has filled them with a stronger breeze. I drink in the sweet streams of peace not reluctantly and with aversion but eagerly and with open mouth.

2. But what can I do, I who can only wish for peace and have no power to bring it about? Even though the wish may win its recompense with God, its futility must still sadden him who cherishes it. When the apostle said, "as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men," [Rom. 12:18] he knew quite well that the realisation of peace depends upon the consent of two parties. The prophet truly cries "They say Peace, peace: and yet there is no peace." [Jer. 11:14, LXX] To overthrow peace by actions while professing it in words is not hard. To point out its advantages is one thing and to strive for it another. Men's speeches may be all for unity but their actions may enforce bondage. I wish for peace as much as others; and not only do I wish for it, I ask for it. But the peace which I want is the peace of Christ; a true peace, a peace without rancour, a peace which does not involve war, a peace which will not reduce opponents but will unite friends. How can I term domination peace? I must call things by their right names. Where there is hatred there let men talk of feuds; and where there is mutual esteem, there only let peace be spoken of. For my part I neither rend the church nor separate myself from the communion of the fathers. From my very cradle, I may say, I have been reared on Catholic milk; and no one can be a better churchman than one who has never been a heretic. But I know nothing of a peace that is without love or of a communion that is without peace. In the gospel I read:—"if thou bring thy gift to the altar and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift." [Matt. 5:23, Matt. 5:24] If then we may not offer gifts that are our own unless we are at peace with our brothers; how much less can we receive the body of Christ if we cherish enmity in our hearts? How can I conscientiously approach Christ's eucharist and answer the Amen² if I doubt the charity of him who ministers it?

3. Hear me, I beg you with patience and do not take truthfulness for flattery. Is any man reluctant to communicate with you? Does any turn his face away when you hold out your hand? Does any at the holy banquet offer you the kiss of Judas?³ At your approach the monks instead of trembling rejoice. They race to meet you and leaving their dens in the desert are fain to master you by their humility. What compels them to come forth? Is it not their love for you? What draws together the scattered dwellers in the desert? Is it not the esteem in which they hold you? A parent ought to love his children; and not only a parent but a bishop ought to be loved by his children. Neither ought to be feared. There is an old saying:⁴ "whom a man fears he hates; and whom he hates, he would fain see dead." Accordingly, while for the young the holy scripture makes fear the beginning of knowledge,⁵ it also tells us that "perfect love casteth out fear." [1 John. 4:18] You exact no obedience from them; therefore the monks obey you. You offer them a kiss; therefore they bow the neck. You shew yourself a common soldier; therefore they make you their general. Thus from being one among many you become one above many. Freedom is easily roused if attempts are made to crush it. No one gets more from a free man than he who does not force him to be a slave. I know the canons of the church; I know what rank her ministers hold; and from men and books I have daily up to the present learned and gathered many things. The kingdom of the mild David was quickly dismembered by one who chastised his people with scorpions and fancied that his fingers were thicker than his father's loins. [1 K. 12:10] The Roman people refused to brook insolence even in a king.⁶ Moses was leader of the host of Israel; he brought ten plagues upon Egypt; sky, earth, and sea alike obeyed his commands: yet he is spoken of as "very meek above all the men which were" at that time "upon the face of the earth." [Nu. 12:3] He maintained his forty-years' supremacy because he tempered the insolence of office with gentleness and meekness. When he was being stoned by the people he made intercession for them; [Exod. 17:4] nay more he wished to be blotted out of God's book sooner than that the flock committed to him should perish. [Exod. 32:31, Exod. 32:32] He sought to imitate the Shepherd who would, he knew, carry on his shoulders even the wandering sheep. "The good Shepherd"—they are the Lord's own words—"layeth down his life for the sheep." [John. 10:11, RV.; Luke 15:4, Luke 15:5] One of his disciples can wish to be anathema from Christ for his brethren's sake, his kinsmen according to the flesh who were Israelites. [Rom. 9:3, Rom. 9:4, RV] If then Paul can desire to perish that the lost may not be lost, how much should good parents not provoke their children to wrath [Eph. 6:4] or by too great severity embitter those who are naturally mild.

4. The limits of a letter compel me to restrain myself; otherwise, indignation would make me diffuse. In an epistle which its writer regards as conciliatory but which to me appears full of malice my opponent⁷ admits that I have never calumniated him or accused him of heresy. Why then does he calumniate me by spreading a rumour that I am infected with that awful malady and am in revolt against the Church? Why is he so ready to spare his real assailants and so eager to injure me who have done nothing to injure him? Before my brother's ordination he said nothing of any dogmatic difference between himself and pope Epiphanius. What then can have "forced" him-I use his own word-publicly to argue a point which no one had yet raised? One so full of wisdom as you knows well the danger of such discussions and that silence is in such cases the safest course; except, indeed, on some occasion which renders it imperative to deal with great matters. What ability and eloquence it must have needed to compress into a single sermon-as he boasts to have done⁸-all the topics which the most learned writers have treated in detail in voluminous treatises! But this is nothing to me: it is for the hearers of the sermon to notice and for the writer of the letter to realize. But as for me he ought of his own accord to acquit me of bringing the charge against him. I was not present and did not hear the sermon. I was only one of the many, indeed hardly one of them; for while others were crying out I held my peace. Let us confront the accused and the accuser, and let us give credit to him whose services, life, and doctrine are seen to be the best.

5. You see, do you not, that I shut my eyes to many things and touch upon others only in the most cursory manner, hinting at what I suppose rather than saying out what I think.

I understand and approve your manoeuvres;⁹ how in the interests of the peace of the Church you stop your ears when you come within range of the Sirens. Moreover, trained as you have been from childhood in sacred studies, you know exactly what is meant by each expression which you use. You knowingly employ ambiguous terms and carefully balanced sentences so as not to condemn others¹⁰ or repudiate us.¹¹ But it is not a pure faith and a frank confession which look for quibbles or circumlocutions. What is simply believed must be professed with equal simplicity. For my part I could cry out-though it were amid the swords and fires of Babylon, "why does the answer evade the question? why is there no frank, straightforward declaration?" From beginning to end all is shrinking, compromise, ambiguity: as though he were trying to walk on spikes of corn. His blood boils with eagerness for peace; yet he will not give a straightforward answer! others are free to insult him; for, when he is insulted, he does not venture to retaliate. I meantime hold my peace: for the present I shall let it be thought that I am too busy, or ignorant, or afraid; for how would he treat me were I to accuse him, if when I praise him-as he admits himself that I do-he secretly traduces me?

6. His whole letter is less an exposition of his faith than a mass of calumnies aimed at myself. Without any of those mutual courtesies which men may use towards each other without flattery, he takes up my name again and again, flouts it, and bandies it about as though I were blotted out of the book of the living. He thinks that he has beaten me black and blue with his letter; and that I live for the trifles at which he aims, I who from my boyhood have been shut up in a monastic cell, and have always made it my aim to be rather than to seem a good man. Some of us, it is true, he mentions with respect, but only that he may afterwards wound us more deeply. As if, forsooth, we too have no open secrets to reveal! One of his charges is that we have allowed a slave to be ordained. Yet he himself has clergymen of the same class, and he must have read of Onesimus who, being made regenerate by Paul in prison,¹² from a slave became a deacon. Then he throws out that the slave in question was a common informer; and, lest he should be compelled to prove the charge, declares he has it from hearsay only! Why, if I had chosen to repeat the talk of the crowd and to listen to scandal-mongers, he would have learned before now that I too know what all the world knows and have heard the same stories as other people. He declares farther that ordination has been given to this slave as a reward for a slander spread abroad by him. Does not such cunning and subtlety appal one? And is there any answer to eloquence so overwhelming? Which is best, to spread a calumny or to suffer from one? To accuse a man whose love you may afterwards wish for, or to pardon a sinner? And is it more tolerable that a common informer should be made a consul than that he should be made an aedile?¹³ He knows what I pass over in silence and what I say; what I myself have heard and what-from the fear of Christ-I perhaps refuse to believe.

7. He charges me with having translated Origen into Latin. In this I do not stand alone for the confessor Hilary has done the same, and we are both at one in this that while we have rendered all that is useful, we have cut away all that was harmful. Let him read our versions for himself, if he knows how (and as he constantly converses and daily associates with Italians,¹⁴ I think he cannot be ignorant of Latin); or else, if he cannot quite take it in, let him use his interpreters and then he will come to know that I deserve nothing but praise for the work on which he grounds a charge against me. For, while I have always allowed to Origen his great merit as an interpreter and critic of the scriptures, I have invariably denied the truth of his doctrines. Is it I then that let him loose upon the crowd? Is it I that act sponsor to other preachers like him? No, for I know that a difference must be made between the apostles and all other preachers. The former always speak the truth; but the latter being men sometimes go astray. It would be a strange defence of Origen surely to admit his faults and then to excuse them by saying that other men have been guilty of similar ones! As if, when you cannot venture to defend a man openly, you may hope to shield him by imputing his mistake to a number of others! As for the six thousand volumes of Origen of which he speaks, it is impossible that any one should have read books which have never been written: and I for my part find it easier to suppose that this falsehood is due to the man who professes to have heard it rather than to him who is said to have told it.¹⁵

8. Again he avers that my brother¹⁶ is the cause of the disagreement which has arisen, a man who is content to stay in a monastic cell and who regards the clerical office as onerous rather than honourable. And although up to this very day he has spoon-fed us with insincere protestations of peace, he has caused commotion in the minds of the western bishops¹⁷ by telling them that a mere youth, hardly more than a boy, has been ordained¹⁸ presbyter of Bethlehem in his own diocese. If this is the truth, all the bishops of Palestine must be aware of it. For the monastery of the reverend pope Epiphanius-called the old monastery-where my brother was ordained presbyter is situated in the district of Eleutheropolis¹⁹ and not in that of Aelia.²⁰ Furthermore his age is well known to your Holiness; and as he has now attained to thirty years I apprehend that no blame can attach to him on that score. Indeed this particular age is stamped as full and complete by the mystery of Christ's assumed manhood. Let him call to mind the ancient law, and he will see that after his twenty-fifth year a Levite might be chosen to the priesthood; [Nu. 4:3, LXX. AV. follows the Hebrew] or if in this passage he prefers to follow the Hebrew he will find that candidates for the priesthood must be thirty years old. And that he may not venture to say that "old things are passed away; and, behold, all things are become new," [2 Cor. 5:17] let him hear the apostle's words to Timothy, "Let no man despise thy youth." [1 Tim. 4:12] Certainly when my opponent was himself ordained bishop, he was not much older than my brother is now. And if he argues that youth is no hindrance to a bishop but that it is to a presbyter because a young elder²¹ is a contradiction in terms, I ask him this question: Why has he himself ordained a presbyter of this age or younger still, and that too to minister in another man's church? But if he cannot be at peace with my brother unless he consents to submit and to renounce the bishop who has ordained him, he shews plainly that his object is not peace but revenge, and that he will not rest satisfied with the quietude of repose and peace unless he is able to inflict to the full every penalty that he now threatens. Had he himself ordained my brother, it would have made no difference to this latter. So dearly does he love seclusion that he would even then have continued to live quietly and would not have exercised his office. And should the bishop have seen fit to rend the church on that score, he would then have owed him nothing save the respect which is due to all who offer sacrifice.²²

9. So much for his prolix defence of himself or I should rather say his attack on me. In this letter I have only answered him briefly and cursorily that from what I have said he may perceive what I do not say, and may know that as I am a human being I am a rational animal and well able to understand his shrewdness, and that I am not so obtuse or brutish as to catch only the sound of his words and not their meaning. I now ask of you to pardon my chagrin and to allow that if it is arrogant to answer back, it is yet more arrogant to bring baseless charges. Yet my answer has indicated what I might have said rather than has actually said it. Why do men look for peace at a distance? and why do they wish to have it enforced by word of command? Let them shew themselves peacemakers, and peace will follow at once. Why do they use the name of your holiness to terrorize us, when your letter-contrast to their harsh and menacing words-breathes only peace and meekness? For that the letter which Isidore the presbyter has brought for me from you does make for peace and harmony I know by this, that these insincere professors of a wish for peace have refused to deliver it to me. Let them choose whichever alternative they please. Either I am a good man or I am a bad one. If I am a good one let them leave me in quiet: if I am a bad one, why do they desire to be in bad company? Surely my opponent has learnt by experience the value of humility. He who now tears asunder things which, formerly separate, he of his own will put together, proves that in severing now what he then joined, he is acting at the instigation of another.²³

10. Recently he sought and obtained a decree of exile against me, and I only wish that he had been able to carry it out,²⁴ so that, as the will is imputed to him for the deed, so I too not in will only but in deed might wear the crown of exile. The church of Christ has been founded by shedding its own blood not that of others, by enduring outrage not by inflicting it. Persecutions have made it grow; martyrdoms have crowned it. Or if the Christians among whom I live are unique in their love of severity and know only how to persecute and not how to undergo persecution, there are Jews here, there are heretics professing various false doctrines, and in particular the foulest of all, I mean, Manichaeism. Why is it that they do not venture to say a word against them? Why am I the only person they wish to drive into exile? Am I who communicate with the church the only person of whom it can be said that he rends the church? I put it to you, is it not a fair demand either that they should expel these others as well as myself, or that, if they keep them, they should keep me too? All the same they honour men by sending them into exile, for by so doing they separate them from the company of heretics. It is a monk,²⁵ shame to say, who menaces monks and obtains decrees of exile against them; and that too a monk who boasts that he holds an apostolic chair. But the monastic tribe does not succumb to terrorism: it prefers to expose its neck to the impending sword rather than to allow its hands to be tied. Is not every monk an exile from his country? Is he not an exile from the whole world? Where is the need for the public authority, the cost of a rescript, the journeyings up and down the earth to obtain one? Let him but touch me with his little finger, and I will go into exile of myself. "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." [Ps. 24:1] Christ is not shut up in any one spot.

11. Moreover when he writes that, though I seem to be separated from communion with him, I in reality hold communion with him through you and through the church of Rome: he need not go so far afield, for I am connected with him in the same way also here in Palestine. And lest even this should appear distant, in this village of Bethlehem I hold communion with his presbyters as much as I can. Thus it is clear that a private chagrin is not to be taken for the cause of the church, and that one man's choler, or even that of several stirred up by him, ought not to be styled the displeasure of the church. Accordingly I now repeat what I said at the beginning of my letter that I for my part am desirous of Christ's peace, that I pray for harmony, and that I request you to admonish him not to exact peace but to purpose it. Let him be satisfied with the pain which he has caused by the insults that he has inflicted upon me in the past. Let him efface old wounds by a little new charity. Let him shew himself what he was before, when of his own choice he bestowed upon me his esteem. Let his words no longer be tinged with a gall that flows from the heart of another. Let him do what he wishes himself, and not what others force him to wish. Either as a pontiff, let him exercise authority over all alike, or as a follower of the apostle, let him serve all for the salvation of all. [Cf. 1 Cor. 9:19] If he will shew himself such, I am ready freely to yield and to hold out my arms; he will find me a friend and a kinsman, and will perceive that in Christ I am submissive to him as to all the saints. "Charity," writes the apostle, "suffereth long and is kind; charity envieth not; ...is not puffed up ...beareth all things, believeth all things." [1 Cor. 13:4-7] Charity is the mother of all virtues, and the apostle's words about faith hope and charity [1 Cor. 13:13] are like that threefold cord which is not quickly broken. [Eccl. 4:12] We believe we hope, and through our faith and hope we are joined together in the bond of charity. [Cf. Col. 3:14] It is for these virtues that I and others have left our homes, it is for these that we would live peaceably without any contention in the fields and alone; paying all due veneration to Christ's pontiffs-so long as they preach the right faith-not because we fear them as lords but because we honour them as fathers deferring also to bishops as bishops, but refusing to serve under compulsion, beneath the shadow of episcopal authority, men whom we do not choose to obey. I am not so much puffed up in mind as not to know what is due to the priests of Christ. For he who receives them, receives not them but Him, whose bishops they are. [Cf. John. 13:20] But let them be content with the honour which is theirs. Let them know that they are fathers and not lords, especially in relation to those who scorn the ambitions of the world and count peace and repose the best of all things. And may Christ who is Almighty God grant to your prayers that I and my opponent may be united not in a feigned and hollow peace but in true and sincere mutual esteem, lest biting and devouring one another we be consumed one of another. [Gal. 5:15]

1: Matt. xi 29 2: 1 Cor. 14:16, where in the Greek `giving of thanks 0' is `eucharist. 0

3: Matt. 26:48, Matt. 26:49 - the kiss of peace formed an integral part of the eucharistic office from primitive till mediaeval times 4: Attributed by Cicero to Ennius

5: Prov. 1. 7 6: Tarquin the Proud the last king of Rome was driven into exile because of his many acts of tyranny

7:

John, Bishop of Jerusalem, who had accused Jerome of Origenism, a charge which was brought against himself by Epiphanius (see Letter LI.)

8: Jerome represents John as saying that he took advantage of a verse in the lesson "to preach on faith and all the dogmas of the Church (c. Joh. Jer. ii.) 9: Jerome now addresses John of Jerusalem 10: The Origenists 11: The orthodox 12: Philemon, 10

13: The highest and lowest offices in the Roman magistracy. Jerome insinuates that if the ordained slave was a common informer so also was John of Jerusalem 14: A hit at Rufinus

15: The statement that he had read 6000 volumes of Origen was attributed to Epiphanius by Rufinus and John of Jerusalem. Cf. Apol. 100:Ruf. 2:100:13 16: Paulinian, who had been ordained by Epiphanius 17: Sacerdotes; lit. `sacrificing priests. 0 18: Not by himself but by Epiphanius 19: Otherwise Lydda, a town in the south of Judah at this time the seat of a bishopric 20: Aelia Capitolina was the name given by Hadrian to the colony established by him on the site of Jerusalem 21: The word `presbyter 0' means elder 22: Here as frequently in Jerome the word `sacerdos 0' is used to denote a bishop

23: Probably Isidore, who had taken a view hostile to Jerome, and who at this time fell under the displeasure of Theophilus 24: The execution of the decree was stopped by the sudden death of the imperial minister Rufinus 25: John of Jerusalem

Letters - letter_083

Letter 83. From Pammachius and Oceanus. A letter from Pammachius and Oceanus in which they express the, perplexity into which they have been thrown by Rufinus's version of Origen's treatise, On First Principles (see Letter 80.) and request Jerome to make for them a literal translation of the work. Written in 399 or 400 a.d.

1. Pammachius and Oceanus to the presbyter Jerome, health. A reverend brother has brought to us sheets containing a certain person's translation into Latin of a treatise by Origen-entitled "περὶ ■ρχ■v". These contain many things which disturb our poor wits and which appear to us to be uncatholic. We suspect also that with a view of clearing the author many passages of his books have been removed which had they been left would have plainly proved the irreligious character of his teaching. We therefore request your excellency to be so good as to bestow upon this particular matter an attention which will benefit not only ourselves but all who reside in the city; we ask you to publish in your own language the abovementioned book of Origen exactly as it was brought out by the author himself; and we desire you to make evident the interpolations which his defender has introduced. You will also confute and overthrow all statements in the sheets which we have sent to your holiness that are ignorantly made or contradict the Catholic faith. The writer in the preface to his work has, with much subtlety but without mentioning your holiness's name, implied that he has done no more than complete a work which you had yourself promised, thus indirectly suggesting that you agree with him. Remove then the suspicions men cannot help feeling and confute your assailant; for, if you ignore his implications, people will say that you admit their truth.

Letters - letter_084

Letter 84. To Pammachius and Oceanus. A calm letter in which Jerome defines and justifies his own attitude towards Origen, but unduly minimizes his early enthusiasm for him. He admires him in the same way that Cyprian admired Tertullian but does not in any way adopt his errors. He then describes his own studies and recounts his obligations to Apollinaris, Didymus, and a Jew named Bar-anina. The rest of the letter deals with the errors of Origen, the state of the text of his writings, and the eulogy of him composed by the martyr Pamphilus (the authenticity of which Jerome assails without any sufficient reason). The date of the letter is 400 a.d.

Jerome to the brothers Pammachius and Oceanus, with all good wishes.

1. The sheets that you send me¹ cover me at once with compliments and confusion; for, while they praise my ability, they take away my sincerity in the faith. But as both at Alexandria and at Rome and, I may say, throughout the whole world good men have made it a habit to take the same liberties with my name, esteeming me only so far that they cannot bear to be heretics without having me of the number, I will leave aside personalities and only answer specific charges. For it is of no benefit to a cause to encounter railing with railing and to retaliate for attacks upon oneself by attacks upon one's opponents. We are commanded not to return evil for evil [1 Thess. 5:15] but to overcome evil with good, [Rom. 12:21] to take our fill of insults, and to turn the other cheek to the smiter. [Matt. 5:39]

2. It is charged against me that I have sometimes praised Origen. If I am not mistaken I have only done so in two places, in the short preface (addressed to Damasus) to his homilies on the Song of Songs and in the prologue to my book of Hebrew Names. In these passages do the dogmas of the church come into question? Is anything said of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost? or of the resurrection of the flesh? or of the condition and material of the soul? I have merely praised the simplicity of his rendering and commentary and neither the faith nor the dogmas of the Church come in at all. Ethics only are dealt with and the mist of allegory is dispelled by a clear explanation. I have praised the commentator but not the theologian, the man of intellect but not the believer, the philosopher but not the apostle. But if men wish to know my real judgement upon Origen; let them read my commentaries upon Ecclesiastes, let them go through my three books upon the epistle to the Ephesians: they will then see that I have always opposed his doctrines. How foolish it would be to eulogize a system so far as to endorse its blasphemy! The blessed Cyprian takes Tertullian for his master, as his writings prove; yet, delighted as he is with the ability of this learned and zealous writer he does not join him in following Montanus and Maximilla.² Apollinaris is the author of a most weighty book against Porphyry, and Eusebius has composed a fine history of the Church; yet of these the former has mutilated Christ's incarnate humanity,³ while the latter is the most open champion of the Arian impiety.⁴ "Woe," says Isaiah, "unto them that call evil good and good evil; that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter." [Isa. 5:20] We must not detract from the virtues of our opponents-if they have any praiseworthy qualities-but neither must we praise the defects of our friends. Each several case must be judged on its own merits and not by a reference to the persons concerned. While Lucilius is rightly assailed by Horace [Hor. S. 1. 10:1-4] for the unevenness of his verses, he is equally rightly praised for his wit and his charming style.

3. In my younger days I was carried away with a great passion for learning, yet I was not like some presumptuous enough to teach myself. At Antioch I frequently listened to Apollinaris of Laodicea, and attended his lectures; yet, although he instructed me in the holy scriptures, I never embraced his disputable doctrine as to their meaning. At length my head became sprinkled with gray hairs so that I looked more like a master than a disciple. Yet I went on to Alexandria and heard Didymus.⁵ And I have much to thank him for: for what I did not know I learned from him, and what I knew already I did not forget. So excellent was his teaching. Men fancied that I had now made an end of learning. Yet once more I came to Jerusalem and to Bethlehem. What trouble and expense it cost me to get Baraninas⁶ to teach me under cover of night. For by his fear of the Jews he presented to me in his own person a second edition of Nicodemus. [John. 3:2] Of all of these I have frequently made mention in my works. The doctrines of Apollinaris and of Didymus are mutually contradictory. The squadrons of the two leaders must drag me in different directions, for I acknowledge both as my masters. If it is expedient to hate any men and to loath any race, I have a strange dislike to those of the circumcision. For up to the present day they persecute our Lord Jesus Christ in the synagogues of Satan. [Cf. Rev. 2:9] Yet can anyone find fault with me for having had a Jew as a teacher? Does a certain person dare to bring forward against me the letter I wrote to Didymus calling him my master? It is a great crime, it would seem, for me a disciple to give to one both old and learned the name of master. And yet when I ask leave to look at the letter which has been held over so long to discredit me at last, there is nothing in it but courteous language and a few words of greeting. Such charges are both foolish and frivolous. It would be more to the point to exhibit a passage in which I have defended heresy or praised some wicked doctrine of Origen. In the portion of Isaiah which describes the crying of the two seraphim [Isa. 6:2] he explains these to be the Son and the Holy Ghost; but have not I altered this hateful explanation into a reference to the two testaments?⁷ I have the book in my hand as it was published twenty years ago. In numbers of my works and especially in my commentaries I have, as occasion has offered, mangled this heathen school. And if my opponents allege that I have done more than anyone else to form a collection of Origen's books, I answer that I only wish I could have the works of all theological writers that by diligent study of them, I might make up for the slowness of my own wits. I have made a collection of his books, I admit; but because I know everything that he has written I do not follow his errors. I speak as a Christian to Christians: believe one who has tried him. His doctrines are poisonous, they are unknown to the Holy Scriptures, nay more, they do them violence. I have read Origen, I repeat, I have read him; and if it is a crime to read him, I admit my guilt: indeed, these Alexandrian writings have emptied my purse. If you will believe me, I have never been an Origenist: if you will not believe me, I have now ceased to be one. But if even this fails to convince you, you will compel me in self-defence to write against your favourite, so that, if you will not believe me when I disclaim him, you will have to believe me when I attack him. But I find readier credence when I go wrong than when I shew amendment. And this is not surprising, for my would-be friends suppose me a fellow-disciple with them in the arcana of their system. I am loath, they fancy, to profess esoteric doctrines before persons who according to them are brute-like and made of clay. For it is an axiom with them that pearls ought not to be lightly cast before swine, nor that which is holy given to the dogs. [Matt. 7:6] They agree with David when he says: "Thy word have I hid in mine heart that I might not sin against thee;" [Ps. 119:11] and when in another place he describes the righteous man as one "who speaketh truth with his neighbour," [Ps. 15:2, Ps. 15:3 from memory] that is with those who "are of the household of faith." [Gal. 6:10] From these passages they conclude that those of us who as yet are uninitiated ought to be told falsehoods, lest, being still unweaned babes, we should be choked by too solid food. Now that perjury and lying enter into their mysteries and form a bond between them appears most clearly from the sixth book of Origen's Miscellanies,⁸ in which he harmonizes the Christian doctrine⁹ with the conceptions of Plato.

4. What must I do then? deny that I am of Origen's opinion? They will not believe me. Swear that I am not? They will laugh and say that I deal in lies. I will do the one thing which they dread. I will bring forward their sacred rites and mysteries, and will expose the cunning whereby they delude simple folk like myself. Perhaps, although they refuse credence to my voice when I deny, they may believe my pen when I accuse. Of one thing they are particularly apprehensive, and that is that their writings may some day be taken as evidence against their master. They are ready to make statements on oath and to disclaim them afterwards with an oath as false as the first. When asked for their signatures they use shifts and seek excuses. One says: "I cannot condemn what no one else has condemned." Another says: "No decision was arrived at on the point by the Fathers."¹⁰ It is thus that they appeal to the judgment of the world to put off the necessity of assenting to a condemnation. Another says with yet more assurance: "how am I to condemn men whom the council of Nicaea has left untouched? For the council which condemned Arius would surely have condemned Origen too, had it disapproved of his doctrines." They were bound in other words to cure all the diseases of the church at once and with one remedy; and by parity of reasoning we must deny the majesty of the Holy Ghost because nothing was said of his nature in that council. But the question was of Arius, not of Origen; of the Son, not of the Holy Ghost. The bishops at the council proclaimed their adherence to a dogma which was at the time denied; they said nothing about a difficulty which no one had raised. And yet they covertly struck at Origen as the source of the Arian heresy: for, in condemning those who deny the Son to be of the substance of the Father, they have condemned Origen as much as Arius. On the ground taken by these persons we have no right to condemn Valentine,¹¹ Marcion,¹² or the Cataphrygians,¹³ or Manichaeus, none of whom are named by the council of Nicaea, and yet there is no doubt that in time they were prior to it. But when they find themselves pressed either to subscribe or to leave the Church, you may see some strange twisting. They qualify their words, they arrange them anew, they use vague expressions; so as, if possible, to, hold both our confession and that of our opponents, to be called indifferently heretics and Catholics. As if it were not in the same spirit that the Delphian Apollo (or, as he is sometimes called, Loxias) gave his oracles to Croesus and to Pyrrhus; cheating with a similar device two men widely separated in time.¹⁴ To make my meaning clear I will give a few examples.

5. We believe, say they, in the resurrection of the body. This confession, if only it be sincere, is free from objection. But as there are bodies celestial and bodies terrestrial [1 Cor. 15:40] and as thin air and the aether are both according to their natures Called bodies, they use the word body instead of the word flesh in order that an orthodox person hearing them say body may take them to mean flesh while a heretic will understand that they mean spirit. This is their first piece of craft, and if this is found out, they devise fresh wiles, and, pretending innocence themselves, accuse us of malice. As though they were frank believers they say, "We believe in the resurrection of the flesh." Now when they have said this, the ignorant crowd thinks it ought to be satisfied, particularly because these exact words are found in the creed.¹⁵ If you go on to question them farther, a buzz of disapproval is heard in the ring and their backers cry out: "You have heard them say that they believe in the resurrection of the flesh; what more do you want?" the popular favour is transferred from our side to theirs, and while they are called honest, we are looked on as false accusers. But if you set your face steadily and keeping a firm hold of their admission about the flesh, proceed to press them as to whether they assert the resurrection of that flesh which is visible and tangible, which walks and speaks, they first laugh and then signify their assent. And when we inquire whether the resurrection will exhibit anew the hair and the teeth, the chest and the stomach, the hands and the feet, and all the other members of the body, then no longer able to contain their mirth they burst out laughing and tell us that in that case we shall need barbers, and cakes, and doctors, and cobblers. Do we, they ask us in turn, believe that after the resurrection men's cheeks will still be rough and those of women smooth, and that sex will differentiate their bodies as it does at present? Then if we admit this, they at once deduce from our admission conclusions involving the grossest materialism. Thus, while they maintain the resurrection of the body as a whole, they deny the resurrection of its separate members.

6. The present is not a time to speak rhetorically against a perverse doctrine. Neither the rich vocabulary of Cicero nor the fervid eloquence of Demosthenes could adequately convey the warmth of my feeling, were I to attempt to expose the quibbles by which these heretics, while verbally professing a belief in the resurrection, in their hearts deny it. For their women finger their breasts, slap their chests, pinch their legs and arms, and say, "What will a resurrection profit us if these frail bodies are to rise again? No, if we are to be like angels, [Cf. Matt. 22:30] we shall have the bodies of angels." That is to say they scorn to rise again with the flesh and bones wherewith even Christ rose. [Cf. Luke 24:39] Now suppose for a moment that in my youth I went astray and that, trained as I was in the schools of heathen philosophy, I was ignorant, in the beginning of my faith, of the dogmas of Christianity, and fancied that what I had read in Pythagoras and Plato and Empedocles was also contained in the writings of the apostle: Supposing, I say, that I believed all this, why do you yet follow the error of a mere babe and sucking child in Christ? Why do you learn irreligion of one who as yet knew not religion? After shipwreck one has still a plank to cling to;¹⁶ and one may atone for sin by a frank confession. You have followed me when I have gone astray; follow me also now that I have been brought back. In youth we have wandered; now that we are old let us mend our ways. Let us unite our tears and our groans; let us weep together, and return to the Lord our Maker. [Ps. 95:6, Vulg] Let us not wait for the repentance of the devil; for this is a vain anticipation and one that will drag us into the deep of hell. Life must be sought or lost here. If I have never followed Origen, it is in vain that you seek to discredit me: if I have been his disciple, imitate my penitence. You have believed my confession; credit also my denial.

7. But it will be said, "If you knew these things, why did you praise him in your works?" I should praise him today but that you and men like you praise his errors. I should still find his talent attractive, but that some people have been attracted by his impiety. "Read¹⁷ all things," says the apostle, "hold fast that which is good." [1 Thess. 5:21] Lactantius in his books and particularly in his letters to Demetrian altogether denies the subsistence of the Holy Spirit, and following the error of the Jews says that the passages in which he is spoken of refer to the Father or to the Son and that the words 'holy spirit' merely prove the holiness of these two persons in the Godhead. But who can forbid me to read his Institutes-in which he has written against the Gentiles with much ability-simply because this opinion of his is to be abhorred? Apollinaris¹⁸ has written excellent treatises against Porphyry, and I approve of his labours, although I despise his doctrine in many points because of its foolishness. If you too for your parts will but admit that Origen errs in certain things I will not say another syllable. Acknowledge that he thought amiss concerning the Son, and still more amiss concerning the Holy Spirit, point out the impiety of which he has been guilty in speaking of men's souls as having fallen from heaven, and shew that, while in word he asserts the resurrection of the flesh, he destroys the force of this language by other assertions. As, for instance, that, after many ages and one "restitution of all things," [Acts 3:21] it will be the same for Gabriel as for the devil, for Paul as for Caiaphas, for virgins as for prostitutes. When once you have rejected these misstatements and have parted them with your censor's wand from the faith of the Church, I may read what left with safety, and having first taken the antidote need no longer dread the poison. For instance it will do me no harm to say as I have said, "Whereas in his other books Origen has surpassed all other writers, in commenting on the Song of Songs he has surpassed himself"; nor will I fear to face the words with which formerly in my younger days I spoke of him as a doctor of the churches.¹⁹ Will it be pretended, that I was bound to accuse a man whose works was translating by special request? that I was bound to say in my preface, "This writer whose books I translate is a heretic: beware of him, reader, read him not, flee from the viper: or, if you are bent on reading him, know that the treatises which I have translated have been garbled by heretics and wicked men; yet you need not fear, for have corrected all the places which they have corrupted," that in other words I ought to have said: "the writer that I translate is a heretic, but I, his translator, am a Catholic." The fact is that you and your party in your anxiety to be straightforward, ingenuous, and honest, have paid too little regard to the precepts of rhetoric and to the devices of oratory. For in admitting that his books On First Principles are heretical and in trying to lay the blame of this upon others, you raise difficulties for your readers; you induce them to examine the whole life of the author and to form a judgment on the question from the remainder of his writings. I on the other hand have been wise enough to emend silently what I wished to emend: thus by ignoring the crime I have averted prejudice from the criminal. Doctors tell us that serious maladies ought not to be subjected to treatment, but should be left to nature, lest the remedies applied should intensify the disease. It is now almost one hundred and fifty years since Origen died at Tyre.²⁰ Yet what Latin writer has ever ventured to translate his books On the Resurrection and On First Principles, his Miscellanies²¹ and his Commentaries or as he himself calls them his Tomes?²² Who has ever cared by so infamous a work to cover himself with infamy? I am not more eloquent than Hilary or truer to the faith than Victorinus who both have rendered his Homilies²³ not in exact versions but in independent paraphrases. Recently also Ambrose appropriated his Six Days' Work,²⁴ but in such a way that it expressed the views of Hippolytus and Basil rather than of Origen. You profess to take me for your model, and blind as moles in relation to others you scan me with the eyes of gazelles. Well, had I been ill-disposed towards Origen, I might have translated these very books so as to make his worst writings known to Latin readers; but this I have never done; and, though many have asked me, I have always refused. For it has never been my habit to crow over the mistakes of men whose talents I admire. Origen himself, were he still alive, would soon fall out with you his would-be patrons and would say with Jacob: "Ye have troubled me to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land." [Gen. 34:30]

8. Does any one wish to praise Origen? Let him praise him as I do. From his childhood he was a great man, and truly a martyr's son.²⁵ At Alexandria he presided over the school of the church, succeeding a man of great learning the presbyter Clement. So greatly did he abhor sensuality that, out of a zeal for God but yet one not according to knowledge, [Rom. 10:2] he castrated himself with a knife. Covetousness he trampled under foot. He knew the scriptures by heart and laboured hard day and night to explain their meaning. He delivered in church more than a thousand sermons, and published innumerable commentaries which he called tomes. These I now pass over, for it is not my purpose to catalogue his writings. Which of us can read all that he has written? and who can fail to admire is enthusiasm for the scriptures? If some one in the spirit of Judas the Zealot²⁶ brings up to me his mistakes, he shall have his answer in the words of Horace:

"Tis true that sometimes Homer sleeps, but then

He's not without excuse:

The fault is venial, for his work is long."²⁷

Let us not imitate the faults of one whose virtues we cannot equal. Other men have erred concerning the faith, both Greeks and Latins, but I must not mention their names lest I should be supposed to defend Origen not by his own merits but by the errors of others. This, you will say, is to accuse them and not to excuse him. You would be right, if I had declared him not to have erred, or if I had professed a belief that the apostle Paul or an angel from heaven [Cf. Gal. 1:8] ought to be listened to in a depravation of the faith. But as it is seeing I frankly admit him to be wrong, I may read him on the same terms as I read others, because if he is wrong so also are they. But you may say, If error is common to many, why do you assail him alone? I answer, because he alone is praised by you as an apostle. Take away your exaggerated love for him, and I am ready to take away the greatness of my dislike. While you gather other men's faulty statements out of their books merely to defend Origen in his error, you extol this latter to the sky and will not allow that he has erred at all. Whosoever you are who are thus preaching new doctrines, I beseech you, spare the ears of the Romans, spare the faith of a church which an apostle has praised. [Rom. 1:8] Why after four hundred years do you try to teach us Romans doctrines of which until now we have known nothing? Why do you publicly proclaim opinions which Peter and Paul²⁸ refused to profess? Until now no such teaching has been heard of, and yet the world has become christian. For my part I will hold fast in my old age the faith wherein I was born again in my boyhood.²⁹ They speak of us as claytowners,³⁰ made out of dirt, brutish and carnal, because, say they, we refuse to receive the things of the spirit; but of course they themselves are citizens of Jerusalem and their mother is in heaven. [Gal. 4:26] I do not despise the flesh in which Christ was born and rose again, or scorn the mud which, baked into a clean vessel, reigns in heaven. And yet I wonder why they who detract from the flesh live after the flesh,³¹ and cherish and delicately nurture that which is their enemy. Perhaps indeed they wish to fulfil the words of scripture: "love your enemies and bless them that persecute you." [Matthew 5:44 from memory] I love the flesh, but I love it only when it is chaste, when it is virginal, when it is mortified by fasting: I love not its works but itself, that flesh which knows that it must be judged, and therefore dies as a martyr for Christ, which is scourged and torn asunder and burned with fire.

9. The folly also of their contention that certain heretics and ill-disposed persons have tampered with Origen's writings may be shewn thus. Could any person be more wise, more learned, or more eloquent than were Eusebius and Didymus, Origen's supporters? Of these the former in the six volumes of his Apology³² asserts that Origen is of the same mind with himself; while the latter, though he tries to excuse his errors, admits that he has made them. Not being able to deny what he finds written, he endeavours to explain it away. It is one thing to say that additions have been made by heretics, but another to maintain that heretical statements are commendable. Origen's case would be unique if his writings were falsified all over the world and if in one day by an edict like that of Mithridates³³ all the truth were shorn from his volumes. Even supposing that some one treatise of his has been tampered with, can it be possible that all his works, published as they were at different times and places, have been corrupted? Origen himself in a letter written to Fabian, bishop of Rome,³⁴ expresses penitence for having made erroneous statements, and charges Ambrose³⁵ with over haste in making public what was meant only for private circulation. And yet to this day his disciples search for shifts to prove that all that excites disapprobation in his writings is due not to him but to others.

10. Moreover, when they speak of Pamphilus as one who praised Origen, I am personally much obliged to them for accounting me worthy to be calumniated with that martyr. For if, sirs, you tell me that Origen's books have been tampered with by his enemies to bring them into discredit; why may not I in my turn allege that his friends and followers have attributed to Pamphilus a volume composed by themselves to vindicate their master from disrepute by the testimony of a martyr? Lo and behold, you yourselves correct in Origen's books passages which (according to you) he never wrote: and yet you are surprised if a man is said to have published a book which as a matter of fact he did not publish. But while your statements can easily be brought to the test by an appeal to Origen's published works; as Pamphilus has published nothing else, it is easier for calumny to fix a book upon him. For shew me any other work of Pamphilus; you will nowhere find any, this is his only one. How then can I know that it is by Pamphilus? You will tell me, that the style and tone ought to inform me. Well, I shall never believe that a man so learned has dedicated the first fruits of his talent to defend doubtful and discredited positions. The very name of an apology which the treatise bears implies a previous charge made; for nothing is defended that is not first attacked. I will now bring forward but a single argument, one, however, the force of which only folly and effrontery can deny. The treatise attributed to Pamphilus contains nearly the first thousand lines of Eusebius's sixth book in defence of Origen.³⁶ Yet in the remaining parts of his work the writer brings forward passages by which he seeks to prove that Origen was a Catholic. Now Eusebius and Pamphilus were in such thorough harmony with each other that they seemed to have but one soul between them, and one even went so far as to adopt the other's name.³⁷ How then could they have disagreed so fundamentally on this point, Eusebius in all his works proving Origen to be an Arian, and Pamphilus describing him as a supporter of the Nicene council, which had not yet been held? It is evident from this consideration that the book belongs not to Pamphilus but to Didymus or somebody else, who having cut off the head of Eusebius's sixth book supplied the other members himself. But I am willing to be generous and to allow that the book is written by Pamphilus, only by Pamphilus not yet a martyr. For he must have written the book before he underwent martyrdom. And why, you will say, was he accounted worthy of martyrdom? Surely that he might efface his error by a martyr's death, and wash away his one fault by shedding his blood. How many martyrs there have been all the world over who before their deaths have been the slaves of sins! Are we then to palliate the sins because those who committed them have afterwards become martyrs?

11. This reply to your letter, my most loving brothers, I have dictated in all haste; and, overcoming my scruples, I have taken up my pen against a man whose ability I once eulogized. I would sooner, indeed, risk my reputation than my faith. My friends have placed me in the awkward dilemma that if I say nothing I shall be held guilty, and if I offer a defence I shall be accounted an enemy. Both alternatives are hard; but of the two I will choose that which is the least so. A quarrel can be made up, but blasphemy can find no forgiveness. I leave to your judgment to discover how much labour I have expended in translating the books On First Principles; for on the one hand if one alters anything from the Greek the work becomes less a version than a perversion; and on the other hand a literal adherence to the original by no means tends to preserve the charm of its eloquence.

1:

i.e. Rufinus's version of Origen's treatise, On First Principles, with the Preface, translated in vol. 3: of this series. See also Letters LXXX. and LXXXI

2:

Of these the two founders of Montanism the first was a Phrygian of the second century who professed to be the special organ of the Holy Ghost while the second was a female disciple who claimed to exercise the gift of prophecy in furtherance of his aims

3:

Dimidiatam Christi introduxit oeconomiam. Apollinaris taught that in Christ the divine personality supplied the place of a human soul. In his view, therefore, Christ ceased to be "very man."

4:

Eusebius, although he sided with the Arians, always claimed to be orthodox. However, as Newman says, "his acts are his confession."

5:

See Letter L

6: From this Jew Jerome took lessons in Hebrew during the earlier years of his life at Bethlehem. From time to time he also consulted other Jewish scholars 7: Cf. Letter XVIII 8: strwmateij, lit. = 'tapestries.' 9: See note on Letter LXX.

9: The doctrine alluded to is probably that of the Trinity 10: i.e. the Bishops present at Nicaea 11: The founder of a Gnostic sect in the second century. He taught first in Egypt and afterwards in Rome 12: See note on Letter XLVIII 13: The Montanists were so called because the headquarters of their sect were at Pepuza a small village in Phrygia

14:

Croesus when he asked whether he should resist Cyrus was told that, if he did so, he would overthrow a mighty kingdom, a prophecy fulfilled in his own destruction; while Pyrrhus long afterwards received an equally evasive answer in the words, "Pyrrhus the Sons of Rome may well defeat."

15: Article XI. of the Apostles' Creed speaks in the original forms of the resurrection not of "the body" but of "the flesh:" and it is still found in this shape in the Anglican office for the visitation of the sick 16: A favourite metaphor with Jerome to describe the nature of Christian penitence 17: AV. `prove. 0 18: See note on above

19: See Jerome's preface to his version of Origen's Homilies on Ezekiel: and his preface to his own Treatise on Hebrew Names. See also Letter XXXIII 20: Origen died at Tyre about the year 255 a.d 21: See note on Letter LXX

22:

tomoi

23: Tractatus 24: Hexaëmeron: an account of the creation is meant 25: His father Leonides suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Severus 26: i.e. Judas the Gaulonite whose fanatical rising against the Romans is mentioned in Acts 5:37 27: Hor. A. P. 359, 360 28: The (traditional) founders of the Roman Church 29: Jerome was baptized at Rome about the year 367 a.d 30: Pelusiotae, men of Pelusium, supposed to be derived from phloj, "clay." See Jerome's Comm. on Jer. 29:14-20 31: See the description of Rufinus in Letter CXXV. 18

32:

This treatise the joint work of Eusebius and his friend Pamphilus has perished. Part of the Latin version of Rufinus still remains. Jerome at this time erroneously supposed that the two friends had written separate works in defence of Origen. (See De VV. III. 100:75, 81, in vol. 3: of this series.

33: In accordance with this edict (promulgated in 88 b.c.) all the Romans in Pontus were massacred in one day 34: This letter is no longer extant 35: A wealthy Alexandrian, who employed shorthand writers to take down Origen's lectures. Euseb. Eccl. Hist. B. 6:c. 23

36: If the text is sound here Jerome is again misled by supposing that Eusebius and Pamphilus had written separate books in defence of Origen 37: Eusebius calls himself Eusebius Pamphili, that is, `the friend of Pamphilus. 0

Letters - letter_085

Letter 85. To Paulinus.

Paulinus had asked Jerome two questions,(1) how can certain passages of scripture (Exod. vii. 13: Rom. ix. 16) be reconciled with Free Will? and (2) Why are the children of believers said to be holy (1 Cor. vii. 14) apart from baptismal grace? For the first of these questions Jerome refers Paulinus to his version (newly made) of Origen's treatise, On First Principles. For the second he quotes the explanation of Tertullian. Written in 400 a.d.

1. Your words urge me to write to you but your eloquence deters me from doing so. For as a letter-writer you are almost as good as Tully. You complain that my letters are short and unpolished: this is not due to carelessness but to fear of you, lest writing to you at greater length I should but send you more sentences to find fault with. Moreover, to make a clean breast of it to a good man like you, just about the time the vessels sail for the west, so many letters are demanded of me at once that, if I were to reply to all my correspondents, I should be unable to accomplish my task. Hence it happens that, neglecting the niceties of composition and not revising the work of my secretaries, I dictate whatever first comes into my head. Thus when I write to you I regard you as a friend and not as a critic.

2. Your letter propounds two questions, the first, why God hardened Pharaoh's heart, and why the apostle said: "So then it is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy;" [Rom. 9:16] and other things which appear to do away with free will: the second, how those are holy who are born of believing, that is, of baptized parents, [1 Cor. 7:14] seeing that without the gift of grace afterwards received and kept they cannot be saved.

3. Your first question is most ably answered by Origen in his treatise on First Principles which, at the request of my friend Pammachius, I have recently translated. This task has occupied me so fully that I am unable to keep my word with you and must again postpone the sending my commentary on Daniel. Indeed, distinguished and devoted to me as Pammachius is, had he been alone in his request, I should have deferred it to another time, but, as it was, almost all our brothers at Rome urged the same demand declaring that many persons were in danger, and that some even accepted Origen's heretical teaching. I have found myself forced therefore to translate a book in which there is more of bad than of good, and to keep to this rule that I should neither add nor subtract but should preserve in Latin in its integrity the true sense of the Greek. You will be able to borrow a copy of my version from the aforesaid brother, though in your case the Greek will serve quite as well neither should you, who can drink from the fountain head, turn to the muddy streamlets supplied by my poor wits.

4. Moreover, as I am speaking to an educated man, well versed both in the sacred scriptures and in secular literature, I desire to give your excellency this note of warning. Do not suppose that I am a clumsy buffoon [Cf. Hor. S. II. 8:21] who condemn everything that Origen has written,-as his injudicious friends falsely assert-or that I have changed my mind as suddenly as the philosopher Dionysius.¹ The fact is that I repudiate merely his objectionable dogmas. For I know that one curse hangs over those who call evil good and over those who call good evil, over those who put bitter for sweet, and over those who put sweet for bitter. [Isa. 5:20] Who would go so far in praise of another man's teaching as to acquiesce in blasphemy?

5. Your second question is discussed by Tertullian in his books on Monogamy [Ad. Ux. 2:2] where he declares that the children of believers are called holy because they are as it were candidates for the faith and have suffered no pollution from idolatry. Consider also that the vessels of which we read in the tabernacle are called holy and everything else required for the ceremonial worship: although in strictness of speech there can be nothing holy except creatures which know of and worship God. But it is a scriptural usage sometimes to give the name of holy to those who are clean, or who have been purified, or who have made expiation. For instance, it is written of Bathsheba that she was made holy² from her uncleanness, [2 Sam. 11:4] and the temple itself is called the holy place.

6. I beg that you will not silently in your mind accuse me either of vanity or of insincerity. God bears me witness in my conscience that the unavoidable circumstances mentioned above drew me back when I was just going to grapple with my commentary; and you know that what is done when the mind is pre-occupied is never well done. I gladly accept the cap that you have sent me, a mark, though small, of no small affection and just the thing to keep an old man's head warm. I am delighted alike with the gift and with the giver.

1: Dionysius of Heraclea called the renegade because he abandoned the Stoic for the Cyrenaic school 2: AV. `purified. 0

Letters - letter_086

Letter 86. To Theophilus.

Jerome congratulates Theophilus on the success of his crusade against Origenism, and speaks of the good work done in Palestine by his emissaries Priscus and Eubulus. He then (by a singular change in his sentiments) asks Theophilus to forgive John of Jerusalem for having unwittingly received an excommunicated Egyptian. The date of the Letter is 400 a.d.

Jerome to the most blessed Pope Theophilus. I have recently received despatches from your blessedness setting right your long silence and summoning me to return to my duty. So, though the reverend brothers Priscus and Eubulus have been slow in bringing me your letters, yet, as they are now hastening in the ardour of faith from end to end of Palestine and scattering and driving into their holes the basilisks of heresy, I write a few lines to congratulate you on your success. The whole world glories in your victories. An exultant crowd of all nations gazes on the standard of the cross raised by you at Alexandria and upon the shining trophies which mark your triumph over heresy. Blessings on your courage! blessings on your zeal! You have shewn that your long silence has been due to policy and not to inclination. I speak quite openly to your reverence. I grieved to find you too forbearing, and, knowing nothing of the course shaped by the pilot, I yearned for the destruction of those abandoned men. But, as I now see, you have had your hand raised and, if you have delayed to strike, it has only been that you might strike harder. As regards the welcome given to a certain person,¹ you have no reason to be vexed with the prelate of this city;² for as you gave no instructions on the point in your letter, it would have been rash in him to decide a case of which he knew nothing. Still I think that he would neither wish nor venture to annoy you in any way.

1:

Doubtless some Egyptian monk or ecclesiastic placed under ban by Theophilus on account of Origenism

2:

John of Jerusalem. He had probably, like Rufinus, been reconciled to Jerome, and seems to have taken no part in the subsequent quarrel between Jerome and Rufinus

Letters - letter_087

Letter 87. From the Ophilus to Jerome.

Theophilus informs Jerome that he has expelled the Origenists from the monasteries of Nitria, and urges him to shew his zeal for the faith by writing against the prevalent heresy. The date of the letter is 400 a.d.

Theophilus, bishop, to the well-beloved and most loving brother, the presbyter Jerome. The reverend bishop Agatho with the well-beloved deacon Athanasius is accredited to you with tidings relating to the church. When you learn their import I feel no doubt but that you will approve my resolution and will exult in the church's victory. For we have cut down with the prophet's sickle [Joel 3:13] certain wicked fanatics who were eager to sow broadcast in the monasteries of Nitria the heresy of Origen. We have remembered the warning words of the apostle, "rebuke with all authority." [Tit. 2:15] Do you therefore on your part, as you hope to receive a share in this reward, make haste to bring back with scriptural discourses those who have been deceived. It is our desire, if possible, to guard in our days not only the Catholic faith and the rules of the church, but the people committed to our charge, and to give a quietus to all strange doctrines.

Letters - letter_088

Letter 88. To Theophilus.

Replying to the preceding letter Jerome again congratulates Theophilus on the success of his efforts to put down Origenism, and informs him that they have already borne fruit as far west as Italy. He then asks him for the decrees of his council (held recently at Alexandria). The date of the letter is 400 a.d.

Jerome to the most blessed pope Theophilus. The letter of your holiness has given me a twofold pleasure, partly because it has had for its bearers those reverend and estimable men, the bishop Agatho and the deacon Athanasius, and partly because it has shewn your zeal for the faith against a most wicked heresy. The voice of your holiness has rung throughout the world, and to the joy of all Christ's churches the poisonous suggestions of the devil have been silenced. The old serpent [Rev. 12:9] hisses no longer, but, writhing and disembowelled, lurks in dark caverns unable to bear the shining of the sun. I have already, before the writing of your letter, sent missives to the West pointing out to those of my own language some of the quibbles employed by the heretics. I hold it due to the special providence of God that you should have written to the pope Anastasius¹ at the same time as myself, and should thus without knowing it have been the means of confirming my testimony. Now that you have directly urged me to do so, I shall shew myself more zealous than ever to recall from their error simple souls both near and far. Nor shall I hesitate, if needful, to incur odium with some, for we ought to please God rather than men: [Acts 5:29] although indeed they have been much more forward to defend their heresy than I and others have been to attack it. At the same time I beg that if you have any synodical decrees bearing upon the subject you will forward them to me, that, strengthened with the authority of so great a prelate, I may open my mouth for Christ with more freedom and confidence. The presbyter Vincent has arrived from Rome two days ago and humbly salutes you. He tells me again and again that Rome and almost the whole of Italy owe their deliverance after Christ to your letters. Shew diligence therefore, most loving and most blessed pope, and whenever opportunity offers write to the bishops of the West not to hesitate-in your own words² -to cut down with a sharp sickle the sprouts of evil.

1: Bishop of Rome, a.d. 398-402 2: See the preceding letter

Letters - letter_089

Letter 89. From Theophilus to Jerome. This letter (probably earlier in date than the three preceding) commends to Jerome the monk Theodore, who, having come from Rome to declare the condemnation of Origenism by the church there, had visited the monasteries of Nitria now purged of heresy, and wished before returning to the West to see the Holy Places as well. The date of the letter is 400 a.d.

Theophilus, bishop, to the well-beloved lord and most loving brother the presbyter Jerome. I have learned the project of the monk Theodore-which will be known also to your holiness-and I approve of it. Having to leave us on a voyage for Rome, he has been unwilling to set out without first visiting and embracing as his own flesh and blood you and the reverend brothers who are with you in the monastery. You will, I am sure, rejoice in the news with which he will meet your welcome, that quiet has been restored to the church here. He has seen all the monasteries of Nitria and can tell you of the continence and meekness of the monks in them; as also how the Origenists have been put down and scattered, how peace has been restored to the church, and how the discipline of the Lord is being upheld. How gladly would I see the mask of hypocrisy laid aside by those also who near you are said to be undermining the truth. I feel obliged to write thus because the brothers in your neighbourhood¹ are mistaken concerning them. Wherefore take heed to yourselves and shun men of this type; even as it is written:-"if any man bring not to you the faith of the church, bid him not God speed."² It may, indeed, be superfluous to write thus to you who can recall the erring from their error, yet no harm is done when those careful for the faith admonish even the wise and learned. Kindly salute in my name all the brothers who are with you.

1: The bishops of Palestine are meant. See Letter XCII 2: 2 John 10, inexactly quoted

Letters - letter_090

Letter 90. From Theophilus to Epiphanius.

Theophilus writes to Epiphanius to convoke a council in Cyprus for the condemnation of Origenism and asks him to transmit to Constantinople by a trustworthy messenger a copy of its decrees together with the synodical letter of Theophilus himself. His anxiety about this last point is caused by the news that certain of the excommunicated monks have set sail for Constantinople to lay their case before the bishop, John Chrysostom. The date of the letter is 400 a.d.

Theophilus to his well-beloved lord, brother, and fellow-bishop Epiphanius. The Lord has said to his prophet "See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms to root out and to pull down and to destroy and...to build and to plant." [Jer. 1:10] In every age he bestows the same grace upon his church, that His Body [Eph. 1:23] may be preserved intact and that the poison of heretical opinions may nowhere prevail over it. And now also do we see the words fulfilled. For the church of Christ "not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing" [Eph. 5:27] has with the sword of the gospel cut down the Origenist serpents crawling out of their caves, and has delivered from their deadly contagion the fruitful host of the monks of Nitria. I have compressed a short account of my proceedings (it was all that time would allow) into the general letter¹ which I have addressed indiscriminately to all. As your excellency has often fought in contests of the kind before me, it is your present duty to strengthen the hands of those who are in the field and to gather together to this end the bishops of your entire island.² A synodical letter should be sent to myself and the bishop of Constantinople³ and to I any others whom you think fit; that by universal consent Origen himself may be expressly condemned and also the infamous heresy of which he was the author. I have learned that certain calumniators of the true faith, named Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius, filled with a fresh access of enthusiasm in behalf of the heresy, have taken ship for Constantinople, to ensnare with their deceits as many new converts as they can and to confer anew with the old companions of their impiety. Let it be your care, therefore, to set forth the course of the matter to all the bishops throughout Isauria and Pamphylia and the rest of the neighbouring provinces: moreover, if you think fit, you can add my letter, so that all of us gathered together in one spirit with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ may deliver these men unto Satan for the destruction of the impiety which possesses them. [Cf. 1 Cor. 5:4, 1 Cor. 5:5] And to ensure the speedy arrival of my despatches at Constantinople, send a diligent messenger, one of the clergy (as I send fathers from the monasteries of Nitria with others also of the monks, learned men and continent) that when they arrive they may be able themselves to relate what has been done. Above all I beg of you to offer up earnest prayers to the Lord that we may be able in this contest also to gain the victory; for no small joy has filled the hearts of the people both in Alexandria and throughout all Egypt, because a few men have been expelled from the Church that the body of it might be kept pure. Salute the brothers who are with you. The people⁴ with us salute you in the Lord.

1:

Letter XCII

2: Cyprus 3: i.e. John Chrysostom who had been raised to the patriarchate in 398 a.d

4:

Plebs

Letters - letter_091

Letter 91. From Epiphanius to Jerome. An exultant letter from Epiphanius in which he describes the success of his council (convened at the suggestion of Theophilus), sends Jerome a copy of its synodical letter. and urges him to go on with his work of translating into Latin documents beating on the Origenistic controversy. Written in 400 a.d. To his most loving lord, son, and brother, the presbyter Jerome, Epiphanius sends greeting in the Lord. The general epistle written¹ to all Catholics belongs particularly to you; for you, having a zeal for the faith against all heresies, particularly oppose the disciples of Origen and of Apollinaris whose poisoned roots and deeply planted impiety almighty God has dragged forth into our midst, that having been unearthed at Alexandria they might wither throughout the world. For know, my beloved son, that Amalek has been destroyed root and branch and that the trophy of the cross has been set up on the hill of Rephidim. [Cf. Exod. 17:8-14] For as when the hands of Moses were held up on high Israel prevailed, so the Lord has strengthened His servant Theophilus to plant His standard against Origen on the altar of the church of Alexandria; that in him might be fulfilled the words: "Write this for a memorial, for I will utterly put out Origen's heresy from under heaven together with that Amalek himself." And that I may not appear to be repeating the same things over and over and thus to be making my letter tedious, I send you the actual missive written to me that you may know what Theophilus has said to me, and what a great blessing the Lord has granted to my last days in approving the principles which I have always proclaimed by the testimony of so great a prelate. I fancy that by this time you also have published something and that, as I suggested in my former letter to you on this subject, you have elaborated a treatise for readers of your own language. For I hear that certain of those who have made shipwreck [1 Tim. 1:19] have come also to the West, and that, not content with their own destruction, they desire to involve others in death with them; as if they thought that the multitude of sinners lessens the guilt of sin and the flames of Gehenna do not grow in size in proportion as more logs are heaped upon them. With you and by you we send our best greetings to the reverend brothers who are with you in the monastery serving God.

1:

By Theophilus

Letters - letter_092

Letter 92. The Synodical Letter of Theophilus to the Bishops of Palestine and of Cyprus. The synodical letter of the council held at Alexandria in 400 a.d. to condemn Origenism. Written originally in Greek it was translated into Latin by Jerome. This letter has been sent in identical terms to the Bishops of Palestine and to those of Cyprus. We reproduce the headings of both copies. That to the Bishops of Palestine commences thus: To the well-beloved lords, brothers, and fellow-bishops, Eulogius, John, Zebianus, Auxentius, Dionysius, Gennadius, Zeno, Theodosius, Dictorius, Porphyry, Saturninus, Alan, Paul, Ammonius, Helianus, Eusebius, the other Paul, and to all the Catholic bishops gathered together at the dedication festival of Aelid,¹ Theophilus [sends] greeting in the Lord. The Cyprians he addresses thus: To the well-be-loved lords, brothers, and fellow-bishops, Epiphanius, Marcianus, Agapetus, Boethius, Helpidius, Entasius, Norbanus, Macedonius. Aristo, Zeno, Asiaticus, Heraclides, the other Zeno, Cyriacus, and Aphroditus, Theophilus [sends] greeting in the Lord. The scope of the letter is as follows:

We have personally visited the monasteries of Nitria and find that the Origenistic heresy has made great ravages among them. It is accompanied by a strange fanaticism: men even maim themselves or cut out their tongues² to show how they despise the body. I find that some men of this kind have gone from Egypt into Syria and other countries³ where they speak against us and the truth. The books of Origen have been read before a council of bishops and unanimously condemned. The following are his chief errors, mainly found in the "περὶ Ἀρχῆς".

1. The Son compared with us is truth, but compared with the Father he is falsehood. 2. Christ's kingdom will one day come to an end. 3. We ought to pray to the Father alone, not to the Song of Solomon. 4. Our bodies after the resurrection will be corruptible and mortal. 5. There is nothing perfect even in heaven; the angels themselves are faulty, and some of them feed on the Jewish sacrifices. 6. The stars are conscious of their own movements, and the demons know the future by their courses. 7. Magic, if real, is not evil. 8. Christ suffered once for men; he will suffer again for the demons. The Origenists have tried to coerce me; they have even stirred up the heathen by denouncing the destruction of the Serapeum; and have sought to withdraw from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction two persons accused of grave crimes. One of these is the woman⁴ who was wrongly placed on the list of widows by Isidore, the other Isidore himself. He is the standard-bearer of the heretical faction, and his wealth supplies them with unbounded resources for their violent enterprises. They have tried to murder me; they seized the monastery church at Nitria, and for a time prevented the bishops from entering and the offices from being performed. Now, like Zebul (Beelzebub) they go to and fro on the earth.

I have done them no harm; I have even protected them. But I would not let an old friendship (with Isidore) impair our faith and discipline. I implore you to oppose them wherever they come, and to prevent them from unsettling the brethren committed to you.

1: In Aeliae encaeniis. Aelia was the name given by the emperor Hadrian to the Roman colony founded by him on the site of Jerusalem 2: The monk Ammonius is said to have done this and similar things

3:

Some fifty, led by Ammonius and his three brothers (called the Long or Tall Monks) went first to Syria and then to Constantinople

4:

This woman is said to have brought a charge of immorality against Isidore and then suppressed it on being placed by him on the list of widows who received the church's bounty. Isidore was now eighty years old, and there were many causes for the quarrel. Palladius, Socrates and Sozomen intimate that the real cause of Theophilus' enmity to his old confidant Isidore was that Isidore knew secrets unfavorable to Theophilus. He afterwards went with the Long Monks to Constantinople, where Chrysostom by his reception of them incurred the hatred of Theophilus. See Jerome Letter CXIII

Letters - letter_093

Letter 93. From the Bishops of Palestine to Theophilus. The synodical letter of the council of Jerusalem sent to Theophilus in reply to the preceding. The translation as before is due to Jerome. The following is an epitome: We have done all that you wished, and Palestine is almost wholly free from the taint of heresy. We wish that not only the Origenists, but Jews, Samaritans and heathen also, could be put down. Origenism does not exit among us. The doctrines you describe are never heard here. We anathematize those who hold such doctrines, and also those of Apollinaris, and shall not receive anyone whom you excommunicate.

Letters - letter_094

Letter 94. From Dionysius to Theophilus. In this letter (translated into Latin by Jerome) Dionysius, bishop of Lydda, praises Theophilus for his signal victories over Origenism and urges him to continue his efforts against that heresy. Written in 400 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

Bishop Dionysius of Lidda to the most blessed Lord Theophilus.

1. Our God is good, who is glorified in the assemblies of the saints (Ps. 88.2), and prepares friends and prophets for Himself in each successive age. If you consider the order of our generation, O most blessed brother, the Lord raised you up as an imitator of correct faith, so that you might crush heretical superstition flowing from the source of the Gentiles with Apostolic rigor, and restore the human race, which is dragged down by many errors, and the dispersed flock of Christ to their Shepherd; who, at the time of his passion, gave his life for all, so that we might now say with faith, 'Truly God is among us' (1 Cor. 14.25). For who is either so foolish or impious, that they would not confess that you have given the greatest gift to the world, by wiping out the most wicked blasphemers of Origen's disciples, so that the Church of Christ may not be polluted by them? Their cancer and incurable leprosy have spread so widely through the hearts of many, that even those who feign penitence join heresy with perjury; and they do not cease to force us, who are compelled to remain silent, to hate.

2. Therefore, be strengthened and act manfully (1 Chronicles 22:13) then, servant of God, and pursue Origen's fictions to the end, so that the minds of the simple may not be caught with its alluring shadows of wisdom, and a division may not be made in the body of Christ. For all who are wise profess your father, your hope and the crown of the alacrity of faith, that you have impaled Arius, the master and his disciple, with the sword of the Gospel. The brothers of my cell greet you very warmly, as well as the brothers who are with you.

Letters - letter_095

Letter 95. From Pope Anastasius to Simplicianus. At the request of Theophilus Anastasius, bishop of Rome, writes to Simplicianus, bishop of Milan, to inform him that he, like Theophilus, has condemned Origen whose blasphemies have been brought under his notice by Eusebius of Cremona. This latter had shown him a copy of the version by Rufinus of the treatise On First Principles. The date of the letter is 400 a.d. To his lord and brother Simplicianus, Anastasius.

1. It is felt right that a shepherd should bestow great care and watchfulness upon his flock. In like manner too from his lofty tower the careful watchman keeps a lookout day and night on behalf of the city. So also in the hour of tempest when the sea is dangerous the shipmaster suffers keen anxiety¹ lest the gale and the violence of the waves shall dash his vessel upon the rocks. It is with similar feelings that the reverend and honourable Theophilus our brother and fellow-bishop, ceases not to watch over the things that make for salvation, that God's people in the different churches may not by reading Origen run into awful blasphemies.

2. Being informed, then, by a letter of the aforesaid bishop, we inform your holiness that we in like manner who are set in the city of Rome in which the prince of the apostles, the glorious Peter, first founded the church and then by his faith strengthened it; to the end that no man may contrary to the commandment read these books which we have mentioned, have condemned the same; and have with earnest prayers urged the strict observance of the precepts which God and Christ have inspired the evangelists to teach. We have charged men to remember the words of the venerable apostle Paul, prophetic and full of warning: "if any than preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." [Gal. 1:8] Holding fast, therefore, this precept, we have intimated that everything written in days gone by Origen that is contrary to our faith is even by us rejected and condemned.

3. I send this letter to your holiness by the hand of the presbyter Eusebius,² a man filled with a glowing faith and love for the Lord. He has shewn to me some blasphemous chapters which made me shudder as I passed judgement on them. If Origen has put forth any other writings, you are to know that they and their author are alike condemned by me. The Lord have you in safe keeping, my lord and brother deservedly held in honour.

1: Magister hactenus navis hora tempestatis `quoris et periculo magnam patitur animi jactationem

2: See the account of the meeting of Eusebius with Rufinus in the presence of Simplicianus. Ruf. Apol. 1:19

Letters - letter_096

Letter 96. From Theophilus. A translation by Jerome of Theophilus's paschal letter for the year 401 a.d. In it Theophilus refutes at length the heresies of Apollinaris and Origen. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

Letter 96. Or Paschal of Alexandria Bishop Theophilus' Easter Year 401 to All the Bishops of Egypt, Rendered into Latin by Saint Jerome. The divinity of Christ is especially affirmed against Apollinarius, then most of Origen's errors are discussed in detail and refuted; finally, the love for one's neighbors is praised as the main virtue for celebrating the Lord's Pascha.

1. Let us praise the Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of Glory, beloved brethren, with one voice again, and worship Him eagerly, and fulfill the words of the prophets, who says, "Sing a new hymn to the Lord" (Psalm 149); as many as of us who are partners of the Kingdom of Heaven by leading a faithful life, let us receive the coming of the holy solemnity and celebrate the upcoming festivals with the celebration of the whole world; one of the wise men has proclaimed: "Come, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart: because thy works please God" (Ecclesiastes 9:7). For those who are of good works, and after being left the milk of infancy, receive the nourishment of more solid food, they contemplate divine senses more deeply, and when satisfied with spiritual food, they have God as both their praiser and witness of their life; and to guests such as these the preacher speaks: "At all times let your garments be white, and let no oil be lacking on your head" (Ecclesiastes 9). Let us, clothed in the garment of virtues, imitate the brightness of the sun, and let everyone infuse oil to his own understanding by daily reading of the Holy Scriptures, and prepare a lamp for his mind, which, according to the precept of the Gospel, may shine before all who are in the house (Matthew 5).

2. Therefore, let us join together with such guests who celebrate so the Lord's Passion, eager to say with the Saints: "I will praise the Lord in my life; I will sing psalms to my God while I live." (Ps 103) And let us hasten to the metropolis of the Angels, which is free and is not stained with any impurity of evil; where there is neither division nor downfall and the passage from one place to another; where every temptation of pleasure is trodden underfoot and the surging billows of lust are stilled, so that we may be mingled with the celestial choirs and, already translated in mind to that place and seeing what is there, may become what is to be our future. The Jews have made themselves unworthy of blessedness, who, forsaking the riches of Holy Scripture and acquiescing to the understanding of the poor teachers, today hear: They always err with their hearts (Psalm 94); and when Christ is present, they do not want to say: Blessed is He who comes in the name of the Lord (Psalm 117). Especially since with every voice they testify that the works are clearer than God himself, and not to say: Thus says the Lord, but I say to you: by which he shows himself to be the bearer of laws and the true Lord God, and not one of the prophets.

3. For the assumption of the form of a slave was not capable of obscuring his divine nature, which is not constrained by the limits of any place, nor of limiting the ineffable power of his majesty within the confines of a human body, which the greatness of God's works demonstrated in the son of God. For when he had calmed the raging waves and the swelling height of the sea that looked like mountains, and given it a sudden calm, when the apostles' boat was delivered from shipwreck, and they had felt the power of the Lord's presence in the depths of the waters, and when the winds had ceased and the waves were subdued on every side by the Lord's command, they said together, as if moved by divine inspiration: "Truly, you are the Son of God" (Matthew 14), not doubting about his divinity which his works proclaimed. For truly there is prophetic vision: You rule the strength of the sea, and you calm the movement of its waves (Psalm 88). And the prophet himself indicates the significance of the song, so that not only in word but also in the power of the true God, who was seen, it might be believed, with the excellence of his works revealing what lay hidden. God, perfect by his own will, assuming everything of human nature and condition, is born sinless and without malice, adored as Emmanuel, visited by the Magi from the East, confessed as the Son of God with bended knee; who, and at the time of his passion, while hanging on the cross, obscured the rays of the sun, expressing the magnitude of his divinity with a new and unheard of miracle. And undivided and inseparable, not separated into two saviors by some error. Hence he spoke to the disciples: Do not call anyone on earth your father; for one is your Father, who is in heaven (Matt. 23:9). For when he said this to the apostles, he did not separate the excellence of the divinity from the body that was visible. And when he bore witness to the one Christ, the Son of God, he did not divide soul and flesh: not one separately and the other separately, but both subsisting as one and the same, both God and man, while he seems a servant and is worshipped as Lord. For he concealed the ineffable Godhead in the frailty of his human body, and again in his divine works exceeded the weakness of the flesh. And lest any one of the holy ones be believed (as it is by many) to be only one, he whom Paul seeks to show, writes: One God, and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus. And again, There is one mediator of God and man, the man Christ Jesus; because there is one Son of the Father, and our mediator, who did not lose his equality with the Father, nor was separated from our company: invisible God, and visible man: hidden in the form of a servant, and confirmed in the confession of believers as Lord of glory.

4. For the Father did not deprive him of his own nature, after he became a man and poor for us, nor did he call him by another name when he was baptized in the Jordan River, but his only begotten son: You are my beloved son, in whom I am well pleased (Luke 2). And our similitude has not been changed into the nature of divinity, nor has divinity been turned into the similitude of our nature; but the Word of God, remaining what it was from the beginning, and glorifying us in Himself, He did not come, according to Jeremiah, to say, 'Woe is me, that you have begotten me a man, a judge of strife and a cause of division to the whole earth. I have not profited, nor has he that sent me.' Neither did He cry out according to Isaiah, 'Woe is me, because I am a man, and have unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people having unclean lips, and I have seen the Lord, the King of hosts, with my eyes.' For he was the king of glory, as it is written in the 23rd Psalm: Being a conqueror on the cross and restraining hostile wars, so that he might make a man fashioned from the soil into a dweller of heaven and present him with the sharing of his triumph.

5. So, though those who believe he was changed into someone else may not want this, Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today and forever (Hebrews 13:8), and will never have an end to his reign. According to the wicked error of Origen, he may be deprived of his eternal kingdom when his reign ends, but he speaks before all and states, 'I am in the Father and the Father is in me' (John 11:34). And wanting to teach us that the Father is in the Son and the Son is in the Father, he commands all creatures, and proving this, he adds, 'I and the Father are one' (John 14:11), so that no one divides his unity in himself and the Father's kingdom on account of human flesh. "But if Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, were ever, according to Origen's insanity, to lose his kingdom, would he not, when speaking to the Apostles, have said, 'I and the Father are two,' instead of 'I and the Father are one,' meaning that he would not afterward possess sole rule, but that he would share it with another? For he has his glory here, which he will lay aside there; and where will that be which is ever both in the Father and the Son, if the kingdom of the Son is not assured? But those who contend that this is so, if they do not repent, should perish, and to those moved by zeal for faith and piety Moses should say, 'Cursed be you in the city, and cursed be you in the field' (Deut 28); and the Psalmist likewise rebuking: 'Let sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more.'" (Psalm 104)

6. Indeed, I cannot understand with what rashness Origen so boldly invented so many things, not following the authority of Scripture, but his own errors; he dared to bring everything harmful into the open, and he never thought that anyone would contradict his assertions if he mixed the arguments of philosophers with his own interpretations, and if he went from an evil beginning to some fables and delusions, turning Christian doctrine into a game and a jest, not relying on the truth of divine teaching but on the discretion of the human mind, swelling up with such great pride as to not imitate the humility of Paul, who, full of the Holy Spirit, compared the gospel with the first apostles, so that perhaps he would not run in vain or run too hard (Gal. 2:2): he did not know that he was instigated by a demonic spirit to follow the sophisms of human minds and to consider something divine beyond the authority of Scripture. Let those, who dream of the end of Christ's kingdom and desire to be parasites of Origen's verbosity, rest quietly and not pretend to walk with the faithful in faith they do not possess. Rather, let them learn that all deceit and fraudulence is one thing and shows another: so that it may strive to conceal vices under the guise of virtue. For even though Christ did not lose the glory of being the Lord in the ignominy of the cross which He suffered for us, according to the blessed Apostle, when those who were shouting against the Jews said: "You who tear down the temple and build it up in three days, save yourself: if you are the son of God, descend from the cross" (Matthew 27), and suffering in the flesh, and hanging on the gibbet, he showed the strength of his own majesty, causing the sun to cease from his course, and extorting from the thief by the magnitude of his signs a voice full of faith: Remember me, Lord, when you come into your kingdom (Luke 23). Never will he lose the kingdom after the glory of the resurrection, although Origen may throw countless stones of blasphemy against him. Or, whose is the consequence, to promise the disciples the perpetuity of the kingdom, and to say: Come, you blessed of my Father, possess the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world (Matthew 25): and to lack the very thing that he attributes to others? Or how can it be understood that the kingdom of Christ, which Paul writes to the Corinthians, 'You reign without us, and I wish you did reign, that we also might reign with you' (1 Cor. 4), might be terminated after many ages, especially when John cries out: 'He that cometh from above is above all' (John 3:31): And the Apostle writes, 'Whose are the fathers, and of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen.' (Romans 9:5).

7. Therefore, there is no doubt that whoever remains as God forever, both has a kingdom and is called a perpetual king, having the appropriate dominion of divinity, with nothing rough or new in himself except the assumption of human frailty. For if, according to Origen's madness, Christ's kingdom is to end after many circles of centuries, it is consequent to his impiety to say that God will also stop being God someday; and he who sets limits to the kingdom is forced to feel the same thing about divinity that naturally possesses the perpetuity of the empire. If the Word of God (Λόγος Θεοῦ Verbum Dei) reigns, then God truly exists, and is discerned in this way: whoever tries to impose an end on his reign falls into that, compelled to believe in Christ and to cease being God. But a foolish teacher talks this way with impious followers. Let us believe in Christ's eternal reign, and on the solemn day let us sing with the Angel, and say: His reign shall be without end (Luke 1.33). For if He is one with the Father, then He will never cease to be one with Him, and the unity of the Father and the Son will never be divided into parts, lest the truth that they are one may eventually cease to be.

8. Therefore, let the most foolish of mortals make haste and descend living into hell (Psalm. 54.16), as the psalmist testifies, and seeing their teacher of impiety there, let them cry, "And you have been taken as we have; you have been reckoned among us; your glory has descended into hell," and so on. Such a shepherd of the soft flock bruises Christ everywhere with his slights, and exalts the devil with honor, while he claims that he, having been cleansed of faults and sins, will finally receive his former glory and withdraw from ruling, to be brought down with the devil under the authority of the Father; so much that he exclaims in wonder not so much like the prophecies of the Jews, but rather like the blasphemies of Origen: "The heavens were astounded at this and shuddered greatly," says the Lord, "because he has done two evils." (Jeremiah 2:12) Origen, asserting that Christ will cease to rule and that the devil will ascend to the heights from which he fell, digs such a deep pit of his sin, that cannot contain its own waters: He as far as he can makes the Son of God equal to the devil, while he detracts the eternal glory of the kingdom and subjects him with the demons under the Father's authority. But the voice of such a wicked one is being prevailed upon, so that we may know that the kingdom of Christ is perpetual, he himself speaking to his disciples: 'You have persevered with me in my trials, and I establish for you an eternal covenant, that you may always drink and eat at my table in my kingdom.' (Luke 22:28-29). For how can this, which is said to be always, be fulfilled unless it be an everlasting kingdom, and with no end? The Magi, understanding this, turned to penitence, and questioned more diligently: 'Where is he who is born King of the Jews? For we have seen his star in the East, and have come to worship him.' (Matthew 2:22). The Magi confess Christ as king, and Origen denies this, saying he will not reign forever, and does not realize that he is similar to the blasphemies of the Jews.

9. We read in the Gospel that when the Lord and Savior, showing an outstanding example of his strength and patience, mounted the cross, Pilate inscribed a title and placed it over his head. It was written: Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews (John 19:19). This title many of the Jews read, for it was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. So the chief priests of the Jews said to Pilate, "Do not write 'The King of the Jews,' but rather, 'He said, I am King of the Jews.'" Pilate responded: "What I have written, I have written." (John 19:22). Therefore, since Pilate was unable to be swayed to remove the title of the Christ as king by either sedition or pleas, let Origen know that he ought not to consider the kingdom of Christ as terminable without any need to do so, such as the Jews did. And while the Jews denied a king who was present on the earth, Pilate here tries to detract from one who reigns in heaven as much as he can, so that he may have an accuser for his crime. Let the prophetic word enter into the midst and let it proclaim the kingdom of Christ in total liberty: Rejoice daughter of Zion, proclaim daughter of Jerusalem, be glad and exult with your whole heart, daughter of Jerusalem ((or Israel)); The Lord has taken away your iniquities, he has redeemed you from the hand of your enemies, the king of Israel is in your midst, you will no longer see evil ((Soph. 3, 14. from the Greek.)). For those who once saved will not again be thrown from heaven, and will not be persuaded by the deliriums and fables of Origen, so as to fall again from the heights. And this which is said, "You will not see (alternatively, you will see) further evil," is a sign of eternal security, that those who have once been liberated and enjoyed the possession of the kingdom of heaven may by no means be dragged down by vices to the earth, nor deprived of the help of God, who according to the prophetic word will set a wall and a circumvallation around them by his own power. Hence the Psalmist sings: "He who dwells in Jerusalem will not be moved forever" (Psalm 124). And the Lord testifies: "I will not leave you or forsake you." And it is in vain to dream of ascending souls to heaven, and descending, and now making progress, now sliding down to lower things, so that they often die by countless ruins, and the passion of Christ is made void. For he who died for us once, gave us the eternal joy of his victory, which is not diminished by any weight of vices. And no one dies more frequently among men than what Origen dared to write, seeking to establish the most impious doctrine of the Stoics by the authority of the divine Scriptures.

10. Christ will suffer for the demons. - But why do we remember this? When such madness has broken out, nay, madness, that they implicate another crime to the Savior, saying that he should be affixed to the cross for demons and spiritual wickednesses before the gods. Nor does he understand into what a deep abyss of impiety he falls. For if Christ suffered for men and became man, as the testimonies of the Scriptures bear witness, it will follow that Origen says, "And if he was to suffer for demons, he would become a demon; for he will be forced to infer this out of necessity, lest he appear to disagree with what he has begun." This is to imitate the blasphemies of the Jews, whom he always imitates; for they also spoke to Christ in a similar manner: "You have a demon," and "By Beelzebub, the prince of demons, you cast out demons" (Luke 11:15). But it is far from the truth that Christ should suffer for demons, lest he himself become a demon. And those who believe this crucify him again and hold him up to ridicule as the Son of God (Hebrews 6:6), who, as he did not take hold of the seed of Abraham, will not also assume the nature of demons, so that he may be crucified for them as well. Neither do the demons seeing God in suffering, will cry out with the Prophet: He carried our sins and suffers for us. Neither will they say as Isaiah does: By his bruises we are healed (Isaiah 53:4). Neither for the demons, as for the human race, will Christ be led like a sheep to the victim; nor will it be said for their salvation: He did not spare his own Son (Jeremiah 11); because neither will the demons cry out: He was handed over for our sins, and rose again for our justification (1 Corinthians 11). Paul writes: "For I passed on to you as of first importance what I also received, that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures (1 Cor. 15): he cites them in testimony and wishes to confirm the doubtful by their authority;" but Origen, without any testimony of the divine voice, tries to force the truth and find it with an extinguished lamp.

11. Supporter of demons and not humans, he attacks with frequent calumnies the Son of God, and crucifies him anew, not understanding into what a deep and horrible abyss of impiety he is dragged. For it follows that whoever undertakes the former, accepts the latter as well: and whoever says that Christ was crucified for the demons, must also accept the following: "Take and eat: this is my body." And: "Take and drink: this is my blood" (Matthew. 26.26). For if he is crucified also for the demons, as an assertor of new doctrines affirms, what privilege will there be or what reason that only human beings should share in his body and blood, and not also demons, for whom he shed his blood in his passion? But the demons will not hear, "Take and eat," and, "Take and drink." Nor will the Lord dissolve his own precepts who says to his disciples, "Do not give the holy thing to dogs, nor cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet and turn and tear you in pieces (Matthew 7)." For the apostle also writes, "I do not want you to become partners with demons. You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of demons: you cannot partake of the table of the Lord and the table of demons (1 Corinthians 10)." Through these things he shows that it is impossible for demons to drink from the cup of the Lord and to partake of his table. The food of the devil are the deniers of God, with Habakkuk speaking: Their chosen food (Habakkuk 1); however, the food of all the impious is execrable, the devil himself, as prophesied by the Prophet: You have given him as food for the people of Ethiopia (Psalm 73.14). From all of these it is proven that Christ cannot be crucified for the demons, lest they become partakers of his Body and Blood.

12. So when the Apostle also indicates regarding the Savior: For He did this once, offering Himself (Heb. 7:27); and Origen contradicts that sentiment with such confidence, it is time to infer this: Earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord, write this man rejected (Jer. 22). For who can receive these evils in hell? Who can think of such things in Tartarus? What madness of the giants stood so rebellious and built the tower of impiety? What the lewd desire, and the insatiable desire of the demons, thus divided the legs of her mind, passing through the whole doctrine? Who drinks so much from the vineyards of Sodom that, drunken with the wine of their fury, he falls with all his heart? Who, irrigated by the streams of the Babylonians, left alive the sources of Israel? Who, departing from Jerusalem and imitating Jeroboam son of Nebat, has made so many errors of altars and lit profane incense? Why do Dathan and Abiron, who sinned less, not come before the judgment of Christ and condemn themselves by comparison to him, who outside the Church of the Savior has filled various censers with diabolical fire of doctrines? For the Lord who speaks through the Prophet says: I have multiplied visions and I have been made like a Prophet's hands (Hosea 12:10 according to LXX), He taught him to bring forth adulterous doctrines, neither those who saw him from the beginning and were ministers of the Word of God, nor the chorus of Prophets, who were once called the Seers, taught him this themselves: but he himself, by the choice of his own mind, serving the frenzy of demons and deceived by the flattery of his own thoughts, has sent throughout the whole world, to the minds of the unlearned, a flock and, so to speak, a swarm of perverse dogmas. This is the one who opened his mouth to the Assyrians and Babylonians rivers, who tried to cover with waves a ship full of the Church's good merchandise of salutary doctrine; while he is lifted up by the praise of the unskilled, and boasting about the sense of Holy Scripture, he teaches in his confusion otherwise than reality. For, who has written so many and so voluble, and so full of both verbosity and ignorance books, and has connected them day and night with tireless zeal, that forsaking the monuments of error, he might be worthy of hearing: 'Have you been deceived by your many trips?' For he has used as a guide the worst of people, the popular breeze, and very many books of false knowledge, and fighting with a mind in rebellion against God, he blended a certain pus and the stench of his own fetor with the ointment of heavenly teachings, so that it would again be said to his soul: 'Filthy, infamous, and excessive in iniquities.' For he did not wish to listen to the prophet admonishing: "Why do you love vanity and seek after lies?" (Psalm 4:3). He who crucifies Christ on behalf of demons, in order that he might be a mediator not only between God and men but also for demons. But far be it from us to believe such a monstrous blasphemy about our Savior, that he would lose the temple of his body, which he deigned to raise up for us, and affix to himself another temple of a demoniacal condition, so that by receiving their likeness, he might also suffer the cross for them.

13. I ask, dear brothers, that you forgive my grief, resisting impious teachings; for while we strive to push back the audacity of his followers, we have exposed the framework of his armor, and the deceitful tricks of his venomous heart, so that what was also said of him might be fulfilled: I shall reveal your shame, and show it to your lovers (Ezek. 16:36). For among other things, he so corrupts and violates even the resurrection from the dead, which is the hope of our salvation, by daring to say that our bodies will indeed be raised up, but only so that they may fall again into corruption and death once more. Answer me, O head of impiety, how, according to the Apostle Paul, did Christ conquer him who had power over death, that is, the devil, if corruptible and mortal bodies will rise again? What profit is Christ's passion to us if death and corruption will again possess our bodies? Or what does the Apostle mean when writing, 'For as in Adam all die, so in Christ shall all be made alive' (1 Cor. 15), if, when we rise again, cruel death will still rule over us? Or how can those who believe this sincerely say, 'Christ is the power of God and the wisdom of God' (1 Cor. 1.24), desiring to be stronger than death, which will destroy the bodies raised by him and cannot be completely overcome? But our Lord Christ triumphed over even Origen, who resisted impiously, and over death as well as the devil, who had dominion over death, he destroyed by his own power, having prepared for us in heaven the triumph of his victories. Nor will he raise those bodies only to destroy them again; rather, he has wholly abolished death and corruption for their sakes.

14. Therefore freed from all evils, let us celebrate the feast of the Lord's Passion and, according to the parable of the Gospel (Matth. 22), while we behold wisdom sacrificing bulls and birds, let us feed upon stronger and more nourishing foods, and richer in the doctrine of truth, that we may leave the milk of infancy and obtain solid nourishment, and so flee from all the causes of evil, especially from ignorance, which, binding the feet with many diverse heresies, has made Origen its chief patron, he who dared to say among other things that we should not pray either to the Son or to the Father with the Son; and after many ages he revived the blasphemy of Pharaoh, saying: "Who is the Lord, that I should hear His voice? I know not the Lord, nor will I let Israel go" (Exod. 5. 2). There is nothing else to say, I don't know the Lord, other than what Origen says, that the Son should not be prayed to, whom he certainly confesses as Lord. And although he has burst into such open blasphemy, he must still be prayed to, of whom the Prophet testifies, saying: And they shall adore thee, and shall pray to thee, because God is in thee, and there is no other God besides thee (Isai. 4. 5. 14). And again, Whoever shall invoke the name of the Lord shall be saved (Rom. 10. 13). And Paul reasoning: How, he says, shall they call on him, in whom they have not believed (Ibid. v. 14)? It is necessary first to believe that the Son of God exists, so that his invocation is correct and consequent. And just as he who is not God is not to be prayed to, so on the contrary, whoever is found to be God is to be adored and prayed to. Therefore Stephen, kneeling down, prayed for them that were killing him, saying: Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep in the Lord. And Saul was consenting to his death. (Acts 7) But that which is said, 'The knee shall be bent,' is a sign of anxious and humble supplication. Therefore, Origen does not believe in the Son of God who he thinks should not be prayed to, and he tears him apart with insults. And even though he flatters himself with the memory of the Scriptures and thinks he understands them, he does not hear Moses speaking against himself: 'The man who blasphemes against God shall have sinned, and who speaks the name of the Lord shall die by death.' All the multitude shall stone him to death (Leviticus 24:16). But who would so insult Christ with such insults, as this one who has dared to say that He should not be prayed to, indulging only in the empty and useless name of divinity?

15. But what is the use of lingering among such impious statements? Let us pass on to another error of his. He asserts that the bodies which rise again will at last, after many ages, be dispersed into nothingness and never again have any existence, except when souls, after sinking down from the heavenly realms, need new ones to be made for them, which will again in their turn be destroyed, the former ones being entirely blotted out. Who that hears this would not quiver in mind and body? For if after the resurrection bodies are reduced to nothingness, the second death will be more powerful than the first; for it will entirely destroy the substantial character of the body. Why does Paul thus write: "Death shall no longer have dominion over him; for the dead, it is true, are dead unto sin once for all" (Rm 6:10)? If the bodies are to be utterly destroyed, how can it be true that "once for all" that which is dead is dead unto sin? In what sense then has he added: "It is sown in corruption, it shall rise in incorruption: it is sown in weakness, it shall rise in power: it is sown in dishonor, it shall rise in glory: it is sown a natural body, it shall rise a spiritual body" (1 Cor 15)? For if corruption reduces into nothingness, it would be consequent to say that they are reserved in perpetuity for corruption, and that corruption is stronger than the incorruptible. But may it be far from Paul to write the opposite to himself, that incorruption and corruption have the same nature. And so, if, as Origen falsely believes, not only the corruptible but also the mortal body is to be raised up, then corruption and incorruption, death and life, will be said to be one and the same, and they will have the same power in resurrected bodies, and not in things, but only in names corruption and incorruption, death and life will be separated. But if the corruptible and mortal body is to rise again, it would follow that the apostle was speaking of the following: It is sown in corruption, it shall rise in incorruption: it is sown in weakness, it shall rise in power. It is sown a natural body, it shall rise a spiritual body. If then it takes away corruption, and weakness, and disgrace from the bodies which are to be raised up, and says that, on the contrary, they are to be clothed with incorruption, and strength, and glory, and that the animal body is to be transformed into a spiritual body, then death will be destroyed, and in the bodies thus raised there will be nothing of death and corruption remaining. For the body itself, too, will become immortal and incorruptible, in order that it may be joined together with the soul for all eternity. Therefore, since the Savior, in the resurrection of his body, bestowed a pledge of salvation upon our bodies, he cannot be believed to be subject to death any longer, in agreement with the Apostle in this statement: Christ rising from the dead, dies now no more, death shall have no more dominion over him. (Romans 6:9). Unless it had ruled him, it will not rule over us.

16. A not evil magical art. Origen is confused among other types of wickedness, giving support to magic arts: for in his treatises, he speaks these words: "The magical art does not seem to me to be the name of any subsisting thing, and even if it were, it is not the work of evil," lest anyone should hold it in contempt. Thus speaking, he shows himself to be a supporter of the magician of Elyma, who resisted the Apostles, and of Jamne and Mambre, who withstood Moses' magical arts.

"But the power of Origen will have no support, because Christ destroyed the tricks of the Magi by his coming. Let the advocate of the new impiety respond, better yet, let him clearly hear: If magical art is not evil, then idolatry, which relies on the powers of magical art, will not be evil. But if idolatry is evil, then magical art, from which idolatry arises, will also be evil. And since idolatry has been destroyed by the majesty of Christ, it is clear that magical art, its parent, has been dissolved with it, the Prophet proclaiming about this: Stand now with thy enchantments, and with the multitude of thy sorceries, which thou hast learned from thy youth, if so be thou shalt be able to profit." (Isaiah 47:12) Therefore when these prophecies in writing testify, and no one has ever dared to disclose the names, among the best of the magicians' arts, even public laws punish magicians and sorcerers, I cannot understand in what way Origen, who boasts himself a Christian, being an imitator of the pseudo-prophet Sedechiah, made iron horns for himself, with which he walks around armed against the doctrines of truth, nor does he know anything about the heavenly Jerusalem, nor does he imitate Moses, and Daniel, and Peter, and other saints, who fought against magicians and enchanters, as if standing in battle in unceasing contest. Let us lead the choirs of festive days with those, having avoided the poisons of Origen through dangers by traveling through the middle of Babylon, and having obeyed the words of the Prophet commanding, 'Go forth from Babylon, ye that flee from the land of the Chaldeans' (Jer. 50. 8), so that we may enter into Jerusalem, where the preaching of truth is.

17. Although resisting with lies, we suffered something of the three boys, who conquered the nature of the flames of a burning fire in the furnace, nevertheless the Babylonian fire did not prevail against us, nor were our hair burned (Dan. 3:94), namely the extreme dogmas of ecclesiastical truth; neither were the saraballs changed, which the Holy Scriptures wove for us in testimony for the protection of souls, nor is the scent of fire within us, the flame of a perverse science racing about. For we have not acquiesced to his teaching, who suspects that bodies were made because of the downfall of rational creatures; and he says, according to the etymology of the Greek language, that souls are named thus, because they have lost the warmth of their mind, and their most fervent love for God, and have received their name from coldness, lest we feel that the soul of our Savior is subject to the same ignorance. We do not assert that the course of the sun, moon, and stars, and the most beautiful harmony in the diversity of the whole world, happened because of the preceding causes, various sins, and vices of souls, nor did God wait a long time to exhibit His goodness, so that He would not make visible creatures unless the invisible ones had sinned. Nor do we call substantial materiality vanity, as that person thinks, agreeing with the teachings of Manichaeus in different words, lest Christ's body fall under vanity, of which, having been satiated with its food, we daily chew the words spoken, saying: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you will not have life in you" (John 13). For if bodily nature is empty and futile, according to Origen's error, why did Christ rise from the dead? why will he raise our bodies? what does Paul mean when he writes: if the dead do not rise again, neither has Christ risen; but if Christ has not risen, our faith is in vain (1 Cor. 13).

18. From which it is clear that the nature of bodies is not empty, but those who do not believe that it will rise again and exist perpetually are foolish. Let him also despise honorable marriages, denying that bodies can exist unless souls have first sinned in heaven, so that they may be precipitated from there and bound in the prisons of the body. And let him feel as he wishes, speak as he does not fear; let him hear us shouting in his ears with Paul: Honorable marriage and an undefiled bed (Hebrews 13: 4). "And how can [the soul be] immaculate, if it is surrounded by flesh stained with faults? And Anna, the wife of Helcana, subject to faults, asking for semen of a male, for the desire of a woman, [puts] the souls in danger in the heavens, and one of them, heavy with sin, falls onto the earth and deserts its previous blessedness. Neither does Moses cursing and saying: "May the Lord your God multiply you, and behold, you are today as the stars of the heaven in multitude. The Lord God of your fathers add to you as you are, a thousand times, and bless as he had spoken" (Deuteronomy 1:10 and following): he asked for it so that clouds of souls, of the sinning Israeli people, could form a nation in heaven. What is different, is very clear, as he who prayed for the offense of the people said: If you forgive this people's sin, forgive; but if not, blot me out of the book which you have written (Exod. 32. 32 according to the Greek), if he asks for the multiplication of the sons of Israel, whom, if he knew to grow in the ruins of souls, he would not pray for the opposite, lest he be considered inferior in nature for the vices of a better substance. Why does David pray in Psalm: "May the Lord bless you from Zion, that you may see the good things of Jerusalem all the days of your life and see your children's children" (Psalm 127:5) if the number of righteous people increases with the rejection and destruction of souls? And he dares to say: "Behold, in this way man will be blessed, who fears the Lord" (Ibid. 4): when he knows that the souls of delinquents are bound in the chains of their bodies, and in such a prison, the judgment of God must pay the penalty for sins? How does God speak through the Prophet: "If you had heard my commandments, then your peace would have been like a river, and your righteousness like the waves of the sea, and your seed like the sand, and the offspring of your womb like the dust of the earth" (Isaiah 48:18-19, from the Greek)? For those who keep God's commandments, they should not receive as a reward the ruins of souls from heaven, which, bound to their bodies, multiply the offspring of them. But if they wish to learn what are the beginnings of the human race, let them hear Moses saying: God took earth and formed man, and breathed into his face the breath of life, and man became a living soul (Gen. 2.7), that is, immortal. God also, blessing Adam and Eve, said: Increase and multiply, and fill the earth (Gen. 9.1.7).

19. If souls are sent to earth after sin, to be born in bodies, Adam and Eve were not blessed with reason, since the cause of sin deserved rather to be cursed. In fact, after He created them, God blessed them with words of blessing: but later, when they sinned of their own will, He struck them with a curse. From which it can be gathered that nature did not change its course on account of the sin of souls replacing bodies. Let them hear again the saying: I have made the earth, and man on it (Jer. 27. 5). And David: The heaven of heavens is the Lord's: but the earth he gave to the children of men (Psal. 113). And let them cease to follow the errors of their thoughts, and rather be led by the authority of the Scriptures. For just as those who have been weakened by pleasures, and in whose hearts desire rules, upon contemplating the beauty of bodies, do not seek the beauty of morals, but of limbs; and their senses, burdened with filth, do not look upon anything higher: thus those who are led by the arranged composition of words, and captivated by the sound of eloquence, do not perceive the truth of doctrines, they blush to confess their former error, and, blinded by the arrogance of pride, do not wish to be disciples, lest they seem to have made mistakes before they were corrected.

20. Therefore, with Origen's evils being rejected, and the Scriptures, which are called apocrypha (also apocrypha and hidden), that is, hidden, and the disciples being omitted: "For I did not speak in secret" (John 18:20), says the Lord. Again and again, I implore you, beloved brothers, let us celebrate the feast of the Lord's Passion by enhancing our faith with our conduct, let us imitate God in his mercy towards the poor, to whom no form of bodily nature is similar. Let us have the image of His goodness in all things, let us correct our mistakes with repentance, let us pray for our enemies, let us plead with our detractors, emulating Moses, who prayed away his sister's accusations against him. Let us wash away the filth of sinners with the oil of alms-giving: let us seem to bind the chains of prisoners, and let us pray to God that He may be propitious to them. Let us support in our daily kindness those who are shut up in prison, and those whose bodily members are consumed by continuous decay on account of the heavenly reward that is laid up for them; and let us minister to them with earnest diligence. And if at any time power of judgment be given to us, and the cause of contending brethren be brought before us, let there be no respect of persons, but let the case be decided on its merits; and if any are falling, or in distress, let us also be carried away with a feeling of their pain. Let the laws hold the standard of truth. Let charity be ready for mercy, not insulting sinners, but condoling, for it is easy to fall into vices, and the frailty of human nature must dread whatever it sees in another. And if someone else has been corrected for error, his correction shall be our caution, and above all, like the pinnacle and crown of virtues, piety towards God shall be observed with fear of the whole heart, and let us confess the indiscreet substance, wherein we were baptized and received eternal life, cursing the number of gods and acknowledging the One and undivided substance of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. And if the mercy of God shall grant it, we shall merit to celebrate the Lord's Passover with the angels, beginning the season of Lent on the eighth day of the month called Phamenoth by the Egyptians; and thus shall we fast, receiving strength from Him who giveth strength, on the fourth day of the week [Wednesday], and on the Preparation-day we shall arrange the foundation of the holy week of the Paschal festival, that haply we may receive the joy of the resurrection in Christ Jesus our Lord, through Whom to Him be glory and power for ever and ever. Amen. And on the second day, which is the symbol of the Lord's Resurrection, that is, on the nineteenth of the same month, let us celebrate the true Pasch, adding to this [day] the remaining seven weeks in which the festival of Pentecost is woven, and making ourselves worthy by communion of the Body and Blood of Christ. For thus shall we deserve to receive the kingdoms of heaven in Christ Jesus our Lord, by whom, and with whom, to God the Father be glory and dominion, with the Holy Spirit, now and always, and unto ages of ages. Amen.

21. Greet one another with a holy kiss. Those who are with me send their greetings, brothers.

Letters - letter_097

Letter 97. To Pammachius and Marcella. With this letter Jerome sends to Pammachius and Marcella a translation of the paschal letter issued by Theophilus for the year 402 a.d. together with the Greek original. He takes the precaution of sending this latter because in the preceding year complaints have been made that his translation was not accurate. Written in 402 a.d.

1. Once more with the return of spring I enrich you with the wares of the east and send the treasures of Alexandria to Rome: as it is written, "God shall come from the south and the Holy One from Mount Paran, even a thick shadow." [Hab. 3:3, LXX] (Hence in the Song of Songs the joyous cry of the bride: "I sat down under his shadow with great delight and his fruit was sweet to my taste." [Cant. 2:3]) Now truly is Isaiah's prophecy fulfilled: "In that day shall there be an altar to the Lord in the land of Egypt." [Isa. 19:19] "Where sin hath abounded, grace doth much more abound." [Rom. 5:20] They who fostered the infant Christ now with glowing faith defend Him in His manhood; and they who once saved Him from the hands of Herod are ready to save Him again from this blasphemer and heretic. Demetrius expelled Origen from the city of Alexander; but he is now thanks to Theophilus outlawed from the whole world. Like him to whom Luke has dedicated the Acts of the Apostles [Acts 1:1] this bishop derives his name from his love to God. Where now is the wriggling serpent?¹ In what plight does the venomous viper find himself? His is A human face with wolfish body joined. [Virg. A. 3:426] Where now is that heresy which crawled hissing through the world and boasted that both the bishop Theophilus and I were partisans of its errors? Where now is the yelping of those shameless hounds who, to win over the simple minded, falsely proclaimed our adherence to their cause? Crushed by the authority and eloquence of Theophilus they are now like demon-spirits only able to mutter and that from out of the earth. [Cf. I. Sam. 28:13] For they know nothing of Him who, as He comes from above, [John. 8:23] speaks only of the things that are above.

2. Would that this generation of vipers [Matt. 3:7] would either honestly accept our doctrines, or else consistently defend its own; that we might know whom we are to esteem and whom we are to shun. As it is they have invented a new kind of penitence, hating us as enemies though they dare not deny our faith. What, I ask, is this chagrin of theirs which neither time nor reason seems able to cure? When swords flash in battle and men fall and blood flows in streams, hostile hands are often clasped in amity and the fury of war is exchanged for an unexpected peace. The partisans of this heresy alone can make no terms with churchmen; for they repudiate mentally the verbal assent that is extorted from them. When their open blasphemy is made plain to the public ear, and when they perceive their hearers clamouring against them; then they assume an air of simplicity, declaring that they hear such doctrines for the first time and that they have no previous knowledge of them as taught by their master. And when you hold their writings in your hand, they deny with their lips what their hands have written. Why, sirs, need you beset the Propontis,² shift your abode, wander through different countries, and rend with foaming mouths a distinguished prelate of Christ and his followers? If your recantations are sincere, you should replace your former zeal for error with an equal zeal for the faith. Why do you patch together from this quarter and from that these rags of cursing? And why do you rail at the lives of men whose faith you cannot resist? Do you cease to be heretics because according to you sundry persons believe us to be sinners? And does impiety cease to disfigure your lips because you can point to scars on our ears? So long as you have a leopard's spots and an Ethiopian's skin, [Jer. 13:23] how can it help your perfidy to know that I too am marked by moles? See, Pope Theophilus is freely allowed to prove Origen a heretic; and the disciples do not defend the master's words. They merely pretend that they have been altered by heretics and tampered with, like the works of many other writers. Thus they seek to maintain his cause not by their own belief but by other people's errors. So much I would say against heretics who in the fury of their unjust hostility to us betray the secret feelings of their minds and prove the incurable nature of the wound that rankles in their breasts.

3. But you are Christians and the lights of the senate: accept therefore from me the letter which I append.³ This year I send it both in Greek and Latin that the heretics may not again lyingly assert that I have made many changes in and additions to the original. I have laboured hard, I must confess, to preserve the charm of the diction by a like elegance in my version: and keeping within fixed lines and never allowing myself to deviate from these I have done my best to maintain the smooth flow of the writer's eloquence and to render his remarks in the tone in which they are made. Whether I have succeeded in these two objects or not I must leave to your judgement to determine. As for the letter itself you are to know that it is divided into four parts. In the first Theophilus exhorts believers to celebrate the Lord's passover; in the second he slays Apollinarius; in the third he demolishes Origen; while in the fourth and last he exhorts the heretics to penitence. If the polemic against Origen should seem to you to be inadequate, you are to remember that Origenism was fully treated in last year's letter;⁴ and that this which I have just translated, as it aims at brevity, was not bound to dwell farther upon the subject. Besides, its terse and clear confession of faith directed against Apollinarius is not lacking in dialectical subtlety. Theophilus first wrests the dagger from his opponent's hand, and then stabs him to the heart.

4. Entreat the Lord, therefore, that a composition which has won favour in Greek may not fail to win it also in Latin, and that what the whole East admires and praises Rome may gladly take to her heart. And may the chair of the apostle Peter by its preaching confirm the preaching of the chair of the evangelist Mark. Popular rumour, indeed, has it that the blessed pope Anastasius is of like zeal and spirit with Theophilus and that he has pursued the heretics even to the dens in which they lurk. Moreover his own letters inform us that he condemns in the West what is already condemned in the East. May he live for many years⁵ so that the reviving sprouts of heresy may in course of time by his efforts be made to wither and to die.

1:

The allusion is to Rufinus

2: Many of the Egyptian Origenists had fled to Constantinople and thrown themselves on the kindness of the patriarch John Chrysostom 3: Letter XCVIII

4: Letter XCVI 5: He was already dead when these words were written

Letters - letter_098

Letter 98. From Theophilus. A translation by Jerome of Theophilus's paschal letter for the year 402 a.d. Like that of the previous year (Letter 96) it deals mainly with the heresies of Apollinarius and Origen.

First, he encourages believers to celebrate Easter to the Lord. Secondly, he refutes and slaughters the errors of Apollinaris, thirdly, those of Origen, finally, he urges heretics to repentance. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. First, the divine discourse of August solemnity shines from the regions of the heavens, surpassing the brilliance of the sun with its radiance, and pours the brightest light into the souls longing for it. And when they have withstood the rays of its full gaze, he attracts them to the very innermost chambers of heavenly Jerusalem, and, so to speak, to the Holy of Holies. So, if we wish to be participants in salvation and to be attached to the pursuit of virtues, let us purify the faults of our souls and wash away whatever filth there is within us through constant study of the Scriptures; as if, gazing upon the open knowledge of doctrines, we should hasten to celebrate the festivals of heavenly joy and to join the choirs of angels, where there are crowns and rewards, and certain victory is attained, and the desired palm is set before the triumphant. Nor let us delay, now that we have been freed from the surging waves of the flesh and are caught amid the diverse shipwrecks of pleasures on either side, but let us grasp the rudder of virtues and, after the great dangers of the sea, make for the most secure harbor of heaven.

2. Therefore, both those whom the empty concern of this life disturbs, and those surrounding depths of disturbance like raging waves, as if arousing them from a heavy sleep, let us call to the profit of wisdom: let us show them the true riches of divine perception, and the joys inspired by holy celebration; and let all the labor of the present be assumed, so that both those who are a little careless and ourselves may prepare for eternal glory. Therefore, in the Book of Proverbs, Wisdom, inviting the senseless to her feast, cries out: "Come, eat of my bread, and drink of the wine I have mixed" (Prov. 9). For not in this way is the heaven which we see illuminated by the choruses of stars, nor do the sun and moon, those two brightest eyes of the world, which by their course make a year revolve and by their changing produce the seasons, pour forth their light so brightly upon the earth that our festival of virtues shines and sparkles. Those who seek its treasures and riches sing with David in harmony: "Who will give me wings like a dove, and I will fly and be at rest?" (Ps. 54). And rejoicing, and being filled with inexplicable joy, and according to what is written, they cry out again: We do not have a lasting city here, but we seek one that is future (Hebrews 13.14), of which God is the craftsman and fabricator. For they (Christians) know that this (hope) is what is stored up for all their labors in this world of struggle and running, and that this (hope) is established for the future, for which they (Christians) without fear of any danger guide the course of their (Christian) lives, avoiding the heretics and especially their snares by which the blind lead the blind into the pit, and like some old and most filthy rot, they defile the hearts of the deceived; nor satisfied with this lime, they drink of the innermost marrow of the Scriptures, condemning as an erroneous doctrine the knowledge of the false name.

3. That understanding patriarch Jacob sees the ladder in his dreams, the top of which reaches to heaven, through which one ascends to the heights with different degrees of virtue, and men are challenged, abandoning earthly lowliness, as the primitive Church celebrates the festivals of the Lord's passion. This is nothing else, he said, but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven (Genesis 28). "Which, David examining more sharply, and inquiring with all the desire of his mind, and dealing with the reasons of this journey in his thoughts, and as if grinding and crushing precious pigments more strongly, so that the fragrances of the sweetest scent might be scattered, he calls forth those hastening to the solemnity, saying: Open to me the gates of justice; I will enter into them, and give praise to the Lord. This is the gate of the Lord; the just shall enter into it." (Psalm 117) Therefore, there is no celebration among the heretics; nor can those deceived by error rejoice in its communion. For it is written, 'If the beast touches the mountain, it shall be stoned' (Heb. 12:20). Neither can those who contradict the divine dogmas of the Church receive the sacraments of the heavenly words. Therefore, purifying our souls with all our strength from every contamination, let us prepare them worthy for the approaching celebration, so that we may sing with the saints: 'God is the Lord, and He appeared to us' (Ps. 117). About which another Prophet, conscious of the future, witnesses with mystical voice: 'The Lord will appear in them, and will destroy all the gods of the Gentiles' (Zeph. 2:11). When words have been put into action, and the truth of things, which is often obscured from sight, is demonstrated to doubting eyes, so that by the effectiveness of what has been spoken, the truth of the words may be confirmed, we ourselves, by the grace of God, shall be partakers in His victory, so that we may share fellowship with the holy and celebrate the praises of His glorious advent. For, whereas once the whole earth had been corrupted by the seductive attraction of various vices, reckoning virtues among vices and, conversely, vices among virtues, and deeming custom a law of nature as time went on, wicked and tyrannical pride had become established and lies had gained strength, fathers and teachers came to be regarded as the guardians of truth. This is how it came about that men's errors multiplied and, ignorant of the truths which are of real advantage, they despised the true shepherd, the Lord.

And, seized by fury, they worshipped tyrants and rulers as if they were gods, consecrating their own weakness among men of the same nature. Through this, it happened that they escaped present danger of death and won over those whose mercy was more cruel than their cruelty.

4. Therefore, with all being lead astray by error, the living word of God came to our aid to lands that were ignorant of the worship of God and sustained the loneliness of truth. The witness of which thing is he who speaks: "All have sinned, becoming useless together" (Romans 3). And the prophets of Christ praying for aid: "Lord, incline your heavens and descend" (Psalm 143). Not to change the places where all things were, but in order to take on the flesh of human weakness for our salvation, as Paul sings the same: When he was rich, for our sake he became poor, so that by his poverty we might become rich (1 Corinthians 8). And he came into the world, and from the virginal womb, which he sanctified, came forth as a man, confirming by his dispensation the interpretation of his name, Emmanuel, that is, God with us, and he began to be marvelously what we are, and he did not cease to be what he was: thus assuming human nature, so that he himself might not lose what he was. Although John writes "The Word was made flesh" (John 1), that is to say, "Man", nevertheless it is not turned into flesh because God never ceased to be. To whom

David also speaks: "But You are the same" (Psalms 101). And the Father from heaven testifies, saying: "Thou art my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Luke 2). So that it may be said that He who was before man was made, remains through our confession having become man, Paul himself preaching with the same voice as ours: "Jesus Christ, yesterday and today, and the same forever (Hebrews 13)." For in that which he says, 'He,' he shows that he did not change his original nature, nor diminish the wealth of his divinity, who, for our sake, became poor, and assumed the full likeness of our condition. He assumed man from among so many and such beings, solely without sin; from what sort and quality of beings we are all created, not in part, but wholly, the Mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus (I. Tim. 2. 5), and he had nothing which is found in our resemblance, except only sin, which has no substance; for he had not lifeless flesh, and in that flesh, as God's Word, he himself was rational soul, just as the drowsy scholars of Apollinaris suspect. And saying that in the Gospel: "Now my soul is troubled" (Matthew 26:38), [he] testifies (some say "it is testified") that his divinity was subject to perturbation, which is a consequent claim of those who argue that divinity was in his body for his soul; nor again by joining only a soul together, [he] filled it up being undertaken by man, lest he be deemed to have completed the act of mediation by [merely] sharing in flesh, and in the dissimilarity of souls. Being like us in flesh, and having the soul of irrational animals - if according to their [the rationalists'] understanding the Savior's soul is irrational and without reason and feeling, [it] is impious to believe this, and far from the ecclesiastical faith, lest it be immediately struck by that praise with which the Prophet rebukes the offender, saying: Ephraim is like a senseless dove without a heart (Hosea 7:11). And if he hears like one who is irrational: he has been compared to foolish beasts, and he has become like them. For it is beyond doubt that an irrational and mindless soul is compared to irrational beasts; hence Moses also writes: you shall not muzzle the ox when it treads out the grain. And Paul in expounding the passage says: Is it for oxen that God is concerned? Does he not speak entirely for our sake?

5. Therefore, for our sake, the man became a Savior, not for brute and irrational animals, so that he might assume the likeness of the souls of animals without sense and reason. But neither does the Church accept (the opinion) which the followers of the same heresy cavil and gossip (about), that the soul of the Savior should be called the prudence of the flesh, since the Apostle plainly calls the prudence of the flesh an enemy to God, and death (Rom. 8.7): which it is sacrilege to say about the Lord, that His soul is death, and is believed to be an enemy to God. For if he commands us: Be not afraid of them that kill the body, and are not able to kill the soul; (Matt. 10. 28), they will be forced to undertake their foolish disputation, that it is better for our souls to have the soul of the Saviour, while that wisdom of the flesh is asserted which is death, and an enemy to God, but our soul cannot die. This must not be understood in any such sense, most beloved brethren, since even the wisdom of the soul cannot be called the soul, and they differ very much from each other: for though the wisdom of the soul be in that, whose wisdom it is; yet one has it, the other is possessed by it; and the former is the soul, the latter is engaged in the soul. If the prudence of the soul is not the soul, how much less can the prudence of the flesh be called soul? Let them spread their nets of syllogisms and their deceiving sophisms as much as they wish, let them entangle themselves in their own snares without even realizing it, those who boast of a vain knowledge: and let them learn from us, whom they force to embark in such arguments for free, that what tastes good is one thing, wisdom is another, and that which is tasted is yet another. And these not only disagree with each other in words, but also in meaning: for that which has wisdom, the rational soul is wise; moreover, that which is from it, and of itself, and not that which it has wisdom, is called wisdom: but that which is understood, is the thing which is referred to, and is produced from the wisdom of the wise, and not from the wise person himself, nor from wisdom itself. And at length let the arts of dialectic cease from perverting the simple decrees of the ecclesiastical faith with their sophistries, as when they call the prudence of the flesh the wisdom of the Saviour, which the Apostle asserts to be death and enmity to God.

6. But it seems to be argued against them in this way as well. It is written about the Word of God: All things were made by him (John 1:3). Is it credible that the wisdom or prudence of the flesh, which they understand to be the soul of the Savior, was created by the Word of God so that the very operator of death and enmity against God might exist and that, what is wicked to say, that he was joined to those things? But if it is wicked to believe this, and the soul of the Savior possesses all virtues, then his prudence of the flesh will not be his soul, lest he be believed to have joined death and enmity against God. Let the disciples of Apollinaris cease to defend those things which he has spoken against the rules of the Church, for although he has written against the Arians and Eunomians, and overturned Origen and other heretics by his argument, nevertheless, whoever remembers that precept: You shall not show partiality in judgment (Leviticus 19:15; and Deuteronomy 1:17): he must always love the truth, not the persons; and he must know that in the dispensation of man, which the only-begotten Son of God has deigned to assume for our salvation, he who understood and wrote perversely upon his soul, may not be free from guilt. For as the Apostle says, 'If I give away all I have, and if I deliver my body to be burned, but have not love, I gain nothing.' (1 Corinthians 13) And so, be it this one, about whom we are speaking now, or Origen and other heretics, even if they wrote some things that do not contradict the ecclesiastical faith, they will nevertheless not be without fault, and on those things which are important and relevant to the salvation of believers, they contradict the ecclesiastical faith. For our Lord and Savior did not assume a soul without intellect and senses nor did he assume the middle or two parts of three, or the third part, to save imperfect humanity incompletely, since neither the middle nor the remaining parts can receive the name of perfection. And just as the perfect thing lacks the defect of the imperfect, so what is imperfect cannot be called perfect. And if he had imperfectly received our likeness, or partly, as it was spoken in the Gospel: No one takes my life from me: I have the power to lay it down, and I have the power to take it up? (John 10:18) But what is taken away and put down cannot be said to be irrational or without mind and intelligence, but rather rational and intelligible, having a mind and feeling.

7. And in this way the order of the discussion proved that nothing imperfect had been undertaken by the Lord, but rather that man had been fully and perfectly saved by Him. For there is no doubt that the souls of irrational beasts are not set forth and taken up again, but when they perish with the bodies, they are dissolved into dust. Further, the Savior, taking up his soul and separating it from his body at the time of his passion, received it again in the resurrection. And long before he did this, he spoke in the Psalm: "You will not abandon my soul to Hades, nor will you let your Holy One see corruption" (Psalm 15). And it is not believable that His flesh descended to hell, or that the prudence of the flesh, which is called the soul, appeared in hell; but rather that His body was placed in a tomb, and Himself did not say anything about either the flesh or wisdom of the flesh, nor about His divinity, "You will not abandon my soul to hell", but truly He showed that the soul of our nature, as perfect and rational, and intelligible and sensible, descended to hell. We urge those who understand such matters, to abandon the errors of heretics and to assent to the truth of the Church, and not to make the feast of the Lord's Passion incomplete, lest they deny the principal and greater part of man in the Savior, asserting that his body exists without a soul and mind. For if it were so, who was speaking when he said: "The good shepherd lays down his life for his sheep" (John 10)? And if he had assumed only human flesh, why did he say during the passion, "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak" (Matthew 26)?

Therefore it is to be known that the sacrament of human condition exhibits temperance in every way, having taken on a perfect likeness of our condition; it neither took on only flesh, nor an irrational soul, and without sensation, but uniting its whole body and whole soul, it demonstrated a perfect man in itself, so that it could offer salvation to all men in and of itself; also, having fellowship with us, who were made of earth, it did not bring down flesh from heaven, nor coupled with its body the soul which had existed before and had been created before His flesh, as the disciples of Origen endeavor to teach. For if the soul of the Savior, before He took on human flesh, had dwelt in the heavenly regions, and was not yet the soul of the Lord, it is most impious to say that it was there before the Lord's body, doing something and meriting praise, and later transformed into His soul. Another thing is, if they can teach from the Scriptures that before being born of Mary, the Word of God had this soul, and before the assumption of the flesh, that soul was named. But if they are compelled by the authority of the Scriptures and reason itself to accept it, they are clearly convinced that Christ did not have a soul before being born of Mary (for in the assumption of man, his soul was also taken). But let those who are frenzied by the impiety of new doctrines cease. Following the rule of the Scriptures, we boldly proclaim with all our heart that neither his flesh nor his soul existed before he was born of Mary. Nor was the soul dwelling in heaven before it was united to God after: for nothing of our condition that comes from heaven did the Lord bring away with him. Therefore, cutting off with the Gospel scythe whatever is contrary to the truth, it says: Every plant that my heavenly Father did not plant will be uprooted (Matthew 15:13). The word by action, completing its threat in its end, and by fulfilling the power of its words with the fulfillment of things, so that the truth of actions might exhibit whatever promise had been made by speech.

9. Origen is attacked. Therefore let those who follow Origen, like someone who tells tales of the legends of the poets, know that they cannot celebrate the Lord's Passion with us. They boast that they have Origen as their master and leader of every heresy and error. Though he wrote countless books and even bequeathed to the world an inheritance of destructive loquacity, we know that the law forbids us to appoint a foreigner over us, for he is not our brother (Deuteronomy 17:15). For whoever has strayed from the regulations of the apostles along a different path, he is thrown out of the solemnity of Christ, as unworthy and profane to the choir of Christ and the fellowship of His mysteries: he is driven far away by the fathers and elders who founded the Church of the Savior because he has tried to sew old and worn out rags of philosophers onto a new and firm garment of the Church, and to mix falsehood with the truth so that his weakness may be made stronger by their presence, and this beauty may be defiled.

10. The principal heresies of Origen. - For what reason led him to lift the truth through the shadows of allegories and the empty images of the Scriptures, and what order of discussions led him? Who taught the Prophet to feel that God was compelled to create bodies because of the ruin and fall of souls from heaven? Who, according to the blessed Luke (chap. 1, v. 2), gave this to teach for negligence and motion and flow from higher rational creatures to provoke God to make the diversity of this world? Although Moses, explaining its creation, did not indicate (alternatively, judge) the sensible things of rational beings, invisible things of visible things, or worse things due to some previous causes, which Origen clearly preaches. For he says that the world began on account of the sins of intelligent creatures; unwilling to celebrate Easter with the saints, nor to say with Paul: "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead" (Rom. 1); nor to rave like the Prophet: "I have considered thy works and wondered." For the beauty of the world could not have subsisted otherwise, unless it were filled with the various adornments of creatures. Finally, the sun and the moon, those two great lights, and the other stars, before they existed in what their daily course witnesses them created, were not without bodies, nor did they leave behind their pristine simplicity for any reasons, but were surrounded by bodies, like someone who might dream up doctrines contrary to the faith. Neither did souls sin in the regions of heaven, and therefore they were not relegated to bodies. For if this were so, the Savior should not have taken on his body, and he ought to have freed the souls from the bodies at the time he forgave sins in baptism; he should immediately have freed the baptized from the bonds of the body, which remembers the condemnation of sin caused by sins. But it promises the resurrection of the body to no purpose if the souls fly away lightly to heaven without the weight of the body. He himself also, when he rose again, ought not to have raised his flesh, but only to have united his soul to the divinity, if it is better to live without bodies than with bodies.

11. About bodies. But what does it mean to often preach about souls being bound to bodies, divided from them, and to bring us many deaths? Ignorant that Christ came for this reason: not to release souls from bodies after resurrection, or to once again clothe them in other bodies, and as they descended from the regions of the sky, to clothe them in blood and flesh; but to grant bodies once resurrected with incorruption and eternity. For just as Christ, having died, will never die again, nor will death have dominion over him; so also, the bodies raised up after the resurrection will not die again or perish frequently, nor will death have dominion over them, nor will they be dissolved into nothing; for the coming of Christ has saved (past tense) the whole person.

12. About Angels. - But the fact that Origen does not attribute the Principalities, Powers, Virtues, Thrones, and Dominions to being created from the beginning, but rather that they were made worthy of some honor after their creation, and having fallen to lower things with their brethren due to negligence, they were named by distinguished names: so (according to his error) God did not create them as Principalities and Powers, and the rest: but the sins of others gave them the opportunity for glory. And just as the Apostle Paul writes: "All things were created in Christ, both in the heavens and on earth, visible and invisible, whether Thrones, or Dominions, or Principalities, or Powers, all things were created through Him and in Him, and He is before all things (Colossians 1);" if he understood the power of the word by which it is said: "All things were created," he would certainly know that they were created so from the beginning, and not that they fell by the laziness of others, and that their downfall provided God with an occasion for naming those Principalities, and Powers, and other Virtues: especially since the beauty of creatures consists in the order of dignities. For just as it is written of the sun and the moon, and the stars: "God made two great lights: the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; and the stars; and He placed them in the firmament of the heaven, to shine upon the earth" (Gen. 1), nor do we believe that Principalities and Powers, which are established in the regions of the heavens, have made progress after they were created by good works, but rather they were created that way from the beginning; nor do we imitate the error of Origen and his disciples, who think that the Principalities and Powers, the Virtues and the Thrones, and the Dominions, assumed these names and offices of their own will, after their creation, by doing something good, so that they, who had fallen to lower things, might be raised up to high things, and be distinguished by these names, having afterwards what they had not had before. Those who speak do not understand, Paul is speaking of the opposite, created in Christ are principalities, powers, thrones, and dominions. However, it is not doubted that they were created from the beginning, and did not receive such titles later on.

13. On the Holy Spirit.- But let it suffice to have briefly stated these views. Let us pass on to another impious assertion which he vomits forth out of the deepest gulf of impiety, and which has left upon the world the most infamous of all memories of himself. He says that the Holy Spirit does not work upon inanimate objects or descend to irrational creatures. And yet he does not reflect that by this assertion he denies that the mystical waters of baptism are consecrated by the advent of the Holy Spirit, and that the bread of the Lord, namely, that which shows forth the body of the Savior, and which we break for the sanctification of ourselves, and that also the sacred cup, although they are entirely inanimate and placed upon the table of the Church, are sanctified by the invocation and the advent of the Holy Spirit. If the strength of the Holy Spirit does not reach irrational and soulless things, why does David sing: Where shall I go from your Spirit? (Ps. 1. 38.8)? By saying this, he shows that everything is contained in the Holy Spirit and surrounded by his majesty: if everything is in everything, surely even irrational and soulless things are. And where we read: the Spirit of the Lord hath filled the whole world (Wis. 1. 7). That which Scripture never mentioned, except irrational and inanimate things, and were filled with its divine will. But he is not content with the end of blasphemy, but, like lunatics who demonstrate their madness with the grinding of their teeth and the spitting of their saliva, he again belches forth and says that the Son of God, that is, reason (the Word), and his speech, and power, arrive only at those things which are rational. Upon hearing this, I wonder where he got it from or how he does not know how to read: All things were made through Him (John 1) : from which it is approved, to attain all the strength of the Word of God. Perhaps he forgot the story of Lazarus, raised by the power of Christ, whose body at that time, when it rose from death to life, lacked reason, just as it lacked the soul. He was ignorant also of that (story) in which five loaves fed five thousand men, besides women and children, and there remained 12 baskets of fragments (Matthew 14). This truly was the work of Christ's power. I believe he did not remember that miracle of his, when he, treading with divine foot upon the irrational waves of the sea, restored calm to the sailors. This miracle was wrought by the power of Christ Himself, and by no other's command. Therefore, how does he not tremble with his entire heart and mind and body, saying that the strength of the Word of God cannot reach irrational creatures? And he who boasts of himself in the knowledge of the Scriptures, and thinks that he has read as much as no man has read, let him know that the scripture says that the sick were carried on beds and laid in the streets and alleys, that Peter's shadow might fall on them and heal them (Acts 5), which the sacred Acts of the Apostles attest, which show the folly of Origen, by which he is convicted of saying that the Apostles made their shadow do it, which he testifies that the Son of God, the Word of God, could not do.

14. Concerning the Providence of God. - Being deceived by a similar mistake and not knowing what he was talking about, he is of those who do not want to admit that the providence of God extends to all creatures and descends to the lower levels of the world, but only dwells in the regions of the heavens, so that what the strength of the Savior could not accomplish was done by the shade of Peter. But let us also come to this: For the Apostle, clearly proclaiming about the firstborn Son of God, says, "Let each one understand this in us, what is also in Christ Jesus, who, though he was in the form of God, did not account equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, taking the form of a servant" (Phil. 2): he dared to say that the soul of the Savior emptied itself and took on the form of a servant, so that John may be believed to have lied when he said, "And the Word became flesh" (John 1), attributing our Savior to a condition like ours, when it is not he who emptied himself and took on the form of a servant, but it was his soul; and by his impiety dissolving the faith, which is established by the confession of all. For if the soul of the Savior is what was in the form of God, and equal to God, according to the insanity of Origen, but the Son of God is equal to God, and what is equal to God is shown to be of the same substance, the order of our debate leads us to believe that the soul and God are of one nature. And when he says this, it follows that he contends that our souls are not of a nature separate from God (and it is without doubt that our souls and the soul of the Savior are of the same substance), so that they are now the product and creation of one nature. And how, if the souls of men are of the same substance as the Creator, were all things created in Christ? But it is not so, brethren, neither is the soul of the Savior of the same substance, for the Son of God, when He was in the form of God and equal to God, emptied Himself, taking on the form of a servant. But Origen, sunk into the depths of impiety, does not understand that he is a partaker with the Gentiles, who worship idols as God: "For professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, and they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of the image of corruptible man" (Rom. 1.); and falling into the same error, he is deceived in like manner; for by affirming that the soul of the Savior is in the form and equality of God, he is equal to the impiety of the heathen, as has been stated above. For just as they changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of corruptible man's image, saying that there were gods who were not; so also this one changed the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of his form and claimed that the Savior's soul, which was created, was of equal status; and he emptied it out and did not come to earthly things as the authority of the Apostles affirms, unlike the Word of God.

15. He is not abashed, being forgetful of himself from much speaking, and he calls the soul of man not so much from the beginning of its condition, but because it has taken on the coldness of neglect and unfaithfulness from what it was before, mind and senses. This etymology is more suitable to the Greek rather than the Latin language. But if the Savior asserts that the soul is equal to God and is in His form, then it has received the name by adoption of love and it has lost the dignity of its previous name. For it is a general discussion that the souls of men are called such because they have lost the heat of their former fervor. Therefore, if all souls, having regained their coolness, are called forth, and if one confesses that one has had a Savior of the soul, it follows that one must say of one's mind and intellect that they have migrated to this type of term. Although it is not spoken of in everyday conversation and the wicked can repress their insanity, the statement itself is compelled by necessity, which ties the following to what has already been said in order. For either he must deny that the Savior had a soul, to come most plainly against the authority of the Gospels, or if he cannot speak contrary to himself, he will also confess that this thing, called a soul, is from the coldness of charity taken in mind and understanding; for all souls who have departed from God and have lost the warmth of divine love are reckoned cold. Who would not believe that he is satisfied with this end of sacrilege?

16. Another time he connects a calumny against the Son of God, and speaks these words. As the Father and the Son are one, so the soul which the Son assumed, and the Son of God Himself, are one. Nor does he understand that the Father and the Son are one in essence and the same divinity, but that the Son of God and his soul are of different and widely-distant natures. For if as the Father and the Son are one, so the soul of the Son and the Son Himself are one, the Father will be one with the soul of the Saviour, and He Himself may say: He that sees me, sees the Father also. (John 14:9) But this is not so: let this be far from the ecclesiastical faith. For the Son and the Father are one, because there is not a different nature between them; however, the soul and the Son of God differ in nature and substance from each other, and because it was also created by the Son, it is of our condition and nature. For if, just as the Father and the Son are one, so is the soul of the Son of God and the Son himself, there will be one, as we have already said, the soul and God the Father; and it will be believed that the soul of the Savior is the splendor of His glory and the form of His substance. But to say this is impious and blasphemous. Therefore, it is an act of impiety to say that the Son and his soul are one, and to deny that the Father and the Son are one. Moreover, speaking against himself, he says: "The soul which is troubled and saddened" (Mark 14:34), was not himself the only-begotten and first-born of every creature, nor the Word of God, which transcends the condition of the soul, and truly speaks of the Son of God in the Gospel: "I have the power to lay it down, and I have the power to take it again" (John 10:18). Therefore, if the Son of God is better and more powerful than his soul, which is beyond doubt, how could his soul be in the form of God and equal to God when he says that he emptied himself and took on the form of a servant; he thus surpasses all heretics in the magnitude of his blasphemy. For if the Word of God is in the form of God and equal to God, and if the soul of the Savior is in the form of God and equal to him, how can one be greater and the other lesser among equals? Indeed, those things which belong to a lower nature testify to a higher nature and substance by their own degradation.

17. This blasphemy is not enough for him, but he runs his chariot of foolishness across the rivers of Ethiopia, and again, raging, boasts that God created as many reasonable creatures as he was able to govern, so that he might compare the power of God to the weakness of man and the other things which He created. For in the human body, his strength sustains and rules as many limbs as he is able to infuse with life, and he bestows upon us that moderation which he is able by his presence to rule, and he supports it by so much virtue as the limbs of man are able to bear. But God, who created these things, is greater, since in creation he provided a measure greater than what the order of things demanded, and he is more able than what has been created can contain. But he, the pillar of truth, affirms that the strength of God is limitable, and less than the arts of humans. For builders of stones, and those who excel in the knowledge of constructing buildings, can build greater things than they have built, provided that they are able to support the foundations on which these structures will be built; and the creation of thought is not the end of the arts. And when they have accomplished works as great as the necessity of things demanded, and they have a measure beyond which, if anything had been built, it would be found unbecoming and useless, the art itself contains more in the mind than it has shown in the work: nor is there any end of things imposed upon science; yet, if, as I have said, whatever the mind has conceived and thought on the grandeur of the works has expanded, the things that are subject to it can bear it. And how impious is it not to impose an end on human art, nor to compare the knowledge of artisans to their works; and to say that God has made as great things as rational creatures, as much as he was able? Let the impious, therefore, hear and learn: The power of God is not so great as is said to have made rational creatures, but imposing a measure on the works beyond what they could be, and determining the number of things by his own art of disposition, himself is not held by measure and number. From which it clearly appears that he did not do as much as he could, but rather only as much virtue as the necessity of circumstances required. Let us assume an example to make what we say more manifest. If a wealthy father of the family wishes to invite guests to supper, and to offer them a feast so lavish as to satisfy their appetites, the wealthy host could not have as much food as they might eat or as much as had been prepared for them; but he offered them what was demanded by the dignity of the occasion. Thus also the Almighty God, surpassing the example of comparison, did not create creatures as great as He could, but those as great as it was right to create. But he weaves a germ of verboseness and responds, saying: God has made as much as He could comprehend, and He has subjected it to Himself and governs it by His providence. Does he not hear the Prophet saying, "Behold the nations are like a drop from a bucket, and are counted as the dust on the scales; behold He takes up the coastlands like fine dust...To whom then will you liken God?" (Isaiah 40:15, 18); Again: "Who has measured the waters in the hollow of his hand and marked off the heavens with a span, enclosed the dust of the earth in a measure and weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance?" (Isaiah 40:12) If the water is measured with a hand, and the heavens with a span, and all the earth in a measure, by comparison with the strength of God ■■(which, however, are said metaphorically, so that the baseness of what was done is proven by the magnificence of the Maker, for God was not composed of diverse members), how can it be said that He has made as much as He could by His own power?

18. We should strive to complete what we have begun and more fully explain our meaning. 'If all nations were considered as though from a bucket and as though from the balance they were weighed and as saliva they were reckoned:' by means of these words the cheapness and insignificance of all creatures is demonstrated so that the incomparable sublimity of God appears; therefore His power also is reckoned as if from a bucket and as if from the balance and as if from the saliva of a man, if, according to Origen, He made things as great as His own power could comprehend; and necessity demands that the power of God equals the number and measure of the things He created, if God could not make greater things than those He made. But I do not believe anyone, I do not say man but even the demons, would dare to imagine these things about God which Origen both perceived and wrote, that God made as much matter as He could adorn and divide into forms of things. The one who perceives this should learn from us again that God did not make things as great as he was able to; rather, God fashioned things in accordance with the measure that the order of things required, possessing much greater skill and power than what has been made in number and measure. And let him know that this can be confirmed by the testimonies of the prophets, from which one says: 'His strength covered the heavens,' and another cries out: 'But he made the earth as nothing.' They preach that the power of God in what has been made is greater. Furthermore, what he said: "he made the earth as if it were nothing" the Apostle, interpreting from all creatures speaks: Who calls things that are not as though they are (Rom. 4). So that we may learn from these words, the strength of God is greater than those things that were made by him. And he is not ashamed against the strength of God to dispute, saying that God can only do as much as the material he is given to work with! And he does not understand that there is a different nature of the created things, and a different nature of God, the creator; nor that the material from which something is made is not as powerful as the one who shapes it: for the power and condition of diverse substances are diverse.

19. Therefore, if they want to celebrate the Lord's Pascha with the Church, those who prefer the delusions of Origen to the authority of the Scriptures should listen to God crying out: And I did not show that to you so that you would walk after it: And the Prophet tearfully reminding them: O flee from the land of the north, says the Lord, for I will gather you from the four winds, and you will be saved in Zion, you who dwell as the daughter of Babylon (Zech. 2.). Let those leaving the darkness of error and the cold of ignorance, join with the studies of the wise, and turn to the rising sun of justice, and those dwelling in the warmest region of heaven, which is felt in the fervor of the Scriptures, may seek out the pastors of the church, despising the madness of Origen, and say: Where is he who is born king of the Jews (Matth. 2. 2)? When they have found him lying in the manger, with humble language of the Scriptures, let them offer him gold, and frankincense, and myrrh: that is, proven faith and shining with every splendor of truth, the fragrance of good conversation and continence, drying up the indulgence of pleasure and the incentive of fleshly pursuits. For those who, after frequent warnings, contradict the ecclesiastical faith, are held back by a twofold weakness, wickedness and incompetence, and turned entirely to earthly things like serpents, adhering to the ground and preferring evil to good, they do not know the difference between vices and virtues, and they disdain and reject remedies for their correction and healing found in the Holy Scriptures, enduring the aversion to truth like pregnant women who reject their usual food and pursue harmful things, nor are they able to direct the clear light of the soul to the rays of truth, despising ecclesiastical discipline and rolling like pigs in the mire, and they reject precious ointments. But it is just, that at least from the examples which we infer they may receive health. For just as eye-offending speck causes blearyness, and fever depopulates the whole body, so too rust gradually consumes brass and iron, in the same way the noxious contagion of perverse doctrines violates the beauty of souls neglectful of truth, and dyes it with the pallor of lies. I beg you, brothers, to forgive me for causing you pain, by bringing wicked doctrines into the light. Although we have passed through the rivers of Babylon, to persuade the captives residing there to go to the celebration in Jerusalem, we ourselves were not affected by captivity, spreading the sails of the Scriptures with favourable winds. Neither did the swelling whirlpools of heretical doctrines overwhelm us, nor did the storm of lies frighten us, nor did the torrents of wickedness drag us away in the midst of their sea, where, as the Psalmist sings, "there are reptiles without number" (Ps. 103:25) and the devil Dragon lives, an animal most venomous, yielding itself to the sport of saints; nor, to sum up everything briefly, could the blasts of winds rising from every quarter have overthrown the ecclesiastical ship or covered over with a savage whirlwind the oar of our studies. And with the Savior Lord, like his disciples, we sailed across, and entering the port of rest, we embrace the most beautiful shore of divine writings; gathering various flowers of knowledge, and fixing with eager kisses the limbs of wisdom, we cling to her embrace, and if the Lord permits, living with her, and persevering in her love, we will sing: I was a lover of her beauty (Wisdom 8). For as many as diligently read the Holy Scriptures, and roam through the heavenly meadows of painted words, enjoy this blessing. But those who, leaving behind the strength of the Lord's solemnity, cross over to desert places, endure the hostile attacks of demons according to the manner of cities without walls.

20. Therefore, celebrating the upcoming festivals, let us understand ourselves and all that belongs to us; and let us embrace knowledge and our rational soul, as a mother, with all zeal, having the root of speech, and the notion of knowledge and reason, but speech, so to speak, as a vestibule of the work. Furthermore, the work of speech and knowledge is a perfect roofed building, and the firmest pinnacle of the house is placed. For speech, reason, knowledge, and faith without work are empty and unstable. And so that we might seem to take something from that doctrine for the benefit of those who are trained in the arts of dialectic; just as if we connect a word to a name, a perfect sense is made, and if there is only a word, or a name without a word, there is absolutely nothing that is said; and so knowledge without action, and action without faith, are weak and perishable; and, on the contrary, knowledge coupled with action is the indication of perfect virtue. For unspoken thought of the mind is its secret, which, when brought forth by outwardly resonant language, expresses the sentiment of the mind. And when the word has been brought to completion, an end is imposed upon our knowledge and thought. Moreover, we shall give an account of our thought, word, and deed at the judgment, with our thoughts accusing or defending themselves, on the day when God shall judge the hidden things of humanity through Jesus Christ, as Paul the Apostle writes.

21. As it is, with the approaching feast of the Lord, let us say to those whom the error of Origen involves and holds captive by deception: Flee from the midst of Babylon, and save each one his own soul. (Jeremiah 51) For although according to the prophecy of the prophet, Babylon is said to be a golden cup, and it surpasses the beauty of truth in composition and charm of words, and transforms itself into an Angel of light: nevertheless it must be known that whoever drinks of its wine is moved and falls, and is worthy of mourning in contrition. But we, resisting deadly disturbances, hold our soul within the wall of discipline, and we protect its freedom by the daily exercise of virtues. For just as bought slaves who are called both servants and whip-bearers of those who paid the price for them, so those who have sold their souls to diverse desires are called slaves of those to whom they have surrendered, and they obey them as if they were cruel masters. When even the correctors of their error, with rigid brow, disdain and defend folly by their rashness, they are ignorant that audacity is nothing other, as it appears to me, than sentiment without sense and thought, fleeing far from itself the governing mind of disturbances. And when such a soul has been deprived of a safeguard, it is carried headlong into the abyss of impiety, and, as if by some bitter flow, it darkens the light of the mind and surrounds its eye with the impenetrable darkness of night.

22. Those who delight in the errors of Origen should not hope for the shouts of Easter, nor seek ointments, gold, and pearls in the mud, nor tear their mother, the Church, who bore and nourished them, into small pieces in great cities, those who sometimes surpass us with hatred because of him and his disciples among the Gentiles and heap curses on us in their love for them, and besiege the gates of the rich, nor are they afraid to listen with the Jews: I have begotten and exalted children, but they have despised me (Isaiah 1). They who seem to me to be ignorant of every word of truth, not having a foundation, though for a time they may attract a listener, so that he may suppose to be true what is not true, will gradually dissolve and be reduced to nothing; and the entire sentiment, which is brought forth in the manner of a torrent from the worst mind, will overwhelm its author, and the letters and syllables with which it was composed will be lost, without meaning or sound, and left with no image, and will strike the bearer like the most deadly serpent, and will immediately retract its head and, as if decaying and coming to nothing, consume him in the depths of his mind. For the end of lies is destruction. Those who used to boast of themselves as lovers of solitude, at least build a small room to conceal their curses, above the lips of their frenzy, not with the holy stones of Jerusalem, but with the rough stones of Babylon, which, unsupported, and uneven, are going to collapse and support the walls of the house. Although they are commended by their hatred of the Gentiles with effeminate ears, and they criticize us for the discipline of the Church, and they abuse our patience, as if it were a kind of rashness, nevertheless, let them sometimes be silent and rest, and let them hear the Prophet saying: Refrain your tongue from evil, and your lips from speaking deceit (Psalm 34:13). And let them desire to understand those things which are worthy of a holy life, and not grieve the leader and ruler of the Church, God.

23. But I beseech you, brethren, that we jointly pray for them, and say with a prophetic voice: Who will give water to my head, and a fountain of tears to my eyes? And I will weep day and night for the wounds of the daughter of my people (Jeremiah 9): beseeching the mercy of God, that he may free them from the error in which they are bound; and that they may exchange hatred, with which they madly rage against us, for love. Therefore we, forgetting the injuries inflicted on us, desire most indulgently to receive them in our embrace, and we consider their health and conversion to God as our own health and glory. And if they cannot be cured otherwise, unless by our humility, we shall voluntarily satisfy them; we have inflicted no injuries upon them, we have harmed no one, although they are angry and raging against the remedies of the Church, which restore health to the wounded. We speak what we know and what we have learned; praying that those who despise the rules of the Church may receive the pattern of truth, and not lose the benefit of repentance because of the confusion of men, by which they are often difficult to correct. And now we say, and we have said before, and we frequently urge the same, that we do not want them to wander or to stray through foreign provinces, but we shout with the Prophet to those who are outsiders and raving, and we say: Save yourselves from the earth, and return, and do not stand: remember those who are far from the Lord, and let Jerusalem rise up over your heart. (Jeremiah 51:50)

24. Perhaps hearing this, the love of the church congregation may occur and they may remember the communal joy of brotherhood and the hymns, which they sang with others to the Lord, and change the cold of hatred into the warmth of love, and understand that we are doctors, not enemies, the most indulgent fathers, not swelling with hostile pride. For it cannot happen that whom we wish to be saved, we desire to perish, and that the ecclesiastical rod not be turned into a staff for them: if indeed they will want to abandon error and follow the truth, and abandon the recklessness of lewd boys. But if they reject her, and despising ecclesiastical discipline, lift up their horn against her rules, and spurning salutary counsels, throw themselves backward, let them hear the Lord threatening: The man who acts with pride, so as not to listen to the priest who stands to minister in the name of your God, or to the judge, whoever he may be in those days, will die, and you will take away evil from Israel, and all the people hearing will fear, and they will no longer act impiously. (Deuteronomy 17:12) But lest we be preoccupied with the care of the wounded, and forgetful of our own selves, and neglectful of them, and accordingly as it is written, "Preaching to others, we ourselves shall be reprobates" (1 Cor. 9), let us remind those who are standing, to beware lest, while they reach forth a helping hand to the fallen, they themselves fall, and let them be careful to observe the ecclesiastical discipline, lest they should be afraid of the judgment to come.

25. Therefore, celebrating the Lord's Passover, let us purify ourselves with the holy speech of the Scriptures and, looking towards the trophies of the Savior, let us remove all obstacles by which the course of our life is delayed. Avoiding avarice as the worst usurer, let us strangle the desire for vain glory like an insatiable beast, and with a cautious mind let us avoid the flattering and slippery serpent of fornication. If ever a prosperous breeze of circumstances has come to us, let us mitigate the swelling of the soul with humility and meekness. If adverse winds blow, we will raise up our discouraged and fallen spirit with strength, and we will be accusers of our own sins: so that, knowing ourselves, we may correct ourselves, and, by constant meditation, recover the freedom of the soul's virtues, which has been oppressed by vices. Therefore, being placed in the struggle and sweat and labor of the present, preparing for ourselves the future glory of the heavenly celebration, before we stand before the tribunal of Christ, let us correct our past sins with repentance: with present weeping, let us redeem future joys, and let us repel the harmful bees of sins, like stingers of conscience, reserving full hives with wax and honey. Let us cure the wounds of various vices and curb the plundering of the rich, which especially captivates this race of people, with frequent admonitions. And thus we will be able to begin the journey of imminent fasting. The days of Lent begin on the thirtieth day of the month of Mechir. And a holy week of Easter we shall celebrate on the fifth day of the month of Pharmuthi, ending the fast according to Gospel traditions on the evening of the Sabbath of the tenth day of Pharmuthi. And as soon as it dawns to the Lord's day, let us celebrate the feast day on the eleventh day of the same month, joining together the other seven weeks of holy Pentecost. So that we, who confess the one divinity of the Trinity, may receive rewards in heaven with Jesus Christ our Lord, through whom and with whom, to God the Father be glory and dominion, with the Holy Spirit, forever and ever, Amen.

26. Greet one another with a holy kiss. All who are with me greet you. And we write this by necessity so that you may know that those Bishops who have fallen asleep in the Lord, and were ordained in Lemnos for Hero, in Erythrum for Sabbatius, in Omboes for Sylvanus, are counted among the saints and the blessed. Therefore, write to them and receive from them peaceful letters, according to ecclesiastical customs.

Letters - letter_099

Letter 99. To Theophilus.

Jerome forwards to Theophilus a translation of the latter's paschal letter for 404 a.d. and apologizes for his delay in sending it, on the ground that ill-health and grief for the death of Paula have prevented him from doing literary work. The date of the letter is 404 a.d. To the most blessed pope Theophilus, Jerome.

1. From the time that I received the letters of your holiness together with the paschal treatise¹ until the present day I have been so harassed with sorrow and mourning, with anxiety, and with the different reports which have come from all quarters concerning the condition of the church, that I have hardly been able to turn your volume into Latin. You know the truth of the old saying, grief chokes utterance; and it is more than ever true when to sickness of the mind is added sickness of the body. I have now been five days in bed in a burning fever: consequently it is only by using the greatest haste that I can dictate this very letter. But I wish to shew your holiness in a few words what pains I have taken, in translating your treatise, to transfer the charm of diction which marks every sentence in the original, and to make the style of the Latin correspond in some degree with that of the Greek.

2. At the outset you use the language of philosophy; and, without appearing to particularize, you slay one² while you instruct all. In the remaining sections—a task most difficult of accomplishment—you combine philosophy and rhetoric and draw together for us Demosthenes and Plato. What diatribes you have launched against self-indulgence! What eulogies you have bestowed upon the virtue of continence! With what secret stores of wisdom you have spoken of the interchange of day and night, the course of the moon, the laws of the sun, the nature of our world; always appealing to the authority of scripture lest in a paschal treatise you should appear to have borrowed anything from secular sources! To be brief, I am afraid to praise you for these things lest I should be charged with offering flattery. The book is excellent both in the philosophical portions and where, without making personal attacks, you plead the cause which you have espoused. Wherefore, I beseech you, pardon me my backwardness: I have been so completely overcome by the falling asleep of the holy and venerable Paula³ that except my translation of this book I have hitherto written nothing bearing on sacred subjects. As you yourself know, I have suddenly lost the comforter whom I have led about with me, not—the Lord is my witness—to minister to my own needs, but for the relief and refreshment of the saints upon whom she has waited with all diligence. Your holy and estimable daughter Eustochium (who refuses to be comforted for the loss of her mother), and with her all the brotherhood humbly salute you. Kindly send me the books which you say that you have lately written that I may translate them or, if not that, at least read them. Farewell in Christ.

1:

Letter C

2: Origen 3: See Letter CVIII

Letters - letter_100

Letter 100. From Theophilus. A translation by Jerome of Theophilus's paschal letter for 404 a.d. In it Theophilus inculcates penitence for sinners, recommends the practice of fasting and condemns the errors of Origen.

Overview: You must cease from sins, having initiated a routine of virtues, by which the mind is prepared for celebrating Easter. The observance of Lent is holy, both for the sake of fasting and for the sake of a true faith in God. We must also reject the errors of Origen before Easter Sunday, and suppress avarice while joining together in love for God and our neighbors. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. Now also the living wisdom of God calls us to celebrate the holy Easter, desiring all of us to be participants therein: wherefore I hasten running at that with a step, fasting and continence, and every affliction of the body contending against the industry of the adversaries of virtues, let us reduce our pleasures to nothing, supported by the help of the Savior: and we, confessing our sins simply to God, who can heal, fear the true judgement of conscience, that with David clamoring and saying: remember not the sins of my youth and my ignorance: be mindful of me according to your mercy (Ps 27.7); we will consume with terror of eternal fire, the growing vices: of which the end is, to do nothing beyond them, and the beginning of salvation, the forgetting of our past. For just as the beginning of a good life's way (of life), is to do just things, thus the beginning of those who have ceased sinning is to restrain their impulses, while they are checked either by reason or by fear so that they don't fall into headlong destruction. And whenever the recollection of the law has been brought to mind, they immediately flee and halting no longer, they come to the camp of triumphant virtues, gradually retracing their steps and turning towards the judgment of the wise, they dissolve away like smoke into nothingness. Difficult are the cures for afflictions which have not immediately been suppressed as they began to grow: the eradication of such maladies is easy, when those who recently sinned are converted by penitence to prudence, and who have found profit in repenting at the end of their sins. For we cannot suppress the incentives of vices, unless we have started to make virtues, or the old ones will cease before they are excluded from the new works. And just as if we firmly resist the coming pleasures, past sins are erased, so if we persevere in forgetting the past, future sins will no longer be able to grow beyond. Indeed, the operators of the evils, as if bringing into their domain those who can prohibit them but do not, are wholly insane indulging in sin, and dragging silence into sense, they strive to fulfill whatever desire suggests to the mind. The liberty of present vices breeds future vices: and if you have neglected the past, it is the source and seedbed of the future.

2. Sins must be prohibited. Since it is so, those who can prohibit sin and hide from work and remain silent become accomplices to the increase of evil, even as they are in the right judgment of those who are authors of wickedness and who will pay the penalty of sloth. They have preferred irrational leisure, culpable quiet, to severities that cut off vice in the sweat of their brow. For, if we turn away from vices, they will completely perish, and their fraudulent sweetness will dry up. Every impulse of pleasure, so to speak, will become torpid: for our mind will be a seat of virtue. The remembrance of the law does not allow sins to be generated, nor does it permit them to grow; and when they have thought of the future judgment seat and the fearsome day of judgment, then it will prohibit the beginning, middle, and end of sin, and it will dry up the bitter waves and swelling whirlpools all the way to the source, and it will dry up the veins; virtue accompanied by the law will crush the seeds of vices, and it will raise the mind from humble things to lofty ones. On the contrary, vices, unless they are restrained, flourish, and when they become obedient to themselves, they drag themselves down to hell; and once they have taken possession of souls, they oppress them with the allurements of pleasures and do not allow them to look up to heaven, or to stand erect like human bodies, but like beasts, they lean towards earthly things. Of whom the Psalmist testifies, saying, "They have called their names in their lands" (Psalm 48).

3. Those who must get rid of vices. Let someone say, what must those do who, feeling that they have sinned, desire to change their sins for virtues, and scorn worse things in love of better things? Let them hear Moses speaking in this manner: Have you sinned? Stop, subverting previous sins with the cessation of vices, and correcting vices with the most powerful remedy; turn away the sweet allurements of wicked living and the enticing pleasures of the body, as if they were harmful poisons. Do not enter the slippery and soft path of pleasure; for fasting and continence seize a celebration, and we can barely change bad things with good things, laboring and sweating, and suppressing opposing pleasures. There are few who keep the way of truth, while wickedness uses innumerable ways to harm and cannot be conquered unless we are supported from above by the help of wisdom, calling out to us and saying: Do not be afraid, for I am with you (Gen. 26,24). It is the destruction of evil to not commit further wrongs: the root of vices is to despise the learned precepts of the law. As negligence bears the fruit of sins, so solicitude produces virtues. A guarded law drives away disgrace, but one neglected gives birth to punishment; and however, if it is despised, it imitates the ferocity of the strict judge, so much it exhibits the gentleness of the kindest father if it is preserved. Therefore, the cessation of sin is the beginning of virtue. The study of past, present, and future defects in the law is an unwearied medicine: when it has obtained security for its possessor, it is free from all disturbances. For wisdom works good in us: after we have given her a dwelling place in our hearts and turned our thoughts into deeds. And there is no doubt that in either direction, whether to do or not to do good, we have the free capacity, and when the wicked are oppressed, the right things are born: then the chorus of virtues sings together, when there is solitude of vices in the souls. For just as self-restraint holding domination in our bodies, prevents the birth of weaknesses, and neither weakens nor kills its lovers, restoring past illnesses into their original health, and expelling that which is against nature, it restores that which is congruous with nature, so that the rational order of this life might be preserved with an equal balance: so the soul, preserving the orders of the laws, as much as human nature is capable of receiving, is separated from the contagion of evils, and, being worried in every part and inspecting itself, allows nothing to come in that is contrary to brilliant thoughts. Instead indeed, he who has turned to the temple of God, continually delights in the heavenly solemnity, having riches, observing the law, which raises up those who are lying down, punishing the wicked, correcting others, and always crying out: Will he who has fallen not rise again? Or he who is turned away, will he not return? [Jeremiah 8] He bestows hope of salvation to the repentant: while he advises, so that it may be of benefit: he rebukes, so that he may correct: and by casting the shame of former sins upon the sinner, he compels them to seek better things: which no one can desire unless they have first condemned the wounds of their conscience.

4. However, because the law aims to bring back those who are neglecting themselves and sinking in the best of plans into a better way of life, as a standard of wicked works, it does not allow them to be without reward or to be oppressed by eternal tribulations who obey it; as many of us as celebrate holy Easter let us make the bringer of the Law our friend through continence and fasts, the Prophet promising these things to those who celebrate Easter: You will be a crown of beauty in the hand of the Lord, and a diadem of the kingdom in the hand of your God (Isai. 62.3). Let us seek a rich banquet of virtues, adorning ourselves with knowledge of Scripture, as if with festive garments. Let us prepare holy kisses, rejoicing with the Angels in Heaven, fleeing all negligence, and breaking delay, so that we may go eagerly with disciples to our Saviour, and say to Him, "Where will You have us prepare the Passover for You?" (Matthew 26) And ((al. ut.)) situated (there) in the heavenly chamber, and making the mystical Passover, we will be able to sing: "How lovely are your dwelling places, O Lord of hosts!" (Psalm 84:1) For there we shall find the choirs of Angels, and celebrating feasts with them, we will have them as companions in the mysteries of God, and we will rejoice with indescribable joy, learning the sacraments of wisdom with them, where there is no deception of fraud, where he who does not have the wedding garment is forbidden to enter the feast, although he may boast of being just in the present world. "All things there are full of the wisdom of the aging and advanced: and according to the Prophet, no immature wisdom will be found there. For, he says, a youth of 100 years shall be there, showing the magnitude of perfect knowledge. Therefore, brothers and sisters, sharing in the holy and heavenly calling, let us hear the Savior crying out through the Prophet: 'I will gather all peoples together, and they will come and see my glory, and I will set upon them the sign of the world.'" (Isaiah 65:20, 66)

5. Therefore, let us hurry to the celebration and say: But may I never boast except in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ (Gal. 6). He will give joy to those who labor for him. He will bless those who fast and repent, and they will find their joy in the Lord. Love truth and peace. These are the feasts of the Lord. So, let us not live in darkness, but get rid of our evil deeds and put on the armor of light. Let us walk honestly, as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in sleeping and impurities, not in contention and rivalry; but put on the Lord Jesus Christ, and do not make provision for the flesh in its lusts (Rom. 13:12). It is just that all those purified by fear of the Lord should observe a worthy solemnity, redeeming chastity by abstinence and fasting, and arousing wakeful faith in dormant senses, and to imitate the wisest Daniel, of whom it is written: There is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy gods; and in the days of thy father knowledge and wisdom were found in him (Dan. 5. 11). For they who take care of themselves in order to make progress toward better things, having the law as their strongest guide, obey its commands and overturn the sins that come against them, illuminating the splendor of the Easter festival with their works and anticipating victory with a secure conscience, neglecting the darts of disturbance with hope. But those who are imitators of these, before entering the fray, seize the palm of victory of desire for valor and possess the crown of triumphs in heavenly things, contemplating with an unveiled face in their minds; they will be clamorous and say: Lord God, my strength, and he shall place my feet in the consummation, establishing me on high places, that I may overcome in his song.

6. And beloved brothers, let us not think the struggle is perpetual, so that we may become weary; but let us know that the end of this [struggle] is the crown of justice, which no age of centuries corrupts. The study of this life and struggle is temporary, but those who have run with unhindered pace and have come to the end of the rewards, will find new mansions, demonstrating victory with songs. Therefore, celebrating fasts properly, since the grace of the Lord promises triumphs over the most wicked demons, let us also participate properly in the solemnity. Not at all during the days of Lent, as is the habit of luxurious rich men, let us gasp for a cup of wine, nor delight ourselves in the consumption of meats in preparing for battle, when labor and sweat is necessary. For indeed, gluttony and drunkenness, and the other allurements of this life drain the wealthiest treasure of souls, and stifle the most abundant seed of knowledge and learning with their admixture. Therefore, the Lord and Savior, calling his disciples to the rigor of continence, spoke: Take heed to yourselves, lest perhaps your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and the cares of this life, and that day come upon you suddenly. For as a snare shall it come upon all that sit upon the face of the whole earth. (Luke 21:34-35) Arise; let us go hence. (John 14:31), those who, because of their negligence, will immediately suffer punishment. But those who keep the precepts of the law, avoid drinking wine during fasting, reject eating meat, and restrain insatiable greed out of fear of God. Therefore scripture daily cries out to the temperate: "They shall not drink wine nor strong drink" (Judges 13:4,7,14). And on the other hand, the Jews hear a rebuke for their fault: "You made the prophets drink wine" (Amos 2:12). They are unable to accept correction, who are caught up in the pleasure of luxury, nor can they control the greed of their bellies with reason and advice, due to their love of gluttony and quickly perishing pleasure, they shame the pursuit of virtue, not blushing to drink wine secretly, and avoiding those who would be judges with greedy mouths, drinking mead in their bedrooms, so that they exchange hunger and fasting, which they should seek for voluntarily, for luxury and drunkenness during the time of fasting: not knowing that, even if they flee the conscience of men and eat flesh behind closed walls, and tear apart birds during Lent and approaching Easter with unclean hands, promising fasting outside with sad face, that the Lord will rebuke those with such wickedness, saying: 'These people commit great iniquities' in order to keep away from my holy ones. It is not appropriate for those fasting during times of struggle and battle to eat meat, as Scripture warns: "You shall afflict your souls" (Leviticus 16:29). Nor should you seek out fatted birds with anxious toil, and stuff their fat into your greedy throat. Do not inquire after cooks who, through skillful art, can satisfy the cravings of gluttonous stomachs by preparing meats in various tastes and flavors, with smoking dishes and the aroma of their wares tempting even the most restrained person, as different colored and flavored wines are sought after to the detriment of self-control.

7. The story of Saint Daniel teaches us, and the virtue of the three youths, to desire and honor fasting, who, to explain briefly a lengthy speech, changed their servitude to freedom, and when they should have desired the pleasures of captivity, they despised Babylonian feasts and preferred simple food to the royal table. For King Nebuchadnezzar had commanded the chief eunuch to bring into the palace from the sons of the captivity of Israel and the royal seed, boys in whom there was no blemish, handsome in body and fit to learn wisdom, to be in the king's court, to learn the scriptures and the Chaldean language, and to live on the remains of his table, and to drink his wine (Dan. 1:4-5). Therefore, from the tribe of Judah, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah were chosen, who were of one mind and faith, whose nobility slavery could not change. Among them Daniel, as Scripture testifies, resolved in his heart not to be defiled by the king's table. (Ibid. 7). "Three boys also associated not only by kinship but also by religion, receive the council of men, and approve of wisdom, at the same time beseeching the prince of the eunuchs, by the merciful help of God, they obtain what they desire, and preserve the nobility of their lineage in the land of captivity: for fearing the superintendent, lest he should attach more severe punishment to the heads of other boys, they soothe him with reason and counsel, speaking these words: Try your servants for ten days, and let us be given from the seeds, and we will eat, and we will drink water, and our faces will appear before thee, and the faces of the boys that eat of the king's table; and as thou shalt see, so do with thy servants." [Daniel 1:12] For by the mercy of God he saw even the desire for virtue sustained, and that continent and strong bodies were preserved, and faith conquered all deformity, and no wasting impaired beauty's radiance.

8. We have repeated this, most beloved brothers, in order that, knowing the words of Paul the Apostle preaching about the virtues of the saints, in which he says: Considering the end of their conversation, imitate their faith (Heb. 13.7), we may encourage those who take delight in eating meat during the time of fasting, to imitate the continence of the saints, who were not able to be overcome by force, so as to lose the rigour of virtue, who, fearing the empires of the Babylonians, showed that they despised captive pleasure, but remained free, and overcame with reason the desires of the belly, and conquered the titillating pleasures of the throat, and left us examples of their fortitude, dwelling in Babylon in their bodies, but with sense and faith dwelling with the Angels in heavenly Jerusalem, so that they may teach us throughout all ages that during the time of fasting we must abstain from wine and meat, take seeds from the earth, and drink water, with which companions chastity abounds.

9. What should I mention the remarkable victories of the Maccabees (2 Maccabees 7)? They, in order to not consume illegal meats and to avoid touching common foods, offered their bodies to torments: and are praised throughout the churches of Christ in the entire world, stronger in punishments, more passionate than the fires with which they were burned. All the ingenuities of cruelty were conquered in them, and the fortitude of those suffering overcame whatever the anger of the persecutor had come up with. Amid more fatherly punishments of the law than of the memories of pain: their entrails were torn apart, their bodies dissolved by pus and passion yet their sentence remained immobile: their spirits were free, and in hope the evil presence of the future was despised. The torturers were tired, but faith was not tired: bones were broken, and every connection of nerves and limbs was dissolved by the whirling wheel, and fires breathing death rose up to the sky; pans filled with fervent oil were there, and with incredible terror they sounded for frying the bodies of the saints; and yet, amidst all these things, they walked mentally in paradise, not feeling what they suffered, but what they eagerly desired to see. For the mind fortified by the fear of God overcomes flames, scorns various pains of torment. And once it has dedicated itself to virtue, it tramples and despises whatever adversities happen. This is how Paul was, writing: In all these things we are more than conquerors, through Him who loved us (Rom. 8:37). For what the weakness of our flesh cannot endure, the soul overcomes through natural frailty, talking to God in faith.

10. So those who fast, that is, who imitate the angelic conversation on earth, should remember the saying: 'The kingdom of God is not food and drink, but righteousness, and joy, and peace, and gladness' (Rom. 14). Through continence, these people gain great and eternal rewards with brief and small effort, and they receive much more than they offer. They mitigate the present difficulties with the glory of the future time, as in this race for virtue, there will be an end to the struggle. For those who engage in battle against vices and dedicate their souls to the disciplines of wisdom, as much as human nature allows, they seek knowledge of future things, perceiving the kingdoms of heaven through a mirror and image, sense and faith, and they will attain eternal rewards, which will never be closed by any end of time. Days and nights follow each other in certain intervals, gradually decreasing, what they lose, they receive, and what they receive, they give: convening twice a year in the same measure, nor do they remain in the same state, but they distinguish the moments of time by the brevity and length of hours, in order to make the diversity of seasons useful for the world. For the day borrows from its order and circle its times of night, and night again receives what it has given out; and while they each give and receive in turn, and receive back little by little what they had lost in their waning, they gradually grow full again; and so the wisdom of the Creator is interpreted. And from this reciprocal interchange of spaces of time either the month's circle of the moon is completed, or the year returns as the sun moves through its own footsteps, while always-changing and yet always-the-same times are renewed. And so the moon, created by the all-wise artifice of God, changing its forms to reach fullness and hastening to diminution, whatever it has acquired while growing, it loses when it decreases. Nor does it remain in the same state, but ascending and descending by certain degrees, it proceeds from poverty to riches and, from riches, returns to poverty, demonstrating that it is changeable and mutable by the diversity of its forms. Who, indeed, could express with fitting words the course of the sun, and the year's circle corresponding to the monthly computation or the moon's, while it revolves through the four seasons and continually returns upon itself, and ascends and descends by the same measure, and glides away by an eternal order, so that the space which the moon fills up in thirty days and nights, the course of the sun restores by the spaces of the revolving year. And when he (the sun) has reached equality of day and night, and stood for a little while on the balance of justice, he hastens toward inequality, leaving behind what he had come to. I think Ecclesiastes says this in his own book, so that we do not draw from others' wells: The spirit goes around, and returns to its own circle (Eccl. 1), signifying the annual course of the sun. For the wheel of time returns in itself, returning to where it had started.

11. But the holy and heavenly solemnity emitting the rays of its own splendor is not limited by any spaces: and when the struggles of the saints and the toil of the present age have been brought to an end, perpetual joy and eternal festival will follow. Hence, perfect men, separating their souls from every darkness of error, now proclaim their feasts: Let us enter into his gates with praise, into his courts with hymns (Psalm 94), sounding the Advent of the Savior with happy voices. For when wickedness was reigning throughout the whole world, and demons had filled human eyes with darkness, and no one could give them any help, according to what is written: "I looked, and there was none to help; and I wondered, and there was none to uphold" (Ps. 89), in order that impiety should at last have an end, and the fraud of idolatry destroyed, the living Word of God, leaving nothing of our likeness untouched except sin alone, which has no real existence, has been made incarnate in a new way, and, uniting Himself to us, has been made man, that He might become the Son of Man, and that, while remaining Son of God, He might make us the Sons of God. His birth of the Virgin was, indeed, believed by those of dull sight to be according to the flesh, but by the spiritual minded it was understood to be according to the Spirit. But in the works and the magnitude of the signs, the invisible God was perceived by the wise, both with the human appearance displayed, with the virtues signifying God, covered by the cheapness of servile form. Although the Jews handed him over and with impious voices shouted to have him crucified, blaspheming the Lord in the slaughter of his body, indeed by the killing of the Lord's flesh, they became impious servants. Yet, he approached fearless towards death, in order to provide an example of virtue for us, the Lord of glory was shown in the passion itself, remaining in the majesty of impassible divinity and passable in flesh, just as Blessed Peter spoke, and therefore suffering for us, he did not flee from death, so that we would not lose victory in battling with the property of his death. For if he had feared the cross, bearing the opposite of what he had taught, who of his disciples would willingly have fought for religion? Therefore, he is ridiculed by the foolish and unbelieving who subjected the world to his own faith and bestowed the dignity of the Christian name upon the saints. And even though the greatness of his virtues shines forth, they do not cease to blaspheme. But indeed God, who is mocked, has been demonstrated by his works to overthrow the temples of demons, in order to rebuke the impiousness of the Origenists. Whose founder, Origen, so deceived the ears of the simple and the light-hearted with his own persuasiveness, that they are accustomed to be dashed against the shores by waves coming from the open sea, and to be broken up into swirling masses in themselves.

12. Therefore, we speak with zeal of faith to him who has dared to write that the ruin of reasonable creatures is the body's fabric, that if this kind of impiety pleases you, how does the Apostle Paul write, "I desire young women to marry and bear children" (Tim. 5)? Did he command marriage so that, as bodies are born from women, the souls falling from heaven may be turned towards appropriately prepared prisons? Or is it so that he, serving God's teachings regarding marriage, may preserve the human race? For if he wishes young women to marry and bear children from which human bodies are born, but errant souls are united with bodies only through punishment and torment, there can be no doubt that young women are united with bonds for the sake of souls' punishment rather than for the order of procreation in marriage. But heaven forbid that we should believe that the marriage union of husband and wife is joined together not for blessing but for sin. Neither did God create Adam and Eve, in order to bring together by a blessing those spirits who fell from heaven and from rational creatures, saying, 'increase and multiply, and fill the earth.' For if souls were sent down from heaven to earth because of prior sins, so that they might be bound to bodies, then Paul is lying when he writes: 'Marriage is honorable, and the bed undefiled.' [Heb. 12] But he certainly does not lie. Therefore, bodies are not made for the destruction of souls, but so that the world may compensate for the losses of those being born and dying through perpetual succession, and overcome the brevity of human life. For if those who are falling and united with bodies are blessed by God, they will be of a better condition after they have received the bodies. If they are said to receive bodies for the sake of punishing sinners, how are they blessed in bodies, into which they came because of sins? For one of two things will be true: either they were blessed before their fall, or, after their fall and union with bodies, they cannot be blessed. For if blessing follows this life, it renounces that (life); if it is transferred to that (life), it is not found to have been in this (life). But if before they fell and before they were clothed in human bodies, they were in blessing, and when they fell and had bodies, they were blessed again, their prior lives will be similar to their subsequent lives in the condition of the blessing; and this is by no means subsequent, because the sinners merit punishment, while not sinners merit blessing. Whatever truth there may be in either of the two (lives), it will be culpable if they do not wish to observe the rule of ecclesiastical doctrine. For whether it is on account of sins that souls falling from heaven are bound like prisoners, attached to bodies with chains, let them answer how Adam and Eve, male and female, alive in their bodies, were blessed. For according to their madness, they are not called naked souls, but rather bodies which distinguish both sexes. Whether, indeed, they (i.e. the just) dwelt before in the heavenly abodes, and were then blessed, and worthily held converse without their bodies; in what manner were they blessed either before their fall, or after they became corrupted, and inhabited ruinous bodies for their punishment, and then again became blessed? For surely blessing and punishment are not the same; they are kept far apart, both in name and in effect, and cannot possibly be joined, since they are so utterly antagonistic. And in what sense is a great offspring promised as a blessing to the just, as when the prophet says, 'The least among you shall become a thousand, and the smallest a great nation?'

13. Therefore, those who want to celebrate the Lord's feasts, should also despise the images of Origen and overcome the obscenity of his teachings by reason. For just as the impious error and custom of the Ethnics preferred falsehood, manufacturing idols in the likeness of men and blaspheming the invisible God, while they fashioned for themselves their form and their limbs and their genital organs: now professing a man, now a woman, and changing the glory of the incorruptible God into the likeness of the image of a corruptible man (Rom. 1.23), of various forms: so Origen, with the facility and impiety of believers, dropped shrines of idols, as it were, in his treatises, which undermine us by the authority of the Scriptures and the zeal of faith, let us use this simile: For just as builders wanting to build a house with square corners measure equal walls all around, and directing them by rule and plumb-line, build with works in accord with their plan, and join the four sides of the square with angles upward and downward, preserving the equal beginning and gradually augmenting it, so that the beauty of the design join the diversity of the material of the task, and the craftsman's structure preserves the angular lines; thus the teachers of the Church, having the testimonies of the Scriptures, firmly establish the foundations of their teaching, and persist fearlessly, offering their works to Christ and saying: Confirm me in your words (Ps. 118.28). For he, of whom it is written: The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner (Matthew 21), has united us and those who are above with one solemnity, to which, sailing with swift course, we do not at all fear the rage of the heretical waves to be rapidly dissipated.

14. For just as the helmsmen of great ships, when they see an immense whirling wave coming from the deep, like hunters, they undertake the foaming waves and sustain them by the projection of the prow, turning the rudder in different directions and tightening or loosening the ropes, and when the wave subsides, they release the struggling chains on both sides of the ship so that they may be prepared for the approaching swell of water. And when the wave comes again, they tighten the heads of the chains and expand the palms so that the labor of either side may be equalized by the cleft blasts from all directions, and what could not be borne together may be borne separately with more ease. They who are concerned with themselves, follow the example of this comparison and, using the helm like a divine dispensation of words, rush to meet the storm and waves of heretics, retaining the law of God for their skill, that they may raise up those who have fallen. Let those who stand persevere firmly and let them all be kept safe in the common support of the teaching. For as the helm is to the helmsman, so is the law of God to the soul: in which, making the Lord's Passover, we may prefer nothing else to the love of God and our neighbor in the world, nor change our opinion with the variation of human circumstances which turn hither and thither, so that, having already served with dishonorable flattery those for whose power we once labored, if the winds should turn and riches be changed to poverty, high birth to humility, glory to ignominy, we should suddenly become their enemies, resisting in their face those whom we formerly deemed worthy of respect, considering not their faith but their times of need. On the contrary, they demonstrate hidden enmities in a time of necessity and proceed out of their dens in the likeness of serpents, so that not only are we ungrateful towards those whose benefits we enjoyed, rejoicing if we possess the names of clients, but as if we were traitors we persecute them even unto blood: trampling on them when they are cast down and prostrate, whom not long since we regarded as wealthy; we denounce them as the worst of all men, and extol their power, defaming their misfortunes; we honor or despise some not for their nature, but for the variety of accidents, so that those whom we previously called masters and patrons, we now name mere bullies and very wicked slaves. In every way, it is clear that our injustice is manifested, while we praise the unworthy and with criticism, pursue the worthy, imitating that which was spoken reproachfully against the blessed Job, "For your sins, you have suffered a few things, you have been beaten." (Job 11: 7).

15. Therefore, let us cherish the most steadfast courage, not uncertain wealth: let poverty not humiliate us by its harshness, nor riches elevate us, which have been accustomed to depress and elevate the most foolish of men; but let us restrain both for the sake of honesty, and enduring both sorrowful and joyful things with an equal mind. The care of riches interrupts the sweetest slumbers, brings forth harmless slanders, and when it has gathered infinite resources, prepares the material for eternal fires. But after insatiable greed has clung to the sought-after wealth, greed is not satisfied, but despises laws, and holds the flames of hell in contempt, regarding the future judgment seat as useless. Nor do adversaries fight against their enemies as much as riches fight against virtues, unless reason and mercy towards those close by temper them. These (riches) are preferred over nobility in the cities, these (riches) give an ancient family to new people. The desire for wealth can never be satisfied with any amount of wealth. He who is greedy always lacks, not knowing moderation, as much as he lacks what he has. Hell is not filled with the dead, but the more it receives, the more it desires. Therefore, greed imitates him, and cannot be satisfied, but whatever he has, he will demand more: he thinks all that he possesses to be less than what he desires; always immense, always immoderate, not restraining the ardor of sinners by the magnitude of wealth, in feasts he devours not foods, but injustice: in judgments he mixes wrangling, and discord, he brings forth envy, through which he arrives at homicide: he is not in control of his mind, but rather he is like one who is drunkenly fluctuating, having one measure, he always seeks beyond measure. The sea is enclosed by shores, and harbours either constructed or naturally very strong, prevent the incoming waves from the deep and the violence of raging whirlpools; but the desire for riches, unless controlled by reason, neither respects counsel nor is it mitigated by law, nor can any abundance satisfy it. Covetousness does not blush, nor is it afraid of future judgment, but, in its desire for more, as those addicted to luxury are wont to do, it strives to embrace all pleasures and to be mad with lust, so it fills cities, villages, villas, islands, seas, lands, shores, roads, and passageways with calumnies and dissensions; avarice possesses islands, seas, lands, shores, roads, studies, while, in its desire for more, it exchanges goods back and forth by means of trade and lays the insatiable foundation of riches by means of frauds and perjuries.

16. Therefore, despising such rage, let us seek riches in the worship of God, and the steadfast possessions of chastity and holiness, worshipping the one divinity of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; believing the resurrection of the dead to be incorruptible, and everlasting. For it is impossible that death should prevail over that which is confirmed by the passion of Christ, raising up the incorruptible and eternal temple of his body. Let us pray for the most pious Emperors; and by observance of the law of God, let us adorn the fasts: for virtue keeps its followers without any necessity, and elevates the mind, which fluctuates on various thoughts from earthly things to lofty things, contemplating not at all the beauty of bodies, but rather the order of conversation and morals, showing to the person the choirs of angels rejoicing in heaven, and teaching the flashes of shining disciplines, so that in this present age, he may endure the wounds inflicted on him as the strongest athlete, and prepare for himself future glory: not subject to vice, but lifting up the inner man with the desire for eternal things; and restraining all the impulses of pleasure by reason, he considers that which is to come, and withdraws from the solicitude of worldly things, preferring spiritual things to bodily things, so that he may also despise the body itself, and, by persuading himself to embrace a life that is harder but better than the present pleasures, he who was once a slave to passion may serve chastity with good liberty, and being removed from the precipices, receive the gentle reins of fasting. For if the nature of the body is weak and without a ruler and master, nor does it want to obey a commanding mind, it provokes infinite shipwrecks for itself and the ruler and drags them into the most shameful lusts and the abyss of pleasures, so that it does not consider what is honorable, but fleeing from good things, it dwells in filth and squalor. But when virtue has governed the soul like a charioteer, and standing as if in a chariot, has restrained its impulse and various desires with the reins of teaching, it lifts it up from humble things to lofty ones, revealing to it invisible and eternal things for visible ones, preparing a dwelling in the heavens for it, and making for it friends who, serving the ministry of God, enjoy spiritual delights - so that what it saw here in an image, it may perceive there in truth and see greater clarity with the rays of the sun that descend for us in part, so that we may tend from lesser things to greater things and make progress as if by letters and syllables for reading: for both those things need these and these those. "When we have been joined to the company of the blessed there, we will hear: Well done, good and faithful servant; because you have been faithful over a few things, I will place you over many. Enter into the joy of your Lord." (Matthew 25:21, 23)

17. On the eleventh day of the month of Phamenoth, the holy Lenten fast begins, and on the sixteenth day of the month of Pharmuthi, we have the week of Passion. And we will end the fast on the twenty-first day of the same month of Pharmuthi, and we shall celebrate Easter on the twenty-second day of the same month. After which we will join (or let us join) the seven weeks of Holy Pentecost: remembering the poor, loving both God and neighbor, praying for enemies, pleasing persecutors, lifting up the ruins of the weak with consolation and mercy. So that our tongue always resounds in the praises of God, so that the just judgments of the Church are never destroyed by irrational clemency, nor that the laws of God be preferred to those of men. If we desire its friendships, we will obtain heavenly glory in Christ Jesus our Lord, through whom, and with whom, to God the Father be glory and power with the Holy Spirit forever and ever. Amen.

18. Greet one another with a holy kiss. The brothers who are with us greet you. And you should know this: For deceased bishops, each has a place assigned. In the city of Nichium for Theopemptus, Theodosius; in Terenuthide for Arsinthius; in the town of Geras for Eudemon Pyrrhus; in Achaeis for Apollinus Museus; in Athrividis for Isidore Athanasius; in Cleopatrida for Offellus; and in the town of Laton for Timothy Apelles. Therefore, write to them and, according to custom, accept the ecclesiastical letters from them.

Letters - letter_101

Letter 101. From Augustine. A letter from Augustine in which he denies that he has written a book against Jerome and sent it to Rome but confesses that he has criticized him although without giving details. Written in 402 a.d. In collections labeled Augustine's Letter 40, or Jerome's Letter 67. To My Lord Most Beloved and Longed For, My Honoured Brother in Christ, and Fellow-Presbyter, Jerome, Augustine Sends Greeting in the Lord.

1. I have heard that my letter has come to your hand. I have not yet received a reply, but I do not on this account question your affection; doubtless something has hitherto prevented you. Wherefore I know and avow that my prayer should be, that God would put it in your power to forward your reply, for He has already given you power to prepare it, seeing that you can do so with the utmost ease if you feel disposed.

2. I have hesitated whether to give credence or not to a certain report which has reached me; but I felt that I ought not to hesitate as to writing a few lines to you regarding the matter. To be brief, I have heard that some brethren have told your Charity that I have written a book against you and have sent it to Rome. Be assured that this is false: I call God to witness that I have not done this. But if perchance there be some things in some of my writings in which I am found to have been of a different opinion from you, I think you ought to know, or if it cannot be certainly known, at least to believe, that such things have been written not with a view of contradicting you, but only of stating my own views. In saying this, however, let me assure you that not only am I most ready to hear in a brotherly spirit the objections which you may entertain to anything in my writings which has displeased you, but I entreat, nay implore you, to acquaint me with them; and thus I shall be made glad either by the correction of my mistake, or at least by the expression of your goodwill.

3. Oh that it were in my power, by our living near each other, if not under the same roof, to enjoy frequent and sweet conference with you in the Lord! Since, however, this is not granted, I beg you to take pains that this one way in which we can be together in the Lord be kept up; nay more, improved and perfected. Do not refuse to write me in return, however seldom.

Greet with my respects our holy brother Paulinianus, and all the brethren who with you, and because of you, rejoice in the Lord. May you, remembering us, be heard by the Lord in regard to all your holy desires, my lord most beloved and longed for, my honoured brother in Christ.

Letters - letter_102

Letter 102. To Augustine.

Jerome's reply to the foregoing in which, it has been said, friendship struggles with suspicion and resentment. He warns Augustine not to provoke him, lest old as he is he may prove a dangerous opponent; and encloses part of his reply to the apology of Rufinus. Written in 402 a.d. Sometimes numbered as Augustine Letter 68. To Augustine, My Lord, Truly Holy and Most Blessed Father, Jerome Sends Greeting in Christ.

1. When my kinsman, our holy son Asterius, subdeacon, was just on the point of beginning his journey, the letter of your Grace arrived, in which you clear yourself of the charge of having sent to Rome a book written against your humble servant. I had not heard that charge; but by our brother Sysinnius, deacon, copies of a letter addressed by some one apparently to me have come hither. In the said letter I am exhorted to sing the παλινωδία, confessing mistake in regard to a paragraph of the apostle's writing, and to imitate Stesichorus, who, vacillating between disparagement and praises of Helen, recovered, by praising her, the eyesight which he had forfeited by speaking against her. Although the style and the method of argument appeared to be yours, I must frankly confess to your Excellency that I did not think it right to assume without examination the authenticity of a letter of which I had only seen copies, lest perchance, if offended by my reply, you should with justice complain that it was my duty first to have made sure that you were the author, and only after that was ascertained, to address you in reply. Another reason for my delay was the protracted illness of the pious and venerable Paula. For, while occupied long in attending upon her in severe illness, I had almost forgotten your letter, or more correctly, the letter written in your name, remembering the verse, "Like music in the day of mourning is an unseasonable discourse." [Sirach 22:6] Therefore, if it is your letter, write me frankly that it is so, or send me a more accurate copy, in order that without any passionate rancour we may devote ourselves to discuss scriptural truth; and I may either correct my own mistake, or show that another has without good reason found fault with me.

2. Far be it from me to presume to attack anything which your Grace has written. For it is enough for me to prove my own views without controverting what others hold. But it is well known to one of your wisdom, that every one is satisfied with his own opinion, and that it is puerile self-sufficiency to seek, as young men have of old been wont to do, to gain glory to one's own name by assailing men who have become renowned. I am not so foolish as to think myself insulted by the fact that you give an explanation different from mine; since you, on the other hand, are not wronged by my views being contrary to those which you maintain. But that is the kind of reproof by which friends may truly benefit each other, when each, not seeing his own bag of faults, observes, as Persius has it, the wallet borne by the other. Let me say further, love one who loves you, and do not because you are young challenge a veteran in the field of Scripture. I have had my time, and have run my course to the utmost of my strength. It is but fair that I should rest, while you in your turn run and accomplish great distances; at the same time (with your leave, and without intending any disrespect), lest it should seem that to quote from the poets is a thing which you alone can do, let me remind you of the encounter between Dares and Entellus, and of the proverb, "The tired ox treads with a firmer step." With sorrow I have dictated these words. Would that I could receive your embrace, and that by converse we might aid each other in learning!

3. With his usual effrontery, Calphurnius, surnamed Lanarius, has sent me his execrable writings, which I understand that he has been at pains to disseminate in Africa also. To these I have replied in past, and shortly; and I have sent you a copy of my treatise, intending by the first opportunity to send you a larger work, when I have leisure to prepare it. In this treatise I have been careful not to offend Christian feeling in any, but only to confute the lies and hallucinations arising from his ignorance and madness.

Remember me, holy and venerable father. See how sincerely I love you, in that I am unwilling, even when challenged, to reply, and refuse to believe you to be the author of that which in another I would sharply rebuke. Our brother Communis sends his respectful salutation.

Letters - letter_103

Letter 103. To Augustine. A letter of introduction in which Jerome commends the deacon Praesidius to the kind offices of Augustine. Written in 403 a.d. See Augustine, vol. i., Letter 39. To My Lord Augustine, a Father Truly Holy and Most Blessed, Jerome Sends Greeting in Christ.

1. Last year I sent by the hand of our brother, the subdeacon Asterius, a letter conveying to your Excellency a salutation due to you, and readily rendered by me; and I think that my letter was delivered to you. I now write again, by my holy brother the deacon Præsidius, begging you in the first place not to forget me, and in the second place to receive the bearer of this letter, whom I commend to you with the request that you recognise him as one very near and dear to me, and that you encourage and help him in whatever way his circumstances may demand; not that he is in need of anything (for Christ has amply endowed him), but that he is most eagerly desiring the friendship of good men, and thinks that in securing this he obtains the most valuable blessing. His design in travelling to the West you may learn from his own lips.

2. As for us, established here in our monastery, we feel the shock of waves on every side, and are burdened with the cares of our lot as pilgrims. But we believe in Him who has said, "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," [John 16:33] and are confident that by His grace and guidance we shall prevail against our adversary the devil.

I beseech you to give my respectful salutation to the holy and venerable brother, our father Alypius. The brethren who, with me, devote themselves to serve the Lord in this monastery, salute you warmly. May Christ our Almighty God guard you from harm, and keep you mindful of me, my lord and father truly holy and venerable.

Letters - letter_104

Letter 104. From Augustine. In this letter Augustine (1) commends to Jerome the deacon Cyprian, (2) explains how it is that his first letter (Letter 56.) has miscarried, and (3) urges Jerome to base his scriptural labours not on the Hebrew text but on the version of the LXX. The date of the letter is 403 a.d. Sometimes numbered as Augustine Letter 71. To My Venerable Lord Jerome, My Esteemed and Holy Brother and Fellow-Presbyter, Augustine Sends Greeting in the Lord.

1. Never since I began to write to you, and to long for your writing in return, have I met with a better opportunity for our exchanging communications than now, when my letter is to be carried to you by a most faithful servant and minister of God, who is also a very dear friend of mine, namely, our son Cyprian, deacon. Through him I expect to receive a letter from you with all the certainty which is in a matter of this kind possible. For the son whom I have named will not be found wanting in respect of zeal in asking, or persuasive influence in obtaining a reply from you; nor will he fail in diligently keeping, promptly bearing, and faithfully delivering the same. I only pray that if I be in any way worthy of this, the Lord may give His help and favour to your heart and to my desire, so that no higher will may hinder that which your brotherly goodwill inclines you to do.

2. As I have sent you two letters already to which I have received no reply, I have resolved to send you at this time copies of both of them, for I suppose that they never reached you. If they did reach you, and your replies have failed, as may be the case, to reach me, send me a second time the same as you sent before, if you have copies of them preserved: if you have not, dictate again what I may read, and do not refuse to send to these former letters the answer for which I have been waiting so long. My first letter to you, which I had prepared while I was a presbyter, was to be delivered to you by a brother of ours, Profuturus, who afterwards became my colleague in the episcopate, and has since then departed from this life; but he could not then bear it to you in person, because at the very time when he intended to begin his journey, he was prevented by his ordination to the weighty office of bishop, and shortly afterwards he died. This letter I have resolved also to send at this time, that you may know how long I have cherished a burning desire for conversation with you, and with what reluctance I submit to the remote separation which prevents my mind from having access to yours through our bodily senses, my brother, most amiable and honoured among the members of the Lord.

3. In this letter I have further to say, that I have since heard that you have translated Job out of the original Hebrew, although in your own translation of the same prophet from the Greek tongue we had already a version of that book. In that earlier version you marked with asterisks the words found in the Hebrew but wanting in the Greek, and with obelisks the words found in the Greek but wanting in the Hebrew; and this was done with such astonishing exactness, that in some places we have every word distinguished by a separate asterisk, as a sign that these words are in the Hebrew, but not in the Greek. Now, however, in this more recent version from the Hebrew, there is not the same scrupulous fidelity as to the words; and it perplexes any thoughtful reader to understand either what was the reason for marking the asterisks in the former version with so much care that they indicate the absence from the Greek version of even the smallest grammatical particles which have not been rendered from the Hebrew, or what is the reason for so much less care having been taken in this recent version from the Hebrew to secure that these same particles be found in their own places. I would have put down here an extract or two in illustration of this criticism; but at present I have not access to the manuscript of the translation from the Hebrew. Since, however, your quick discernment anticipates and goes beyond not only what I have said, but also what I meant to say, you already understand, I think, enough to be able, by giving the reason for the plan which you have adopted, to explain what perplexes me.

4. For my part, I would much rather that you would furnish us with a translation of the Greek version of the canonical Scriptures known as the work of the Seventy translators. For if your translation begins to be more generally read in many churches, it will be a grievous thing that, in the reading of Scripture, differences must arise between the Latin Churches and the Greek Churches, especially seeing that the discrepancy is easily condemned in a Latin version by the production of the original in Greek, which is a language very widely known; whereas, if any one has been disturbed by the occurrence of something to which he was not accustomed in the translation taken from the Hebrew, and alleges that the new translation is wrong, it will be found difficult, if not impossible, to get at the Hebrew documents by which the version to which exception is taken may be defended. And when they are obtained, who will submit to have so many Latin and Greek authorities pronounced to be in the wrong? Besides all this, Jews, if consulted as to the meaning of the Hebrew text, may give a different opinion from yours: in which case it will seem as if your presence were indispensable, as being the only one who could refute their view; and it would be a miracle if one could be found capable of acting as arbiter between you and them.

5. A certain bishop, one of our brethren, having introduced in the church over which he presides the reading of your version, came upon a word in the book of the prophet Jonah, of which you have given a very different rendering from that which had been of old familiar to the senses and memory of all the worshippers, and had been chanted for so many generations in the church. [Jonah 4:6] Thereupon arose such a tumult in the congregation, especially among the Greeks, correcting what had been read, and denouncing the translation as false, that the bishop was compelled to ask the testimony of the Jewish residents (it was in the town of Oea). These, whether from ignorance or from spite, answered that the words in the Hebrew manuscripts were correctly rendered in the Greek version, and in the Latin one taken from it. What further need I say? The man was compelled to correct your version in that passage as if it had been falsely translated, as he desired not to be left without a congregation — a calamity which he narrowly escaped. From this case we also are led to think that you may be occasionally mistaken. You will also observe how great must have been the difficulty if this had occurred in those writings which cannot be explained by comparing the testimony of languages now in use.

6. At the same time, we are in no small measure thankful to God for the work in which you have translated the Gospels from the original Greek, because in almost every passage we have found nothing to object to, when we compared it with the Greek Scriptures. By this work, any disputant who supports an old false translation is either convinced or confuted with the utmost ease by the production and collation of manuscripts. And if, as indeed very rarely happens, something be found to which exception may be taken, who would be so unreasonable as not to excuse it readily in a work so useful that it cannot be too highly praised? I wish you would have the kindness to open up to me what you think to be the reason of the frequent discrepancies between the text supported by the Hebrew codices and the Greek Septuagint version. For the latter has no mean authority, seeing that it has obtained so wide circulation, and was the one which the apostles used, as is not only proved by looking to the text itself, but has also been, as I remember, affirmed by yourself. You would therefore confer upon us a much greater boon if you gave an exact Latin translation of the Greek Septuagint version: for the variations found in the different codices of the Latin text are intolerably numerous; and it is so justly open to suspicion as possibly different from what is to be found in the Greek, that one has no confidence in either quoting it or proving anything by its help.

I thought that this letter was to be a short one, but it has somehow been as pleasant to me to go on with it as if I were talking with you. I conclude with entreating you by the Lord kindly to send me a full reply, and thus give me, so far as is in your power, the pleasure of your presence.

Letters - letter_105

Letter 105. To Augustine.

Jerome's answer to the foregoing. He complains that even now he has not received Augustine's letter and asks him to Send him a copy of it. Popular rumour, he declares, credits Augustine with a deliberate suppression of the letter in order that he may seem to win an easy victory over his opponent. Jerome next deals with Augustine's denial of having made a written attack upon him and concludes by refusing for the present all discussion of points of criticism. Sometimes numbered as Augustine Letter 72. To Augustine, My Lord Truly Holy, and Most Blessed Father, Jerome Sends Greeting in the Lord.

1. You are sending me letter upon letter, and often urging me to answer a certain letter of yours, a copy of which, without your signature, had reached me through our brother Sysinnius, deacon, as I have already written, which letter you tell me that you entrusted first to our brother Profuturus, and afterwards to some one else; but that Profuturus was prevented from finishing his intended journey, and having been ordained a bishop, was removed by sudden death; and the second messenger, whose name you do not give, was afraid of the perils of the sea, and gave up the voyage which he had intended. These things being so, I am at a loss to express my surprise that the same letter is reported to be in the possession of most of the Christians in Rome, and throughout Italy, and has come to every one but myself, to whom alone it was ostensibly sent. I wonder at this all the more, because the brother Sysinnius aforesaid tells me that he found it among the rest of your published works, not in Africa, not in your possession, but in an island of the Adriatic some five years ago.

2. True friendship can harbour no suspicion; a friend must speak to his friend as freely as to his second self. Some of my acquaintances, vessels of Christ, of whom there is a very large number in Jerusalem and in the holy places, suggested to me that this had not been done by you in a guileless spirit, but through desire for praise and celebrity, and éclat in the eyes of the people, intending to become famous at my expense; that many might know that you challenged me, and I feared to meet you; that you had written as a man of learning, and I had by silence confessed my ignorance, and had at last found one who knew how to stop my garrulous tongue. I, however, let me say it frankly, refused at first to answer your Excellency, because I did not believe that the letter, or as I may call it (using a proverbial expression), the honeyed sword, was sent from you. Moreover, I was cautious lest I should seem to answer uncourteously a bishop of my own communion, and to censure anything in the letter of one who censured me, especially as I judged some of its statements to be tainted with heresy. Lastly, I was afraid lest you should have reason to remonstrate with me, saying, "What! Had you seen the letter to be mine — had you discovered in the signature attached to it the autograph of a hand well known to you, when you so carelessly wounded the feelings of your friend, and reproached me with that which the malice of another had conceived?"

3. Wherefore, as I have already written, either send me the identical letter in question subscribed with your own hand, or desist from annoying an old man, who seeks retirement in his monastic cell. If you wish to exercise or display your learning, choose as your antagonists, young, eloquent, and illustrious men, of whom it is said that many are found in Rome, who may be neither unable nor afraid to meet you, and to enter the lists with a bishop in debates concerning the Sacred Scriptures. As for me, a soldier once, but a retired veteran now, it becomes me rather to applaud the victories won by you and others, than with my worn-out body to take part in the conflict; beware lest, if you persist in demanding a reply, I call to mind the history of the way in which Quintus Maximus by his patience defeated Hannibal, who was, in the pride of youth, confident of success.

"Omnia fert ætas, animum quoque. Sæpe ego longos Cantando puerum memini me condere soles; Nunc oblita mihi tot carmina: vox quoque Mœrin Jam fugit ipsa." Or rather, to quote an instance from Scripture: Barzillai of Gilead, when he declined in favour of his youthful son the kindnesses of King David and all the charms of his court, taught us that old age ought neither to desire these things, nor to accept them when offered.

4. As to your calling God to witness that you had not written a book against me, and of course had not sent to Rome what you had never written, adding that, if perchance some things were found in your works in which a different opinion from mine was advanced, no wrong had thereby been done to me, because you had, without any intention of offending me, written only what you believed to be right; I beg you to hear me with patience. You never wrote a book against me: how then has there been brought to me a copy, written by another hand, of a treatise containing a rebuke administered to me by you? How comes Italy to possess a treatise of yours which you did not write? Nay, how can you reasonably ask me to reply to that which you solemnly assure me was never written by you? Nor am I so foolish as to think that I am insulted by you, if in anything your opinion differs from mine. But if, challenging me as it were to single combat, you take exception to my views, and demand a reason for what I have written, and insist upon my correcting what you judge to be an error, and call upon me to recant it in a humble παλιν *ἵδι'*α, and speak of your curing me of blindness; in this I maintain that friendship is wounded, and the laws of brotherly union are set at nought. Let not the world see us quarrelling like children, and giving material for angry contention between those who may become our respective supporters or adversaries. I write what I have now written, because I desire to cherish towards you pure and Christian love, and not to hide in my heart anything which does not agree with the utterance of my lips. For it does not become me, who have spent my life from youth until now, sharing the arduous labours of pious brethren in an obscure monastery, to presume to write anything against a bishop of my own communion, especially against one whom I had begun to love before I knew him, who also sought my friendship before I sought his, and whom I rejoiced to see rising as a successor to myself in the careful study of the Scriptures. Wherefore either disown that book, if you are not its author, and give over urging me to reply to that which you never wrote; or if the book is yours, admit it frankly; so that if I write anything in self-defense, the responsibility may lie on you who gave, not on me who am forced to accept, the challenge.

5. You say also, that if there be anything in your writings which has displeased me, and which I would wish to correct, you are ready to receive my criticism as a brother; and you not only assure me that you would rejoice in such proof of my goodwill toward you, but you earnestly ask me to do this. I tell you again, without reserve, what I feel: you are challenging an old man, disturbing the peace of one who asks only to be allowed to be silent, and you seem to desire to display your learning. It is not for one of my years to give the impression of enviously disparaging one whom I ought rather to encourage by approbation. And if the ingenuity of perverse men finds something which they may plausibly censure in the writings even of evangelists and prophets, are you amazed if, in your books, especially in your exposition of passages in Scripture which are exceedingly difficult of interpretation, some things be found which are not perfectly correct? This I say, however, not because I can at this time pronounce anything in your works to merit censure. For, in the first place, I have never read them with attention; and in the second place, we have not beside us a supply of copies of what you have written, excepting the books of Soliloquies and Commentaries on some of the Psalms; which, if I were disposed to criticise them, I could prove to be at variance, I shall not say with my own opinion, for I am nobody, but with the interpretations of the older Greek commentators.

Farewell, my very dear friend, my son in years, my father in ecclesiastical dignity; and to this I most particularly request your attention, that henceforth you make sure that I be the first to receive whatever you may write to me.

Letters - letter_106

Letter 106. To Sunnias and Fretela. A long letter in which Jerome answers a number of questions put to him by two sojourners in Getica, Sunnias and Fretela. Diligent students of scripture, these men were at a loss to understand the frequent differences between Jerome's Latin psalter of 383 a.d. (the so-called Roman psalter) and the LXX, and accordingly sent him a long list of passages with a request for explanation. Jerome in his reply deals fully with all these and points out to his correspondents that they have been misled by their edition of the LXX. (the "common" edition) which differs widely from the critical text of Origen as given in the Hexapla and used by himself. He also expresses his joy to find that even among the Getae the scriptures are now diligently studied. The date of the letter is about 403 a.d. Translated by Michael Metlen. With parallel Latin. To My Beloved Brethren Sunja and Frithila and All Those Who with You are Serving the Lord, Hieronymus.

1. Certainly these apostolic and prophetic words have been fulfilled in you: Their sound went into all the earth, and their words unto the ends of the world?² Who would believe that the barbarous language of the Goths would try to compete with the Hebrew in establishing the true text of the Scriptures, and that, while the Greeks are indolent and contentious, even Germany³ would scrutinize the words of the Holy Spirit? Truly I have found out that God is no respecter of persons, but that among every nation he who feareth him and cloth what is right will be acceptable to him.⁴ Already the hands callous from wielding the sword, and the fingers fitter to handle the bow are getting accustomed to using the pen, and the men hardened in warfare are learning Christian gentleness. Now we see the prophecy of Isaiah fulfilled indeed: They will beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation will not lift up the sword against nation, neither will they learn war any more.⁵ And again in the same: The wolf will eat with the lamb, and the leopard will lie down with the kid, and the calf and the lion and the bull will feed together, and a little child will lead them; and the cow and the bear will eat together, and their young ones will be friends, and the lion and the ox will eat straw,⁶ not in order that meekness shall become ferocious, but that ferocity shall learn meekness.

2. You are requesting of me a difficult thing and one beset with trouble, a matter which does not require so much of ingenuity as rather learning, exposing me, as it does, while trying to judge about others, to public criticism. You wish namely, according to your letter, that I indicate to you, wherever there is in the Psalter a discrepancy between the Latin and Greek texts, which of the readings in question expresses the corresponding Hebrew text more faithfully. In connection with this let me advise you at the outset briefly that there is one edition which Origines and Eusebius of Caesarea and all Greek writers call the κοινὴ, ⁷ that is, the common or vulgar text, and which now goes mostly by the name of Lukian, the other is the Septuagint, which is also to be found in the Hexapla⁸ and has been translated by me faithfully into Latin, and is used at Jerusalem and in the oriental churches. About this matter also my holy son Avitus has inquired often, and since our brother, the presbyter Firmus, who brought me your letter, affords me a chance, I am going to answer it jointly, thus acquitting myself of a duty of friendship which cannot be exaggerated. And as, in dealing with the New Testament, whenever among the Latin writers a doubt arises, and there occurs a discrepancy between individual copies, we have recourse to the original Greek, in which the New Testament was written, so also in the Old Testament, if there are discrepancies between the Greek and Latin texts, we go back to the Hebrew, in order that we may trace to their origins the individual variant readings. The κοιν■ that is the common edition, however, is the same as the Septuagint, but with the difference that the κοιν■ is the old edition, which became corrupted through the whims of the individual writers and the accidents of the times and of the places [where the copies were made],⁹ whereas the one which is contained in the Hexapla and which I have translated is the pure and unadulterated version of the Septuagint, as it is found in the texts of learned scholars. There is no doubt that whatever differs from this differs also from the Hebrew text.¹⁰

3. Your first question concerns the place in the 5th Psalm: Neque habitabit juxta te malignus which reads in the Greek: ο■τε παροικ■σαι σοι πονηρ■ς, which reading the vulgar¹¹ edition contains; and you are wondering why the Latin translator has not rendered the word παροικ■αν by "incolatum," and why he has used instead the word "habitationem," which is in the Greek κατοικ■α. He has done the same in another place, viz. in: Heu mihi, quia incolatus meus prolongatus est. And in the 14th Psalm he uses again "habitationem" for "incolatu": Domine, quis habitabit in tabernaculo tuo ? It is to be noted that if we want to say: "Domine, quis incolet tabernaculum tuum ?"," or in the 5th Psalm, "Neque incolet juxta te malignus," it won't sound right and, while translating literally, the rendering will not be correct. It should, therefore, be the rule of a good translator to express the idioms of a foreign language by the corresponding idioms of his own tongue. This also Tullius has done in Plato's Protagora and in the Ο■κονομικ■ of Xenophon and in the Oration of Demosthenes against Aeschines, as well as the very learned men Plautus, Terence, and Caelius in their translations of Greek comedies. Nobody should, however, on that account consider the Latin language not flexible enough because it cannot translate literally [and idiomatically at one and the same time],⁹ since the Greeks, too, mostly translate our works idiomatically and take care also not to render the Hebrew literally, but idiomatically.

4. In the same Psalm: Dirige in conspectu meo viam tuam. For this the Greek has: κατε■θυνον ■ν■πιον σου τ■ν ■δ■ν μου, that is: "Dirige in conspectu tuo viam meam"; the former version neither the Septuagint has, nor Aquila, nor Symmachus, nor Theodotion, but only the κοιν■ edition. Finally, I have found also in the Hebrew this reading: oser laphanoi darchach, which all [not mentioned]⁹ have translated the same way: "Dirige in conspectu meo viam tuam," according to what is said also in the Lord's Prayer: Pater noster, qui es in cælis, sanctificetur nomen tuum. This does not mean that by our prayers should be hallowed what is holy in itself, but it means that we are praying that that which is sacred in virtue of its own nature be also hallowed in us. In the same way the prophet is now also asking that the way of the Lord, which is right in itself, be made likewise right for him.

5. In Psalm 6: Erubescant et conturbentur vehementer omnes inimici mei. You say that "vehementer" is not found in the Greek. I know it, but the Vulgate¹¹ has it. Besides, there is in the Hebrew the word mod, which means "vehementer," and all have translated σφ■δρα similarly.

6. In Psalm 7: Judica me, domine, secundum justitiam meam, for which the Greek has κατ■ τ■ν δικαιοσ■νην σου, that is, "juxta justitiam tuam." But that is wrong, for the Hebrew has sedechi, which is “justitia mea,” and not “sedecach,” which means “justitiam tuam.” But all translators have likewise rendered “justitiam meam.” And nobody should think it foolish that the Psalmist asks to be judged according to his own justice, since the following verse means the same thing: Et secundum innocentiam meam super me, while also the 16th Psalm starts this way: Exaudi, domine, justitiam meam, and the 17th has this: Retribuet mihi dominus secundum justitiam meam et secundum puritatem manuum mearum reddet mihi. Furthermore, we find also in the 25th Psalm this reading: Proba me, domine, et tempta me; ure renes meos et cor meum, and in the 4th: Quum invocarem, exaudivit me Deus justitiæ meæ, and in the 85th: Custodi animam meam, quoniam sanctus sum. Jacob also says in Genesis: Exaudiet me cras justitia mea.

7. In Psalm 8: Quoniam videbo cælos tuos. You say that the Greek does not have “tuos.” That is true, but in the Hebrew we find samacha, which means “cælos tuos,” and which has been added in the Septuagint from Theodotion’s text under an asterisk. Here I shall briefly explain this matter. Whenever there occurs in the Greek an omission, which the Hebrew has, Origenes added such omission from Theodotion’s translation, putting an asterisk — that is a star — in order that it should light up and make clear that which was previously obscure. On the other hand, whenever something is found in the Greek texts which is not in the Hebrew, he placed an obelus in front of it, that is, a horizontal line, which we may call in Latin a dart [in English an arrow]⁹ to indicate that that which is not found in the authentic texts should be extirpated. These signs are also found in Greek and Latin poems.

8. Psalm 14: Oculi tui videant æquitates. [You say that in the Greek]¹² you have read: οφθαλμοι μου, that is, “oculi mei.” But it is more correct to say “oculi tui” because the prophet had said before: De vultu tuo judicium meum prodeat, in order that God’s eyes should not see in the work of the prophet the wrong but the right things. In the same: Custodi me ut pupillam oculi. You say that your Greek version is: Custodi me, Domine. This is found, however, neither in the Hebrew, nor in any translator. In the same: Exurge, Domine, præveni eum et supplantata eum. For this you say the Greek has πρὸφθασον αὐτόν, that is, “Præveni eos et supplantata eos.” The singular number is here better, however, if the statement is made concerning the evil one, to whom applies also what immediately follows: Præveni eum et supplantata eum ; eripe animam meam ab impio. There is no doubt that this refers to the devil.

9. Psalm 17: Grando et carbones ignis, and you ask why in the Greek text not two other verses are inserted before the repetition of this one. It is to be noted, however, that this one has been added, in the Septuagint, under an asterisk from the Hebrew and the text of Theodotion. In the same: Qui perfecit pedes meos tamquam cervorum. For this you say the Greek has: σε λήφου, that is, “tamquam cervi,” using the singular number for the plural. But in the Hebrew the plural “chaialoth” is used, and all translators have used the plural here. In the same: Et dedisti mihi protectionem salutis tuæ. For this you say you have read in the Greek: τὴν σωτηρίαν μου, that is, “salutis meæ.” But in the Hebrew “iesacha” means “salutis tuæ” and not “meæ.” And all translators have this reading. In the same: Supplantasti insurgentes in me subtus me. For this you say you have found in the Greek: Omnes insurgentes . However, “omnes” has been added. In the same: Vivit Dominus et benedictus Deus meus. You say that in the Greek “meus” is lacking. This has not been added under an asterisk, but has been translated from the Hebrew by the very translators of the Septuagint, and all translators agree in this particular. In the same: Liberator meus de gentibus iracundis. For this you say you have found in the Greek: “Ab inimicis meis fortibus,” or “potentibus.” But since we are interested in the truth, let me say that if anything has been changed owing to the hurry of the translator or the fault of the transcriber, we simply have to admit it and correct the wrong form. The Hebrew has nothing else but: “Liberator meus ab inimicis meis.” The translators of the Septuagint, however, have added “iracundis.” And for “gentibus” the Greek text and all translators have “inimici.” I wonder how the form “gentes” has slipped in for “inimicis.”

10. Psalm 18: Exultavit ut gigas ad currendam viam suam. You say that in the Greek “suam” does not occur. But we find this word added here under an arrow, and it is apparent that it does not occur in the Hebrew.

11. Psalm 19: Tribuat tibi secundum cor tuum. You say that you have found that in the Greek the name of the Lord is added in this verse. This is superfluous because it is understood from the context of the preceding words {πακοσαι σου Κριος} with which the Psalm begins: “Exaudiat te Dominus in die tribulationis,” so that the Psalmist continues here in the same vein: Tribuat tibi secundum cor tuum, which statement refers to the Lord himself who has been mentioned before. In the same: Et exaudi nos in die, qua invocaverimus te. For this you say you have read: “in quocumque die.” But the former reading agrees with the Hebrew, where we find biom, which means “in die.”

12. Psalm 21: Tu autem, Domine, ne elongaveris auxilium tuum a me. For this you say you have found “meum.” This is true and should be corrected accordingly. In short: If anything has been changed through an error of the transcribers, it would be foolish to defend such error. In the same: Universum semen Jacob, magnificate eum. For this you say the Greek has: δοξασατε ατν, that is: “glorificate eum.” But it is to be noted that wherever the Greek has “glorificate,” the Latin translator has rendered this by “magnificate,” on the basis of what is said in Exodus: Cantemus Domino; gloriose enim magnificatus est, for which in the Greek “glorificatus est” is written. This, however, sounds awkward in the Latin translation, so that I, when revising the Psalter, did not want to deviate from the practice of the old translators, provided no change of sense was involved, in order not to disturb the reader by too many innovations.

13. Psalm 22: Calix meus inebrians quam præclarus est. For this you say you have read in the Greek: “calix tuus.” But in the κοιν version this reading is a mistake. Besides, the Septuagint, the Hebrew and all translators have calix meus, which means in the Hebrew chosi; for calix tuus would be chosach.

14. Psalm 24: Confundantur omnes iniqua agentes. You say that “omnes” does not occur in the Greek. That’s right, for it does not occur in the Hebrew either, and it is added in the Septuagint under an arrow. In the same: Innocentes et recti adhæserunt mihi, quia sustinui te, and you say that you have found “Domine” in the Greek. This, however, is superfluous.

15. Psalm 26: Et nunc ecce exaltavit caput meum. But “ecce” is superfluous. In the same: Exquisivit facies mea, for which you say the Greek has: Quaesivit te facies mea. The former reading is the better one, however.

16. Psalm 27: Exaudi vocem deprecationis meæ, for which you say you have found: Exaudi, Domine. But “Domine” also has been added.

17. Psalm 28: Et in templo ejus omnis dicet gloriam. For this you say the Greek contains π[ο]ς τ[ο]ς. But if we should want to translate verbatim “omnis quis,” the result would be a mere transliteration and an absurd rendering. In the same: Dominus diluvium inhabitare facit, for which you say you have read: Dominus diluvium inhabitat. The former rendering refers to the blessings of the faithful, the latter to the dwelling place of him in whom they believe. However, since iasaph is an ambiguous word which may mean either of two things — for it signifies both “sessio” and “habitatio” and refers in the Psalm in question to the grace of Baptism: Vox Domini super aquas ; Dominus super aquas multas; and Vox Domini præparantis cervos et revelabit condensa, et in templo ejus omnis dicet gloriam —, I prefer to understand it of those who glorify the Lord, and have thus translated it, Dominus diluvium inhabitare facit.

18. Psalm 30: Quoniam tu es protector meus. Again in this place the Lord’s name has been added. Let me say once for all that you should not forget that the name of our Lord and God is often added, and that you should observe the corrections I have made on the basis of the Hebrew and the Septuagint. In the same: Ego autem dixi in excessu mentis meæ. For this the Latin texts had: in pavore meo, and I translated according to the Greek: ἐν τῷ ἁκισμῷ μου, that is, “in excessu mentis meæ.” For the Latin cannot express ἁκισμῷ except by “mentis excessum.” I know that I have read in the Hebrew the differing version: “in stupore et in admiratione mea.”

19. Psalm 31: Nec est in spiritu ejus dolus. For this you say you have read in the Greek: ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ, that is, “in ore ejus,” which Symmachus alone has. On the other hand, the Septuagint, Theodotion, the Fifth and Sixth editions,¹³ Aquila, and the Hebrew itself have “in spiritu ejus,” which is in the Hebrew brucho. If the meaning were, however, “in ore ejus,” baffio would be written in the Hebrew. In the same: Conversus sum in ærumna mea. You say that the Hebrew does not have “mea,” which has been added under an asterisk from the Hebrew and Theodotion’s translation, and which in the Hebrew reads lasaddi; lasaddi . . . [there is a gap here].⁹

20. Psalm 34: Omnia ossa mea dicent: « Domine... ». Here, you say, you have found in the Greek the word “Domine” twice. It is to be noted, however, that there are many Hebrew copies which have the word “Dominum” not even once.

21. Psalm 36: Et viam ejus volet. You say that you have read in the Greek “volet nimis.” But “nimis” has been added and is not found in any one of the translators.

22. Psalm 38: Verumtamen vane conturbatur omnis homo. You say that you have not found in the Greek the word “conturbatur.” But this also has been added in the Septuagint under an arrow, and from this you and most of the rest have incurred an error because everything is mixed up through the negligence of the scribes in omitting the arrows and asterisks.

23. Psalm 39: Et legem tuam in medio cordis mei. For this you say you have found in the Greek: “in medio ventris mei,” which also in the Hebrew occurs in batthoch meai. This, however, has in the Latin texts euphemistically been changed to “in corde.” However, we should not change the meaning of anything. In the same: “Domine, in adjutorium meum respice.” For this you say you have found in the Greek: σπεῖσον, that is, “festina.” In the Septuagint, however, πρῶτος, that is “respice,” is written.

24. Psalm 40: Et si ingrediebatur, ut videret, and you say that “si” does not occur in the Greek, although it is very clearly written in the Hebrew and has been rendered by all translators. The Septuagint, too, renders it thus: κα■ ε■ ε■σεπορε■ετο το■ ιδε■ν.

25. Psalm 41: Salutare vultus mei, Deus meus. For this you say you have found: “et Deus meus.” But it is to be noted that this [viz. “deus meus”]9 is found twice in that Psalm, and that in the first place “salutare vultus mei, deus meus” is written, while in the second place, viz., at the end of the Psalm, “salutare vultus mei et Deus meus” is used, but so that the conjunction “et” has been added under an asterisk from the Hebrew and Theodotion. In the same: Exprobraverunt mihi, qui tribulant me. For this you say you have found: ο■ χθρο■ μου, that is, “inimici mei,” while the Septuagint has: ο■ θλ■βοντ■ς με, and the Hebrew sorarai, that is, “hostes mei.” In the same: Spera in deo, quoniam adhuc confitebor illi. You say that “adhuc” is not found in the Greek. But it has been added under an asterisk. In the Hebrew likewise we find written chi od, which means ■τι ■τι and is rendered in Latin by “quoniam adhuc.” The same applies to Psalm 42.

26. Psalm 43: Et non egredieris in virtutibus nostris . For this you say you have found in the Greek: “Et non egredieris, Deus.” But “Deus” is superfluous. In the same: “Posuisti nos in similitudinem gentibus,” for which you say the Greek has: ■ν το■ς ■θνεσιν. However, if we should say in Latin: “in similitudinem in gentibus,” it would sound badly, and on that account a proper rendering has been maintained without damage to the sense. On the other hand, I have found in the Hebrew text: “Posuisti nos proverbium in gentibus.” In the same: Exurge, adjuva nos. To this, as usually, the Lord’s name has been added in the Greek.

27. Psalm 44: Sagittae tuae acutæ. For this you say you have read in the Greek: “acutæ, potentissime.” But this is wrong, as “potentissime” has been added from a preceding verse in which we read: “Accingere gladio tuo super femur tuum, potentissime.”

28. Psalm 47: Quoniam ecce reges congregati sunt. For this you say you have found in the Greek: “quoniam ecce reges ejus congregati sunt.” The context of the reading itself shows that “ejus” is wrong. The old Latin texts had here “reges terræ,” which I omitted because it is found neither in the Hebrew nor in the Septuagint. In the same: “sicut audivimus, sic vidimus.” For this you say you have found in the Greek: “sic et vidimus.” This is wrong, for the Hebrew has here chen rainu, which is translated by ο■τως ■ιδομεν, that is, “sic vidimus.” In the same: Suscepimus, Deus, misericordiam tuam in medio templi tui. For the expression which I have translated, in accordance with the Hebrew and the Septuagint, by “templi tui,” you say you have read in the Greek “populi tui,” which is wrong, for in the Hebrew echalach is written, which means το■ νχο■ σου, that is, “templi tui,” and not ammach, which signifies “populum tuum.”

29. Psalm 48: Homo, quum in honore esset. For this you say you have found in the Greek: “Et homo, in honore quum esset.” But it is to be noted that the verse in question occurs twice in this Psalm, and that in the first place the conjunction “et” is added, but in the second not. In the same: “et dominabuntur eorum justi.” For “justis” you say you have read in the Greek ε■θε■ς, which means “rectos.” However, “justi” has been substituted in the Latin on account of the context. Besides, also in that place in which we find the expression: “in libro ε■θε■ς,” we understand “justorum libro.” Hence, we should not translate so literally that, while splitting hairs about syllables, we lose sight of the sense. In the same: “De manu inferni quum liberaverit me.” For this you say you have read in the Greek: “quum acceperit me.” This I also have translated that way from the Septuagint, and I am wondering who has changed it in your text.

30. Psalm 49: Sedens adversus fratrem tuum loquebaris. For this you say you have found in the Greek: κατ[] το[] []δελφο[] σου κατελ[]λεις, and you think that it is not translated well because I said: “adversus fratrem tuum loquebaris,” and that I should have said: “adversus fratrem tuum detrahebas.” But even a fool realizes that that is wrong and not idiomatic in our language. Neither am I ignorant of the fact that καταλαλ[]α means “detractio.” However, if we want to use that, we cannot say: “adversus fratrem tuum detrahebas,” but we must say: “de fratre tuo detrahebas.” However, if we do so, some hairsplitter of words will inquire again why we do not say: κατ[] το[] []δελφο[] σου, that is, “adversus fratrem tuum.” All that, however, is nonsense, and we should not embark upon a useless quibbling about words, as long as the meaning remains one and the same, because every language, as I said before, has its own idiomatic way of expressing itself. In the same: “Ne quando rapiat, et sit qui eripiat.” You say that you have found in the Greek: “Et non sit qui eripiat,” which I also have translated thus and is to be found that way in my texts. Hence I wonder why you blame the translator for the negligence of a drowsy transcriber, unless the reading is perchance: “Ne quando rapiat, nec sit qui eripiat,” so that the copyist wrote “et” for “nec.” In the same: “Sacrificium laudis honorificabit me,” for which the Greek has: δοξ[]σει με, that is, “glorificabit me,” which I explained already a little while ago. In the Gospel we read in the Latin “Pater, clarifica me,” in the place where the Greek has: Π[]τερ, δ[]ξασ[]ν με τ[] δ[]ξ[] [] ε[]χον παρ[] σοι πρ[] το[] τ[]ν κ[]σμον γεν[]σθαι. Thus I did not want to change a time-honored reading because there was no difference of meaning.

31. Psalm 54: Exspectabam eum qui salvum me fecit, and you say that you have found in the Greek: “Exspectabam Deum,” but “Deum” has been added. In the same: “A pusillanimitate spiritus,” and you say you have found in the Greek: []π[] []λιγοψυχ[]ας, which in effect means “pusillanimitas.” It is to be noted, however, that for []λιγοψυχ[]α Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion and the Fifth Edition have the rendering []π[] πνε[]ματος, that is, “a spiritu,” that the Hebrew has merucha, and that the complete sense is, in the texts referred to: Festinabo, ut salver a spiritu tempestatis et turbidinis. In the same: “Quoniam si inimicus maledixisset.” In the Greek we have []νε[]δισεν, that is, “exprobrasset.” But there is no difference in meaning between “maledicta” and “opprobria.”

32. Psalm 55: Quoniam multi bellantes adversum me, ab altitudine diei timebo. You say that you have found in the Greek: non timebo. Here “non” has been added. The sense is: “quoniam multi dimicant adversum me, idcirco ego ab altitudine diei timebo,” that is: “non bellantes adversum me, sed tuum excelsum timebo lumen.” In the same: “In ira populos confringes.” For this the Greek has: []ν []ργ[] λαο[]ς κατ[]ξεις [that is “dejicies,” and not κατε[]ξεις],¹² that is, “confringes.” In Latin a bad error has crept in here, viz. “confringes,” that is κατε[]ξεις, for κατ[]ξεις, which means “dejicies.” For the Hebrew has here hored, meaning καταβ[]βασον, which we may translate by “depone,” and which Symmachus has translated by κατ[]γαγε.

33. Psalm 58: Quia deus susceptor meus, for which the Greek has: Susceptor meus es tu. But it is to be noted that the Hebrew has neither “es” nor “tu,” and that these words appear only in the Septuagint. In the same: “Deus meus, voluntas ejus praeveniet me.” For this the Greek has: τ[] []λεος α[]το[], that is, “misericordia ejus,” which is more correct. The Hebrew, on the other hand, has: “Misericordia mea praeveniet me.” In the same: “Deus ostendit mihi inter inimicos meos,” for which the Greek has: "Deus meus." But "meus" has been added. In the same: "Ne occidas eos, ne quando obliviscantur populi tui," for which the Greek has: "legis tuæ." But in the Septuagint and in the Hebrew, "populi tui" does not occur, but populi mei, and I have translated it thus. In the same: "Et scient, quia Deus dominator Jacob finium terræ." For this the Greek has: "Et finium terræ." The conjunction "et" has been added, however. The sense is: "Scient quia Deus Jacob dominator finium terræ."

34. Psalm 59: Quis deducet me usque in Idumaeam ? For this the Greek has: aut quis deducet me ?, which is wrong.

35. Psalm 60: Quoniam tu, Deus meus, exaudisti orationem meam, for which you say your Greek text has: Quia tu, Deus, exaudisti me. This reading does not occur either in the Hebrew or in the Septuagint, but only in the Latin. In the same: "Psallam nomini tuo in sæculum sæculi, for which you say your Greek text has: "in sæculum." The Hebrew has once laed, that is, "in æternum," and not lolam, which means "in sæculum."

36. Psalm 61: Quia Deus adjutor noster in æternum, for which the Greek has: "Deus adjutor noster." Hence "in æternum" is to be omitted.

37. Psalm 62: Sitivit tibi anima mea, for which you say your Greek text has: Sitivit in te anima mea. The Hebrew, however, has not attha, which means "te," but lach, which means "tibi." All translators have rendered accordingly. Hence it has been translated properly into the Latin.

38. Psalm 63: Sagittae parvulorum factæ sunt plagæ eorum, for which your Greek text has: Sagitta parvulorum. But if we say: "Sagitta parvulorum factæ sunt plagæ eorum," the rendering is wrong from the standpoint of Latin. Instead, the Hebrew version, "Percutiet eos Deus jaculo repentino et inferentur plagæ eorum," is better.

39. Psalm 64: Qui conturbas profundum maris, sonum fluctuum ejus. You say your Greek text has the addition: "Quis sustinebit ?" This is wrong, for the sense is: "qui conturbas profundum maris et conturbas sonum fluctuum ejus." In the same: Parasti cibum illorum, quoniam ita est præparatio ejus, and you say that your Greek text does not have "ejus," although in the Hebrew the china clearly means "præparationem ejus," viz. "ejus terræ," of which the Psalmist had earlier said: "Visitasti terram et inebriasti eam."

40. Psalm 65: Holocausta medullata offeram tibi cum incenso arietum, for which you say you have found: Cum incensu et arietibus. But that is wrong, for the Hebrew has: em catoroth helim, which means μετὰ θυμιαματος κριόν, that is, "cum incenso arietum." In the same: Propterea exaudivit Deus, for which you say you have found in the Greek: Exaudivit me Deus. Here, "me" is superfluous.

41. Psalm 67: Et exsultent in conspectu ejus, for which you say you have found in the Greek: Et exsultate in conspectu ejus. This I, too, have translated that way, but I cannot know who has tampered with it in your text. In the same: Etenim non credunt inhabitare Dominum, for which you say you have read in the Greek: καὶ γὰρ πειθοῦντες τοὺς κατασκηνοῦντας. Both of these versions are wrong, for I translated: Etenim non credentes inhabitare Dominum, which is the correct meaning depending upon the preceding: "Ascendisti in altum, cepisti captivitatem, accepisti dona in hominibus (et eos qui non credebant Dominum inhabitare posse mortalibus)." In the same: Deus benedictus Dominus die cottidie, for which you say you have found in the Greek: Dominus benedictus Deus, benedictus Dominus die cottidie. But the former reading is better and truer. In the same: Viderunt ingressus tui, Deus, for which you say your Greek has: Visi sunt ingressus tui, Deus. The Hebrew has the following: rachua alichatach, which Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion and the Fifth and Sixth editions have translated: Viderunt itinera tua, Deus, and what follows: Itinera Dei mei regis, qui est in sancto. Hence we should read thus: Viderunt ingressus tuos, Deus, and not imitate the mistake of the transcriber who put the nominative for the accusative, although in the Septuagint and in the Hexapla I have found: θεωρῶσαν αὐτοῦ, θεῷ, and for θεωρῶσαν, that is, “viderunt,” in many texts θεωρῶθησαν is found, which reading custom has maintained. In the same: Ingressus Dei mei, regis mei, qui est in sancto, the meaning of which is: “Viderunt ingressus Dei mei, regis mei.” But your statement that “mei” is not added in the Greek after “rege” is clearly erroneous; for both “Dei mei” and “regis mei” are used here pleonastically by way of affection to express the fervent desire that he who is God and king of all should in a special sense be the prophet’s God and king because of his condition as a servant of God. Finally, the Hebrew text has heli melchi, which means “Deum meum et regem meum.” In the same: Regna terræ, cantate Deo, psallite Domino, and you say that “Psallite Domino” does not occur in that verse because there follows immediately: Diapsalma. Psallite Deo, qui ascendit super cælum cæli ad orientem, whereas that verse should rather read according to the Hebrew: Cantate Deo, psallite Domino, and what follows at the beginning of the other verse, viz., “Psallite Deo,” does not occur in the authentic texts, but has an arrow in front of it. Thus you, too, should adhere to the true version lest, while adopting a spurious reading, you lose sight of what the prophet has written.

42. Psalm 68: Laudabo nomen Dei cum cantico. For this you say you have found in your Greek text: “Dei mei.” But “mei” is superfluous.

43. Psalm 70: Deus, ne elongeris a me. You say that your Greek text reads: Deus meus, but “meus” is superfluous. In the same: Deus, docuiste me e juventute mea. Also here “meus” after “Deus,” which you say you have found in the Greek, is superfluous. In the same: Donec annuntiem brachium tuum. You say you have found in the Greek: mirabilia tua. This, however, is from the preceding verse: Et usque nunc pronuntiabo mirabilia tua. The word “brachium” is hence correct here.

44. Psalm 71: Et adorabunt eum omnes reges. You say that you have found in your Greek text: “reges terræ, but “terræ” is superfluous. In the same: Benedictus Dominus Deus, Deus Israël. You say that in your Greek text “Deus” does not occur twice, although it is in the Hebrew, and the threefold occurrence in the Septuagint of the name of our Lord and God very clearly indicates the mystery of the Holy Trinity.¹⁴ In the same: Et benedictum nomen majestatis ejus in æternum. You say that you have found in the Greek: In æternum et in sæculum sæculi. But please remember that the additional words have redundantly been added by the Greeks, as they occur neither in the Hebrew nor in the Septuagint.

45. Psalm 72: prodiet quasi ex adipe, and you say that you have found in the Greek: ξελεσονται, that is, “prodient,” which is wrong; for also the Septuagint has this: ξελεσεται ὁ κύριος ὁ δίκαιος. In the same: Quomodo scit Deus. You say that the Greek does not have the word “Deum,” although the Septuagint has: Πῶς γινώκει, and all translators have rendered it similarly from the Hebrew. In the same: Intellegam in novissimis eorum, for which you say have read in the Greek: Et intellegam. However, here the conjunction “et” is superfluous. In the same: Defecit caro mea et cor meum, for which some have changed the word-order in an awkward way, thus: Defecit cor meum et caro mea. In the same: Ut annuntiem omnes prædicationes tuas, for which you say you have read in the Greek: τὰς ἀνσεις σου, that is, “laudes tuas.” It is to be noted, however, that the Hebrew has malochothach, which Aquila has translated by γγελας σου, that is, “nuntios tuos,” the Septuagint by τὰς παγγελας σου, that is, “prædicationes” or “promissa,” although “laus” and “prædicatio” mean one and the same thing.

46. Psalm 73: Ut quid, Deus, reppulisti in finem ?, for which the Greek with an awkward word-order says: Ut quid reppulisti, Deus ? In the same: Quanta malignatus est inimicus in sancto ! I wonder who has corrected a mistake into your copy by substituting “sanctis” for “sancto,” since also my copy has the form “in sancto.” In the same: Incendamus omnes dies festos Dei a terra, for which the Greek has καταπασωμεν, and I translated thus: Quiescere faciamus omnes dies festos Dei a terra. I wonder why some rash fellow has thought that the note: “the correct form is not καταπασωμεν, as some think, but κατακασωμεν, that is, incendamus,” which was placed by me for the guidance of the reader into the margin, should be put into the body of the text. And since the holy presbyter Firmus, who was in charge of this work, has told me that this question has been discussed by many, I am going to explain it somewhat more in detail. The Hebrew text reads: sarphu chol moedahu hel baares, which Aquila and Symmachus have rendered: νεπρισαν πσας τς συνταγς το Θεο, that is, incenderunt omnes solemnitates Dei in terra. The Fifth Edition renders: κατκασσαν, that is, combusserunt, the Sixth: κατακασωμεν, that is, comburamus, which also the Septuagint evidently translates according to the copies [by καταπασωμεν].⁹ Also Theodotion renders: νεπρσωμεν, that is, succendimus [= perfect tense]. From this it is clear that my rendering should be used, although sight should not be lost of the true Hebrew version. For the reading of the Septuagint should be used in the churches, because of its antiquity, whereas the scholars should, for the sake of the accuracy of the Scriptures, not forget the true version. Thus, whenever anything has been added in the margin for the sake of taking note of, this should not be put into the body of the text, in order not to corrupt the original translation according to the whim of the transcribers. In the same: Contribulasti capita draconum in aquis ; tu confregisti capita draconis. This is the correct form of the reading; hence “tu” should not occur in the first verse, but in the second, and “aquæ” should be in the plural, instead of in the singular, the same as Aquila has translated the Hebrew word ammaim by τῶν δῶν, that is, “aquarum.” In the same: Ne obliviscaris voces inimicorum tuorum, for which you say the Greek has τὸν κετὸν σου, that is, “deprecantium te.” In the Hebrew sorarach is used, which Aquila has translated by “hostium tuorum,” Symmachus by “bellantium contra te,” the Septuagint and the Sixth Edition by “inimicorum tuorum.” The meaning is clear from the preceding: Memor esto improperiorum tuorum, eorum, quæ ab insipiente sunt tota die ; ne obliviscaris voces inimicorum tuorum (that is, the voices which blaspheme you and disparage against you amongst your people). Whereupon follows: Superbia eorum, qui te oderunt, ascendit semper, that is: “while you are deferring the punishment, they increase their blasphemies.”

47. Psalm 74: Narrabimus mirabilia tua. For this the Greek has the wrong reading: Narrabo omnia mirabilia tua.

48. Psalm 75: Omnes viri divitiarum manibus suis, and not, as you have read in the text spoiled by, God knows, whom: in manibus suis. In the same: Terribili et ei qui aufert spiritus principum. You say that “ei” is not in the Greek. That’s true, but unless we add “ei,” the Latin is not complete. For we cannot say correctly: “Terribili et qui aufert spiritus principum.”

49. Psalm 76: Et meditatus sum node cum corde meo et exercitabar et scopebam spiritum meum. For this we read in the Hebrew: Recordabar Psalmorum meorum in nocte ; cum corde meo loquebar, et scopebam spiritum meum. For “exercitatione” the Septuagint translates δολεσχαν, meaning some sort of “decantationem” and “meditationem,” and for what we call “scopebam,” it puts σκαλλον, which Symmachus has translated by νηρεων, that is, “perscrutabar,” or “quærebam.” The Fifth Edition uses a similar form. σκαλισμς, however, refers in agriculture properly to the hoeing of the soil for the purpose of destroying the weeds. And as there the weeds which are to be destroyed are loosened with a hoe, so here the Psalmist uses this figure in connection with the imperfect state of his mind. But it is to be noted that σκαλλον {aorist tense} refers to one, σκαλλον {imperfect tense} to a repeated occurrence. In the same: A generatione in generationem. You say that this is followed in the Greek by: consummavit verbum. But that would be an error in the Latin text, and no translator has it.

50. Psalm 77: Et narrabunt filiis suis. For this the Greek has ναγγελοσιν, which means “annuntiabunt.” It is to be noted, however, that the Hebrew has iasaphpheru, which Aquila and Symmachus have translated by “narrabunt.” In the same: Et occidit pingues eorum. This reading also the Hebrew has, viz. bamasmnehem, which Aquila translated by ν λιπαρος ατν, Symmachus by τος λιπαρωτρους ατν, the Septuagint, Theodotion and the Fifth Edition by ν τος ποσιν ατν. Some ignorant fellows, however, have supposed that πλεοσιν was written for ποσιν. In the same: Dilexerunt eum in ore suo et lingua sua mentiti sunt ei. The Hebrew likewise has the same reading, viz. icazbulo, and all have translated similarly: ψεσαντο ατ, that is, “mentiti sunt ei.” Who, however, should want to put for “ei,” “eum”? I shall, forsooth, not be a party to adulterating the Scriptures. In the same: Et propitius fiet peccatis eorum et non disperdet eos. You say that “eos” does not occur in the Greek, which is true. I, however, in order to avoid a loose construction, have completed the statement according to Latin usage. If anyone, however, should think that διαφθε does not mean “perditionem,” but “corruptionem,” let him remember the place which reads: ες τ τλος μ διαφθερς, that is, “in finem ne disperdas,” and not, as most have translated erroneously, “ne corrumpas.” In the same: Et induxit eos in montem sanctificationis suæ, montem quem acquisivit dextera ejus. For this the Septuagint has the reading: ρος τοτο, κτσατο δεξα ατο — and not, as you write, κτσατο [= “founded” or “created”]⁹ —, that is, quem acquisivit dextera ejus. Thus Symmachus has translated correctly according to the Hebrew: montem quem acquisivit dextera ejus. In the same: Et averterunt se et non servaverunt pactum, quemadmodum patres eorum. I know that the word “pactum” does not occur in the Hebrew, but since all have translated in a similar way συνθησαν, and since the Greek form συνθηκη means “pactum,” the meaning of the whole [i.e. συνθησαν]⁹ is “non servaverunt pactum,” although the Septuagint has θησαν. In the same: In terra quam fundavit in sæcula, for which you say you have found: In terra fundavit eam in sæcula. The Hebrew has the following version, which also Symmachus renders the same way: ες τν γν ν θεμελωσεν ες τν ανα. If the statement, however, does not mean that the earth has been created, but something else which is supposed to have been founded on earth, let those who think so prove from the context what the meaning is, as I do not know what which is not expressed should be founded on earth. If they think, however, that a sanctuary has been founded upon the earth, the version should be: in terra fundavit illud in sæcula. In the same: Et in intellectibus manuum suarum deduxit eos. The singular ἐν τῇ συνείδει is not used here, as you say, but ἐν ταῖς συνείδεσιν, which means “intelligentias.” This idea is contained also in the Hebrew bathabunoth, which means “intellectibus.”

51. Psalm 78: Posuerunt Hierusalem in pomorum custodiam, which in the Greek means ἐν πωροφυλάκτιον and cannot be translated differently from the way I have rendered it. The word indicates a watchtower or lookout, such as the wardens of the fields and orchards were accustomed to have, so that of the extensive city hardly a cottage was left [which was not under their watchful eye].⁹ This is the sense according to the Greek. Besides, in the Hebrew lichin is written, which Aquila translated by λίθαριον, that is a pile of stones which the farmers are wont to pick from their vineyards and fields.

52. Psalm 79: Et plantasti radices ejus hinc. You say that “hinc” does not occur in the Greek. That’s all right, for it does not occur in my texts either, so that I am wondering which dunce has altered your copies.

53. Psalm 82: « Hereditate possideamus sanctuarium Dei ! », and you say that the Greek has « Κληρονομήσωμεν αὐτόν ! », that is, “possideamus nobis.” This is a useless question, for when we say “possideamus,” “nobis” is likewise included.

54. Psalm 83: Cor meum et caro mea exsultavit in deum vivum. For this you say the Greek has exsultaverunt. There is no contradiction in this, for when we read “exsultavit,” the meaning is: “cor meum exsultavit et caro mea exsultavit.” If, on the other hand, the form “exsultaverunt” is used, two exult at one and the same time, viz. the heart and the flesh. Let me request you to avoid this type of nonsense and useless questions where there is no difference in the sense. In the same: Beatus vir, cujus est auxilium abs te. You say that you have found in the Greek: cui est auxilium ejus abs te, and I am criticized, as you say, for having avoided this rendering in my Latin translation. However, who does not understand that if we should say “cui est auxilium ejus,” this would be a manifest error, and that if “cui” precedes, “ejus” cannot follow, unless I am criticized for having avoided a mistake. In the same: In valle lacrimarum, for which you say the Greek has κλαυθμύνης, that is, “plorationis.” However, it makes no difference whether we say “ploratum” or “planctum” or “fletum” or “lacrimas”; the meaning remains one and the same, so that I follow the rule that, where there is no change of sense, I write as it sounds best in Latin.

55. Psalm 84: Benedixisti, domine, terram tuam. You say that for “benedixisti” you have found in the Greek Εὐδίκησας, and you ask how that word should be expressed in Latin. If we want to quibble about words and syllables, we may say: “Bene placuit, Domine, terra tua” and, while translating words, we lose sight of the sense. At any rate, something should be added to give a proper meaning, and we might say: “Complacuit tibi, Domine, terra tua.” However, if we do this, some one might ask again why we have added “tibi,” since it is found neither in the Greek, nor in the Hebrew. However, we should always follow the rule which I have repeated so often, viz., that where there is no difference in the sense, we should translate idiomatically and use a polished language. In the same: Misericordia et veritas obviaverunt sibi. You say that “sibi” is not in the Greek. However, it is neither in the Hebrew and is given in the Septuagint under an arrow. When these signs [viz. arrow and asterisk]⁹ are omitted as superfluous, as it were, through the carelessness of most transcribers, the reader is badly led astray. If “sibi” were not added, it would be thought that pity and truth had not met each other, but someone else, nor that justice and peace had given a kiss to each other, but to somebody else.

56. Psalm 85: Et non proposuerunt te in conspectu suo. You say that “te” is not in your text. Add “te” and thus, while correcting the blunder of the transcriber, you will correct at the same time your own error. In the same: Et tu, Domine Deus, miserator et misericors. You say that you have found in the Greek: Et tu, Domine Deus meus. But “meus” is superfluous here, as it is neither in the Hebrew nor in the Septuagint.

57. Psalm 88: Magnus et horrendus, for which you say you have found in the Greek φοβερός, which means “terribilis,” “timendus,” “formidandus.” I think it means, in the above expression, just “horrendum” (not, however, as the common people think, “despiciendum” and “squalidum”), according to the following: Mihi frigidus horror, Membra quatit (Virgil. Æneid 3:29-30). and: Horror ubique animo, simul ipsa silentia terrent (Virgil. Æneid 2:755) and: Monstrum horrendum, ingens (Virgil. Æneid 3:658) as well as in many similar places. In the same: Tunc locutus es in visione sanctis tuis, for which you say you have found in the Greek filiis tuis. It is to be noted, however, that the Hebrew has here laasidach, which all have translated by τοῖς ἁγίοις σου, that is, “sanctis tuis,” except the Sixth Edition, which translates prophetis tuis, expressing the sense rather than the words. In the κοινῇ only, however, I have found “filios” for “sanctis.” In the same: Tu vero reppulisti et respexisti, for which you say you have found in the Greek ἐξουδένωσας. How big an error has resulted here from the change of one letter! — for I did not translate “respexisti,” but “despexisti et pro nihilo duxisti” — unless perchance you think that ἐξουδένωσας should not be rendered by “despexisti” but, according to the most learned translator of those times, by “annihilasti,” or “annullasti,” or “nullificasti,” or by any other word-monster which the inexpert may invent.

58. Psalm 89: A sæculo et usque in sæculum tu es, Deus, and you say that the word “Deus” is not contained in the Greek. It is clear that it is missing there, since it is in the Hebrew. Besides, all other translators and the Septuagint have the corresponding rendering: πάλαι τοῦ αἰῶνος, καὶ ἄχρι τοῦ αἰῶνος σὺ εἶ, Ὁ Θεός, which means in the Hebrew: meolam ad olam atah el. In the same: Quoniam superuenit mansuetudo, et corripiemur. You say that you have found in the Greek: Mansuetudo super nos. But “super nos” is superfluous.

59. Psalm 90: Dicet Domino, « Susceptor meus es tu », and you say that in the Greek text “es” does not occur. But let me reply to you that in the Hebrew neither “es” occurs nor “tu,” but that the Septuagint and the Latin texts use these words idiomatically.

60. Psalm 93: Beatus homo quem tu erudieris, Domine. You say that in the Greek “tu” does not occur, which is true. The Latin texts, however, use it idiomatically. For if we say: “Beatus homo quem erudieris, Domine,” the rendering does not sound so well. And when we say “Domine,” addressing the Lord, the sense is not perverted by the addition of “tu.” In the same: Et in malitia eorum disperdet eos. You say that the preposition “in” is absent from the Greek, and that the reading is: Malitiam eorum disperdet. It is to be noted, however, that both the Hebrew and all the translators have: In malitia eorum disperdet eos. But if we should want to read “Malitiam eorum disperdet,” then the word “eos,” which follows in the Septuagint at the end of the verse, would be superfluous and wrong.

61. Psalm 97: Recordatus est misericordiæ suæ, for which you say you have found in the Greek: Misericordiæ suæ Jacob. However, the name “Jacob” is superfluous here.

62. Psalm 100: Oculi mei ad fideles terræ, ut sederent mecum, for which you say you have found in the Greek: το σὺγκαθῆσθαι αὐτὸς μετ’ ἐμοῦ. Who, however, would not avoid such a translation that, rendering verbatim, he would say: “Ut consederent ipsi mecum ?”

63. Psalm 101: Vigilavi et factus sum sicut passer solitarius in tecto. You say you have found in the Greek π δμᾱτι, which the ancient Latin texts have rendered by in ædificio. Δμᾱ has in the regions of the Orient the same meaning as “tectum” in Latin; for in Palestine and Egypt, where the Divine Books were either written or translated, the roofs have no tops but δμᾱτα, which at Rome are called either “solaria” or “Mæniana,” that is, flat roofs which are supported by transverse beams. Further, when Peter in the Acts of the Apostles ascended unto the δμᾱ, he is to be believed to have ascended to the roof of the building, and when we are told to put a “coronam” on our δμᾱτι, it means that we should place a railing around it in order to avoid falling down. Likewise in the Gospel the statement, Quæ, says he, auditis in aure, dicite super δμᾱτα, means on the roof. The same in Isaiah: Quid vobis est, quod omnes ascendistis in tecta vana ? ; and in many other similar places. In the same: Factus sum sicut νυκτικῶραξ in domicilio, which is expressed in the same way in the Greek, and you ask what the word νυκτικῶραξ means in Latin. In the Hebrew the word “bos” is written for “nycticorace.” This Aquila, the Septuagint, Theodotion and the Fifth Edition have translated by “nycticoracem,” Symmachus “upupam,” the Sixth Edition by “noctuam,” which I, too, rather follow. Further, where in the Latin and Greek the reading: Factus sum sicut νυκτικῶραξ in domicilio, occurs, the Hebrew says: Factus sum sicut noctua in ruinosi. The majority think the word “bubonem” to have an ambiguous meaning. In the same: A facie iræ et indignationis tuæ. For this you say you have found in the Greek: A facie iræ tuæ, although it is clear that both the Hebrew and the Septuagint have the following version: π προσπὸν τῶ ργῶ σου καὶ τὸ θυμὸ σου. In the same: Quoniam placuerunt servis tuis lapides ejus, et terræ ejus miserebuntur. For “terra” the word afar is used in the Hebrew, which all have translated by χον, and which may mean either “pulvis” or “humus,” that is, “terra.”

64. Psalm 102: Non in perpetuo irascetur, for which you say you have found in the Greek: Non in finem. However, the Hebrew word nese may mean either “perpetuum” or “finis” or “victoria,” depending upon the context.

65. Psalm 103: Qui facis angelos tuos spiritus, for which you say you have found in the Greek: ποιῶν τοὺς ἁγγέλους αὐτόν, that is, Qui facit angelos suos. In this connection examine why, since God is being addressed, the prophet suddenly changes, as though talking to some one else, especially as he begins thus: Domine, Deus meus, magnificatus es vehementer. Confessionem et decorem induisti, and: Qui tegis in aquis superiora ejus — that is to say, of the sky — Qui ponis nubem ascensum tuum, qui ambulas super pennas ventorum ; and then immediately continues: Qui facis angelos tuos spiritus, et ministros tuos ignem urentem. Qui fundasti terram super stabilitatem suam; and a little further: Ab increpatione tua fugient ; a voce tonitru tui formidabunt; and: In loco quem fundasti eis. Qui emittis fontes in convallibus; and then: Ut educas panem de terra. If, thus, all this is addressed to the Second Person — that is, to God —, why is in one verse the Third Person suddenly and without connection introduced? In the same: A voce tonitru tui formidabunt. The Hebrew, too, has here tonitru tui, so that I am wondering how it has been omitted in the Latin texts through an error of the transcribers. In the same: Hoc mare magnum et spatiosum manibus. You say that in the Greek the word “manibus” is lacking. I know it, but it has been added in the Septuagint under an asterisk from the Hebrew and Theodotion’s edition. Furthermore, the Hebrew also has this reading: ze haïam gadol uarab idaim, which Aquila has translated thus: ἀλλὰ καὶ πλατεῖα χερσίν, while all translators say, according to the Hebrew text, metaphorically: ἀτὴ θάλασσα μεγάλη καὶ ἐρηχὼρος χερσίν, as though the sea with outstretched hands were taking everything unto itself. In the same: Ut educas panem de terra, for which you say you have found: Ut educat. However, one thing cannot be addressed to God, and the other said about him. The prophet either addresses everything to God, or he says it to some one else about him. Since, however, the larger part is addressed to God, also the doubtful portions are to be addressed to his person. In the same: Herodii domus dux est eorum. For “herodio” [“heron”],⁹ which in the Hebrew is asida, Symmachus uses κτηνᾶ, that is, “milvum” [“kite”].⁹ I, too, have translated thus into the Latin: Ibi aves nidificabunt ; milvi abies domus est, viz., because it is accustomed to build its nest always in high and inaccessible trees. Hence the Sixth Edition translates with greater clarity yet: Milvo cupressi ad nidificandum. The Hebrew, however, uses for “abietibus” and “cupressis” barusim, which means “abietes” rather than κυπαρίσσους. In the same: Petra refugium erinaciis [“hedgehogs”],⁹ for which the Hebrew has sphannim, and all have used the similar form τοῖς χοιρογρυλλοῖς [“porcupines”],⁹ excepting the Septuagint, which uses “lepores” [“hares,” “rabbits”].⁹ It is to be noted, however, that reference is had to an animal not larger than the hedgehog, which has characteristics of both the mouse and the bear, for which reason it is called in Palestine ῥκτμς [“marmot”].⁹ These animals are very abundant in those regions and are wont to live in recesses of rocks or in holes in the ground.

66. Psalm 104: Dedit terra eorum ranas, for which you say you have read in the Greek ἐξήρπεν, which may be translated thus: “Ebullivit terra eorum ranas.” However, in this there is no difference of meaning either, so that I, following the ancient version, did not want to change what was not wrong. In the same: Et contrivit lignum finium eorum, for which you say you have found in the Greek: omne lignum. But here “omne” has been added and is superfluous. In the same: Quoniam memor fuit verbi sancti sui, quod habuit ad Abraham, puerum suum, for which you say you have found in the Greek ἐν διέθετο, that is, quod disposuit. The Hebrew and the Septuagint, however, have the following reading: μνησθη τοῦ λόγου τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ αὐτοῦ, τοῦ πατρὸς βράμ τὸν δόλον αὐτοῦ. Hence the Greek words ἐν διέθετο are wrong in this place and should be erased.

67. Psalm 105: Confitemini Domino, quoniam bonus, for which you say you have found in the Greek: Quoniam χρηστς, that is, suavis. It is to be noted, however, that χρηστς may be translated either by “bonum” or by “suave.” Furthermore, the Hebrew also has the reading: chi tob, which all have translated similarly: quia bonus, from which it is clear that also χρηστς is meant to stand for “bonus.” In the same: Non fuerunt memores multitudinis misericordiae tuæ. You say that you have found in the Greek: Et non fuerunt memores. But the conjunction “et” is superfluous. In the same: Et irritaverunt ascendentes in mare, Mare Rubrum, for which you say you have found in the Greek: καὶ παραπικράναν, and you think that the expression has to be translated literally: “et amaricaverunt.” But this rendering is similar to “annullationi” or “annihilationi.”¹⁵ Read Ezechiel and you will find that παραπικράσµς always stands for “irritationem et exacerbationem” where the expression οίκος παραπικρῶν, that is, domus exasperans, occurs. In the same: Et vidit, quum tribularentur, et audivit orationem eorum. What you say you have found in the Greek besides this is superfluous.

68. Psalm 106: Et statuit procellam ejus in auram et siluerunt fluctus ejus. What you say you have found in the Greek for this, viz.: καὶ πέτμησεν τὴν καταιγίδι αὐτῆς, καὶ ἐστη ἐξ αὐρᾶν, is wrong. In the same: Et deduxit eos in portum voluntatis eorum. For this you say you have found: In portum voluntatis suæ. However, the Hebrew does not have ephsau, which means “voluntatis suæ,” but ephsam, which stands for “voluntatis eorum.”

69. Psalm 107: Exsurge, gloria mea. What you say does not occur in the Latin is rightly not in this Psalm, because it is neither found in the Hebrew, nor in any translation, but is contained in the 56th Psalm, and it seems to me that somebody has transferred it from that place to this. In the same: Mihi alienigenæ amici facti sunt. For this you say you have found in the Greek πετγησαν, that is, “subditi sunt.” This, however, occurs in the 59th Psalm. In the present Psalm, however, we find in all translations the reading: μοῖς ἄλλοφυλοι φίλασαν, which means: amici facti sunt, and is expressed in the Hebrew by ethrohe.

70. Psalm 109: Virgam virtutis tuæ emittet Dominus e Sion. You say that “virtutis tuæ” does not occur in your Greek texts. It occurs, however, evidently in the Hebrew and in the Septuagint. In the same: Dominare in medio inimicorum tuorum. You say that the Greek has: et dominare. But the conjunction “et” is neither in the Hebrew nor in the Septuagint and is superfluous.

71. Psalm 110: Confitebor tibi, Domine, in toto corde. In the Greek you say you have found: in toto corde meo. But “meo,” too, is here superfluous.

72. Psalm 113: Deus autem noster in cælo, for which you say you have read in the Greek: in cælo et in terra. But the addition “et in terra” is superfluous.

73. Psalm 114: Et in diebus meis invocabo te. You say that “te” is not in the Greek, and that’s all right. Hence it should be erased from your copies. In the same: Placebo Domino in regione vivorum, for which you say you have read in the Greek: Placebo in conspectu Domini. But this is wrong.

74. Psalm 117: Et in nomine Domini, quia ultus sum in eos. You say that “quia” is not found in the Greek texts. It should be added, however, in the Latin copies under an asterisk.

75. Psalm 118: Et meditabar in mandatis tuis quæ dilexi. You say that in the Greek the word vehementer is added. But this is superfluous. In the same: Levavi manus meas ad mandata tua quæ dilexi. You say that you have read in the Greek, “ad mandata tua quæ dilexi [vehementer]”¹²; but “vehementer” is superfluous. In the same: Cogitavi vias meas. You say that you have read in the Greek, “[juxta]¹² vias tuas,” but “juxta” is superfluous and “meas” is more correct. In the same: Et verti pedes meos in testimonia tua. You say you have read in the Greek, “et averti”; but the prefix is superfluous. In the same: Ego autem in toto corde scrutabor mandata tua. You say that you have read in the Greek, “in toto corde meo”; but “meo” is superfluous here. In the same: anima mea in manibus meis semper ; et legem tuam non sum oblitus. For this you say you have read in the Greek, “Anima mea in manibus tuis semper.” It is to be noted, however, that the Hebrew the Septuagint and all other translators have here “in manibus meis,” and not “in manibus tuis,” which is in the Hebrew bachaffi. All ecclesiastical writers among the Greeks interpret this place that way, and its sense is briefly the following: “I am daily in danger and hold my life, as it were, in my very hands, and yet I do not forget your law.” In the same: Exitus aquarum deduxerunt oculi mei, quia non custodierunt legem tuam. For this you say you have read in the Greek, “quia non custodivi legem tuam.” But this is wrong because also the Hebrew text has: Rivi aquarum fluebant de oculis meis, quia non custodierunt legem tuam. In the same: Pronuntiabit lingua mea eloquium tuum. You say that you have read in the Greek for “pronuntiabit” φησὶ γέται, which word means either “pronuntiabit,” “effabitur,” or “loquetur,” as these are synonymous. Finally, from the Hebrew I have also translated thus: Loquetur lingua mea sermonem tuum.

76. Psalm 119: Domine, libera animam meam a labiis iniquis, a lingua dolosa. You say you have read in the Greek, “et a lingua dolosa”; but “et” is superfluous.

77. Psalm 126: Beatus vir qui implebit desiderium suum ex ipsis. You say that in your Greek text the word “vir” does not occur. It is, however, clearly expressed in both the Hebrew and the Septuagint.

78. Psalm 129: Propter legem tuam sustinui te, Domine. You say that you have found in the Greek: Propter nomen tuum. I confess that a number of texts have that reading. But since we are investigating the truth, we simply must adhere to what we find in the Hebrew. And there we find for “nomine” or “lege” the word thira, which Aquila translates by φόβον, that is, “timorem,” Symmachus and Theodotion by νόμον, that is “legem,” thinking, as they did, that the Hebrew had the word thora on account of the similarity between jod { ה } and waw { ו }, which differ only in size. The Fifth Edition has “terrorem,” the Sixth “verbum.”

79. Psalm 131: Sicut juravit Domino, votum vovit Deo Jacob. You say that you have found in the Greek, for my rendering “votum vovit,” the form ηξάτο, and you think that I should have translated “oravit”! This, however, is wrong, for εχ means either “orationem” or “votum,” according to the context, as in: Redde Deo vota tua, that is: τες εχς σου.

80. Psalm 135: Qui fecit luminaria magna. You say that you have found in the Greek: magna solus. But “solus” has been added from a preceding verse, where we read: Qui fecit mirabilia magna solus. Hence you should insert it there and omit it here as superfluous.

81. Psalm 137: Quoniam magnificasti super omne, nomen sanctum tuum. You say that you have found in the Greek: super omnes. The Septuagint, however, has: τι μεγαλυνας π πν τ νομα τ γν σου, as I, too, have translated into the Latin. Besides, remember that the Hebrew has this reading: Quia magnificasti super omne nomen tuum, Verbum tuum. According to the Latin version, however, the meaning is: “Quoniam magnificasti super omne nomen” — that is, above everything that may be called holy in Heaven and on earth — “filium tuum.”

82. Psalm 138: Quia non est sermo in lingua mea. For this you say you have read in the Greek: Quia non est dolus in lingua mea. But only the Sixth Edition has this reading. Besides, both the Septuagint and all translators and the very Hebrew text have either λαλι or λγον, that is, “eloquium” and “verbum.” The Hebrew word in question is mala.

83. Psalm 139: Funes extenderunt in laqueum. For this you say the Greek has: Funes extenderunt laqueum pedibus meis. But that is wrong in this place. In the same: You say that you have found in the Greek, for “Habitabunt recti cum vultu tuo,” the reading: Et habitabunt. But the conjunction “et” is superfluous here.

84. Psalm 140: Dissipata sunt ossa nostra secus infernum, for which you say you have read in the Greek: ossa eorum. That reading, however, is wrong, too.

85. Psalm 146: Nec in tibiis viri beneplacitum erit ei. You say that for “ei” you have read “Domino,” which does not occur.

86. And since you are asking at the end of your missive, and my holy son Avitus likewise has requested me often, how certain Greek words should be translated, I shall note these briefly. Νεομηνια is the beginning of the month, which in Latin we may properly call “kalendas.” However, since the Hebrews calculate the month on the basis of the revolution of the moon around the earth, and since the Greeks call the moon μνη, νεομηνια means, as it were, “new moon”; ερημος means “desertum” or “solitudinem”; θρονος signifies “sedem” or “solium,” νυκτικραξ, as I have said already,¹⁶ “noctuam”; κυνμυα is wrongly written with the Greek letter υ and consequently translated by the Latins as “musca canina,” whereas it should be written, according to the Hebrew, with the diphthong οι, so that the form becomes κοινμυα, which means “omne muscarum genus”; this Aquila translated by πανμικτον, that is, “omnimodam muscam.” Finally, the word λαξευτηριον, which has been rendered into the Latin by “asciam,” I consider a type of tool with which stone is worked. Thus, translating from the Hebrew, I said: Et nunc sculpturas ejus pariter bipenne et dolatoriis deraserunt. Hence λαξευτηριον may be rendered by “dolatorium.”

Letters - letter_107

Letter 107. To Laeta.

Laeta, the daughter-in-law of Paula, having written from Rome to ask Jerome how she ought to bring up her infant daughter (also called Paula) as a virgin consecrated to Christ, Jerome now instructs her in detail as to the child's training and education. Feeling some doubt, however, as to whether the scheme proposed by him will be practicable at Rome, he advises Laeta in case of difficulty to send Paula to Bethlehem where she will be under the care of her grandmother and aunt, the eider Paula and Eustochium. Laeta subsequently accepted Jerome's advice and sent the child to Bethlehem where she eventually succeeded Eustochium as head of the nunnery rounded by her grandmother. The date of the letter is 403 a.d.

1. The apostle Paul writing to the Corinthians and instructing in sacred discipline a church still untaught in Christ has among other commandments laid down also this: "The woman which hath an husband that believeth not, and if he be pleased to dwell with her, let her not leave him. For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife, and the unbelieving wife is sanctified by the believing husband; else were your children unclean but now are they holy."¹ Should any person have supposed hitherto that the bonds of discipline are too far relaxed and that too great indulgence is conceded by the teacher, let him look at the house of your father, a man of the highest distinction and learning, but one still walking in darkness; and he will perceive as the result of the apostle's counsel sweet fruit growing from a bitter stock and precious balsams exhaled from common canes. You yourself are the offspring of a mixed marriage; but the parents of Paula-you and my friend Toxotius-are both Christians. Who could have believed that to the heathen pontiff Albinus should be born-in answer to a mother's vows-a Christian granddaughter; that a delighted grandfather should hear from the little one's faltering lips Christ's Alleluia, and that in his old age he should nurse in his bosom one of God's own virgins? Our expectations have been fully gratified. The one unbeliever is sanctified by his holy and believing family. For, when a man is surrounded by a believing crowd of children and grandchildren, he is as good as a candidate for the faith. I for my part think that, had he possessed so many Christian kinsfolk when he was a young man, he might then have been brought to believe in Christ. For though he may spit upon my letter and laugh at it, and though he may call me a fool or a madman, his son-in-law did the same before he came to believe. Christians are not born but made. For all its gilding the Capitol is beginning to look dingy. Every temple in Rome is covered with soot and cobwebs. The city is stirred to its depths and the people pour past their half-ruined shrines to visit the tombs of the martyrs. The belief which has not been accorded to conviction may come to be extorted by very shame.

2. I speak thus to you, Laeta my most devout daughter in Christ, to teach you not to despair of your father's salvation. My hope is that the same faith which has gained you your daughter may win your father too, and that so you may be able to rejoice over blessings bestowed upon your entire family. You know the Lord's promise: "The things which are impossible with men are possible with God." [Luke 18:27] It is never too late to mend. The robber passed even from the cross to paradise. [Cf. Luke 23:42, Luke 23:43] Nebuchadnezzar also, the king of Babylon, recovered his reason, even after he had been made like the beasts in body and in heart and had been compelled to live with the brutes in the wilderness. [Dan. 4:33-37] And to pass over such old stories which to unbelievers may well seem incredible, did not your own kinsman Gracchus whose name betokens his patrician origin, when a few years back he held the prefecture of the City, overthrow, break in pieces, and shake to pieces the grotto of Mithras² and all the dreadful images therein? Those I mean by which the worshippers were initiated as Raven, Bridegroom, Soldier, Lion, Perseus, Sun, Crab, and Father? Did he not, I repeat, destroy these and then, sending them before him as hostages, obtain for himself Christian baptism?

Even in Rome itself paganism is left in solitude. They who once were the gods of the nations remain under their lonely roofs with horned-owls and birds of night. The standards of the military are emblazoned with the sign of the Cross. The emperor's robes of purple and his diadem sparkling with jewels are ornamented with representations of the shameful yet saving gibbet. Already the Egyptian Serapis has been made a Christian;³ while at Gaza Marnas⁴ mourns in confinement and every moment expects to see his temple overturned. From India, from Persia, from Ethiopia we daily welcome monks in crowds. The Armenian bowman has laid aside his quiver, the Huns learn the psalter, the chilly Scythians are warmed with the glow of the faith. The Getae,⁵ ruddy and yellow-haired, carry tent-churches about with their armies: and perhaps their success in fighting against us may be due to the fact that they believe in the same religion.

3. I have nearly wandered into a new subject, and while I have kept my wheel going, my hands have been moulding a flagon when it has been my object to frame an ewer.⁶ For, in answer to your prayers and those of the saintly Marcella, I wish to address you as a mother and to instruct you how to bring up our dear Paula, who has been consecrated to Christ before her birth and vowed to His service before her conception. Thus in our own day we have seen repeated the story told us in the Prophets,⁷ of Hannah, who though at first barren afterwards became fruitful. You have exchanged a fertility bound up with sorrow for offspring which shall never die. For I am confident that having given to the Lord your first-born you will be the mother of sons. It is the first-born that is offered under the Law. [Ex. 13:2] Samuel and Samson are both instances of this, as is also John the Baptist who when Mary came in leaped for joy. [Luke 1:41] For he heard the Lord speaking by the mouth of the Virgin and desired to break from his mother's womb to meet Him. As then Paula has been born in answer to a promise, her parents should give her a training suitable to her birth. Samuel, as you know, was nurtured in the Temple, and John was trained in the wilderness. The first as a Nazarite wore his hair long, drank neither wine nor strong drink, and even in his childhood talked with God. The second shunned cities, wore a leathern girdle, and had for his meat locusts and wild honey. [Matt. 3:4] Moreover, to typify that penitence which he was to preach, he was clothed in the spoils of the hump-backed camel.⁸

4. Thus must a soul be educated which is to be a temple of God. It must learn to hear nothing and to say nothing but what belongs to the fear of God. It must have no understanding of unclean words, and no knowledge of the world's songs. Its tongue must be steeped while still tender in the sweetness of the psalms. Boys with their wanton thoughts must be kept from Paula: even her maids and female attendants must be separated from worldly associates. For if they have learned some mischief they may teach more. Get for her a set of letters made of boxwood or of ivory and called each by its proper name. Let her play with these, so that even her play may teach her something. And not only make her grasp the right order of the letters and see that she forms their names into a rhyme, but constantly disarrange their order and put the last letters in the middle and the middle ones at the beginning that she may know them all by sight as well as by sound. Moreover, so soon as she begins to use the style upon the wax, and her hand is still faltering, either guide her soft fingers by laying your hand upon hers, or else have simple copies cut upon a tablet; so that her efforts confined within these limits may keep to the lines traced out for her and not stray outside of these. Offer prizes for good spelling and draw her onwards with little gifts such as children of her age delight in. And let her have companions in her lessons to excite emulation in her, that she may be stimulated when she sees them praised. You must not scold her if she is slow to learn but must employ praise to excite her mind, so that she may be glad when she excels others and sorry when she is excelled by them. Above all you must take care not to make her lessons distasteful to her lest a dislike for them conceived in childhood may continue into her maturer years. The very words which she tries bit by bit to put together and to pronounce ought not to be chance ones, but names specially fixed upon and heaped together for the purpose, those for example of the prophets or the apostles or the list of patriarchs from Adam downwards as it is given by Matthew and Luke. In this way while her tongue will be well-trained, her memory will be likewise developed. Again, you must choose for her a master of approved years, life, and learning. A man of culture will not, I think, blush to do for a kinswoman or a highborn virgin what Aristotle did for Philip's son when, descending to the level of an usher, he consented to teach him his letters.⁹ Things must not be despised as of small account in the absence of which great results cannot be achieved. The very rudiments and first beginnings of knowledge sound differently in the mouth of an educated man and of an uneducated. Accordingly you must see that the child is not led away by the silly coaxing of women to form a habit of shortening long words or of decking herself with gold and purple. Of these habits one will spoil her conversation and the other her character. She must not therefore learn as a child what afterwards she will have to unlearn. The eloquence of the Gracchi is said to have been largely due to the way in which from their earliest years their mother spoke to them.¹⁰ Hortensius¹¹ became an orator while still on his father's lap. Early impressions are hard to eradicate from the mind. When once wool has been dyed purple who can restore it to its previous whiteness? An unused jar long retains the taste and smell of that with which it is first filled. [Horace, Epist. I. 2:69] Grecian history tells us that the imperious Alexander who was lord of the whole world could not rid himself of the tricks of manner and gait which in his childhood he had caught from his governor Leonides.¹² We are always ready to imitate what is evil; and faults are quickly copied where virtues appear inattainable. Paula's nurse must not be intemperate, or loose, or given to gossip. Her bearer must be respectable, and her foster-father of grave demeanour. When she sees her grandfather, she must leap upon his breast, put her arms round his neck, and, whether he likes it or not, sing Alleluia in his ears. She may be fondled by her grandmother, may smile at her father to shew that she recognizes him, and may so endear herself to everyone, as to make the whole family rejoice in the possession of such a rosebud. She should be told at once whom she has for her other grandmother and whom for her aunt; and she ought also to learn in what army it is that she is enrolled as a recruit, and what Captain it is under whose banner she is called to serve. Let her long to be with the absent ones and encourage her to make playful threats of leaving you for them.

5. Let her very dress and garb remind her to Whom she is promised. Do not pierce her ears or paint her face consecrated to Christ with white lead or rouge. Do not hang gold or pearls about her neck or load her head with jewels, or by reddening her hair make it suggest the fires of gehenna. Let her pearls be of another kind and such that she may sell them hereafter and buy in their place the pearl that is "of great price." [Matt. 13:46] In days gone by a lady of rank, Praetextata by name, at the bidding of her husband Hymettius, the uncle of Eustochium, altered that virgin's dress and appearance and arranged her neglected hair after the manner of the world, desiring to overcome the resolution of the virgin herself and the expressed wishes of her mother. But lo in the same night it befell her that an angel came to her in her dreams. With terrible looks he menaced punishment and broke silence with these words, 'Have you presumed to put your husband's commands before those of Christ? Have you presumed to lay sacrilegious hands upon the head of one who is God's virgin? Those hands shall forthwith wither that you may know by torment what you have done, and at the end of five months you shall be carried off to hell.¹³ And farther, if you persist still in your wickedness, you shall be bereaved both of your husband and of your children.' All of which came to pass in due time, a speedy death marking the penitence too long delayed of the unhappy woman. So terribly does Christ punish those who violate His temple, [Cf. 1 Cor. 3:17] and so jealously does He defend His precious jewels. I have related this story here not from any desire to exult over the misfortunes of the unhappy, but to warn you that you must with much fear and carefulness keep the vow which you have made to God.

6. We read of Eli the priest that he became displeasing to God on account of the sins of his children; [1 Sam. 2:27-36] and we are told that a man may not be made a bishop if his sons are loose and disorderly. [1 Tim. 3:4] On the other hand it is written of the woman that "she shall be saved in childbearing, if they continue in faith and charity and holiness with chastity."¹⁴ If then parents are responsible for their children when these are of ripe age and independent; how much more must they be responsible for them when, still unweaned and weak, they cannot, in the Lord's words, "discern between their right hand and their left:" [Jon. 4:11] -when, that is to say, they cannot yet distinguish good from evil? If you take precautions to save your daughter from the bite of a viper, why are you not equally careful to shield her from "the hammer of the whole earth"?¹⁵ to prevent her from drinking of the golden cup of Babylon? to keep her from going out with Dinah to see the daughters of a strange land?¹⁶ to save her from the tripping dance and from the trailing robe? No one administers drugs till he has rubbed the rim of the cup with honey;¹⁷ so, the better to deceive us, vice puts on the mien and the semblance of virtue. Why then, you will say, do we read:-"the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son," but "the soul that sinneth it shall die"? [Ezek. 18:20] The passage, I answer, refers to those who have discretion, such as he of whom his parents said in the gospel:-"he is of age ...he shall speak for himself." [John 9:21] While the son is a child and thinks as a child and until he comes to years of discretion to choose between the two roads to which the letter of Pythagoras points,¹⁸ his parents are responsible for his actions whether these be good or bad. But perhaps you imagine that, if they are not baptized, the children of Christians are liable for their own sins; and that no guilt attaches to parents who withhold from baptism those who by reason of their tender age can offer no objection to it. The truth is that, as baptism ensures the salvation of the child, this in turn brings advantage to the parents. Whether you would offer your child or not lay within your choice, but now that you have offered her, you neglect her at your peril. I speak generally for in your case you have no discretion, having offered your child even before her conception. He who offers a victim that is lame or maimed or marked with any blemish is held guilty of sacrilege. [Deut. 15:21] How much more then shall she be punished who makes ready for the embraces of the king a portion of her own body and the purity of a stainless soul, and then proves negligent of this her offering?

7. When Paula comes to be a little older and to increase like her Spouse in wisdom and stature and in favour with God and man, [Luke 2:52] let her go with her parents to the temple of her true Father but let her not come out of the temple with them. Let them seek her upon the world's highway amid the crowds and the throng of their kinsfolk, and let them find her nowhere but in the shrine of the scriptures, [Cf. Luke 2:43-46] questioning the prophets and the apostles on the meaning of that spiritual marriage to which she is vowed. Let her imitate the retirement of Mary whom Gabriel found alone in her chamber and who was frightened, [Luke 1:29] it would appear, by seeing a man there. Let the child emulate her of whom it is written that "the king's daughter is all glorious within." [Ps. 45:13] Wounded with love's arrow let her say to her beloved, "the king hath brought me into his chambers." [Cant. 1:4] At no time let her go abroad, lest the watchmen find her that go about the city, and lest they smite and wound her and take away from her the veil of her chastity, [Cant. 5:7] and leave her naked in her blood. [Cf. Ezek. 16:1-10] Nay rather when one knocketh at her door [Cant. 5:2] let her say: "I am a wall and my breasts like towers. [Cant. 8:10] I have washed my feet; how shall I defile them?" [Cant. 5:3]

8. Let her not take her food with others, that is, at her parents' table; test she see dishes she may long for. Some, I know, hold it a greater virtue to disdain a pleasure which is actually before them, but I think it a safer self-restraint to shun what must needs attract you. Once as a boy at school I met the words: 'It is ill blaming what you allow to become a habit.'¹⁹ Let her learn even now not to drink wine "wherein is excess." [Eph. 5:18] But as, before children come to a robust age, abstinence is dangerous and trying to their tender frames, let her have baths if she require them, and let her take a little wine for her stomach's sake. [1 Tim. 5:23] Let her also be supported on a flesh diet, lest her feet fail her before they commence to run their course. But I say this by way of concession not by way of command; because I fear to weaken her, not because I wish to teach her self-indulgence. Besides why should not a Christian virgin do wholly what others do in part? The superstitious Jews reject certain animals and products as articles of food, while among the Indians the Brahmans and among the Egyptians the Gymnosophists subsist altogether on porridge, rice, and apples. If mere glass repays so much labour, must not a pearl be worth more labour still?²⁰ Paula has been born in response to a vow. Let her life be as the lives of those who were born under the same conditions. If the grace accorded is in both cases the same, the pains bestowed ought to be so too. Let her be deaf to the sound of the organ, and not know even the uses of the pipe, the lyre, and the cithern.

9. And let it be her task daily to bring to you the flowers which she has culled from scripture. Let her learn by heart so many verses in the Greek, but let her be instructed in the Latin also. For, if the tender lips are not from the first shaped to this, the tongue is spoiled by a foreign accent and its native speech debased by alien elements. You must yourself be her mistress, a model on which she may form her childish conduct. Never either in you nor in her father let her see what she cannot imitate without sin. Remember both of you that you are the parents of a consecrated virgin, and that your example will teach her more than your precepts. Flowers are quick to fade and a baleful wind soon withers the violet, the lily, and the crocus. Let her never appear in public unless accompanied by you. Let her never visit a church or a martyr's shrine unless with her mother. Let no young man greet her with smiles; no dandy with curled hair pay compliments to her. If our little virgin goes to keep solemn eves and all-night vigils, let her not stir a hair's breadth from her mother's side. She must not single out one of her maids to make her a special favourite or a confidante. What she says to one all ought to know. Let her choose for a companion not a handsome well-dressed girl, able to warble a song with liquid notes but one pale and serious, sombrely attired and with the hue of melancholy. Let her take as her model some aged virgin of approved faith, character, and chastity, apt to instruct her by word and by example. She ought to rise at night to recite prayers and psalms; to sing hymns in the morning; at the third, sixth, and ninth hours to take her place in the line to do battle for Christ; and, lastly, to kindle her lamp and to offer her evening sacrifice.²¹ In these occupations let her pass the day, and when night comes let it find her still engaged in them. Let reading follow prayer with her, and prayer again succeed to reading. Time will seem short when employed on tasks so many and so varied.

10. Let her learn too how to spin wool, to hold the distaff, to put the basket in her lap, to turn the spinning wheel and to shape the yarn with her thumb. Let her put away with disdain silken fabrics, Chinese fleeces,²² and gold brocades: the clothing which she makes for herself should keep out the cold and not expose the body which it professes to cover. Let her food be herbs and wheaten bread²³ with now and then one or two small fishes. And that I may not waste more time in giving precepts for the regulation of appetite (a subject I have treated more at length elsewhere)²⁴ let her meals always leave her hungry and able on the moment to begin reading or chanting. I strongly disapprove-especially for those of tender years-of long and immoderate fasts in which week is added to week and even oil and apples are forbidden as food. I have learned by experience that the ass toiling along the high way makes for an inn when it is weary.²⁵ Our abstinence may turn to gluttony, like that of the worshippers of Isis and of Cybele who gobble up pheasants and turtle-doves piping hot that their teeth may not violate the gifts of Ceres.²⁶ If perpetual fasting is allowed, it must be so regulated that those who have a long journey before them may hold out all through; and we must take care that we do not, after starting well, fall halfway. However in Lent, as I have written before now, those who practise self-denial should spread every stitch of canvas, and the charioteer should for once slacken the reins and increase the speed of his horses. Yet there will be one rule for those who live in the world and another for virgins and monks. The layman in Lent consumes the coats of his stomach, and living like a snail on his own juices makes ready a paunch for rich foods and feasting to come. But with the virgin and the monk the case is different; for, when these give the rein to their steeds, they have to remember that for them the race knows of no intermission. An effort made only for a limited time may well be severe, but one that has no such limit must be more moderate. For whereas in the first case we can recover our breath when the race is over, in the last we have to go on continually and without stopping.

11. When you go a short way into the country, do not leave your daughter behind you. Leave her no power or capacity of living without you, and let her feel frightened when she is left to herself. Let her not converse with people of the world or associate with virgins indifferent to their vows. Let her not be present at the weddings of your slaves and let her take no part in the noisy games of the household. As regards the use of the bath, I know that some are content with saying that a Christian virgin should not bathe along with eunuchs or with married women, with the former because they are still men. at all events in mind, and with the latter because women with child offer a revolting spectacle. For myself, however, I wholly disapprove of baths for a virgin of full age. Such an one should blush and feel overcome at the idea of seeing herself undressed. By vigils and fasts she mortifies her body and brings it into subjection. By a cold chastity she seeks to put out the flame of lust and to quench the hot desires of youth. And by a deliberate squalor she makes haste to spoil her natural good looks. Why, then, should she add fuel to a sleeping fire by taking baths?

12. Let her treasures be not silks or gems but manuscripts of the holy scriptures; and in these let her think less of gilding, and Babylonian parchment, and arabesque patterns,²⁷ than of correctness and accurate punctuation. Let her begin by learning the psalter, and then let her gather rules of life out of the proverbs of Solomon. From the Preacher let her gain the habit of despising the world and its vanities.²⁸ Let her follow the example set in Job of virtue and of patience. Then let her pass on to the gospels never to be laid aside when once they have been taken in hand. Let her also drink in with a willing heart the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles. As soon as she has enriched the storehouse of her mind with these treasures, let her commit to memory the prophets, the heptateuch,²⁹ the books of Kings and of Chronicles, the rolls also of Ezra and Esther. When she has done all these she may safely read the Song of Songs but not before: for, were she to read it at the beginning, she would fail to perceive that, though it is written in fleshly words, it is a marriage song of a spiritual bridal. And not understanding this she would suffer hurt from it. Let her avoid all apocryphal writings, and if she is led to read such not by the truth of the doctrines which they contain but out of respect for the miracles contained in them; let her understand that they are not really written by those to whom they are ascribed, that many faulty elements have been introduced into them, and that it requires infinite discretion to look for gold in the midst of dirt. Cyprian's writings let her have always in her hands. The letters of Athanasius³⁰ and the treatises of Hilary³¹ she may go through without fear of stumbling. Let her take pleasure in the works and wits of all in whose books a due regard for the faith is not neglected. But if she reads the works of others let it be rather to judge them than to follow them.

13. You will answer, 'How shall I, a woman of the world, living at Rome, surrounded by a crowd, be able to observe all these injunctions?' In that case do not undertake a burthen to which you are not equal. When you have weaned Paula as Isaac was weaned and when you have clothed her as Samuel was clothed, send her to her grandmother and aunt; give up this most precious of gems, to be placed in Mary's chamber and to rest in the cradle where the infant Jesus cried. Let her be brought up in a monastery, let her be one amid companies of virgins, let her learn to avoid swearing, let her regard lying as sacrilege, let her be ignorant of the world, let her live the angelic life, while in the flesh let her be without the flesh, and let her suppose that all human beings are like herself. To say nothing of its other advantages this course will free you from the difficult task of minding her, and from the responsibility of guardianship. It is better to regret her absence than to be for ever trembling for her. For you cannot but tremble as you watch what she says and to whom she says it, to whom she bows and whom she likes best to see. Hand her over to Eustochium while she is still but an infant and her every cry is a prayer for you. She will thus become her companion in holiness now as well as her successor hereafter. Let her gaze upon and love, let her "from her earliest years admire"³² one whose language and gait and dress are an education in virtue. [Comp. Ecclus. 19:30] Let her sit in the lap of her grandmother, and let this latter repeat to her granddaughter the lessons that she once bestowed upon her own child. Long experience has shewn Paula how to rear, to preserve, and to instruct virgins; and daily inwoven in her crown is the mystic century which betokens the highest chastity.³³ O happy virgin! happy Paula, daughter of Toxotius, who through the virtues of her grandmother and aunt is nobler in holiness than she is in lineage! Yes, Laeta: were it possible for you with your own eyes to see your mother-in-law and your sister, and to realize the mighty souls which animate their small bodies; such is your innate thirst for chastity that I cannot doubt but that you would go to them even before your daughter, and would emancipate yourself from God's first decree of the Law [Gen. 1:28] to put yourself under His second dispensation of the Gospel. [1 Cor. 7:1] You would count as nothing your desire for other offspring and would offer up yourself to the service of God. But because "there is a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing," [Eccl. 3:5] and because "the wife hath not power of her own body," [1 Cor. 7:4] and because the apostle says "Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called" [1 Cor. 7:20] in the Lord, and because he that is under the yoke ought so to run as not to leave his companion in the mire, I counsel you to pay back to the full in your offspring what meantime you defer paying in your own person. When Hannah had once offered in the tabernacle the son whom she had vowed to God she never took him back; for she thought it unbecoming that one who was to be a prophet should grow up in the same house with her who still desired to have other children. Accordingly after she had conceived him and given him birth, she did not venture to come to the temple alone or to appear before the Lord empty, but first paid to Him what she owed; and then, when she had offered up that great sacrifice, she returned home and because she had borne her firstborn for God, she was given five children for herself. [1 Sam. 2:21] Do you marvel at the happiness of that holy woman? Imitate her faith. Moreover, if you will only send Paula, I promise to be myself both a tutor and a foster father to her. Old as I am I will carry her on my shoulders and train her stammering lips; and my charge will be a far grander one than that of the worldly philosopher;³⁴ for while he only taught a King of Macedon who was one day to die of Babylonian poison, I shall instruct the handmaid and spouse of Christ who must one day be offered to her Lord in heaven.

1:

1 Cor. 7:13, 1 Cor. 7:14, the word `believing 0' is twice inserted by Jerome

2:

The Persian sun-god, at this time one of the most popular deities of the Roman pantheon. Gracchus appears to have done this as Urban Praetor, A. C. 378

3: In the year 389 a.d. the temple of Serapis at Alexandria had been pulled down and a Christian church built upon its site 4: Elsewhere (Life of Hilarion §20) Jerome relates an extraordinary story about the discomfiture of this `demon. 0 5: A well-known Thracian tribe not to be confounded with the Goths 6: Cf. Hor. A.P., 21, 22. Amphora caepit Institui: currente rots cur urceus exit 7: The books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings are called in the Hebrew Bible the Former Prophets

8: Cf. Letter LXXIX. Apparently Jerome means that the difficulty of penitence is as great as that of the camel passing through the eye of a needle. John, he implies, by wearing the camel's hair shows that he has surmounted this 9: Quintilian, Inst. I. 1 10: Quint. Inst. I. 1 11: The contemporary and rival of Cicero 12: Quint. Inst. I. 1

13: Inferna 14: Tim. 2:15 A.V. has `sobriety 0' for `chastity 0' but Jerome deliberately prefers the latter word 15: Babylon, the world-power. Jer. 50:23

16: Gen. xxxiv 17: Lucretius, I. 936, sqq 18: The letter Y used by Pythagoras to symbolize the diverging paths of good and evil. Cf. Persius. 3:56 19: Again quoted in Letter CXXVIII 20: Cp. Letter LXXIX, The heathen sage is glass, the Christian virgin the pearl 21: See note on Letter XXII 22: A Virgilian expression, 9, II., 121

23: Simila, but as elsewhere (L. 52, 6) this is spoken of as a luxury, perhaps we should read similia = `and such like. 0 24: Jerome refers to his second book against Jovinian 25: Cf. the dying words of S. Francis (which have a similar reference) `I have sinned against my brother the ass. 0 26: i.e. having vowed to abstain from bread, they indemnify themselves with flesh 27: Vermiculata pictura 28: Jerome tells us that he read the book with Blaesilla for this purpose 29: i.e. Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges

30: Of these a large number are still extant. Over twenty of them are "festal epistles" announcing to the churches the correct day on which to celebrate Easter 31: These include commentaries on many parts of Scripture and a work on the Trinity 32: Virgil, A. 8:507 33: The number 100 denotes virginity to which in her own person Paula could have no claim. See note on Letter XLVIII 34: The allusion is to Aristotle who was tutor to Alexander, King of Macedon

Letters - letter_108

Letter 108. To Eustochium.

This, one of the longest of Jerome's letters, was written to console Eustochium for the loss of her mother who had recently died. Jerome relates the story of Paula in detail; speaking first of her high birth, marriage, and social success at Rome, and then narrating her conversion and subsequent life as a Christian ascetic. Much space is devoted to an account of her journey to the East which included a visit to Egypt and to the monasteries of Nitria as well as a tour of the most sacred spots in the Holy Land. The remainder of the letter describes her daily routine and studies at Bethlehem, and recounts the many virtues for which she was distinguished. It then concludes with a touching description of her death and burial and gives the epitaph placed upon her grave. The date of the letter is 404 a.d.

1. If all the members of my body were to be converted into tongues, and if each of my limbs were to be gifted with a human voice, I could still do no justice to the virtues of the holy and venerable Paula. Noble in family, she was nobler still in holiness; rich formerly in this world's goods, she is now more distinguished by the poverty that she has embraced for Christ. Of the stock of the Gracchi and descended from the Scipios, the heir and representative of that Paulus whose name she bore, the true and legitimate daughter of that Martia Papyria who was mother to Africanus, she yet preferred Bethlehem to Rome, and left her palace glittering with gold to dwell in a mud cabin. We do not grieve that we have lost this perfect woman; rather we thank God that we have had her, nay that we have her still. For "all live unto" God, [Luke 20:38] and they who return unto the Lord are still to be reckoned members of his family. We have lost her, it is true, but the heavenly mansions have gained her; for as long as she was in the body she was absent from the Lord [2 Cor. 5:6] and would constantly complain with tears: "Woe is me that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar; my soul hath been this long time a pilgrim." It was no wonder that she sobbed out that even she was in darkness (for this is the meaning of the word Kedar) seeing that, according to the apostle, "the world lieth in the evil one;" [1 John. 5:19] and that, "as its darkness is, so is its light;" [Ps. 139:12, A.V. marg] and that "the light shineth in darkness and the darkness comprehended it not." [John. 1:5] She would frequently exclaim: "I am a stranger with thee and a sojourner as all my fathers were," [Ps. 39:12] and again, I desire "to depart and to be with Christ." [Phil. 1:23] As often too as she was troubled with bodily weakness (brought on by incredible abstinence and by redoubled fastings), she would be heard to say: "I keep under my body and bring it into subjection; lest that by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway;" [1 Cor. 9:27] and "It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine;" [Rom. 14:21] and "I humbled my soul with fasting;" [Ps. 35:13] and "thou wilt make all" my "bed in" my "sickness;" [Ps. 41:3] and "Thy hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer." [Ps. 32:4] And when the pain which she bore with such wonderful patience darted through her, as if she saw the heavens opened [Cf. Acts 7:56] she would say "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away and be at rest." [Ps. 55:6]

2. I call Jesus and his saints, yes and the particular angel who was the guardian and the companion of this admirable woman to bear witness that these are no words of adulation and flattery but sworn testimony every one of them borne to her character. They are, indeed, inadequate to the virtues of one whose praises are sung by the whole world, who is admired by bishops,² regretted by bands of virgins, and wept for by crowds of monks and poor. Would you know all her virtues, reader, in short? She has left those dependent on her poor, but not so poor as she was herself. In dealing thus with her relatives and the men and women of her small household-her brothers and sisters rather than her servants-she has done nothing strange; for she has left her daughter Eustochium-a virgin consecrated to Christ for whose comfort this sketch is made-far from her noble family and rich only in faith and grace.

3. Let me then begin my narrative. Others may go back a long way even to Paula's cradle and, if I may say so, to her swaddling-clothes, and may speak of her mother Blaesilla and her father Rogatus. Of these the former was a descendant of the Scipios and the Gracchi; whilst the latter came of a line distinguished in Greece down to the present day. He was said, indeed, to have in his veins the blood of Agamemnon who destroyed Troy after a ten years siege. But I shall praise only what belongs to herself, what wells forth from the pure spring of her holy mind. When in the gospel the apostles ask their Lord and Saviour what He will give to those who have left all for His sake, He tells them that they shall receive an hundredfold now in this time and in the world to come eternal life. [Mark 10:28-30] From which we see that it is not the possession of riches that is praiseworthy but the rejection of them for Christ's sake; that, instead of glorying in our privileges, we should make them of small account as compared with God's faith. Truly the Saviour has now in this present time made good His promise to His servants and handmaidens. For one who despised the glory of a single city is to-day famous throughout the world; and one who while she lived at Rome was known by no one outside it has by hiding herself at Bethlehem become the admiration of all lands Roman and barbarian. For what race of men is there which does not send pilgrims to the holy places? And who could there find a greater marvel than Paula? As among many jewels the most precious shines most brightly, and as the sun with its beams obscures and puts out the paler fires of the stars; so by her lowliness she surpassed all others in virtue and influence and, while she was least among all, was greater than all. The more she cast herself down, the more she was lifted up by Christ. She was hidden and yet she was not hidden. By shunning glory she earned glory; for glory follows virtue as its shadow; and deserting those who seek it, it seeks those who despise it. But I must not neglect to proceed with my narrative or dwell too long on a single point forgetful of the rules of writing.

4. Being then of such parentage, Paula married Toxotius in whose veins ran the noble blood of neas and the Julii. Accordingly his daughter, Christ's virgin Eustochium, is called Julia, as he Julius. A name from great lulus handed down. [Virg. A. 1:292.]

I speak of these things not as of importance to those who have them, but as worthy of remark in those who despise them, Men of the world look up to persons who are rich in such privileges. We on the other hand praise those who for the Saviour's sake despise them; and strangely depreciating all who keep them, we eulogize those who are unwilling to do so. Thus nobly born, Paula through her fruitfulness and her chastity won approval from all, from her husband first, then from her relatives, and lastly from the whole city. She bore five children; Blaesilla, for whose death I consoled her while at Rome;³ Paulina, who has left the reverend and admirable Pammachius to inherit both her vows⁴ and property, to whom also I addressed a little book on her death; Eustochium, who is now in the holy places, a precious necklace of virginity and of the church; Rufina, whose untimely end overcame the affectionate heart of her mother; and Toxotius, after whom she had no more children. You can thus see that it was not her wish to fulfil a wife's duty, but that she only complied with her husband's longing to have male offspring.

5. When he died, her grief was so great that she nearly died herself: yet so completely did she then give herself to the service of the Lord, that it might have seemed that she had desired his death. In what terms shall I speak of her distinguished, and noble, and formerly wealthy house; all the riches of which she spent upon the poor? How can I describe the great consideration she shewed to all and her far reaching kindness even to those whom she had never seen? What poor man, as he lay dying, was not wrapped in blankets given by her? What bedridden person was not supported with money from her purse? She would seek out such with the greatest diligence throughout the city, and would think it a misfortune were any hungry or sick person to be supported by another's food. So lavish was her charity that she robbed her children; and, when her relatives remonstrated with her for doing so, she declared that she was leaving to them a better inheritance in the mercy of Christ.

6. Nor was she long able to endure the visits and crowded receptions, which her high position in the world and her exalted family entailed upon her. She received the homage paid to her sadly, and made all the speed she could to shun and to escape those who wished to pay her compliments. It so happened that at that time⁵ the bishops of the East and West had been summoned to Rome by letter from the emperors⁶ to deal with certain dissensions between the churches, and in this way she saw two most admirable men and Christian prelates, Paulinus bishop of Antioch and Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis or, as it is now called, Constantia, in Cyprus. Epiphanius, indeed, she received as her guest; and, although Paulinus was staying in another person's house, in the warmth of her heart she treated him as if he too were lodged with her. Inflamed by their virtues she thought more and more each moment of forsaking her home. Disregarding her house, her children, her servants, her property, and in a word everything connected with the world, she was eager-alone and unaccompanied (if ever it could be said that she was so)-to go to the desert made famous by its Paula and by its Antonies. And at last when the winter was over and the sea was open, and when the bishops were returning to their churches, she also sailed with them in her prayers and desires. Not to prolong the story, she went down to Portus accompanied by her brother, her kinsfolk and above all her own children eager by their demonstrations of affection to overcome their loving mother. At last the sails were set and the strokes of the rowers carried the vessel into the deep. On the shore the little Toxotius stretched forth his hands in entreaty, while Rufina, now grown up, with silent sobs besought her mother to wait till she should be married. But still Paula's eyes were dry as she turned them heaven wards; and she overcame her love for her children by her love for God. She knew herself no more as a mother, that she might approve herself a handmaid of Christ. Yet her heart was rent within her, and she wrestled with her grief, as though she were being forcibly separated from parts of herself. The greatness of the affection she had to overcome made all admire her victory the more. Among the cruel hardships which attend prisoners of war in the hands of their enemies, there is none severer than the separation of parents from their children. Though it is against the laws of nature, she endured this trial with unabated faith; nay more she sought it with a joyful heart: and overcoming her love for her children by her greater love for God, she concentrated herself quietly upon Eustochium alone, the partner alike of her vows and of her voyage. Meantime the vessel ploughed onwards and all her fellow-passengers looked back to the shore. But she turned away her eyes that she might not see what she could not behold without agony. No mother, it must be confessed, ever loved her children so dearly. Before setting out she gave them all that she had, disinheriting herself upon earth that she might find an inheritance in heaven.

7. The vessel touched at the island of Pontia ennobled long since as the place of exile of the illustrious lady Flavia Domitilla who under the Emperor Domitian was banished because she confessed herself a Christian;⁷ and Paula, when she saw the cells in which this lady passed the period of her long martyrdom, taking to herself the wings of faith, more than ever desired to see Jerusalem and the holy places. The strongest winds seemed weak and the greatest speed slow. After passing between Scylla and Charybdis⁸ she committed herself to the Adriatic sea and had a calm passage to Methone.⁹ Stopping here for a short time to recruit her wearied frame

"She stretched her dripping limbs upon the shore:

Then sailed past Malea and Cythera's isle,

The scattered Cyclades, and all the lands

That narrow in the seas on every side." [Virg. A. 3:126-8]

Then leaving Rhodes and Lycia behind her, she at last came in sight of Cyprus, where failing at the feet of the holy and venerable Epiphanius, she was by him detained ten days; though this was not, as he supposed, to restore her strength but, as the facts prove, that she might do God's work. For she visited all the monasteries in the island, and left, so far as her means allowed, substantial relief for the brothers in them whom love of the holy man had brought thither from all parts of the world. Then crossing the narrow sea she landed at Seleucia, and going up thence to Antioch allowed herself to be detained for a little time by the affection of the reverend confessor Paulinus.¹⁰ Then, such was the ardour of her faith that she, a noble lady who had always previously been carried by eunuchs, went her way-and that in midwinter-riding upon an ass.

8. I say nothing of her journey through Coele-Syria and Phoenicia (for it is not my purpose to give you a complete itinerary of her wanderings); I shall only name such places as are mentioned in the sacred books. After leaving the Roman colony of Berytus and the ancient city of Zidon she entered Elijah's town on the shore at Zarephath and therein adored her Lord and Saviour. Next passing over the sands of Tyre on which Paul had once knelt [Acts 21:5] she came to Acco or, as it is now called, Ptolemais rode over the plains of Megiddo which had once witnessed the slaying of Josiah, [2 K. 23:29] and entered the land of the Philistines. Here she could not fail to admire the ruins of Dor, once a most powerful city; and Struto's Tower, which though at one time insignificant was rebuilt by Herod king of Judaea and named Caesarea in honour of Caesar Augustus.¹¹ Here she saw the house of Cornelius now turned into a Christian church; and the humble abode of Philip; and the chambers of his daughters the four virgins "which did prophesy." [Acts 21:8, Acts 21:9] She arrived next at Antipatris, a small town half in ruins, named by Herod after his father Anti-pater, and at Lydda, now become Diospolis, a place made famous by the raising again of Dorcas [Acts 9:36-41] and the restoration to health of Aeneas. [Acts 9:32-34] Not far from this are Arimathaea, the village of Joseph who buried the Lord, [John 19:38] and Nob, once a city of priests but now the tomb in which their slain bodies rest. [1 Sam. 22:17-19] Joppa too is hard by, the port of Jonah's flight; [Jon. 1:3] which also-if I may introduce a poetic fable-saw Andromeda bound to the rock.¹² Again resuming her journey, she came to Nicopolis, once called Emmaus, where the Lord became known in the breaking of bread; [Luke 24:13, Luke 24:28-31] an action by which He dedicated the house of Cleopas as a church. Starting thence she made her way up lower and higher Bethhoron, cities founded by Solomon [2 Chr. 8:5] but subsequently destroyed by several devastating wars; seeing on her right Ajalon and Gibeon where Joshua the son of Nun when fighting against the five kings gave commandments to the sun and moon, [Josh. 10:12-14] where also he condemned the Gibeonites(who by a crafty stratagem had obtained a treaty) to be hewers of wood and drawers of water.¹³ At Gibeah also, now a complete ruin, she stopped for a little while remembering its sin, and the cutting of the concubine into pieces, and how in spite of all this three hundred men of the tribe of Benjamin were saved¹⁴ that in after days Paul might be called a Benjamite.

9. To make a long story short, leaving on her left the mausoleum of Helena queen of Adiabene¹⁵ who in time of famine had sent corn to the Jewish people, Paula entered Jerusalem, Jebus, or Salem, that city of three names which after it had sunk to ashes and decay was by Aelius Hadrianus restored once more as Aelia.¹⁶ And although the proconsul of Palestine, who was an intimate friend of her house, sent forward his apparitors and gave orders to have his official residence¹⁷ placed at her disposal, she chose a humble cell in preference to it. Moreover, in visiting the holy places so great was the passion and the enthusiasm she exhibited for each, that she could never have torn herself away from one had she not been eager to visit the rest. Before the Cross she threw herself down in adoration as though she beheld the Lord hanging upon it: and when she entered the tomb which was the scene of the Resurrection she kissed the stone which the angel had rolled away from the door of the sepulchre. [Matt. 28:2] Indeed so ardent was her faith that she even licked with her mouth the very spot on which the Lord's body had lain, like one athirst for the river which he has longed for. What tears she shed there, what groans she uttered, and what grief she poured forth, all Jerusalem knows; the Lord also to whom she prayed knows. Going out thence she made the ascent of Zion; a name which signifies either "citadel" or "watch-tower." This formed the city which David formerly stormed and afterwards rebuilt. [2 Sam. 5:7, 2 Sam. 5:9] Of its storming it is written, "Woe to Ariel, to Ariel"-that is, God's lion, (and indeed in those days it was extremely strong)-"the city which David stormed:" [Isa. 29:1. Vulg] and of its rebuilding it is said, "His foundation is in the holy mountains: the Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob." [Ps. 87:1, Ps. 87:2] He does not mean the gates which we see to-day in dust and ashes; the gates he means are those against which hell prevails not [Matt. 16:18] and through which the multitude of those who believe in Christ enter in. [Rev. 22:14] There was shewn to her upholding the portico of a church the bloodstained column to which our Lord is said to have been bound when He suffered His scourging. There was shewn to her also the spot where the Holy Spirit came down upon the souls of the one hundred and twenty believers, thus fulfilling the prophecy of Joel. [Acts 2:16-21]

10. Then, after distributing money to the poor and her fellow-servants so far as her means allowed, she proceeded to Bethlehem stopping only on the right side of the road to visit Rachel's tomb. (Here it was that she gave birth to her son destined to be not what his dying mother called him, Benoni, that is the "Son of my pangs" but as his father in the spirit prophetically named him Benjamin, that is "the Son of the right hand)." [Gen. 35:18, Gen. 35:19] After this she came to Bethlehem and entered into the cave where the Saviour was born.¹⁸ Here, when she looked upon the inn made sacred by the virgin and the stall where the ox knew his owner and the ass his master's crib, [Isa. 1:3] and where the words of the same prophet had been fulfilled "Blessed is he that soweth beside the waters where the ox and the ass trample the seed under their feet:" [Isa. 32:20, LXX] when she looked upon these things I say, she protested in my hearing that she could behold with the eyes of faith the infant Lord wrapped in swaddling clothes and crying in the manger, the wise men worshipping Him, the star shining overhead, the virgin mother, the attentive foster-father, the shepherds coming by night to see "the word that was come to pass" [Luke 2:15, rhma] and thus even then to consecrate those opening phrases of the evangelist John "In the beginning was the word" and "the word was made flesh."¹⁹ She declared that she could see the slaughtered innocents, the raging Herod, Joseph and Mary fleeing into Egypt; and with a mixture of tears and joy she cried: 'Hail Bethlehem, house of bread,²⁰ wherein was born that Bread that came down from heaven. [John. 6:51] Hail Ephratah, land of fruitfulness²¹ and of fertility, whose fruit is the Lord Himself. Concerning thee has Micah prophesied of old, "Thou Bethlehem Ephratah art not²² the least among the thousands of Judah, for out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting. Therefore wilt thou [Mic. 5:2, Mic. 5:3, Cf. Matt. 2:6] give them up, until the time that she which travaileth hath brought forth: then the remnant of his brethren shall return unto the children of Israel." [Ps. 110:3, Vulg] For in thee was born the prince begotten before Lucifer. [Acts 13:46] Whose birth from the Father is before all time: and the cradle of David's race continued in thee, until the virgin brought forth her son and the remnant of the people that believed in Christ returned unto the children of Israel and preached freely to them in words like these: "It Was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but seeing ye put it from you and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo, we turn to the Gentiles." [Matt. 15:24] For the Lord hath said: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel."²³ At that time also the words of Jacob were fulfilled concerning Him, "A prince shall not depart from Judah nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until He come for whom it is laid up, [Gen. 49:10, LXX] and He shall be for the expectation of the nations."²⁴ Well did David swear, well did he make a vow saying: "Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house nor go up into my bed: I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to my eyelids, or rest to the temples of my head, [Ps. 132:2-5] until I find out a place for the Lord, an habitation for the . .

God of Jacob." [Ps. 132:6, Vulg] And immediately he explained the object of his desire, seeing with prophetic eyes that He would come whom we now believe to have come. "Lo we heard of Him at Ephratah: we found Him in the fields of the wood."²⁵ The Hebrew word Zo as have learned from your lessons [Ps. 132:7] means not her, that is Mary the Lord's mother, but him that is the Lord Himself. Therefore he says boldly: "We will go into His tabernacle: we will worship at His footstool." [Ps. 132:14] I too, miserable sinner though I am, have been accounted worthy to kiss the manger in which the Lord cried as a babe, and to pray in the cave in which the travelling virgin gave birth to the infant Lord. "This is my rest" for it is my Lord's native place; "here will I dwell" [Ps. 132:17, Vulg] for this spot has my Saviour chosen. "I have prepared a lamp for my Christ" [Ps. 22:29, 30, LXX] "My soul shall live unto Him and my seed shall serve Him." [Gen. 35:21, Mic. 4:8]

After this Paul, went a short distance down the hill to the tower of Edar, [Luke 2:14] that is 'of the flock,' [Jude. 6:37] near which Jacob fed his flocks, and where the shepherds keeping watch by night were privileged to hear the words: "Glory to God in the highest and on earth peace, goodwill toward men." [Ex. 12:21-23] While they were keeping their sheep they found the Lamb of God; whose fleece bright and clean was made wet with the dew of heaven when it was dry upon all the earth beside, [John. 1:29] and whose blood when sprinkled on the doorposts drove off the destroyer of Egypt [Jer. 13:23] and took away the sins of the world. [Acts 8:27-39]

11. Then immediately quickening her pace she began to move along the old road which leads to Gaza, that is to the 'power' or 'wealth' of God, silently meditating on that type of the Gentiles, the Ethiopian eunuch, who in spite of the prophet changed his skin²⁶ and whilst he read the old testament found the fountain of the gospel. [Nu. 13:23, Nu. 13:24] Next turning to the right she passed from Bethzur [Isa. 63:3] to Eshcol which means "a cluster of grapes." It was hence that the spies brought back that marvellous cluster which was the proof of the fertility of the land²⁷ and a type of Him who says of Himself: "I have trodden the wine press alone; and of the people there was none with me." [John. 8:56, cf. Gen. 18:1, R.V.-q.v] Shortly afterwards she entered the home²⁸ of Sarah and beheld the birthplace of Isaac and the traces of Abraham's oak under which he saw Christ's day and was glad. [Cor. 3:6] And rising up from thence she went up to Hebron, that is Kirjath-Arba, or the City of the Four Men. These are Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the great Adam whom the Hebrews suppose (from the book of Joshua the son of Nun) to be buried there. [Jude. 1:13-15] But many are of opinion that Caleb is the fourth and a monument at one side is pointed out as his. After seeing these places she did not care to go on to Kirjath-sepher, that is "the village of letters;" because despising the letter that killeth she had found the spirit that giveth life.²⁹ She admired more the upper springs and the nether springs which Othniel the son of Kenaz the son of Jephunneh received in place of a south land and a waterless possession, [Gen. 18:23-33] and by the conducting of which he watered the dry fields of the old covenant. For thus did he typify the redemption which the sinner finds for his old sins in the waters of baptism. On the next day soon after sunrise she stood upon the brow of Capharbarucha, [Isa. 15:5] that is, "the house of blessing," the point to which Abraham pursued the Lord when he made intercession with Him. [Gen. 14:2] And here, as she looked down upon the wide solitude and upon the country once belonging to Sodom and Gomorrah, to Admah and Zeboim, she beheld the balsam vines of Engedi and Zoar. By Zoar I mean that "heifer of three years old" [Eph. 5:18] which was formerly called Bela [Gen. 19:30-38] and in Syriac is rendered Zoar that is 'little.' She called to mind the cave in which Lot found refuge, and with tears in her eyes warned the virgins her companions to beware of "wine wherein is excess;" [Cant. 1:7] for it was to this that the Moabites and Ammonites owe their origin. [Gen. 43:16]

12. I linger long in the land of the midday sun for it was there and then that the spouse found her bridegroom at rest [Amos 1:1] and Joseph drank wine with his brothers once more. [Luke 24:50, Luke 24:51, Acts 1:9-12] I will return to Jerusalem and, passing through Tekoa the home of Amos, [Nu. 19:1-10] I will look upon the glistening cross of Mount Olivet from which the Saviour made His ascension to the Father. [Ezek. 10:18, Ezek. 10:19] Here year by year a red heifer was burned as a holocaust to the Lord and its ashes were used to purify the children of Israel.³⁰ Here also according to Ezekiel the Cherubim after leaving the temple founded the church of the Lord. [Matt. 21:1-7]

After this Paula visited the tomb of Lazarus and beheld the hospitable roof of Mary and Martha, as well as Bethphage, 'the town of the priestly jaws.'³¹ Here it was that a restive foal typical of the Gentiles received the bridle of God, and covered with the garments of the apostles [Luke 10:30-35] offered its lowly back³² for Him to sit on. From this she went straight on down the hill to Jericho thinking of the wounded man in the gospel, of the savagery of the priests and Levites who passed him by, and of the kindness of the Samaritan, that is, the guardian, who placed the half-dead man upon his own beast and brought him down to the inn of the church. [Luke 19:4] She noticed the place called Adomim [Matt. 20:30-34] or the Place of Blood, so-called because much blood was shed there in the frequent incursions of marauders. She beheld also the sycamore tree³³ of Zacchaeus, by which is signified the good works of repentance whereby he trod under foot his former sins of bloodshed and rapine, and from which he saw the Most High as from a pinnacle of virtue. She was shewn too the spot by the wayside where the blind men sat who, receiving their sight from the Lord, [1 Kings 16:34] became types of the two peoples [Josh. 5:3] who should believe upon Him. Then entering Jericho she saw the city which Hiel founded in Abiram his firstborn and of which he set up the gates in his youngest son Segub. [Rom. 2:28, Rom. 2:29] She looked upon the camp of Gilgal and the hill of the foreskins [Josh. 4:3, Josh. 4:20] suggestive of the mystery of the second circumcision: [Rev. 21:14] and she gazed at the twelve stones brought thither out of the bed of Jordan³⁴ to be symbols of those twelve foundations on which are written the names of the twelve apostles. [Mal. 4:2] She saw also that fountain of the Law most bitter and barren which the true Elisha healed by his wisdom changing it into a well sweet and fertilising. [Josh. 3:17] Scarcely had the night passed away when burning with eagerness she hastened to the Jordan, stood by the brink of the river, and as the sun rose recalled to mind the rising of the sun of righteousness; [Josh. 7:24-26] how the priest's feet stood firm in the middle of the river-bed; [Zech. 3:9] how afterwards at the command of Elijah and Elisha the waters were divided hither and thither and made way for them to pass; and again how the Lord had cleansed by His baptism waters which the deluge had polluted and the destruction of mankind had defiled.

13. It would be tedious were I tell of the valley of Achor, that is, of 'trouble and crowds,' where theft and covetousness were condemned; [Isa. 28:16] and of Bethel, 'the house of God,' where Jacob poor and destitute slept upon the bare ground. Here it was that, having set beneath his head a stone which in Zechariah is described as having seven eyes [Gen. 28:12, Gen. 28:13] and in Isaiah is spoken of as a corner-stone, [Josh. 24:30] he beheld a ladder reaching up to heaven; yes, and the Lord standing high above it [Josh. 24:33] holding out His hand to such as were ascending and hurling from on high such as were careless. Also when she was in Mount Ephraim she made pilgrimages to the tombs of Joshua the son of Nun and of Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, exactly opposite the one to the other; that of Joshua being built at Timnath-serah "on the north side of the hill of Gaash," [Cf. 1 Sam. 1:3] and that of Eleazar "in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son." [Judg. 21:19-23: cf. Liv. 1:9] She was somewhat surprised to find that he who had had the distribution of the land in his own hands had selected for himself portions uneven and rocky. What shall I say about Shiloh where a ruined altar [From John. 4:5] is still shewn to-day, and where the tribe of Benjamin anticipated Romulus in the rape of the Sabine women?³⁵ Passing by Shechem (not Sychar as many wrongly read [Luke 7:28]) or as it is now called Neapols, she entered the church built upon the side of Mount Gerizim around Jacob's well; that well where the Lord was sitting when hungry and thirsty He was refreshed by the faith of the woman of Samaria. Forsaking her five husbands by whom are intended the five books of Moses, and that sixth not a husband of whom she boasted, to wit the false teacher Dositheus,³⁶ she found the true Messiah and the true Saviour. Turning away thence Paula saw the tombs of the twelve patriarchs, and Samaria which in honour of Augustus Herod renamed Augusta or in Greek Sebaste. There lie the prophets Elisha and Obadiah and John the Baptist than whom there is not a greater among those that are born of women. [1 Kings 18:4] And here she was filled with terror by the marvels she beheld; for she saw demons screaming under different tortures before the tombs of the saints, and men howling like wolves, baying like dogs, roaring like lions, hissing like serpents and bellowing like bulls. They twisted their heads and bent them backwards until they touched the ground; women too were suspended head downward and their clothes did not fall off. [Matt. 14:13-21] Paula pitied them all, and shedding tears over them prayed Christ to have mercy on them. And weak as she was she climbed the mountain on foot; for in two of its caves Obadiah in a time of persecution and famine had fed a hundred prophets with bread and water.³⁷ Then she passed quickly through Nazareth the nursery of the Lord; Cana and Capernaum familiar with the signs wrought by Him; the lake of Tiberias sanctified by His voyages upon it; the wilderness where countless Gentiles were satisfied with a few loaves while the twelve baskets of the tribes of Israel were filled with the fragments left by them that had eaten.³⁸ She made the ascent of mount Tabor whereon the Lord was transfigured. [Jude. 5:21, Vulg] In the distance she beheld the range of Hermon; [Luke 7:11-15] and the wide stretching plains of Galilee where Sisera and all his host had once been overcome by Barak; and the torrent [Jude. 15:17-19, R.V] Kishon separating the level ground into two parts. Hard by also the town of Nain was pointed out to her, where the widow's son was raised. [Micah 1:1, Micah 1:14] Time would fail me sooner than speech were I to recount all the places to which the revered Paula was carried by her incredible faith.

14. I will now pass on to Egypt, pausing for a while on the way at Socoh, and at Samson's well which he clave in the hollow place that was in the jaw. [Jer. 2:18] Here I will lave my parched lips and refresh myself before visiting Moresheth; in old days famed for the tomb of the prophet Micah, [Isa. 19:18] and now for its church. Then skirting the country of the Horites and Gittites, Mareshah, Edom, and Lachish, and traversing the lonely wastes of the desert where the tracks of the traveller are lost in the yielding sand, I will come to the river of Egypt called Sihor, [Ps. 78:12] that is "the muddy river," and go through the five cities of Egypt which speak the language of Canaan,³⁹ and through the land of Goshen and the plains of Zoan⁴⁰ on which God wrought his marvellous works. And I will visit the city of No, which has since become Alexandria;⁴¹ and Nitria, the town of the Lord, where day by day the filth of multitudes is washed away with the pure nitre of virtue. No sooner did Paula come in sight of it than there came to meet her the reverend and estimable bishop, the confessor Isidore, accompanied by countless multitudes of monks many of whom were of priestly or of Levitical rank. [Ps. 6:6] On seeing these Paula rejoiced to behold the Lord's glory manifested in them; but protested that she had no claim to be received with such honour. Need I speak of the Macarii, Arsenius, Serapion,⁴² or other pillars of Christ! Was there any cell that she did not enter? Or any man at whose feet she did not throw herself? In each of His saints she believed that she saw Christ Himself; and whatever she bestowed upon them she rejoiced to feel that she had bestowed it upon the Lord. Her enthusiasm was wonderful and her endurance scarcely credible in a woman. Forgetful of her sex and of her weakness she even desired to make her abode, together with the girls who accompanied her, among these thousands of monks. And, as they were all willing to welcome her, she might perhaps have sought and obtained permission to do so; had she not been drawn away by a still greater passion for the holy places. Coming by sea from Pelusium to Maioma on account of the great heat, she returned so rapidly that you would have thought her a bird. Not long afterwards, making up her mind to dwell permanently in holy Bethlehem, she took up her abode for three years? a miserable hostelry; till she could build the requisite cells and monastic buildings, to say nothing of a guest house for passing travellers where they might find the welcome which Mary and Joseph had missed. At this point I conclude my narrative of the journeys that she made accompanied by Eustochium and many other virgins.

15. I am now free to describe at greater length the virtue which was her peculiar charm; and in setting forth this I call God to witness that I am no flatterer. I add nothing. I exaggerate nothing. On the contrary I tone down much that I may not appear to relate incredibilities. My carping critics must not insinuate that I am drawing on my imagination or decking Paula, like sop's crow, with the fine feathers of other birds. Humility is the first of Christian graces, and hers was so pronounced that one who had never seen her, and who on account of her celebrity had desired to see her, would have believed that he saw not her but the lowest of her maids. When she was surrounded by companies of virgins she was always the least remarkable in dress, in speech, in gesture, and in gait. From the time that her husband died until she fell asleep herself she never sat at meat with a man, even though she might know him to stand upon the pinnacle of the episcopate. She never entered a bath except when dangerously ill. Even in the severest fever she rested not on an ordinary bed but on the hard ground covered only with a mat of goat's hair; if that can be called rest which made day and night alike a time of almost unbroken prayer. Well did she fulfil the words of the psalter: "All the night make I my bed to swim; I water my couch with my tear"! [2 Cor. 8:13, 2 Cor. 8:14] Her tears welled forth as it were from fountains, and she lamented her slightest faults as if they were sins of the deepest dye. Constantly did I warn her to spare her eyes and to keep them for the reading of the gospel; but she only said: 'I must disfigure that face which contrary to God's commandment I have painted with rouge, white lead, and antimony. I must mortify that body which has been given up to many pleasures. I must make up for my long laughter by constant weeping. I must exchange my soft linen and costly silks for rough goat's hair. I who have pleased my husband and the world in the past, desire now to please Christ.' Were I among her great and signal virtues to select her chastity as a subject of praise, my words would seem superfluous; for, even when she was still in the world, she set an example to all the matrons of Rome, and bore herself so admirably that the most slanderous never ventured to couple scandal with her name.⁴³ No mind could be more considerate than hers, or none kinder towards the lowly. She did not court the powerful; at the same time, if the proud and the vainglorious sought her, she did not turn from them with disdain. If she saw a poor man, she supported him: and if she saw a rich one, she urged him to do good. Her liberality alone knew no bounds. Indeed, so anxious was she to turn no needy person away that she borrowed money at interest and often contracted new loans to pay off old ones. I was wrong, I admit; but when I saw her so profuse in giving, I reproved her alleging the apostle's words: "I mean not that other men be eased and ye burthened; but by an equality that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want." [Matt. 5:7] I quoted from the gospel the Saviour's words: "he that hath two coats, let him impart one of them to him that hath none"; [Ecclus. 3:30] and I warned her that she might not always have means to do as she would wish. Other arguments I adduced to the same purpose; but with admirable modesty and brevity she overruled them all. "God is my witness," she said, "that what I do I do for His sake. My prayer is that I may die a beggar not leaving a penny to my daughter and indebted to strangers for my winding sheet." She then concluded with these words: "I, if I beg, shall find many to give to me; but if this beggar does not obtain help from me who by borrowing can give it to him, he will die; and if he dies, of whom will his soul be required?" I wished her to be more careful in managing her concerns, but she with a faith more glowing than mine clave to the Saviour with her whole heart and poor in spirit followed the Lord in His poverty, giving back to Him what she had received and becoming poor for His sake. She obtained her wish at last and died leaving her daughter overwhelmed with a mass of debt. This Eustochium still owes and indeed cannot hope to pay off by her own exertions; only the mercy of Christ can free her from it.

16. Many married ladies make it a habit to confer gifts upon their own trumpeters, and while they are extremely profuse to a few, withhold all help from the many. From this fault Paula was altogether free. She gave her money to each according as each had need, not ministering to self-indulgence but relieving want. No poor person went away from her empty handed. And all this she was enabled to do not by the greatness of her wealth but by her careful management of it. She constantly had on her lips such phrases as these: "Blessed are the merciful for they shall obtain mercy;" [Luke 16:9] and "water will quench a flaming fire; and alms maketh an atonement for sins;" [Luke 11:41] and "make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness that ...they may receive you into everlasting habitations;" [Dan. 4:27, LXX] and "give alms ...and behold all things are clean unto you;" [Zech. 9:16, LXX] and Daniel's words to King Nebuchadnezzar in which he admonished him to redeem his sins by almsgiving. [Rev. 21:14] She wished to spend her money not upon these stones, that shall pass away with the earth and the world, but upon those living stones, which roll over the earth; [Rev. 21:19-21] of which in the apocalypse of John the city of the great king is built; [Job 2:4, Job 2:5] of which also the scripture tells us that they shall be changed into sapphire and emerald and jasper and other gems. [Matt. 23:27]

17. But these qualities she may well share with a few others and the devil knows that it is not in these that the highest virtue consists. For, when Job has lost his substance and when his house and children have been destroyed, Satan says to the Lord: "Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath, will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face."⁴⁴ We know that many persons while they have given alms have yet given nothing which touches their bodily comfort; and while they have held out a helping hand to those in need are themselves overcome with sensual indulgences; they whitewash the outside but within they are "full of dead men's bones." [Wisd. 2:24] Paula was not one of these. Her self-restraint was so great as to be almost immoderate; and her fasts and labours were so severe as almost to weaken her constitution. Except on feast days she would scarcely ever take oil with her food; a fact from which may be judged what she thought of wine, sauce, fish, honey, milk, eggs, and other things agreeable to the palate. Some persons believe that in taking these they are extremely frugal; and, even if they surfeit themselves with them, they still fancy their chastity safe.

18. Envy always follows in the track of virtue: as Horace says, it is ever the mountain top that is smitten by the lightning.⁴⁵ It is not surprising that I declare this of men and women, when the jealousy of the Pharisees succeeded in crucifying our Lord Himself. All the saints have had illwishers, and even Paradise was not free from the serpent through whose malice death came into the world. [2 Cor. 12:7] So the Lord stirred up against Paula Hadad the Edomite [Gen. 27:41-46: Gen. 28:1-5] to buffet her that she might not be exalted, and warned her frequently by the thorn in her flesh [1 Sam. 21:10] not to be elated by the greatness of her own virtues or to fancy that, compared with other women, she had attained the summit of perfection. For my part I used to say that it was best to give in to rancour and to retire before passion. So Jacob dealt with his brother Esau; so David met the unrelenting persecution of Saul. I reminded her how the first of these fled into Mesopotamia; [Matt. 5:39] and how the second surrendered himself to the Philistines, [Rom. 12:21] and chose to submit to foreign foes rather than to enemies at home. She however replied as follows:- 'Your suggestion would be a wise one if the devil did not everywhere fight against God's servants and handmaidens, and did he not always precede the fugitives to their chosen refuges. Moreover, I am deterred from accepting it by my love for the holy places; and I cannot find another Bethlehem elsewhere. Why may I not by my patience conquer this ill will? Why may I not by my humility break down this pride, and when I am smitten on the one cheek offer to the smiter the other? [Phil. 2:7, Phil. 2:8] Surely the apostle Paul says "Overcome evil with good." [Job 40:8, LXX] Did not the apostles glory when they suffered reproach for the Lord's sake? Did not even the Saviour humble Himself, taking the form of a servant and being made obedient to the Father unto death, even the death of the cross, [Matt. 5:10] that He might save us by His passion? If Job had not fought the battle and won the victory, he would never have received the crown of righteousness, or have heard the Lord say: "Thinkest thou that I have spoken unto thee for aught else than this, that thou mightest appear righteous."⁴⁶ In the gospel those only are said to be blessed who suffer persecution for righteousness' sake. [Ps. 38:13] My conscience is at rest, and I know that it is not from any fault of mine that I am suffering; moreover affliction in this world is a ground for expecting a reward hereafter.' When the enemy was more than usually forward and ventured to reproach her to her face, she used to chant the words of the psalter: "While the wicked was before me, I was dumb with silence; I held my peace even from good:" [Ps. 38:14] and again, "I as a deaf man heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth:" [Deut. 13:3] and "I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reproofs." [Isa. 28:9-11, LXX] When she felt herself tempted, she dwelt upon the words in Deuteronomy: "The Lord your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul." [Rom. 5:3-5] In tribulations and afflictions she turned to the splendid language of Isaiah: "Ye that are weaned from the milk and drawn from the breasts, look for tribulation upon tribulation, for hope also upon hope: yet a little while must these things be by reason of the malice of the lips and by reason of a spiteful tongue." This passage of scripture she explained for her own consolation as meaning that the weaned, that is, those who have come to full age, must endure tribulation upon tribulation that they may be accounted worthy to receive hope upon hope. She recalled to mind also the words of the apostle, "we glory in tribulations also: knowing that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope: and hope maketh not ashamed" [2 Cor. 4:16] and "though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day":⁴⁷ and "our light affliction which is but for a moment worketh in us [2 Cor. 4:17, 2 Cor. 4:18] an eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal but the things which are not seen are eternal. [Isa. 49:8] She used to say that, although to human impatience the time might seem slow in coming, yet that it would not be long but that presently help would come from God who says: "In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in a day of salvation have I helped thee." [Isa. 51:7, Isa. 51:8] We ought not, she declared, to dread the deceitful lips and tongues of the wicked, for we rejoice in the aid of the Lord who warns us by His prophet: "fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings; for the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool": [Luke 21:19, R.V] and she quoted His own words, "In your patience ye shall win your souls": [Rom. 8:18] as well as those of the apostle, "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed? us": [1 Th. 3:4, R.V] and in another place, "we are to suffer affliction" [Prov. 14:29] that we may be patient in all things that befall us, for "he that is slow to wrath is of great understanding: but he that is hasty of spirit exalteth folly." [2 Cor. 12:10]

19. In her frequent sicknesses and infirmities she used to say, "when I am weak, then am I strong:" [2 Cor. 4:7] "we have our treasure in earthen vessels" [1 Cor. 15:54] until "this corruptible shall have put on incorruption and this mortal shall have put on immortality" [2 Cor. 1:5] and again "as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also aboundeth by Christ:" [2 Cor. 1:7] and then as ye are partakers of the sufferings, so shall ye be also of the consolation. [Ps. 42:11] In sorrow she used to sing: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God for I shall yet praise him who is the health of my countenance and my God." [Luke 9:23] In the hour of danger she used to say: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me:" [Luke 9:24] and again "whosoever will save his life shall lose it," and "whosoever will lose his life for my sake the same shall save it." [Matt. 16:26] When the exhaustion of her substance and the ruin of her property were announced to her she only said: "What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul:" [Job 1:21] and "naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away: blessed be the name of the Lord:" [1 John. 2:15-17] and Saint John's words, "Love not the world neither the things that are in the world. For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes and the pride of life, is not of the Father but is of the world. And the world passeth away and the lust thereof." [Ps. 77:4, Vulg] I know that when word was sent to her of the serious illnesses of her children and particularly of Toxotius whom she dearly loved, she first by her self-control fulfilled the saying: "I was troubled and I did not speak," [Matt. 10:37] and then cried out in the words of scripture, "He that loveth son or daughter more than me is not worthy of me." [Ps. 79:11, LXX] And she prayed to the Lord and said: Lord "preserve thou the children of those that are appointed to die," [1 Cor. 4:9] that is, of those who for thy sake every day die bodily. I am aware that a talebearer-a class of persons who do a great deal of harm-once told her as a kindness that owing to her great fervour in virtue some people thought her mad and declared that something should be done for her head. She replied in the words of the apostle, "we are made a spectacle unto the world and to angels and to men," [1 Cor. 4:10] and "we are fools for Christ's sake" [1 Cor. 1:25] but "the foolishness of God is wiser than men." [Ps. 69:5] It is for this reason she said that even the Saviour says to the Father, "Thou knowest my foolishness," [Ps. 71:7] and again "I am as a wonder unto many, but thou art my strong refuge." [Ps. 73:22, Ps. 73:23] "I was as a beast before thee; nevertheless I am continually with thee." [Mark 3:21] In the gospel we read that even His kinsfolk desired to bind Him as one of weak mind. [John. 8:48] His opponents also reviled him saying "thou art a Samaritan and hast a devil," [Luke 11:15] and another time "he casteth out devils through Beelzebub the chief of the devils." [2 Cor. 1:12] But let us, she continued, listen to the exhortation of the apostle, "Our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience that in simplicity and sincerity ...by the grace of God we have had our conversation in the world." [John. 15:19] And let us hear the Lord when He says to His apostles, "If ye were of the world the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world ...therefore the world hateth you." [Cf. Ps. 44:21] And then she turned to the Lord Himself, saying, "Thou knowest the secrets of the heart,"

[Ps. 44:17, Ps. 44:18] and "all this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant; our heart is not turned back." [Ps. 44:22] "Yea for thy sake are we killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter." [Ps. 118:6, P.B.V] But "the Lord is on my side: I will not fear what man doeth unto me." [Prov. 7:2, LXX] She had read the words of Solomon, "My son, honour the Lord and thou shalt be made strong; and beside the Lord fear thou no man." [Cf. 1 Cor. 9:11] These passages and others like them she used as God's armour against the assaults of wickedness, and particularly to defend herself against the furious onslaughts of envy; and thus by patiently enduring wrongs she soothed the violence of the most savage breasts. Down to the very day of her death two things were conspicuous in her life, one her great patience and the other the jealousy which was manifested towards her. Now jealousy gnaws the heart of him who harbours it: and while it strives to injure its rival raves with all the force of its fury against itself.

20. I shall now describe the order of her monastery and the method by which she turned the continence of saintly souls to her own profit. She sowed carnal things that she might reap spiritual things;⁴⁸ she gave earthly things that she might receive heavenly things; she forewent things temporal that she might in their stead obtain things eternal. Besides establishing a monastery for men, the charge of which she left to men, she divided into three companies and monasteries the numerous virgins whom she had gathered out of different provinces, some of whom are of noble birth while others belonged to the middle or lower classes. But, although they worked and had their meals separately from each other, these three companies met together for psalm-singing and prayer. After the chanting of the Alleluia-the signal by which they were summoned to the Collect⁴⁹-no one was permitted to remain behind. But either first or among the first Paula used to await the arrival of the rest, urging them to diligence rather by her own modest example than by motives of fear. At dawn, at the third, sixth, and ninth hours, at evening, and at midnight they recited the psalter each in turn. [1 Cor. 4:21] No sister was allowed to be ignorant of the psalms, and all had every day to learn a certain portion of the holy scriptures. On the Lord's day only they proceeded to the church beside which they lived, each company following its own mother-superior. Returning home in the same order, they then devoted themselves to their allotted tasks, and made garments either for themselves or else for others. If a virgin was of noble birth, she was not allowed to have an attendant belonging to her own household lest her maid having her mind full of the doings of old days and of the license of childhood might by constant converse open old wounds and renew former errors. All the sisters were clothed alike. Linen was not used except for drying the hands. So strictly did Paula separate them from men that she would not allow even eunuchs to approach them; lest she should give occasion to slanderous tongues (always ready to cavil at the religious) to console themselves for their own misdoing. When a sister was backward in coming to the recitation of the psalms or shewed herself remiss in her work, Paula used to approach her in different ways. Was she quick-tempered? Paula coaxed her. Was she phlegmatic? Paula chid her, copying the example of the apostle who said: "What will ye? Shall I come to you with a rod or in love and in the spirit of meekness?" [1 Tim. 6:8] Apart from food and raiment she allowed no one to have anything she could call her own, for Paul had said, "Having food and raiment let us be therewith content."⁵⁰ She was afraid lest the custom of having more should breed covetousness in them; an appetite which no wealth can satisfy, for the more it has the more it requires, and neither opulence nor indigence is able to diminish it. [Ecclus. 13:2] When the sisters quarrelled one with another she reconciled them with soothing words. If the younger ones were troubled with fleshly desires, she broke their force by imposing redoubled fasts; for she wished her virgins to be ill in body rather than to suffer in soul. If she chanced to notice any sister too attentive to her dress, she reprov'd her for her error with knitted brows and severe looks, saying; "a clean body and a clean dress mean an unclean soul. A virgin's lips should never utter an improper or an impure word, for such indicate a lascivious mind and by the outward man the faults of the inward are made manifest." When she saw a sister verbose and talkative or forward and taking pleasure in quarrels, and when she found after frequent admonitions that the offender shewed no signs of improvement; she placed her among the lowest of the sisters and outside their society, ordering her to pray at the door of the refectory instead of with the rest, and commanding her to take her food by herself, in the hope that where rebuke had failed shame might bring about a reformation. The sin of theft she loathed as if it were sacrilege; and that which among men of the world is counted little or nothing she declared to be in a monastery a crime of the deepest dye. How shall I describe her kindness and attention towards the sick or the wonderful care and devotion with which she nursed them? Yet, although when others were sick she freely gave them every indulgence, and even allowed them to eat meat; when she fell ill herself, she made no concessions to her own weakness, and seemed unfairly to change in her own case to harshness the kindness which she was always ready to shew to others.

21. No young girl of sound and vigorous constitution could have delivered herself up to a regimen so rigid as that imposed upon herself by Paula whose physical powers age had impaired and enfeebled. I admit that in this she was too determined, refusing to spare herself or to listen to advice. I will relate what I know to be a fact. In the extreme heat of the month of July she was once attacked by a violent fever and we despaired of her life. However by God's mercy she rallied, and the doctors urged upon her the necessity of taking a little light wine to accelerate her recovery; saying that if she continued to drink water they feared that she might become dropsical. I on my side secretly appealed to the blessed pope Epiphanius to admonish, nay even to compel her, to take the wine. But she with her usual sagacity and quickness at once perceived the stratagem, and with a smile let him see that the advice he was giving her was after all not his but mine. Not to waste more words, the blessed prelate after many exhortations left her chamber; and, when I asked him what he had accomplished, replied, "Only this that old as I am I have been almost persuaded to drink no more wine." I relate this story not because I approve of persons rashly taking upon themselves burthens beyond their strength (for does not the scripture say: "Burden not thyself above thy power"? [Ps. 63:1]) but because I wish from this quality of perseverance in her to shew the passion of her mind and the yearning of her believing soul; both of which made her sing in David's words, "My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth after thee." [e.g. Aristotle, E.N. 2:6] Difficult as it is always to avoid extremes, the philosophers⁵¹ are quite right in their opinion that virtue is a mean and vice an excess, or as we may express it in one short sentence "In nothing too much." [Rom. 7:24] While thus unyielding in her contempt for food Paula was easily moved to sorrow and felt crushed by the deaths of her kinsfolk, especially those of her children. When one after another her husband and her daughters fell asleep, on each occasion the shock of their loss endangered her life. And although she signed her mouth and her breast with the sign of the cross, and endeavoured thus to alleviate a mother's grief; her feelings overpowered her and her maternal instincts were too much for her confiding mind. Thus while her intellect retained its mastery she was overcome by sheer physical weakness. On one occasion a sickness seized her and clung to her so long that it brought anxiety to us and danger to herself. Yet even then she was full of joy and repeated every moment the apostle's words: "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" [2 Tim. 4:7, 2 Tim. 4:8] The careful reader may say that my words are an invective rather than an eulogy. I call that Jesus whom she served and whom I desire to serve to be my witness that so far from unduly eulogizing her or depreciating her I tell the truth about her as one Christian writing of another; that I am writing a memoir and not a panegyric, and that what were faults in her might well be virtues in others less saintly. I speak thus of her faults to satisfy my own feelings and the passionate regret of us her brothers and sisters, who all of us love her still and all of us deplore her loss.

22. However, she has finished her course, she has kept the faith, and now she enjoys the crown of righteousness. [Rev. 14:4] She follows the Lamb whithersoever he goes. [Cf. Luke 6:21] She is filled now because once she was hungry. [Ps. 48:8] With joy does she sing: "as we have heard, so have we seen in the city of the Lord of hosts, in the city of our God." [Jer. 2:13] O blessed change! Once she wept but now laughs for evermore. Once she despised the broken cisterns of which the prophet speaks; [John. 4:14] but now she has found in the Lord a fountain of life. [Ps. 30:11] Once she wore haircloth but now she is clothed in white raiment, and can say: "thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness." [Ps. 102:9] Once she ate ashes like bread and mingled her drink with weeping; [Ps. 42:3] saying "my tears have been my meat day and night;" [Cf. Ps. 78:25] but now for all time she eats the bread of angels [Ps. 34:8] and sings: "O taste and see that the Lord is good;" [Ps. 45:1, R.V] and "my heart is overflowing with a goodly matter; I speak the things which I have made touching the king." [Isa. 65:13, Isa. 65:14] She now sees fulfilled Isaiah's words, or rather those of the Lord speaking through Isaiah: "Behold, my servants shall eat but ye shall be hungry: behold, my servants shall drink but ye shall be thirsty: behold, my servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed: behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart, but ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for vexation of spirit." [Ps. 42:1, Ps. 42:2] I have said that she always shunned the broken cisterns: she did so that she might find in the Lord a fountain of life, and that she might rejoice and sing: "as the hart panteth after the waterbrooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God. When shall I come and appear before God?" [Wisd. 9:15]

23. I must briefly mention the manner in which she avoided the foul cisterns of the heretics whom she regarded as no better than heathen. A certain cunning knave, in his own estimation both learned and clever, began without my knowledge to put to her such questions as these: What sin has an infant committed that it should be seized by the devil? Shall we be young or old when we rise again? If we die young and rise young, we shall after the resurrection require to have nurses. If however we die young and rise old, the dead will not rise again at all: they will be transformed into new beings. Will there be a distinction of sexes in the next world? Or will there be no such distinction? If the distinction continues, there will be wedlock and sexual intercourse and procreation of children. If however it does not continue, the bodies that rise again will not be the same. For, he argued, "the earthy tabernacle weigheth down the mind that miseth upon many things," [1 Cor. 15:44] but the bodies that we shall have in heaven will be subtle and spiritual according to the words of the apostle: "it is sown a natural body: it is raised a spiritual body." [Ps. 74:19, R.V] From all of which considerations he sought to prove that rational creatures have been for their faults and previous sins subjected to bodily conditions; and that according to the nature and guilt of their transgression they are born in this or that state of life. Some, he said, rejoice in sound bodies and wealthy and noble parents; others have for their portion diseased frames and poverty stricken homes; and by imprisonment in the present world and in bodies pay the penalty of their former sins. Paula listened and reported what she heard to me, at the same time pointing out the man. Thus upon me was laid the task of opposing this most noxious viper and deadly pest. It is of such that the Psalmist speaks when he writes: "deliver not the soul of thy turtle dove unto the wild beast," [Ps. 68:30, R.V] and "Rebuke the wild beast of the reeds;" [Matt. 22:29, Matt. 22:30] creatures who write iniquity and speak lies against the Lord and lift up their mouths against the Most High. As the fellow had tried to deceive Paula, I at her request went to him, and by asking him a few questions involved him in a dilemma. Do you believe, said I, that there will be a resurrection of the dead or do you disbelieve? He replied, I believe. I went on: Will the bodies that rise again be the same or different? He said, The same. Then I asked: What of their sex? Will that remain unaltered or will it be changed? At this question he became silent and swayed his head this way and that as a serpent does to avoid being struck. Accordingly I continued, As you have nothing to say I will answer for you and will draw the conclusion from your premises. If the woman shall not rise again as a woman nor the man as a man, there will be no resurrection of the dead. For the body is made up of sex and members. But if there shall be no sex and no members what will become of the resurrection of the body, which cannot exist without sex and members? And if there shall be no resurrection of the body, there can be no resurrection of the dead. But as to your objection taken from marriage, that, if the members shall remain the same, marriage must inevitably be allowed; it is disposed of by the Saviour's words: "ye do err not knowing the scriptures nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage but are as the angels."⁵² When it is said that they neither marry nor are given in marriage, the distinction of sex is shewn to persist. For no one says of things which have no capacity for marriage such as a stick or a stone that they neither marry nor are given in marriage; but this may well be said of those who while they can marry yet abstain from doing so by their own virtue and by the grace of Christ. But if you cavil at this and say, how shall we in that case be like the angels with whom there is neither male nor female, hear my answer in brief as follows. What the Lord promises to us is not the nature of angels but their mode of life and their bliss. And therefore John the Baptist is called an angel [John. 20:26-28] even before he is beheaded, and all God's holy men and virgins manifest in themselves even in this world the life of angels. When it is said "ye shall be like the angels," likeness only is promised and not a change of nature.

24. And now do you in your turn answer me these questions. How do you explain the fact that Thomas felt the hands of the risen Lord and beheld His side pierced by the spear? [Job. 21:4] And the fact that Peter saw the Lord standing on the shore [Luke 24:42, Luke 24:43] and eating a piece of a roasted fish and a honeycomb. [Mark 5:43] If He stood, He must certainly have had feet. If He pointed to His wounded side He must have also had chest and belly for to these the sides are attached and without them they cannot be. If He spoke, He must have used a tongue and palate and teeth. For as the bow strikes the strings, so to produce vocal sound does the tongue come in contact with the teeth. If His hands were felt, it follows that He must have had arms as well. Since therefore it is admitted that He had all the members which go to make up the body, He must have also had the whole body formed of them, and that not a woman's but a man's; that is to say, He rose again in the sex in which He died. And if you cavil farther and say: We shall eat then, I suppose, after the resurrection; or How can a solid and material body enter in contrary to its nature through closed doors? you shall receive from me this reply. Do not for this matter of food find fault with belief in the resurrection: for our Lord after raising the daughter of the ruler of the synagogue commanded food to be given her. [John. 12:2] And Lazarus who had been dead four days is described as sitting at meat with Him, [John. 20:19] the object in both cases being to shew that the resurrection was real and not merely apparent. And if from our Lord's entering in through closed doors [Matt. 14:25] you strive to prove that His body was spiritual and aerial, He must have had this spiritual body even before He suffered; since-contrary to the nature of heavy bodies-He was able to walk upon the sea. [Matt. 14:29] The apostle Peter also must be believed to have had a spiritual body for he also walked upon the waters with buoyant step. [Matt. 14:31] The true explanation is that when anything is done against nature, it is a manifestation of God's might and power. And to shew plainly that in these great signs our attention is asked not to a change in nature but to the almighty power of God, he who by faith had walked on water began to sink for the want of it and would have done so had not the Lord lifted him up with the reproving words, "O thou of little faith wherefore didst thou doubt?" [John. 20:27] I wonder that you can display such effrontery when the Lord Himself said, "reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless but believing." [Luke 24:39, Luke 24:40] and in another place, "behold my hands and my feet that it is I myself: handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have. And when he had thus spoken he shewed them his hands and his feet."⁵³ You hear Him speak of bones and flesh, of feet and hands; and yet you want to palm off on me the bubbles and airy nothings of which the stoics rave! [Ps. 36:6]

25. Moreover, if you ask how it is that a mere infant which has never sinned is seized by the devil, or at what age we shall rise again seeing that we die at different ages; my only answer-an unwelcome one, I fancy-will be in the words of scripture: "The judgments of God are a great deep," [Rom. 11:33, Rom. 11:34] and "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been his counsellor?"⁵⁴ No difference of age can affect the reality of the body. Although our frames are in a perpetual flux and lose or gain daily, these changes do not make us different individuals. I was not one person at ten years old, another at thirty and another at fifty; nor am I another now when all my head is gray. [Eph. 4:13] According to the traditions of the church and the teaching of the apostle Paul, the answer must be this; that we shall rise as perfect men in the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. [Jas. 1:19] At this age the Jews suppose Adam to have been created and at this age we read that the Lord and Saviour rose again. Many other arguments did I adduce from both testaments to stifle the outcry of this heretic.

26. From that day forward so profoundly did Paula commence to loathe the man-and all who agreed with him in his doctrines-that she publicly proclaimed them as enemies of the Lord. I have related this incident less with the design of confuting in a few words a heresy which would require volumes to confute it, than with the object of shewing the great faith of this saintly woman who preferred to subject herself to perpetual hostility from men rather than by friendships hurtful to herself to provoke or to offend God.

27. To revert then to that description of her character which I began a little time ago; no mind was ever more docile than was hers. She was slow to speak and swift to hear, [Deut. 27:9, R.V] remembering the precept, "Keep silence and hearken, O Israel."⁵⁵ The holy scriptures she knew by heart, and said of the history contained in them that it was the foundation of the truth; but, though she loved even this, she still preferred to seek for the underlying spiritual meaning and made this the keystone of the spiritual building raised within her soul. She asked leave that she and her daughter might read over the old and new testaments⁵⁶ under my guidance. Out of modesty I at first refused compliance, but as she persisted in her demand and frequently urged me to consent to it, I at last did so and taught her what I had learned not from myself-for self-confidence is the worst of teachers-but from the church's most famous writers. Wherever I stuck fast and honestly confessed myself at fault she would by no means rest content but would force me by fresh questions to point out to her which of many different solutions seemed to me the most probable. I will mention here another fact which to those who are envious may well seem incredible. While I myself beginning as a young man have with much toil and effort partially acquired the Hebrew tongue and study it now unceasingly lest if I leave it, it also may leave me; Paula, on making up her mind that she too would learn it, succeeded so well that she could chant the psalms in Hebrew and could speak the language without a trace of the pronunciation peculiar to Latin. The same accomplishment can be seen to this day in her daughter Eustochium, who always kept close to her mother's side, obeyed all her commands, never slept apart from her, never walked abroad or took a meal without her never had a penny that she could call her own, rejoiced when her mother gave to the poor her little patrimony, and fully believed that in filial affection she had the best heritage and the truest riches. I must not pass over in silence the joy which Paula felt when she heard her little granddaughter and namesake, the child of Laeta and Toxotius-who was born and I may even say conceived in answer to a vow of her parents dedicating her to virginity-when, I say, she heard the little one in her cradle sing "alleluia" and falter out the words "grandmother" and "aunt." One wish alone made her long to see her native land again; that she might know her son and his wife and child [Matt. 8:25, Luke 8:24] to have renounced the world and to be serving Christ. And it has been granted to her in part. For while her granddaughter is destined to take the veil, her daughter-in-law has vowed herself to perpetual chastity, and by faith and alms emulates the example that her mother has set her. She strives to exhibit at Rome the virtues which Paula set forth in all their fulness at Jerusalem.

28. What ails thee, my soul? Why dost thou shudder to approach her death? I have made my letter longer than it should be already; dreading to come to the end and vainly supposing that by saying nothing of it and by occupying myself with her praises I could postpone the evil day. Hitherto the wind has been all in my favour and my keel has smoothly ploughed through the heaving waves. But now my speech is running upon the rocks, the billows are mountains high, and imminent shipwreck awaits both you and me. We must needs cry out: "Master; save us we perish:" [Ps. 44:23] and "awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord?" [Eccles. 9:2] For who could tell the tale of Paula's dying with dry eyes? She fell into a most serious illness and thus gained what she most desired, power to leave us and to be joined more fully to the Lord. Eustochium's affection for her mother, always true and tried, in this time of sickness approved itself still more to all. She sat by Paula's bedside, she fanned her, she supported her head, she arranged her pillows, she chafed her feet, she rubbed her stomach, she smoothed down the bedclothes, she heated hot water, she brought towels. In fact she anticipated the servants in all their duties, and when one of them did anything she regarded it as so much taken away from her own gain. How unceasingly she prayed, how copiously she wept, how constantly she ran to and fro between her prostrate mother and the cave of the Lord! imploring God that she might not be deprived of a companion so dear, that if Paula was to die she might herself no longer live, and that one bier might carry to burial her and her mother. Alas for the frailty and perishableness of human nature! Except that our belief in Christ raises us up to heaven and promises eternity to our souls, the physical conditions of life are the same for us as for the brutes. "There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; to the good and to the evil; to the clean and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth and to him that sacrificeth not: as is the good so is the sinner; and he that sweareth as he that feareth an oath." [Ps. 26:8] Man and beast alike are dissolved into dust and ashes.

29. Why do I still linger, and prolong my suffering by postponing it? Paula's intelligence shewed her that her death was near. Her body and limbs grew cold and only in her holy breast did the warm beat of the living soul continue. Yet, as though she were leaving strangers to go home to her own people, she whispered the verses of the psalmist: "Lord, I have loved the habitation of thy house and the place where thine honour dwelleth," [Ps. 84:1, Ps. 84:2] and "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts! My soul longeth yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord," [Ps. 84:10, Vulg] and "I had rather be an outcast in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."⁵⁷ When I asked her why she remained silent refusing to answer my call,⁵⁸ and whether she was in pain, she replied in Greek that she had no suffering and that all things were to her eyes calm and tranquil. After this she said no more but closed her eyes as though she already despised all mortal things, and kept repeating the verses just quoted down to the moment in which she breathed out her soul, but in a tone so low that we could scarcely hear what she said. Raising her finger also to her mouth she made the sign of the cross upon her lips. Then her breath failed her and she gasped for death; yet even when her soul was eager to break free, she turned the death-rattle (which comes at last to all) into the praise of the Lord. The bishop of Jerusalem and some from other cities were present, also a great number of the inferior clergy, both priests and levites. [Cant. 2:10-12, Vulg] The entire monastery was filled with bodies of virgins and monks. As soon as Paula heard the bridegroom saying: "Rise up my love my fair one, my dove, and come away: for, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone," she answered joyfully "the flowers appear on the earth; the time to cut them has come" [Ps. 27:13] and "I believe that I shall see the good things of the Lord in the land of the living." [Acts 9:39]

30. No weeping or lamentation followed her death, such as are the custom of the world; but all present united in chanting the psalms in their several tongues. The bishops lifted up the dead woman with their own hands, placed her upon a bier, and carrying her on their shoulders to the church in the cave of the Saviour, laid her down in the centre of it. Other bishops meantime carried torches and tapers in the procession, and yet others led the singing of the choirs. The whole population of the cities of Palestine came to her funeral. Not a single monk lurked in the desert or lingered in his cell. Not a single virgin remained shut up in the seclusion of her chamber. To each and all it would have seemed sacrilege to have withheld the last tokens of respect from a woman so saintly. As in the case of Dorcas, [Ps. 131:2] the widows and the poor shewed the garments Paula had given them; while the destitute cried aloud that they had lost in her a mother and a nurse. Strange to say, the paleness of death had not altered her expression; only a certain solemnity and seriousness had overspread her features. You would have thought her not dead but asleep.

One after another they chanted the psalms, now in Greek, now in Latin, now in Syriac; and this not merely for the three days which elapsed before she was buried beneath the church and close to the cave of the Lord, but throughout the remainder of the week. All who were assembled felt that it was their own funeral at which they were assisting, and shed tears as if they themselves had died. Paula's daughter, the revered virgin Eustochium, "as a child that is weaned of his mother,"

[Corbona. See Matt. 27:6, Vulg] could not be torn away from her parent. She kissed her eyes, pressed her lips upon her brow, embraced her frame, and wished for nothing better than to be buried with her.

31. Jesus is witness that Paula has left not a single penny to her daughter but, as I said before, on the contrary a large mass of debt; and, worse even than this, a crowd of brothers and sisters whom it is hard for her to support but whom it would be undutiful to cast off. Could there be a more splendid instance of self-renunciation than that of this noble lady who in the fervour of her faith gave away so much of her wealth that She reduced herself to the last degree of poverty? Others may boast, if they will, of money spent in charity, of large sums heaped up in God's treasury, [1 Cor. 2:9] of votive offerings hung up with cords of gold. None of them has given more to the poor than Paula, for Paula has kept nothing for herself. But now she enjoys the true riches and those good things which eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have they entered into the heart of man. [Cant. 5:10] If we mourn, it is for ourselves and not for her; yet even so, if we persist in weeping for one who reigns with Christ, we shall seem to envy her her glory.

32. Be not fearful, Eustochium: you are endowed with a splendid heritage. The Lord is your portion; and, to increase your joy, your mother has now after a long martyrdom won her crown. It is not only the shedding of blood that is accounted a confession: the spotless service of a devout mind is itself a daily martyrdom. Both alike are crowned; with roses and violets in the one case, with lilies in the other. Thus in the Song of Songs it is written: "my beloved is white and ruddy;" [Gen. 12:1] for, whether the victory be won in peace or in war, God gives the same guerdon to those who win it. Like Abraham your mother heard the words: "get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, unto a land that I will shew thee;" [Jer. 51:6] and not only that but the Lord's command given through Jeremiah: "flee out of the midst of Babylon, and deliver every man his soul." [Ruth 1:16] To the day of her death she never returned to Chaldea, or regretted the fleshpots of Egypt or its strong-smelling meats. Accompanied by her virgin bands she became a fellow-citizen of the Saviour; and now that she has ascended from her little Bethlehem to the heavenly realms she can say to the true Naomi: "thy people shall be my people and thy God my God."59

33. I have spent the labour of two nights in dictating for you this treatise; and in doing so I have felt a grief as deep as your own. I say in 'dictating' for I have not been able to write it myself. As often as I have taken up my pen [Horace, C. III. 30:1] and have tried to fulfil my promise; my fingers have stiffened, my hand has fallen, and my power over it has vanished. The rudeness of the diction, devoid as it is of all elegance or charm, bears witness to the feeling of the writer.

34. And now, Paula, farewell, and aid with your prayers the old age of your votary. Your faith and your works unite you to Christ; thus standing in His presence you will the more readily gain what you ask. In this letter "I have built" to your memory "a monument more lasting than bronze," [2 Cor. 3:6] which no lapse of time will be able to destroy. And I have cut an inscription on your tomb, which I here subjoin; that, wherever my narrative may go, the reader may learn that you are buried at Bethlehem and not uncommemorated there.

"The Inscription On Paula's Tomb. Within this tomb a child of Scipio lies, A daughter of the farfamed Pauline house, A scion of the Gracchi, of the stock Of Agamemnon's self, illustrious: Here rests the lady Paula, well-beloved Of both her parents, with Eustochium For daughter; she the first of Roman dames Who hardship chose and Bethlehem for Christ." In front of the cavern there is another inscription as follows:-

"Seest thou here hollowed in the rock a grave,
'Tis Paula's tomb; high heaven has her soul.
Who Rome and friends, riches and home forsook
Here in this lonely spot to find her rest.
For here Christ's manger was, and here the kings
To Him, both God and man, their offerings made."

35. The holy and blessed Paula fell asleep on the seventh day before the Kalends of February, on the third day of the week, after the sun had set. She was buried on the fifth day before the same Kalends, in the sixth consulship of the Emperor Honorius and the first of Aristnetus. She lived in the vows of religion five years at Rome and twenty years at Bethlehem. The whole duration of her life was fifty-six years eight months and twenty-one days.

1:

Ps. 120:5, Ps. 120:6 acc. to Jerome's latest version

2: Sacerdotes 3: See Letter XXXIX 4: Of continence. See Letter LXVI. 3

5: a.d. 382 6: Theodosius and Valentinian 7: Wife of Flavius Clemens, believed to have been a Christian martyr 8: i.e. the straits of Messina 9: A port on the S.W. coast of the Peloponnese 10: At this time one of the three bishops who claimed the see of Antioch. See Ep. 15:2

11:

A maritime city of Palestine which subsequently to its restoration by Herod became first the civil, and then the ecclesiastical, capital of Palestine

12:

Andromeda had been chained to a rock by her father to assuage the wrath of Poseidon who had sent a sea monster to ravage the country. Here she was found by Perseus who slew the monster and effected her rescue. See Josephus B. J. 3:ix. 3

13: Josh. ix 14: Judges 19:Judges 20:According to Judges 20:47 the number of Benjamites who escaped was six hundred 15: Josephus, A.J. 20:ii. 6 16: Or more fully Aelia Capitolina, a Roman colony from which all Jews were expelled 17: Praetorium. The word occurs in John 18:28 18: This legend of the cave dates back to Justin Martyr 19: John. 1:1, John. 1:14 logoj the Vulg. has `verbum 0' both here and in Luke 20: The name means this in Hebrew 21: The word `not 0' is inserted by Paula from Matt. 2:6 22: `Will he 0' A.V. following the Hebrew 23: LXX. acc. to one reading 24: This clause comes from the LXX 25: Jerome taught Paula Hebrew 26: This town played an important part in the wars of the Maccabees 27: Cellulae, lit. `little cells. 0 28: Josh. 14:15. In Hebrew `Adam 0' and `man 0' are the same word. Hence the mistake 29: Perhaps identical with "the valley of Berachah" mentioned in 2 Chr. 20:26 30: The jaw was the priest's portion and hence the epithet 'priestly O': or else Bethphage belonged to the priests

31: Humilia 32: Strictly Damim 33: i.e. the Jews and the Gentiles 34: 2 K. 2:19-22, type and antitype are, as often, here confounded 35: The founder of a Samaritan sect akin to the Essenes 36: Other authorities for these strange phenomena are Hilary, Sulpicius, and Paulinus 37: According to the common tradition, but Hermon is more likely to have been the place 38: In the original 'Hermon and the Hermons O'; an allusion to the Hebrew text of Ps. 42:6 39: A mistake: No is Thebes 40: i.e. presbyters and deacons. Cf. §29, infra 41: At that time the most famous of the Egyptian hermits

42:

Jerome's own name had been coupled with Paula's when they both lived at Rome, but he was able to shew that his relations with her were wholly innocent

43: Luke 3:11. The word alteram, one of two (therefore, Jerome means, retaining the second) is found in the Syriac Version of Cureton. It is not found in the Vulgate 44: Hor. C. 2:x. ii 45: The enemy of Solomon-1 K. 11:14. Who Paula's enemy may have been we do not know 46: Ps. 39:1, Ps. 39:2, acc. to the Gallican psalter

47:

Vulg

48:

The Gathering; perhaps used, like the Greek sunodoj, for the Communion. The opening prayer came thus to be called The Collect. See note on Letter LI.

49: For the canonical hours see note on Letter XXII 50: Cf. Sall. Cat. xi 51: Ne quid nimis, in Greek Mhden agan 52: Luke 7:27. 'Angel O' is a Greek word and means 'messenger. O 53: Globos stoicorum atque aëria quaedam deliramenta 54: Jerome was at this time about 60 years old 55: Vetus et novum instrumentum 56: Toxotius, Laeta, the younger Paula. Comp. Letter CVII 57: For the technical meaning of inclamatio vide Virg. A. 1. 219, with Conington's note 58: i.e. presbyters and deacons-see above

59:

Stilus

Letters - letter_109

Letter 109. To Riparius.

Riparius, a presbyter of Aquitaine had written to inform Jerome that Vigilantius (for whom see Letter 61.) was preaching in southern Gaul against the worship of relics and the keeping of night vigils; and this apparently with the consent of his bishop. Jerome now replies in a letter more noteworthy for its bitterness than for its logic. Nevertheless he offers to write a full confutation of Vigilantius if Riparius will send him the book containing his heresies. This Riparius subsequently did and then Jerome wrote his treatise Against Vigilantius, the most extreme and least convincing of all his works. The date of the letter is 404 a.d.

1. Now that I have received a letter from you, if I do not answer it I shall be guilty of pride, and if I do I shall be guilty of rashness. For the matters concerning which you ask my opinion are such that they cannot either be spoken of or listened to without profanity. You tell me that Vigilantius (whose very name Wakeful is a contradiction: he ought rather to be described as Sleepy) has again opened his fetid lips and is pouring forth a torrent of filthy venom upon the relics of the holy martyrs; and that he calls us who cherish them ashmongers and idolaters who pay homage to dead men's bones. Unhappy wretch! to be wept over by all Christian men, who sees not that in speaking thus he makes himself one with the Samaritans and the Jews who hold dead bodies unclean and regard as defiled even vessels which have been in the same house with them, following the letter that killeth and not the spirit that giveth life. [Eph. 1:21] We, it is true, refuse to worship or adore, I say not the relics of the martyrs, but even the sun and moon, the angels and archangels, the Cherubim and Seraphim and "every name that is named, not only in this world but also in that which is to come." [Rom. 1:25] For we may not serve the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed for ever. [Matt. 10:40] Still we honour the relics of the martyrs, that we may adore Him whose martyrs they are. We honour the servants that their honour may be reflected upon their Lord who Himself says: "he that receiveth you receiveth me." [Deut. 34:6] I ask Vigilantius, Are the relics of Peter and of Paul unclean? Was the body of Moses unclean, of which we are told (according to the correct Hebrew text) that it was buried by the Lord Himself? And do we, every time that we enter the basilicas of apostles and prophets and martyrs, pay homage to the shrines of idols? Are the tapers which burn before their tombs only the tokens of idolatry? I will go farther still and ask a question which will make this theory recoil upon the head of its inventor and which will either kill or cure that frenzied brain of his, so that simple souls shall be no more subverted by his sacrilegious reasonings. Let him answer me this, Was the Lord's body unclean when it was placed in the sepulchre? And did the angels clothed in white raiment merely watch over a corpse dead and defiled, that ages afterwards this sleepy fellow might indulge in dreams and vomit forth his filthy surfeit, so as, like the persecutor Julian, either to destroy the basilicas of the saints or to convert them into heathen temples?

2. I am surprised that the reverend bishop [Ps. 2:9] in whose diocese he is said to be a presbyter acquiesces in this his mad preaching, and that he does not rather with apostolic rod, nay with a rod of iron, shatter this useless vessel [1 Cor. 5:5] and deliver him for the destruction of the flesh that the spirit may be saved. [Ps. 50:18] He should remember the words that are said: "When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst unto him; and hast been partaker with adulterers;" [Ps. 101:8] and in another place, "I will early destroy all the wicked of the land; that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the Lord;" and again "Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee? I hate them with perfect hatred." [Ps. 139:21, Ps. 139:22] If the relics of the martyrs are not worthy of honour, how comes it that we read "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints?" [Ps. 116:15] If dead men's bones defile those that touch them, how came it that the dead Elisha raised another man also dead, and that life came to this latter from the body of the prophet which according to Vigilantius must have been unclean? In that case every encampment of the host of Israel and the people of God was unclean; for they carried the bodies of Joseph and of the patriarchs with them in the wilderness, and carried their unclean ashes even into the holy land. In that case Joseph, who was a type of our Lord and Saviour, was a wicked man; for he carried up Jacob's bones with great pomp to Hebron merely to put his unclean father beside his unclean grandfather and great grandfather, that is, one dead body along with others. The wretch's tongue should be cut out, or he should be put under treatment for insanity. As he does not know how to speak, he should learn to be silent. I have myself before now seen the monster, and have done my best to bind the maniac with texts of scripture, as Hippocrates binds his patients with chains; but "he went away, he departed, he escaped, he broke out," [Cic. Cat. 2:1, of Catiline] and taking refuge between the Adriatic and the Alps of King Cotius² declaimed in his turn against me. For all that a fool says must be regarded as mere noise and mouthing.

3. You may perhaps in your secret thoughts find fault with me for thus assailing a man behind his back. I will frankly admit that my indignation overpowers me; I cannot listen with patience to such sacrilegious opinions. I have read of the javelin of Phinehas, [Nu. 25:7, Nu. 25:8] of the harshness of Elijah, [1 K. 18:40] of the jealous anger of Simon the zealot,³ of the severity of Peter in putting to death Ananias and Sapphir, [Acts 5:1-10] and of the firmness of Paul who, when Elymas the sorcerer withstood the ways of the Lord, doomed him to lifelong blindness. [Acts 13:8-11] There is no cruelty in regard for God's honour. Wherefore also in the Law it is said: "If thy brother or thy friend or the wife of thy bosom entice thee from the truth, thine hand shall be upon them and thou shalt shed their blood, [Deut. 13:6-9] and so shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of Israel." [Deut. 13:5] Once more I ask, Are the relics of the martyrs unclean? If so, why did the apostles allow themselves to walk in that funeral procession before the body-the unclean body-of Stephen? Why did they make great lamentation over him, [Acts 8:2] that their grief might be turned into our joy?

You tell me farther that Vigilantius execrates vigils. In this surely he goes contrary to his name. The Wakeful one wishes to sleep and will not hearken to the Saviour's words, "What, could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing but the flesh is weak." [Matt. 26:40, Matt. 26:41] And in another place a prophet sings: "At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee because of thy righteous judgments." [Ps. 119:62] We read also in the gospel how the Lord spent whole nights in prayer [Luke 6:12] and how the apostles when they were shut up in prison kept vigil all night long, singing their psalms until the earth quaked, and the keeper of the prison believed, and the magistrates and citizens were filled with terror. [Acts 16:25-38] Paul says: "continue in prayer and watch in the same," [Col. 4:2] and in another place he speaks of himself as "in watchings often." [2 Cor. 11:27] Vigilantius may sleep if he pleases and may choke in his sleep, destroyed by the destroyer of Egypt and of the Egyptians. But let us say with David: "Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep." [Ps. 121:4] So will the Holy One and the Watcher come to us.⁴ And if ever by reason of our sins He fall asleep, let us say to Him: "Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord;" [Ps. 44:23] and when our ship is tossed by the waves let us rouse Him and say, "Master, save us: we perish." [Matt. 8:25, Luke 8:24]

4. I would dictate more were it not that the limits of a letter impose upon me a modest silence. I might have gone on, had you sent me the books which contain this man's rhapsodies, for in that case I should have known what points I had to refute. As it is I am only beating the air [Cf. 1 Cor. 9:26.] and revealing not so much his infidelity-for this is patent to all-as my own faith. But if you wish me to write against him at greater length, send me those wretched dronings of his and in my answer he shall hear an echo of John the Baptist's words "Now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees; therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire." [Matt. 3:10] 1: Probably Exuperius of Toulouse.

2: A contemporary and ally of Augustus 3: Luke 6:15 - so called probably because he came from the most fanatical party among the Pharisees 4: Dan. 4:13. Jerome gives the Hebrew word for watcher, viz. ry

Letters - letter_110

Letter 110. From Augustine.

Augustine's answer to Letter 102. He now tries to soothe Jerome's wounded feelings. begs him to overlook the offence that he has committed, and implores him not to break off the friendly relations hitherto maintained between them. He touches on the quarrel between Jerome and Rufinus and sincerely hopes that no such breach may ever separate Jerome from himself. The tone of the letter is throughout conciliatory and is marked in places with deep feeling. More than once Augustine dwells on Jerome's words ("would that I could embrace you and that by mutual converse we might learn one from the other," Letter 102.§2) and speaks of the comfort which they have brought to him. The date of the letter is 404 a.d. Sometimes numbered as Augustine letter 73. To Jerome, My Venerable and Most Esteemed Brother and Fellow-Presbyter Augustine Sends Greeting in the Lord.

1. Although I suppose that, before this reaches you, you have received through our son the deacon Cyprian, a servant of God, the letter which I sent by him, from which you would be apprised with certainty that I wrote the letter of which you mentioned that a copy had been brought to you; in consequence of which I suppose that I have begun already, like the rash Dares, to be beaten and belaboured by the missiles and the merciless fists of a second Entellus in the reply which you have written; nevertheless I answer in the meantime the letter which you have deigned to send me by our holy son Asterius, in which I have found many proofs of your most kind goodwill to me, and at the same time some signs of your having in some measure felt agrieved by me. In reading it, therefore, I was no sooner soothed by one sentence than I was buffeted in another; my wonder being especially called forth by this, that after alleging, as your reason for not rashly accepting as authentic the letter from me of which you had a copy, the fact that, offended by your reply, I might justly remonstrate with you, because you ought first to have ascertained that it was mine before answering it, you go on to command me to acknowledge the letter frankly if it is mine, or send a more reliable copy of it, in order that we may, without any bitterness of feeling, address ourselves to the discussion of scriptural doctrine. For how can we engage in such discussion without bitterness of feeling, if you have made up your mind to offend me? Or, if your mind is not made up to this, what reason could I have had, when you did not offend me, for justly complaining as having been offended by you, that you ought first to have made sure that the letter was mine, and only then to have replied, that is to say, only then to have offended me? For if there had been nothing to offend me in your reply, I could have had no just ground of complaint. Accordingly, when you write such a reply to that letter as must offend me, what hope is left of our engaging without any bitterness in the discussion of scriptural doctrine? Far be it from me to take offense if you are willing and able to prove, by incontrovertible argument, that you have apprehended more correctly than I have the meaning of that passage in Paul's Epistle [to the Galatians], or of any other text in Holy Scripture: nay, more, far be it from me to count it anything else than gain to myself, and cause of thankfulness to you, if in anything I am either informed by your teaching or set right by your correction.

2. But, my very dear brother, you could not think that I could be offended by your reply, had you not thought that you were offended by what I had written. For I could never have entertained concerning you the idea that you had not felt yourself offended by me if you so framed your reply as to offend me in return. If, on the other hand, I have been supposed by you to be capable of such preposterous folly as to take offense when you had not written in such a way as to give me occasion, you have in this already wronged me, that you have entertained such an opinion of me. But surely you who are so cautious, that although you recognised my style in the letter of which you had a copy, you refused to believe its authenticity, would not without consideration believe me to be so different from what your experience has proved me to be. For if you had good reason for seeing that I might justly complain had you hastily concluded that a letter not written by me was mine, how much more reasonably may I complain if you form, without consideration, such an estimate of myself as is contradicted by your own experience! You would not therefore go so far astray in your judgment as to believe, when you had written nothing by which I could be offended, that I would nevertheless be so foolish as to be capable of being offended by such a reply.

3. There can therefore be no doubt that you were prepared to reply in such a way as would offend me, if you had only indisputable evidence that the letter was mine. Accordingly, since I do not believe that you would think it right to offend me unless you had just cause, it remains for me to confess, as I now do, my fault as having been the first to offend by writing that letter which I cannot deny to be mine. Why should I strive to swim against the current, and not rather ask pardon? I therefore entreat you by the mercy of Christ to forgive me wherein I have injured you, and not to render evil for evil by injuring me in return. For it will be an injury to me if you pass over in silence anything which you find wrong in either word or action of mine. If, indeed, you rebuke in me that which merits no rebuke, you do wrong to yourself, not to me; for far be it from one of your life and holy vows to rebuke merely from a desire to give offense, using the tongue of malice to condemn in me that which by the truth-revealing light of reason you know to deserve no blame. Therefore either rebuke kindly him whom, though he is free from fault, you think to merit rebuke; or with a father's kindness soothe him whom you cannot bring to agree with you. For it is possible that your opinion may be at variance with the truth, while notwithstanding your actions are in harmony with Christian charity: for I also shall most thankfully receive your rebuke as a most friendly action, even though the thing censured be capable of defense, and therefore ought not to have been censured; or else I shall acknowledge both your kindness and my fault, and shall be found, so far as the Lord enables me, grateful for the one, and corrected in regard to the other.

4. Why, then, shall I fear your words, hard, perhaps, like the boxing-gloves of Entellus, but certainly fitted to do me good? The blows of Entellus were intended not to heal, but to harm, and therefore his antagonist was conquered, not cured. But I, if I receive your correction calmly as a necessary medicine, shall not be pained by it. If, however, through weakness, either common to human nature or peculiar to myself, I cannot help feeling some pain from rebuke, even when I am justly reprov'd, it is far better to have a tumour in one's head cured, though the lance cause pain, than to escape the pain by letting the disease go on. This was clearly seen by him who said that, for the most part, our enemies who expose our faults are more useful than friends who are afraid to reprove us. For the former, in their angry recriminations, sometimes charge us with what we indeed require to correct; but the latter, through fear of destroying the sweetness of friendship, show less boldness on behalf of right than they ought. Since, therefore, you are, to quote your own comparison, an ox worn out, perhaps, as to your bodily strength by reason of years, but unimpaired in mental vigour, and toiling still assiduously and with profit in the Lord's threshing-floor; here am I, and in whatever I have spoken amiss, tread firmly on me: the weight of your venerable age should not be grievous to me, if the chaff of my fault be so bruised under foot as to be separated from me.

5. Let me further say, that it is with the utmost affectionate yearning that I read or recollect the words at the end of your letter, "Would that I could receive your embrace, and that by converse we might aid each other in learning." For my part, I say — Would that we were even dwelling in parts of the earth less widely separated; so that if we could not meet for converse, we might at least have a more frequent exchange of letters. For as it is, so great is the distance by which we are prevented from any kind of access to each other through the eye and ear, that I remember writing to your Holiness regarding these words in the Epistle to the Galatians when I was young; and behold I am now advanced in age, and have not yet received a reply, and a copy of my letter has reached you by some strange accident earlier than the letter itself, about the transmission of which I took no small pains. For the man to whom I entrusted it neither delivered it to you nor returned it to me. So great in my esteem is the value of those of your writings which we have been able to procure, that I should prefer to all other studies the privilege, if it were attainable by me, of sitting by your side and learning from you. Since I cannot do this myself, I propose to send to you one of my sons in the Lord, that he may for my benefit be instructed by you, in the event of my receiving from you a favourable reply in regard to the matter. For I have not now, and I can never hope to have, such knowledge of the Divine Scriptures as I see you possess. Whatever abilities I may have for such study, I devote entirely to the instruction of the people whom God has entrusted to me; and I am wholly precluded by my ecclesiastical occupations from having leisure for any further prosecution of my studies than is necessary for my duty in public teaching.

6. I am not acquainted with the writings speaking injuriously of you, which you tell me have come into Africa. I have, however, received the reply to these which you have been pleased to send. After reading it, let me say frankly, I have been exceedingly grieved that the mischief of such painful discord has arisen between persons once so loving and intimate, and formerly united by the bond of a friendship which was well known in almost all the Churches. In that treatise of yours, any one may see how you are keeping yourself under restraint, and holding back the stinging keenness of your indignation, lest you should render railing for railing. If, however, even in reading this reply of yours, I fainted with grief and shuddered with fear, what would be the effect produced in me by the things which he has written against you, if they should come into my possession! "Woe unto the world because of offenses!" [Matthew 18:7] Behold the complete fulfilment of which He who is Truth foretold: "Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold." [Matthew 24:12] For what trusting hearts can now pour themselves forth with any assurance of their confidence being reciprocated? Into whose breast may confiding love now throw itself without reserve? In short, where is the friend who may not be feared as possibly a future enemy, if the breach that we deplore could arise between Jerome and Rufinus? Oh, sad and pitiable is our portion! Who can rely upon the affection of his friends because of what he knows them to be now, when he has no foreknowledge of what they shall afterwards become? But why should I reckon it cause for sorrow, that one man is thus ignorant of what another may become, when no man knows even what he himself is afterwards to be? The utmost that he knows, and that he knows but imperfectly, is his present condition; of what he shall hereafter become he has no knowledge.

7. Do the holy and blessed angels possess not only this knowledge of their actual character, but also a foreknowledge of what they shall afterward become? If they do, I cannot see how it was possible for Satan ever to have been happy, even while he was still a good angel, knowing, as in this case he must have known, his future transgression and eternal punishment. I would wish to hear what you think as to this question, if indeed it be one which it would be profitable for us to be able to answer. But mark here what I suffer from the lands and seas which keep us, so far as the body is concerned, distant from each other. If I were myself the letter which you are now reading, you might have told me already what I have just asked; but now, when will you write me a reply? When will you get it sent away? When will it come here? When shall I receive it? And yet, would that I were sure that it would come at last, though meanwhile I must summon all the patience which I can command to endure the unwelcome but unavoidable delay! Wherefore I come back to those most delightful words of your letter, filled with your holy longing, and I in turn appropriate them as my own: "Would that I might receive your embrace, and that by converse we might aid each other in learning,"— if indeed there be any sense in which I could possibly impart instruction to you.

8. When by these words, now mine not less than yours, I am gladdened and refreshed, and when I am comforted not a little by the fact that in both of us a desire for mutual fellowship exists, though meanwhile unsatisfied, it is not long before I am pierced through by darts of keenest sorrow when I consider Rufinus and you, to whom God had granted in fullest measure and for a length of time that which both of us have longed for, so that in most close and endearing fellowship you feasted together on the honey of the Holy Scriptures, and think how between you the blight of such exceeding bitterness has found its way, constraining us to ask when, where, and in whom the same calamity may not be reasonably feared; seeing that it has befallen you at the very time when, unencumbered, having cast away secular burdens, you were following the Lord and were living together in that very land which was trodden by the feet of our Lord, when He said, "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you;" [John 14:27] being, moreover, men of mature age, whose life was devoted to the study of the word of God. Truly "man's life on earth is a period of trial." If I could anywhere meet you both together — which, alas, I cannot hope to do — so strong are my agitation, grief, and fear, that I think I would cast myself at your feet, and there weeping till I could weep no more, would, with all the eloquence of love, appeal first to each of you for his own sake, then to both for each other's sake, and for the sake of those, especially the weak, "for whom Christ died," [1 Corinthians 8:11] whose salvation is in peril, as they look on you who occupy a place so conspicuous on the stage of time; imploring you not to write and scatter abroad these hard words against each other, which, if at any time you who are now at variance were reconciled, you could not destroy, and which you could not then venture to read lest strife should be kindled anew.

9. But I say to your Charity, that nothing has made me tremble more than your estrangement from Rufinus, when I read in your letter some of the indications of your being displeased with me. I refer not so much to what you say of Entellus and of the wearied ox, in which you appear to me to use genial pleasantry rather than angry threat, but to that which you have evidently written in earnest, of which I have already spoken perhaps more than was fitting, but not more than my fears compelled me to do — namely, the words, "lest perchance, being offended, you should have reason to remonstrate with me." If it be possible for us to examine and discuss anything by which our hearts may be nourished, without any bitterness of discord I entreat you let us address ourselves to this. But if it is not possible for either of us to point out what he may judge to demand correction in the other's writings, without being suspected of envy and regarded as wounding friendship, let us, having regard to our spiritual life and health, leave such conference alone. Let us content ourselves with smaller attainments in that [knowledge] which puffs up, if we can thereby preserve unharmed that [charity] which edifies. [1 Corinthians 8:1] I feel that I come far short of that perfection of which it is written, "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man;" [James 3:2] but through God's mercy I truly believe myself able to ask your forgiveness for that in which I have offended you: and this you ought to make plain to me, that through my hearing you, you may gain your brother. [Matthew 18:18] Nor should you make it a reason for leaving me in error, that the distance between us on the earth's surface makes it impossible for us to meet face to face. As concerns the subjects into which we inquire, if I know, or believe, or think that I have got hold of the truth in a matter in which your opinion is different from mine, I shall by all means endeavour, as the Lord may enable me, to maintain my view without injuring you. And as to any offense which I may give to you, so soon as I perceive your displeasure, I shall unreservedly beg your forgiveness.

10. I think, moreover, that your reason for being displeased with me can only be, that I have either said what I ought not, or have not expressed myself in the manner in which I ought: for I do not wonder that we are less thoroughly known to each other than we are to our most close and intimate friends. Upon the love of such friends I readily cast myself without reservation, especially when chafed and wearied by the scandals of this world; and in their love I rest without any disturbing care: for I perceive that God is there, on whom I confidently cast myself, and in whom I confidently rest. Nor in this confidence am I disturbed by any fear of that uncertainty as to the morrow which must be present when we lean upon human weakness, and which I have in a former paragraph bewailed. For when I perceive that a man is burning with Christian love, and feel that thereby he has been made a faithful friend to me, whatever plans or thoughts of mine I entrust to him I regard as entrusted not to the man, but to Him in whom his character makes it evident that he dwells: for "God is love, and he that dwells in love dwells in God, and God in him;" [1 John 4:16] and if he cease to dwell in love, his forsaking it cannot but cause as much pain as his abiding in it caused joy. Nevertheless, in such a case, when one who was an intimate friend has become an enemy, it is better that he should search out what ingenuity may help him to fabricate to our prejudice, than that he should find what anger may provoke him to reveal. This every one most easily secures, not by concealing what he does, but by doing nothing which he would wish to conceal. And this the mercy of God grants to good and pious men: they go out and in among their friends in liberty and without fear, whatever these friends may afterwards become: the sins which may have been committed by others within their knowledge they do not reveal, and they themselves avoid doing what they would fear to see revealed. For when any false charge is fabricated by a slanderer, either it is disbelieved, or, if it is believed, our reputation alone is injured, our spiritual wellbeing is not affected. But when, any sinful action is committed, that action becomes a secret enemy, even though it be not revealed by the thoughtless or malicious talk of one acquainted with our secrets. Wherefore any person of discernment may see in your own example how, by the comfort of a good conscience, you bear what would otherwise be insupportable — the incredible enmity of one who was formerly your most intimate and beloved friend; and how even what he utters against you, even what may to your disadvantage be believed by some, you turn to good account as the armour of righteousness on the left hand, which is not less useful than armour on the right hand [2 Corinthians 6:7] in our warfare with the devil. But truly I would rather see him less bitter in his accusations, than see you thus more fully armed by them. This is a great and a lamentable wonder, that you should have passed from such amity to such enmity: it would be a joyful and a much greater event, should you come back from such enmity to the friendship of former days.

Letters - letter_111

Letter 111. From Augustine to Prsidius.

Augustine asks Prsidius to forward the preceding letter to Jerome and also to write himself to urge him to forgive Augustine. Sometimes numbered as Augustine Letter 74. To My Lord Præsidius, Most Blessed, My Brother and Partner in the Priestly Office, Truly Esteemed, Augustine Sends Greeting in the Lord.

1. I write to remind you of the request which I made to you as a sincere friend when you were here, that you would not refuse to send a letter of mine to our holy brother and fellow presbyter Jerome; in order, moreover, to let your Charity know in what terms you ought to write to him on my behalf. I have sent a copy of my letter to him, and of his to me, by reading which your pious wisdom may easily see both the moderation of tone which I have been careful to preserve, and the vehemence on his part by which I have been not unreasonably filled with fear. If, however, I have written anything which I ought not to have written, or have expressed myself in an unbecoming way, let it not be to him, but to myself, in brotherly love, that you send your opinion of what I have done, in order that, if I am convinced of my fault by your rebuke, I may ask his forgiveness.

Letters - letter_112

Letter 112. To Augustine. On receiving Letter 104 together with duly authenticated copies of Letters 56 and 67, Jerome in three days completes an exhaustive reply to all the questions which Augustine had raised. He explains what is the true title of his book On Illustrious Men, deals at great length with the dispute between Paul and Peter, expounds his views with regard to the Septuagint, and shews by the story of "the gourd" how close and accurate his translations are. His language throughout is kind but rather patronising: indeed in this whole correspondence Jerome seldom sufficiently recognizes the greatness of Augustine. The date of the letter is 404 a.d. Sometimes numbered as Augustine letter 75.

Jerome's answer to Augustine's Letters 28, 40 and 71. To Augustine, My Lord Truly Holy, and Most Blessed Father, Jerome Sends Greeting in Christ.

1. I have received by Cyprian, deacon, three letters, or rather three little books, at the same time, from your Excellency, containing what you call sundry questions, but what I feel to be animadversions on opinions which I have published, to answer which, if I were disposed to do it, would require a pretty large volume. Nevertheless I shall attempt to reply without exceeding the limits of a moderately long letter, and without causing delay to our brother, now in haste to depart, who only three days before the time fixed for his journey asked earnestly for a letter to take with him, in consequence of which I am compelled to pour out these sentences, such as they are, almost without premeditation, answering you in a rambling effusion, prepared not in the leisure of deliberate composition, but in the hurry of extemporaneous dictation, which usually produces a discourse that is more the offspring of chance than the parent of instruction; just as unexpected attacks throw into confusion even the bravest soldiers, and they are compelled to take to flight before they can gird on their armour.

2. But our armour is Christ; it is that which the Apostle Paul prescribes when, writing to the Ephesians, he says, "Take unto you the whole armour of God, that you may be able to withstand in the evil day;" and again, "Stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breastplate of righteousness; and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace; above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith you shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked: and take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." [Ephesians 6:13-17] Armed with these weapons, King David went forth in his day to battle; and taking from the torrent's bed five smooth rounded stones, he proved that, even amidst all the eddying currents of the world, his feelings were free both from roughness and from defilement; drinking of the brook by the way, and therefore lifted up in spirit, he cut off the head of Goliath, using the proud enemy's own sword as the fittest instrument of death, smiting the profane boaster on the forehead and wounding him in the same place in which Uzziah was smitten with leprosy when he presumed to usurp the priestly office; [2 Chronicles 16:19] the same also in which shines the glory that makes the saints rejoice in the Lord, saying, "The light of Your countenance is sealed upon us, O Lord." Let us therefore also say, "My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing and give praise: awake up, my glory; awake, psaltery and harp; I myself will awake early;" that in us may be fulfilled that word, "Open your mouth wide, and I will fill it;" and, "The Lord shall give the word with great power to them that publish it." I am well assured that your prayer as well as mine is, that in our contentings the victory may remain with the truth. For you seek Christ's glory, not your own: if you are victorious, I also gain a victory if I discover my error. On the other hand, if I win the day, the gain is yours; for "the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children." [2 Corinthians 12:14] We read, moreover, in Chronicles, that the children of Israel went to battle with their minds set upon peace, [1 Chronicles 12:17-18] seeking even amid swords and bloodshed and the prostrate slain a victory not for themselves, but for peace. Let me therefore, if it be the will of Christ, give an answer to all that you have written, and attempt in a short dissertation to solve your numerous questions. I pass by the conciliatory phrases in your courteous salutation: I say nothing of the compliments by which you attempt to take the edge off your censure: let me come at once to the matters in debate.

3. You say that you received from some brother a book of mine, in which I have given a list of ecclesiastical writers, both Greek and Latin, but which had no title; and that when you asked the brother aforesaid (I quote your own statement) why the title-page had no inscription, or what was the name by which the book was known, he answered that it was called "Epitaphium," i.e. "Obituary Notices:" upon which you display your reasoning powers, by remarking that the name Epitaphium would have been properly given to the book if the reader had found in it an account of the lives and writings of deceased authors, but that inasmuch as mention is made of the works of many who were living when the book was written, and are at this day still living, you wonder why I should have given the book a title so inappropriate. I think that it must be obvious to your own common sense, that you might have discovered the title of that book from its contents, without any other help. For you have read both Greek and Latin biographies of eminent men, and you know that they do not give to works of this kind the title Epitaphium, but simply "Illustrious Men," e.g. "Illustrious Generals," or "philosophers, orators, historians, poets," etc., as the case may be. An Epitaphium is a work written concerning the dead; such as I remember having composed long ago after the decease of the presbyter Nepotianus, of blessed memory. The book, therefore, of which you speak ought to be entitled, "Concerning Illustrious Men," or properly, "Concerning Ecclesiastical Writers," although it is said that by many who were not qualified to make any correction of the title, it has been called "Concerning Authors."

4. You ask, in the second place, my reason for saying, in my commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, that Paul could not have rebuked Peter for that which he himself had done, [Galatians 2:14] and could not have censured in another the dissimulation of which he was himself confessedly guilty; and you affirm that that rebuke of the apostle was not a manœuvre of pious policy, but real; and you say that I ought not to teach falsehood, but that all things in Scripture are to be received literally as they stand. To this I answer, in the first place, that your wisdom ought to have suggested the remembrance of the short preface to my commentaries, saying of my own person, What then? Am I so foolish and bold as to promise that which he could not accomplish? By no means; but I have rather, as it seems to me, with more reserve and hesitation, because feeling the deficiency of my strength, followed the commentaries of Origen in this matter. For that illustrious man wrote five volumes on the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians, and has occupied the tenth volume of his Stromata with a short treatise upon his explanation of the epistle. He also composed several treatises and fragmentary pieces upon it, which, if they even had stood alone, would have sufficed. I pass over my revered instructor Didymus (blind, it is true, but quick-sighted in the discernment of spiritual things), and the bishop of Laodicea, who has recently left the Church, and the early heretic Alexander, as well as Eusebius of Emesa and Theodorus of Heraclea, who have also left some brief disquisitions upon this subject. From these works if I were to extract even a few passages, a work which could not be altogether despised would be produced. Let me therefore frankly say that I have read all these; and storing up in my mind very many things which they contain, I have dictated to my amanuensis sometimes what was borrowed from other writers, sometimes what was my own, without distinctly remembering the method, or the words, or the opinions which belonged to each. I look now to the Lord in His mercy to grant that my want of skill and experience may not cause the things which others have well spoken to be lost, or to fail of finding among foreign readers the acceptance with which they have met in the language in which they were first written. If, therefore, anything in my explanation has seemed to you to demand correction, it would have been seemly for one of your learning to inquire first whether what I had written was found in the Greek writers to whom I have referred; and if they had not advanced the opinion which you censured, you could then with propriety condemn me for what I gave as my own view, especially seeing that I have in the preface openly acknowledged that I had followed the commentaries of Origen, and had dictated sometimes the view of others, sometimes my own, and have written at the end of the chapter with which you find fault: "If any one be dissatisfied with the interpretation here given, by which it is shown that neither did Peter sin, nor did Paul rebuke presumptuously a greater than himself, he is bound to show how Paul could consistently blame in another what he himself did." By which I have made it manifest that I did not adopt finally and irrevocably that which I had read in these Greek authors, but had propounded what I had read, leaving to the reader's own judgment whether it should be rejected or approved.

5. You, however, in order to avoid doing what I had asked, have devised a new argument against the view proposed; maintaining that the Gentiles who had believed in Christ were free from the burden of the ceremonial law, but that the Jewish converts were under the law, and that Paul, as the teacher of the Gentiles, rightly rebuked those who kept the law; whereas Peter, who was the chief of the "circumcision," [Galatians 2:8] was justly rebuked for commanding the Gentile converts to do that which the converts from among the Jews were alone under obligation to observe. If this is your opinion, or rather since it is your opinion, that all from among the Jews who believe are debtors to do the whole law, you ought, as being a bishop of great fame in the whole world, to publish your doctrine, and labour to persuade all other bishops to agree with you. As for me in my humble cell, along with the monks my fellow-sinners, I do not presume to dogmatize in regard to things of great moment; I only confess frankly that I read the writings of the Fathers, and, complying with universal usage, put down in my commentaries a variety of explanations, that each may adopt from the number given the one which pleases him. This method, I think, you have found in your reading, and have approved in connection with both secular literature and the Divine Scriptures.

6. Moreover, as to this explanation which Origen first advanced, and which all the other commentators after him have adopted, they bring forward, chiefly for the purpose of answering, the blasphemies of Porphyry, who accuses Paul of presumption because he dared to reprove

Peter and rebuke him to his face, and by reasoning convict him of having done wrong; that is to say, of being in the very fault which he himself, who blamed another for transgressing, had committed. What shall I say also of John, who has long governed the Church of Constantinople, and holding pontifical rank, who has composed a very large book upon this paragraph, and has followed the opinion of Origen and of the old expositors? If, therefore, you censure me as in the wrong, suffer me, I pray you, to be mistaken in company with such men; and when you perceive that I have so many companions in my error, you will require to produce at least one partisan in defense of your truth. So much on the interpretation of one paragraph of the Epistle to the Galatians.

7. Lest, however, I should seem to rest my answer to your reasoning wholly on the number of witnesses who are on my side, and to use the names of illustrious men as a means of escaping from the truth, not daring to meet you in argument, I shall briefly bring forward some examples from the Scriptures. In the Acts of the Apostles, a voice was heard by Peter, saying unto him, "Rise, Peter, slay and eat," when all manner of four-footed beasts, and creeping things, and birds of the air, were presented before him; by which saying it is proved that no man is by nature [ceremonially] unclean, but that all men are equally welcome to the gospel of Christ. To which Peter answered, "Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean." And the voice spoke unto him again the second time, "What God has cleansed, call not common." Therefore he went to Cæsarea, and having entered the house of Cornelius, "he opened his mouth and said, Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that fears Him and works righteousness is accepted with Him." Thereafter "the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word; and they of the circumcision which believed were astonished, as many as came with Peter, because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost. Then answered Peter, Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, which have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? And he commanded them to be baptized in the name of the Lord." [Acts 10:13-48] "And the apostles and brethren that were in Judea heard that the Gentiles had also received the word of God. And when Peter had come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him, saying, You went in to men uncircumcised, and ate with them." To whom he gave a full explanation of the reasons of his conduct, and concluded with these words: "Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as He did unto us who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ, what was I, that I could withstand God? When they heard these things, they held their peace, and glorified God, saying, Then has God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life." [Acts 11:1-18] Again, when, long after this, Paul and Barnabas had come to Antioch, and "having gathered the Church together, rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how He had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles, certain men which came down from Judea taught the brethren, and said, Unless you are circumcised after the manner of Moses, you cannot be saved. When therefore Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles and elders about this question. And when they had come to Jerusalem, there rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees which believed, saying that it was needful to circumcise them, and to command them to keep the law of Moses." And when there had been much disputing, Peter rose up, with his wonted readiness, "and said, Men and brethren, you know how that a good while ago God made choice among us, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word of the gospel, and believe. And God, which knows the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost, even as He did unto us; and put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith. Now therefore why do you tempt God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear? But we believe that, through the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, we shall be saved, even as they. Then all the multitude kept silence;" and to his opinion the Apostle James, and all the elders together, gave consent.

8. These quotations should not be tedious to the reader, but useful both to him and to me, as proving that, even before the Apostle Paul, Peter had come to know that the law was not to be in force after the gospel was given; nay more, that Peter was the prime mover in issuing the decree by which this was affirmed. Moreover, Peter was of so great authority, that Paul has recorded in his epistle: "Then, after three years, I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days." [Galatians 1:18] In the following context, again, he adds: "Then, fourteen years after, I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also. And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles;" proving that he had not had confidence in his preaching of the gospel if he had not been confirmed by the consent of Peter and those who were with him. The next words are, "but privately to them that were of reputation, lest by any means I should run, or had run, in vain." Why did he this privately rather than in public? Lest offense should be given to the faith of those who from among the Jews had believed, since they thought that the law was still in force, and that they ought to join observance of the law with faith in the Lord as their Saviour. Therefore also, when at that time Peter had come to Antioch (although the Acts of the Apostles do not mention this, but we must believe Paul's statement), Paul affirms that he "withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed. For, before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles: but when they had come, he withdrew, and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision. And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. But when I saw," he says, "that they walked not up-rightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said to Peter before them all, If you, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why do you compel the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" etc. No one can doubt, therefore, that the Apostle Peter was himself the author of that rule with deviation from which he is charged. The cause of that deviation, moreover, is seen to be fear of the Jews. For the Scripture says, that "at first he did eat with the Gentiles, but that when certain had come from James he withdrew, and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision." Now he feared the Jews, to whom he had been appointed apostle, lest by occasion of the Gentiles they should go back from the faith in Christ; imitating the Good Shepherd in his concern lest he should lose the flock committed to him.

9. As I have shown, therefore, that Peter was thoroughly aware of the abrogation of the law of Moses, but was compelled by fear to pretend to observe it, let us now see whether Paul, who accuses another, ever did anything of the same kind himself. We read in the same book: "Paul passed through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches. Then came he to Derbe and Lystra: and, behold, a certain disciple was there, named Timotheus, the son of a certain woman which was a Jewess, and believed; but his father was a Greek: which was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium. Him would Paul have to go forth with him; and he took and circumcised him, because of the Jews which were in those quarters: for they knew all that his father was a Greek." O blessed Apostle Paul, who had rebuked Peter for dissimulation, because he withdrew himself from the Gentiles through fear of the Jews who came from James, why are you, notwithstanding your own doctrine, compelled to circumcise Timothy, the son of a Gentile, nay more, a Gentile himself (for he was not a Jew, having not been circumcised)? You will answer, "Because of the Jews which are in these quarters?" If, then, you forgive yourself the circumcision of a disciple coming from the Gentiles, forgive Peter also, who has precedence above you, his doing some things of the same kind through fear of the believing Jews. Again, it is written: "Paul after this tarried there yet a good while, and then took his leave of the brethren, and sailed thence into Syria, and with him Priscilla and Aquila; having shorn his head in Cenchrea, for he had a vow." [Acts 18:18] Be it granted that he was compelled through fear of the Jews in the other case to do what he was unwilling to do; wherefore did he let his hair grow in accordance with a vow of his own making, and afterwards, when in Cenchrea, shave his head according to the law, as the Nazarites, who had given themselves by vow to God, were wont to do, according to the law of Moses?

10. But these things are small when compared with what follows. The sacred historian Luke further relates: "And when we had come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly;" and the day following, James, and all the elders who were with him, having expressed their approbation of his gospel, said to Paul: "You see, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law: and they are informed of you, that you teach all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs. What is it therefore? The multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that you have come. Do therefore this that we say to you: We have four men which have a vow on them; them take, and purify yourself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads: and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning you, are nothing; but that you yourself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law. Then Paul took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them, entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification, until an offering should be offered for every one of them." [Acts 21:17-26] O Paul, here again let me question you: Why did you shave your head, why did you walk barefoot according to Jewish ceremonial law, why did you offer sacrifices, why were victims slain for you according to the law? You will answer, doubtless, "To avoid giving offense to those of the Jews who had believed." To gain the Jews, you pretended to be a Jew; and James and all the other elders taught you this dissimulation. But you did not succeed in escaping, after all. For when you were on the point of being killed in a tumult which had arisen, you were rescued by the chief captain of the band, and was sent by him to Cæsarea, guarded by a careful escort of soldiers, lest the Jews should kill you as a dissembler, and a destroyer of the law; and from Cæsarea coming to Rome, you did, in your own hired house, preach Christ to both Jews and Gentiles, and your testimony was sealed under Nero's sword.

11. We have learned, therefore, that through fear of the Jews both Peter and Paul alike pretended that they observed the precepts of the law. How could Paul have the assurance and effrontery to reprove in another what he had done himself? I at least, or, I should rather say, others before me, have given such explanation of the matter as they deemed best, not defending the use of falsehood in the interest of religion, as you charge them with doing, but teaching the honourable exercise of a wise discretion; seeking both to show the wisdom of the apostles, and to restrain the shameless blasphemies of Porphyry, who says that Peter and Paul quarrelled with each other in childish rivalry, and affirms that Paul had been inflamed with envy on account of the excellences of Peter, and had written boastfully of things which he either had not done, or, if he did them, had done with inexcusable presumption, reproving in another that which he himself had done. They, in answering him, gave the best interpretation of the passage which they could find; what interpretation have you to propound? Surely you must intend to say something better than they have said, since you have rejected the opinion of the ancient commentators.

12. You say in your letter: "You do not require me to teach you in what sense the apostle says, 'To the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews;' [1 Corinthians 9:20] and other such things in the same passage, which are to be ascribed to the compassion of pitying love, not to the artifices of intentional deceit. For he that ministers to the sick becomes as if he were sick himself, not indeed falsely pretending to be under the fever, but considering with the mind of one truly sympathizing what he would wish done for himself if he were in the sick man's place. Paul was indeed a Jew; and when he had become a Christian, he had not abandoned those Jewish sacraments which that people had received in the right way, and for a certain appointed time. Therefore, even when he was an apostle of Christ, he took part in observing these, but with this view, that he might show that they were in no wise hurtful to those who, even after they had believed in Christ, desired to retain the ceremonies which by the law they had learned from their fathers; provided only that they did not build on these their hope of salvation, since the salvation which was fore-shadowed in these has now been brought in by the Lord Jesus." The sum of your whole argument, which you have expanded into a most prolix dissertation, is this, that Peter did not err in supposing that the law was binding on those who from among the Jews had believed, but departed from the right course in this, that he compelled the Gentile converts to conform to Jewish observances. Now, if he compelled them, it was not by use of authority as a teacher, but by the example of his own practice. And Paul, according to your view, did not protest against what Peter had done personally, but asked wherefore Peter would compel those who were from among the Gentiles to conform to Jewish observances.

13. The matter in debate, therefore, or I should rather say your opinion regarding it, is summed up in this: that since the preaching of the gospel of Christ, the believing Jews do well in observing the precepts of the law, i.e. in offering sacrifices as Paul did, in circumcising their children, as Paul did in the case of Timothy, and keeping the Jewish Sabbath, as all the Jews have been accustomed to do. If this be true, we fall into the heresy of Cerinthus and Ebion, who, though believing in Christ, were anathematized by the fathers for this one error, that they mixed up the ceremonies of the law with the gospel of Christ, and professed their faith in that which was new, without letting go what was old. Why do I speak of the Ebionites, who make pretensions to the name of Christian? In our own day there exists a sect among the Jews throughout all the synagogues of the East, which is called the sect of the Minei, and is even now condemned by the Pharisees. The adherents to this sect are known commonly as Nazarenes; they believe in Christ the Son of God, born of the Virgin Mary; and they say that He who suffered under Pontius Pilate and rose again, is the same as the one in whom we believe. But while they desire to be both Jews and Christians, they are neither the one nor the other. I therefore beseech you, who think that you are called upon to heal my slight wound, which is no more, so to speak, than a prick or scratch from a needle, to devote your skill in the healing art to this grievous wound, which has been opened by a spear driven home with the impetus of a javelin. For there is surely no proportion between the culpability of him who exhibits the various opinions held by the fathers in a commentary on Scripture, and the guilt of him who reintroduces within the Church a most pestilential heresy. If, however, there is for us no alternative but to receive the Jews into the Church, along with the usages prescribed by their law; if, in short, it shall be declared lawful for them to continue in the Churches of Christ what they have been accustomed to practise in the synagogues of Satan, I will tell you my opinion of the matter: they will not become Christians, but they will make us Jews.

14. For what Christian will submit to hear what is said in your letter? "Paul was indeed a Jew; and when he had become a Christian, he had not abandoned those Jewish sacraments which that people had received in the right way, and for a certain appointed time. Therefore, even when he was an apostle of Christ, he took part in observing these; but with this view, that he might show that they were in no wise hurtful to those who, even after they had believed in Christ, desired to retain the ceremonies which by the law they had learned from their fathers." Now I implore you to hear patiently my complaint. Paul, even when he was an apostle of Christ, observed Jewish ceremonies; and you affirm that they are in no wise hurtful to those who wish to retain them as they had received them from their fathers by the law. I, on the contrary, shall maintain, and, though the world were to protest against my view, I may boldly declare that the Jewish ceremonies are to Christians both hurtful and fatal; and that whoever observes them, whether he be Jew or Gentile originally, is cast into the pit of perdition. "For Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believes," [Romans 10:4] that is, to both Jew and Gentile; for if the Jew be excepted, He is not the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believes. Moreover, we read in the Gospel, "The law and the prophets were until John the Baptist." Also, in another place: "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He had not only broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God." [John 5:18] Again: "Of His fullness have all we received, and grace for grace; for the law was given Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." [John 1:16-17] Instead of the grace of the law which has passed away, we have received the grace of the gospel which is abiding; and instead of the shadows and types of the old dispensation, the truth has come by Jesus Christ. Jeremiah also prophesied thus in God's name: "Behold, the days come, says the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah; not according to the covenant which I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand, to bring them out of the land of Egypt." [Jeremiah 31:31-32] Observe what the prophet says, not to Gentiles, who had not been partakers in any former covenant, but to the Jewish nation. He who has given them the law by Moses, promises in place of it the new covenant of the gospel, that they might no longer live in the oldness of the letter, but in the newness of the spirit. Paul himself, moreover, in connection with whom the discussion of this question has arisen, delivers such sentiments as these frequently, of which I subjoin only a few, as I desire to be brief: "Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if you be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing." Again: "Christ has become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; you are fallen from grace." Again: "If you be led of the Spirit, you are not under the law." From which it is evident that he has not the Holy Spirit who submits to the law, not, as our fathers affirmed the apostles to have done, feignedly, under the promptings of a wise discretion, but, as you suppose to have been the case, sincerely. As to the quality of these legal precepts, let us learn from God's own teaching: "I gave them," He says, "statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live." [Ezekiel 20:25] I say these things, not that I may, like Manichæus and Marcion, destroy the law, which I know on the testimony of the apostle to be both holy and spiritual; but because when "faith came," and the fullness of times, "God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons," [Galatians 4:4] and might live no longer under the law as our schoolmaster, but under the Heir, who has now attained to full age, and is Lord.

15. It is further said in your letter: "The thing, therefore, which he rebuked in Peter was not his observing the customs handed down from his fathers, which Peter, if he wished, might do without being chargeable with deceit or inconsistency." Again I say: Since you are a bishop, a teacher in the Churches of Christ, if you would prove what you assert, receive any Jew who, after having become a Christian, circumcises any son that may be born to him, observes the Jewish Sabbath, abstains from meats which God has created to be used with thanksgiving, and on the evening of the fourteenth day of the first month slays a paschal lamb; and when you have done this, or rather, have refused to do it (for I know that you are a Christian, and will not be guilty of a profane action), you will be constrained, whether willingly or unwillingly, to renounce your opinion; and then you will know that it is a more difficult work to reject the opinion of others than to establish your own. Moreover, lest perhaps we should not believe your statement, or, I should rather say, understand it (for it is often the case that a discourse unduly extended is not intelligible, and is less censured by the unskilled in discussion because its weakness is not so easily perceived), you inculcate your opinion by reiterating the statement in these words: "Paul had forsaken everything peculiar to the Jews that was evil, especially this, that 'being ignorant of God's righteousness, and going about to establish their own righteousness, they had not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God.' [Romans 10:3] In this, moreover, he differed from them, that after the passion and resurrection of Christ, in whom had been given and made manifest the mystery of grace, according to the order of Melchizedek, they still considered it binding on them to celebrate, not out of mere reverence for old customs, but as necessary to salvation, the sacraments of the old dispensation; which were indeed at one time necessary, else had it been unprofitable and vain for the Maccabees to suffer martyrdom as they did for their adherence to them. [2 Maccabees 7:1] Lastly, in this also Paul differed from the Jews, that they persecuted the Christian preachers of grace as enemies of the law. These, and all similar errors and sins, he declares that he counted but loss and dung, that he might win Christ."

16. We have learned from you what evil things peculiar to the Jews Paul had abandoned; let us now learn from your teaching what good things which were Jewish he retained. You will reply: "The ceremonial observances in which they continued to follow the practice of their fathers, in the way in which these were complied with by Paul himself, without believing them to be at all necessary to salvation." I do not fully understand what you mean by the words, "without believing them to be at all necessary to salvation." For if they do not contribute to salvation, why are they observed? And if they must be observed, they by all means contribute to salvation; especially seeing that, because of observing them, some have been made martyrs: for they would not be observed unless they contributed to salvation. For they are not things indifferent — neither good nor bad, as philosophers say. Self-control is good, self-indulgence is bad: between these, and indifferent, as having no moral quality, are such things as walking, blowing one's nose, expectorating phlegm, etc. Such an action is neither good nor bad; for whether you do it or leave it undone, it does not affect your standing as righteous or unrighteous. But the observance of legal ceremonies is not a thing indifferent; it is either good or bad. You say it is good. I affirm it to be bad, and bad not only when done by Gentile converts, but also when done by Jews who have believed. In this passage you fall, if I am not mistaken, into one error while avoiding another. For while you guard yourself against the blasphemies of Porphyry, you become entangled in the snares of Ebion; pronouncing that the law is binding on those who from among the Jews have believed. Perceiving, again, that what you have said is a dangerous doctrine, you attempt to qualify it by words which are only superfluous: viz., "The law must be observed not from any belief, such as prompted the Jews to keep it, that this is necessary to salvation, and not in any misleading dissimulation such as Paul reproved in Peter."

17. Peter therefore pretended to keep the law; but this censor of Peter boldly observed the things prescribed by the law. The next words of your letter are these: "For if Paul observed these sacraments in order, by pretending to be a Jew, to gain the Jews, why did he not also take part with the Gentiles in heathen sacrifices, when to them that were without law he became as without law, that he might gain them also? The explanation is found in this, that he took part in the Jewish rites as being himself a Jew; and that when he said all this which I have quoted, he meant not that he pretended to be what he was not, but that he felt with true compassion that he must bring such help to them as would be needful for himself if he were involved in their error. Herein he exercised not the subtlety of a deceiver, but the sympathy of a compassionate deliverer." A triumphant vindication of Paul! You prove that he did not pretend to share the error of the Jews, but was actually involved in it; and that he refused to imitate Peter in a course of deception, dissembling through fear of the Jews what he really was, but without reserve freely avowed himself to be a Jew. Oh, unheard of compassion of the apostle! In seeking to make the Jews Christians, he himself became a Jew! For he could not have persuaded the luxurious to become temperate if he had not himself become luxurious like them; and could not have brought help, in his compassion, as you say, to the wretched, otherwise than by experiencing in his own person their wretchedness! Truly wretched, and worthy of most compassionate lamentation, are those who, carried away by vehemence of disputation, and by love for the law which has been abolished, have made Christ's apostle to be a Jew. Nor is there, after all, a great difference between my opinion and yours: for I say that both Peter and Paul, through fear of the believing Jews, practised, or rather pretended to practise, the precepts of the Jewish law; whereas you maintain that they did this out of pity, "not with the subtlety of a deceiver, but with the sympathy of a compassionate deliverer." But by both this is equally admitted, that (whether from fear or from pity) they pretended to be what they were not. As to your argument against our view, that he ought to have become to the Gentiles a Gentile, if to the Jews he became a Jew, this favours our opinion rather than yours: for as he did not actually become a Jew, so he did not actually become a heathen; and as he did not actually become a heathen, so he did not actually become a Jew. His conformity to the Gentiles consisted in this, that he received as Christians the uncircumcised who believed in Christ, and left them free to use without scruple meats which the Jewish law prohibited; but not, as you suppose, in taking part in their worship of idols. For "in Christ Jesus, neither circumcision avails anything, nor uncircumcision, but the keeping of the commandments of God."

18. I ask you, therefore, and with all urgency press the request, that you forgive me this humble attempt at a discussion of the matter; and wherein I have transgressed, lay the blame upon yourself who compelled me to write in reply, and who made me out to be as blind as Stesichorus. And do not bring the reproach of teaching the practice of lying upon me who am a follower of Christ, who said, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life." [John 14:6] It is impossible for me, who am a worshipper of the Truth, to bow under the yoke of falsehood. Moreover, refrain from stirring up against me the unlearned crowd who esteem you as their bishop, and regard with the respect due the priestly office the orations which you deliver in the church, but who esteem lightly an old decrepit man like me, courting the retirement of a monastery far from the busy haunts of men; and seek others who may be more fitly instructed or corrected by you. For the sound of your voice can scarcely reach me, who am so far separated from you by sea and land. And if you happen to write me a letter, Italy and Rome are sure to be acquainted with its contents long before it is brought to me, to whom alone it ought to be sent.

19. In another letter you ask why a former translation which I made of some of the canonical books was carefully marked with asterisks and obelisks, whereas I afterwards published a translation without these. You must pardon my saying that you seem to me not to understand the matter: for the former translation is from the Septuagint; and wherever obelisks are placed, they are designed to indicate that the Seventy have said more than is found in the Hebrew. But the asterisks indicate what has been added by Origen from the version of Theodotion. In that version I was translating from the Greek: but in the later version, translating from the Hebrew itself, I have expressed what I understood it to mean, being careful to preserve rather the exact sense than the order of the words. I am surprised that you do not read the books of the Seventy translators in the genuine form in which they were originally given to the world, but as they have been corrected, or rather corrupted, by Origen, with his obelisks and asterisks; and that you refuse to follow the translation, however feeble, which has been given by a Christian man, especially seeing that Origen borrowed the things which he has added from the edition of a man who, after the passion of Christ, was a Jew and a blasphemer. Do you wish to be a true admirer and partisan of the Seventy translators? Then do not read what you find under the asterisks; rather erase them from the volumes, that you may approve yourself indeed a follower of the ancients. If, however, you do this, you will be compelled to find fault with all the libraries of the Churches; for you will scarcely find more than one manuscript here and there which has not these interpolations.

20. A few words now as to your remark that I ought not to have given a translation, after this had been already done by the ancients; and the novel syllogism which you use: "The passages of which the Seventy have given an interpretation were either obscure or plain. If they were obscure, it is believed that you are as likely to have been mistaken as the others; if they were plain, it is not believed that the Seventy could have been mistaken."

All the commentators who have been our predecessors in the Lord in the work of expounding the Scriptures, have expounded either what was obscure or what was plain. If some passages were obscure, how could you, after them, presume to discuss that which they were not able to explain? If the passages were plain, it was a waste of time for you to have undertaken to treat of that which could not possibly have escaped them. This syllogism applies with peculiar force to the book of Psalms, in the interpretation of which Greek commentators have written many volumes: viz. 1 st, Origen; 2 d, Eusebius of Cæsarea; 3 d, Theodorus of Heraclea; 4 th, Asterius of Scythopolis; 5 th, Apollinaris of Laodicea; and, 6 th, Didymus of Alexandria. There are said to be minor works on selections from the Psalms, but I speak at present of the whole book. Moreover, among Latin writers the bishops Hilary of Poitiers, and Eusebius of Vercell, have translated Origen and Eusebius of Cæsarea, the former of whom has in some things been followed by our own Ambrose. Now, I put it to your wisdom to answer why you, after all the labours of so many and so competent interpreters, differ from them in your exposition of some passages? If the Psalms are obscure, it must be believed that you are as likely to be mistaken as others; if they are plain, it is incredible that these others could have fallen into mistake. In either case, your exposition has been, by your own showing, an unnecessary labour; and on the same principle, no one would ever venture to speak on any subject after others have pronounced their opinion, and no one would be at liberty to write anything regarding that which another has once handled, however important the matter might be.

It is, however, more in keeping with your enlightened judgment, to grant to all others the liberty which you tolerate in yourself for in my attempt to translate into Latin, for the benefit of those who speak the same language with myself, the corrected Greek version of the Scriptures, I have laboured not to supersede what has been long esteemed, but only to bring prominently forward those things which have been either omitted or tampered with by the Jews, in order that Latin readers might know what is found in the original Hebrew. If any one is averse to reading it, none compels him against his will. Let him drink with satisfaction the old wine, and despise my new wine, i.e. the sentences which I have published in explanation of former writers, with the design of making more obvious by my remarks what in them seemed to me to be obscure. As to the principles which ought to be followed in the interpretation of the Sacred Scriptures, they are stated in the book which I have written, and in all the introductions to the divine books which I have in my edition prefixed to each; and to these I think it sufficient to refer the prudent reader. And since you approve of my labours in revising the translation of the New Testament, as you say — giving me at the same time this as your reason, that very many are acquainted with the Greek language, and are therefore competent judges of my work — it would have been but fair to have given me credit for the same fidelity in the Old Testament; for I have not followed my own imagination, but have rendered the divine words as I found them understood by those who speak the Hebrew language. If you have any doubt of this in any passage, ask the Jews what is the meaning of the original.

21. Perhaps you will say, "What if the Jews decline to answer, or choose to impose upon us?" Is it conceivable that the whole multitude of Jews will agree together to be silent if asked about my translation, and that none shall be found that has any knowledge of the Hebrew language? Or will they all imitate those Jews whom you mention as having, in some little town, conspired to injure my reputation? For in your letter you put together the following story:— "A certain bishop, one of our brethren, having introduced in the Church over which he presides the reading of your version, came upon a word in the book of the prophet Jonah, of which you have given a very different rendering from that which had been of old familiar to the senses and memory of all the worshippers, and had been chanted for so many generations in the Church. Thereupon arose such a tumult in the congregation, especially among the Greeks, correcting what had been read, and denouncing the translation as false, that the bishop was compelled to ask the testimony of the Jewish residents (it was in the town of Oea). These, whether from ignorance or from spite, answered that the words in the Hebrew manuscripts were correctly rendered in the Greek version, and in the Latin one taken from it. What further need I say? The man was compelled to correct your version in that passage as if it had been falsely translated, as he desired not to be left without a congregation — a calamity which he narrowly escaped. From this case we also are led to think that you may be occasionally mistaken."

22. You tell me that I have given a wrong translation of some word in Jonah, and that a worthy bishop narrowly escaped losing his charge through the clamorous tumult of his people, which was caused by the different rendering of this one word. At the same time, you withhold from me what the word was which I have mistranslated; thus taking away the possibility of my saying anything in my own vindication, lest my reply should be fatal to your objection. Perhaps it is the old dispute about the gourd which has been revived, after slumbering for many long years since the illustrious man, who in that day combined in his own person the ancestral honours of the Cornelii and of Asinius Pollio, brought against me the charge of giving in my translation the word "ivy" instead of "gourd." I have already given a sufficient answer to this in my commentary on Jonah. At present, I deem it enough to say that in that passage, where the Septuagint has "gourd," and Aquila and the others have rendered the word "ivy" (κ■σσος), the Hebrew manuscript has "ciceion," which is in the Syriac tongue, as now spoken, "ciceia." It is a kind of shrub having large leaves like a vine, and when planted it quickly springs up to the size of a small tree, standing upright by its own stem, without requiring any support of canes or poles, as both gourds and ivy do. If, therefore, in translating word for word, I had put the word "ciceia," no one would know what it meant; if I had used the word "gourd," I would have said what is not found in the Hebrew. I therefore put down "ivy," that I might not differ from all other translators. But if your Jews said, either through malice or ignorance, as you yourself suggest, that the word is in the Hebrew text which is found in the Greek and Latin versions, it is evident that they were either unacquainted with Hebrew, or have been pleased to say what was not true, in order to make sport of the gourd-planters. In closing this letter, I beseech you to have some consideration for a soldier who is now old and has long retired from active service, and not to force him to take the field and again expose his life to the chances of war. Do you, who are young, and who have been appointed to the conspicuous seat of pontifical dignity, give yourself to teaching the people, and enrich Rome with new stores from fertile Africa. I am contented to make but little noise in an obscure corner of a monastery, with one to hear me or read to me.

Letters - letter_113

Letter 113. From Theophilus to Jerome.

Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, had compiled an invective against John Chrysostom, bishop of Constantinople who was nosy (largely through his efforts) an exile from his see. This he now sends to Jerome with a request that the latter will render it into Latin for dissemination in the West. The invective (of which only a few fragments remain) is of the most violent kind. Nevertheless Jerome translated it along with this letter, the date of which is 405 a.d. The latter part of the letter has perished. To the well-beloved and most loving brother Jerome, Theophilus sends greeting in the Lord.

1. At the outset the verdict which is in accordance with the truth satisfies but few. But the Lord speaking by the prophet says: "my judgment goeth forth as the light?" [Hos. 6:5, LXX] and they who are surrounded with a horror of darkness and do not with clear comprehension perceive the nature of things, are covered with eternal shame and know by the issues of their acts that their efforts have been in vain. Wherefore we also have always desired for John who has for a time ruled the church of Constantinople grace that he might please God, and we have been slow to attribute to him the rash acts which have caused his downfall. But, not to speak of his other misdeeds, he has taken the Origenists into his confidence, has advanced many of them to the priesthood, and by committing this crime has saddened with no slight grief that man of God, Epiphanius of blessed memory, who has shone throughout all the world a bright star among bishops. And therefore he has rightly come to hear the words of doom: "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." [Isa. 21:9]

2. Knowing then that the Saviour has said: "judge not according to the appearance but judge righteous judgment." [John. 7:24.] ...

Letters - letter_114

Letter 114. To Theophilus.

Jerome writes to Theophilus to apologize for his delay in sending Latin versions of the latter's letter (CXIII.) and invective against John Chrysostom. Possibly, however, the allusion may be not to these but to some other work of Theophilus (e.g. a paschal letter.) This delay he attributes to the disturbed state of Palestine, the severity of the winter, the prevalent famine, and his own ill-health. He now sends the translations that he has made and, while he deprecates criticism on his own work, praises that of Theophilus, quoting with particular approval the directions given by this latter for the reverent care of the vessels used in celebrating the holy communion. The date of the letter is 405 a.d. To the most blessed pope Theophilus, Jerome.

1. My delay in sending back to your holiness your treatise translated into Latin is accounted for by the many interruptions and obstacles that I have met with. There has been a sudden raid of the Isaurians; Phoenicia and Galilee have been laid waste; Palestine has been panic-stricken, and particularly Jerusalem; we have all been engaged in making not books but walls. There has also been a severe winter and an almost unbearable famine; and these have told heavily upon me who have the charge of many brothers. Amid these difficulties the work of translation went on by night, as I could save or snatch time to give to it. At last I got it done and by Lent nothing remained but to collate the fair copy with the original. However, just then a severe illness seized me and I was brought to the threshold of death, from which I have only been saved by God's mercy and your prayers; perhaps for this very purpose that I might fulfil your behest and render with its writer's elegance the charming volume which you have adorned with the scripture's fairest flowers. But bodily weakness and sorrow of heart have, I need hardly say, dulled the edge of my intellect and obstructed the free flow of my language.

2. I admire in your work its practical aim, designed as it is to instruct by the authority of scripture ignorant persons in all the churches concerning the reverence with which they must handle holy things and minister at Christ's altar; and to impress upon them that the sacred chalices, veils,¹ and other accessories used in the celebration of the Lord's passion are not mere lifeless and senseless objects devoid of holiness, but that rather, from their association with the body and blood of the Lord, they are to be venerated with the same awe as the body and the blood themselves.

3. Take back then your book, nay mine or better still ours; for when you flatter me you will but flatter yourself. It is for you that my brain has toiled; it is for you that I have striven with the poor resources of the Latin tongue to find an equivalent for the eloquence of the Greek. I have not indeed given a word-for-word rendering, as skilled translators do, nor have I counted out the money you have given to me coin by coin; but I have given you full weight. Some words may be missing but none of the sense is lost. Moreover I have translated into Latin and prefixed to this volume the letter that you sent to me, so that all who read it may know that I have acted under the commands of your holiness, and have not rashly and over-confidently undertaken a task that is beyond my powers. Whether I have succeeded in it I must leave to your judgment. Even though you may blame my weakness, you will at least give me credit for my good intention.

1:

So the embroidered cloths used in Catholic Churches to cover the sacramental elements are still called.

Letters - letter_115

Letter 115. To Augustine. A short but most friendly letter in which Jerome excuses himself for the freedom with which he has dealt with Augustine's questions (the allusion is to Letter 112.) and hopes that henceforth they may be able to avoid controversy and to labour like brothers in the field of scripture. Written probably in 405 a.d. Sometimes numbered as Augustine letter 81. To Augustine, My Lord Truly Holy, and Most Blessed Father, Jerome Sends Greeting in the Lord.

Having anxiously inquired of our holy brother Firmus regarding your state, I was glad to hear that you are well. I expected him to bring, or, I should rather say, I insisted upon his giving me, a letter from you; upon which he told me that he had set out from Africa without communicating to you his intention. I therefore send to you my respectful salutations through this brother, who clings to you with a singular warmth of affection; and at the same time, in regard to my last letter, I beg you to forgive the modesty which made it impossible for me to refuse you, when you had so long required me to write you in reply. That letter, moreover, was not an answer from me to you, but a confronting of my arguments with yours. And if it was a fault in me to send a reply (I beseech you hear me patiently), the fault of him who insisted upon it was still greater. But let us be done with such quarrelling; let there be sincere brotherliness between us; and henceforth let us exchange letters, not of controversy, but of mutual charity. The holy brethren who with me serve the Lord send you cordial salutations. Salute from us the holy brethren who with you bear Christ's easy yoke; especially I beseech you to convey my respectful salutation to the holy father Alypius, worthy of all esteem. May Christ, our almighty God, preserve you safe, and not unmindful of me, my lord truly holy, and most blessed father. If you have read my commentary on Jonah, I think you will not recur to the ridiculous gourd-debate. If, moreover, the friend who first assaulted me with his sword has been driven back by my pen, I rely upon your good feeling and equity to lay blame on the one who brought, and not on the one who repelled, the accusation. Let us, if you please, exercise ourselves in the field of Scripture without wounding each other.

Letters - letter_116

Letter 116. From Augustine. A long letter in which Augustine for the third time (see Letters 56, 67) restates his opinion about Jerome's theory of the dispute between Peter and Paul at Antioch. In doing so, however, he disclaims all desire to hurt Jerome's feelings, apologizes for the tone of his previous letters, and again explains that it is not his fault that they have failed so long to reach Jerome. Written shortly after the preceding. Sometimes numbered as Augustine letter 82. A reply to Augustine letters 72, 75 and 81. To Jerome, My Lord Beloved and Honoured in the Bowels of Christ, My Holy Brother and Fellow-Presbyter, Augustine Sends Greeting in the Lord.

1. Long ago I sent to your Charity a long letter in reply to the one which you remember sending to me by your holy son Asterius, who is now not only my brother, but also my colleague. Whether that reply reached you or not I do not know, unless I am to infer this from the words in your letter brought to me by our most sincere friend Firmus, that if the one who first assaulted you with his sword has been driven back by your pen, you rely upon my good feeling and equity to lay blame on the one who brought, not on the one who repelled, the accusation. From this one indication, though very slight, I infer that you have read my letter. In that letter I expressed indeed my sorrow that so great discord had arisen between you and Rufinus, over the strength of whose former friendship brotherly love was wont to rejoice in all parts to which the fame of it had come; but I did not in this intend to rebuke you, my brother, whom I dare not say that I have found blameable in that matter. I only lamented the sad lot of men in this world, in whose friendships, depending as they do on the continuance of mutual regard, there is no stability, however great that regard may sometimes be. I would rather, however, have been informed by your letter whether you have granted me the pardon which I begged, of which I now desire you to give me more explicit assurance; although the more genial and cheerful tone of your letter seems to signify that I have obtained what I asked in mine, if indeed it was dispatched after mine had been read by you, which is, as I have said, not clearly indicated.

2. You ask, or rather you give a command with the confiding boldness of charity, that we should amuse ourselves in the field of Scripture without wounding each other. For my part, I am by all means disposed to exercise myself in earnest much rather than in mere amusement on such themes. If, however, you have chosen this word because of its suggesting easy exercise, let me frankly say that I desire something more from one who has, as you have, great talents under the control of a benignant disposition, together with wisdom enlightened by erudition, and whose application to study, hindered by no other distractions, is year after year impelled by enthusiasm and guided by genius: the Holy Spirit not only giving you all these advantages, but expressly charging you to come with help to those who are engaged in great and difficult investigations; not as if, in studying Scripture, they were amusing themselves on a level plain, but as men punting and toiling up a steep ascent. If, however, perchance, you selected the expression "ludamus" [let us amuse ourselves] because of the genial kindliness which befits discussion between loving friends, whether the matter debated be obvious and easy, or intricate and difficult, I beseech you to teach me how I may succeed in securing this; so that when I am dissatisfied with anything which, not through want of careful attention, but perhaps through my slowness of apprehension, has not been demonstrated to me, if I should, in attempting to make good an opposite opinion, express myself with a measure of unguarded frankness, I may not fall under the suspicion of childish conceit and forwardness, as if I sought to bring my own name into renown by assailing illustrious men; and that if, when something harsh has been demanded by the exigencies of argument, I attempt to make it less hard to bear by stating it in mild and courteous phrases, I may not be pronounced guilty of wielding a "honeyed sword." The only way which I can see for avoiding both these faults, or the suspicion of either of them, is to consent that when I am thus arguing with a friend more learned than myself, I must approve of everything which he says, and may not, even for the sake of more accurate information, hesitate before accepting his decisions.

3. On such terms we might amuse ourselves without fear of offending each other in the field of Scripture, but I might well wonder if the amusement was not at my expense. For I confess to your Charity that I have learned to yield this respect and honour only to the canonical books of Scripture: of these alone do I most firmly believe that the authors were completely free from error. And if in these writings I am perplexed by anything which appears to me opposed to truth, I do not hesitate to suppose that either the manuscript is faulty, or the translator has not caught the meaning of what was said, or I myself have failed to understand it. As to all other writings, in reading them, however great the superiority of the authors to myself in sanctity and learning, I do not accept their teaching as true on the mere ground of the opinion being held by them; but only because they have succeeded in convincing my judgment of its truth either by means of these canonical writings themselves, or by arguments addressed to my reason. I believe, my brother, that this is your own opinion as well as mine. I do not need to say that I do not suppose you to wish your books to be read like those of prophets or of apostles, concerning which it would be wrong to doubt that they are free from error. Far be such arrogance from that humble piety and just estimate of yourself which I know you to have, and without which assuredly you would not have said, "Would that I could receive your embrace, and that by converse we might aid each other in learning!"

4. Now if, knowing as I do your life and conversation, I do not believe in regard to you that you have spoken anything with an intention of dissimulation and deceit, how much more reasonable is it for me to believe, in regard to the Apostle Paul, that he did not think one thing and affirm another when he wrote of Peter and Barnabas: "When I saw that they walked not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, I said to Peter before them all, 'If you, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as to the Jews, why do you compel the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?'" [Galatians 2:14] For whom can I confide in, as assuredly not deceiving me by spoken or written statements, if the apostle deceived his own "children," for whom he "travailed in birth again until Christ (who is the Truth) were formed in them"? [Galatians 4:19] After having previously said to them, "The things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not," could he in writing to these same persons state what was not true, and deceive them by a fraud which was in some way sanctioned by expediency, when he said that he had seen Peter and Barnabas not walking uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, and that he had withstood Peter to the face because of this, that he was compelling the Gentiles to live after the manner of the Jews?

5. But you will say it is better to believe that the Apostle Paul wrote what was not true, than to believe that the Apostle Peter did what was not right. On this principle, we must say (which far be it from us to say), that it is better to believe that the gospel history is false, than to believe that Christ was denied by Peter; [Matthew 26:75] and better to charge the book of Kings [second book of Samuel] with false statements, than believe that so great a prophet, and one so signally chosen by the Lord God as David was, committed adultery in lusting after and taking away the wife of another, and committed such detestable homicide in procuring the death of her husband. [2 Samuel 11:4, 17] Better far that I should read with certainty and persuasion of its truth the Holy Scripture, placed on the highest (even the heavenly) pinnacle of authority, and should, without questioning the trustworthiness of its statements, learn from it that men have been either commended, or corrected, or condemned, than that, through fear of believing that by men, who, though of most praiseworthy excellence, were no more than men, actions deserving rebuke might sometimes be done, I should admit suspicions affecting the trustworthiness of the whole "oracles of God."

6. The Manichæans maintain that the greater part of the Divine Scripture, by which their wicked error is in the most explicit terms confuted, is not worthy of credit, because they cannot pervert its language so as to support their opinions; yet they lay the blame of the alleged mistake not upon the apostles who originally wrote the words, but upon some unknown corrupters of the manuscripts. Forasmuch, however, as they have never succeeded in proving this by more numerous and by earlier manuscripts, or by appealing to the original language from which the Latin translations have been drawn, they retire from the arena of debate, vanquished and confounded by truth which is well known to all. Does not your holy prudence discern how great scope is given to their malice against the truth, if we say not (as they do) that the apostolic writings have been tampered with by others, but that the apostles themselves wrote what they knew to be untrue?

7. You say that it is incredible that Paul should have rebuked in Peter that which Paul himself had done. I am not at present inquiring about what Paul did, but about what he wrote. This is most pertinent to the matter which I have in hand — namely, the confirmation of the universal and unquestionable truth of the Divine Scriptures, which have been delivered to us for our edification in the faith, not by unknown men, but by the apostles, and have on this account been received as the authoritative canonical standard. For if Peter did on that occasion what he ought to have done, Paul falsely affirmed that he saw him walking not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel. For whoever does what he ought to do, walks uprightly. He therefore is guilty of falsehood who, knowing that another has done what he ought to have done, says that he has not done uprightly. If, then, Paul wrote what was true, it is true that Peter was not then walking uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel. He was therefore doing what he ought not to have done; and if Paul had himself already done something of the same kind, I would prefer to believe that, having been himself corrected, he could not omit the correction of his brother apostle, than to believe that he put down any false statement in his epistle; and if in any epistle of Paul this would be strange, how much more in the one in the preface of which he says, "The things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not"!

8. For my part, I believe that Peter so acted on this occasion as to compel the Gentiles to live as Jews: because I read that Paul wrote this, and I do not believe that he lied. And therefore Peter was not acting uprightly. For it was contrary to the truth of the gospel, that those who believed in Christ should think that without those ancient ceremonies they could not be saved. This was the position maintained at Antioch by those of the circumcision who had believed; against whom Paul protested constantly and vehemently. As to Paul's circumcising of Timothy, [Acts 16:3] performing a vow at Cenchrea, [Acts 18:18] and undertaking on the suggestion of James at Jerusalem to share the performance of the appointed rites with some who had made a vow, [Acts 21:26] it is manifest that Paul's design in these things was not to give to others the impression that he thought that by these observances salvation is given under the Christian dispensation, but to prevent men from believing that he condemned as no better than heathen idolatrous worship, those rites which God had appointed in the former dispensation as suitable to it, and as shadows of things to come. For this is what James said to him, that the report had gone abroad concerning him that he taught men "to forsake Moses." [Acts 21:21] This would be by all means wrong for those who believe in Christ, to forsake him who prophesied of Christ, as if they detested and condemned the teaching of him of whom Christ said, "Had ye believed Moses, you would have believed Me; for he wrote of Me."

9. For mark, I beseech you, the words of James: "You see, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe; and they are all zealous of the law: and they are informed of you, that you teach all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs. What is it therefore? The multitude must needs come together: for they will hear that you have come. Do therefore this that we say to you: We have four men which have a vow on them; them take, and purify yourself with them, and be at charges with them, that they may shave their heads: and all may know that those things, whereof they were informed concerning you, are nothing; but that you yourself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law. As touching the Gentiles which have believed, we have written and concluded that they observe no such thing, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication." [Acts 21:20-25] It is, in my opinion, very clear that the reason why James gave this advice was, that the falsity of what they had heard concerning him might be known to those Jews, who, though they had believed in Christ, were jealous for the honour of the law, and would not have it thought that the institutions which had been given by Moses to their fathers were condemned by the doctrine of Christ as if they were profane, and had not been originally given by divine authority. For the men who had brought this reproach against Paul were not those who understood the right spirit in which observance of these ceremonies should be practised under the Christian dispensation by believing Jews — namely, as a way of declaring the divine authority of these rites, and their holy use in the prophetic dispensation, and not as a means of obtaining salvation, which was to them already revealed in Christ and ministered by baptism. On the contrary, the men who had spread abroad this report against the apostle were those who would have these rites observed, as if without their observance there could be no salvation to those who believed the gospel. For these false teachers had found him to be a most zealous preacher of free grace, and a most decided opponent of their views, teaching as he did that men are not justified by these things, but by the grace of Jesus Christ, which these ceremonies of the law were appointed to foreshadow. This party, therefore, endeavouring to raise odium and persecution against him, charged him with being an enemy of the law and of the divine institutions; and there was no more fitting way in which he could turn aside the odium caused by this false accusation, than by himself celebrating those rites which he was supposed to condemn as profane, and thus showing that, on the one hand, the Jews were not to be debarred from them as if they were unlawful, and on the other hand, that the Gentiles were not to be compelled to observe them as if they were necessary.

10. For if he did in truth condemn these things in the way in which he was reported to have done, and undertook to perform these rites in order that he might, by dissembling, disguise his real sentiments, James would not have said to him, "and all shall know," but, "all shall think that those things whereof they were informed concerning you are nothing;" [Acts 21:24] especially seeing that in Jerusalem itself the apostles had already decreed that no one should compel the Gentiles to adopt Jewish ceremonies, but had not decreed that no one should then prevent the Jews from living according to their customs, although upon them also Christian doctrine imposed no such obligation. Wherefore, if it was after the apostle's decree that Peter's dissimulation at Antioch took place, whereby he was compelling the Gentiles to live after the manner of the Jews, which he himself was not compelled to do, although he was not forbidden to use Jewish rites in order to declare the honour of the oracles of God which were committed to the Jews — if this, I say, were the case, was it strange that Paul should exhort him to declare freely that decree which he remembered to have framed in conjunction with the other apostles at Jerusalem?

11. If, however, as I am more inclined to think, Peter did this before the meeting of that council at Jerusalem, in that case also it is not strange that Paul wished him not to conceal timidly, but to declare boldly, a rule of practice in regard to which he already knew that they were both of the same mind; whether he was aware of this from having conferred with him as to the gospel which both preached, or from having heard that, at the calling of the centurion Cornelius, Peter had been divinely instructed in regard to this matter, or from having seen him eating with Gentile converts before those whom he feared to offend had come to Antioch. For we do not deny that Peter was already of the same opinion in regard to this question as Paul himself was. Paul, therefore, was not teaching Peter what was the truth concerning that matter, but was reproofing his dissimulation as a thing by which the Gentiles were compelled to act as Jews did; for no other reason than this, that the tendency of all such dissembling was to convey or confirm the impression that they taught the truth who held that believers could not be saved without circumcision and other ceremonies, which were shadows of things to come.

12. For this reason also he circumcised Timothy, lest to the Jews, and especially to his relations by the mother's side, it should seem that the Gentiles who had believed in Christ abhorred circumcision as they abhorred the worship of idols; whereas the former was appointed by God, and the latter invented by Satan. Again, he did not circumcise Titus, lest he should give occasion to those who said that believers could not be saved without circumcision, and who, in order to deceive the Gentiles, openly declared that this was the view held by Paul. This is plainly enough intimated by himself, when he says: "But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised: and that because of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage: to whom we gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour, that the truth of the gospel might continue with you." [Galatians 2:3-5] Here we see plainly what he perceived them to be eagerly watching for, and why it was that he did not do in the case of Titus as he had done in the case of Timothy, and as he might otherwise have done in the exercise of that liberty, by which he had shown that these observances were neither to be demanded as necessary to salvation, nor denounced as unlawful.

13. You say, however, that in this discussion we must beware of affirming, with the philosophers, that some of the actions of men lie in a region between right and wrong, and are to be reckoned, accordingly, neither among good actions nor among the opposite; and it is urged in your argument that the observance of legal ceremonies cannot be a thing indifferent, but either good or bad; so that if I affirm it to be good, I acknowledge that we also are bound to observe these ceremonies; but if I affirm it to be bad, I am bound to believe that the apostles observed them not sincerely, but in a way of dissimulation. I, for my part, would not be so much afraid of defending the apostles by the authority of philosophers, since these teach some measure of truth in their dissertations, as of pleading on their behalf the practice of advocates at the bar, in sometimes serving their clients' interests at the expense of truth. If, as is stated in your exposition of the Epistle to the Galatians, this practice of barristers may be in your opinion with propriety quoted as resembling and justifying dissimulation on the part of Peter and Paul, why should I fear to allege to you the authority of philosophers whose teaching we account worthless, not because everything which they say is false, but because they are in most things mistaken, and wherein they are found affirming truth, are notwithstanding strangers to the grace of Christ, who is the Truth?

14. But why may I not say regarding these institutions of the old economy, that they are neither good nor bad: not good, since men are not by them justified, they having been only shadows predicting the grace by which we are justified; and not bad, since they were divinely appointed as suitable both to the time and to the people? Why may I not say this, when I am supported by that saying of the prophet, that God gave unto His people "statutes that were not good"? [Ezekiel 20:25] For we have in this perhaps the reason of his not calling them "bad," but calling them "not good," i.e. not such that either by them men could be made good, or that without them men could not possibly become good. I would esteem it a favour to be informed by your Sincerity, whether any saint, coming from the East to Rome, would be guilty of dissimulation if he fasted on the seventh day of each week, excepting the Saturday before Easter. For if we say that it is wrong to fast on the seventh day, we shall condemn not only the Church of Rome, but also many other churches, both neighbouring and more remote, in which the same custom continues to be observed. If, on the other hand, we pronounce it wrong not to fast on the seventh day, how great is our presumption in censuring so many churches in the East, and by far the greater part of the Christian world! Or do you prefer to say of this practice, that it is a thing indifferent in itself, but commendable in him who conforms with it, not as a dissembler, but from a seemly desire for the fellowship and deference for the feelings of others? No precept, however, concerning this practice is given to Christians in the canonical books. How much more, then, may I shrink from pronouncing that to be bad which I cannot deny to be of divine institution!— this fact being admitted by me in the exercise of the same faith by which I know that not through these observances, but by the grace of God through our Lord Jesus Christ, I am justified.

15. I maintain, therefore, that circumcision, and other things of this kind, were, by means of what is called the Old Testament, given to the Jews with divine authority, as signs of future things which were to be fulfilled in Christ; and that now, when these things have been fulfilled, the laws concerning these rights remained only to be read by Christians in order to their understanding the prophecies which had been given before, but not to be of necessity practised by them, as if the coming of that revelation of faith which they prefigured was still future. Although, however, these rites were not to be imposed upon the Gentiles, the compliance with them, to which the Jews had been accustomed, was not to be prohibited in such a way as to give the impression that it was worthy of abhorrence and condemnation. Therefore slowly, and by degrees, all this observance of these types was to vanish away through the power of the sound preaching of the truth of the grace of Christ, to which alone believers would be taught to ascribe their justification and salvation, and not to those types and shadows of things which till then had been future, but which were now newly come and present, as at the time of the calling of those Jews whom the personal coming of our Lord and the apostolic times had found accustomed to the observance of these ceremonial institutions. The toleration, for the time, of their continuing to observe these was enough to declare their excellence as things which, though they were to be given up, were not, like the worship of idols, worthy of abhorrence; but they were not to be imposed upon others, lest they should be thought necessary, either as means or as conditions of salvation. This was the opinion of those heretics who, while anxious to be both Jews and Christians, could not be either the one or the other. Against this opinion you have most benevolently condescended to warn me, although I never entertained it. This also was the opinion with which, through fear, Peter fell into the fault of pretending to yield concurrence, though in reality he did not agree with it; for which reason Paul wrote most truly of him, that he saw him not walking uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, and most truly said of him that he was compelling the Gentiles to live as did the Jews. Paul did not impose this burden on the Gentiles through his sincerely complying, when it was needful, with these ceremonies, with the design of proving that they were not to be utterly condemned (as idol-worship ought to be); for he nevertheless constantly preached that not by these things, but by the grace revealed to faith, believers obtain salvation, lest he should lead any one to take up these Jewish observances as necessary to salvation. Thus, therefore, I believe that the Apostle Paul did all these things honestly, and without dissimulation; and yet if any one now leave Judaism and become a Christian, I neither compel nor permit him to imitate Paul's example, and go on with the sincere observance of Jewish rites, any more than you, who think that Paul dissembled when he practised these rites, would compel or permit such an one to follow the apostle in that dissimulation.

16. Shall I also sum up "the matter in debate, or rather your opinion concerning it" (to quote your own expression)? It seems to me to be this: that after the gospel of Christ has been published, the Jews who believe do rightly if they offer sacrifices as Paul did, if they circumcise their children as Paul circumcised Timothy, and if they observe the "seventh day of the week, as the Jews have always done, provided only that they do all this as dissemblers and deceivers." If this is your doctrine, we are now precipitated, not into the heresy of Ebion, or of those who are commonly called Nazarenes, or any other known heresy, but into some new error, which is all the more pernicious because it originates not in mistake, but in deliberate and designed endeavour to deceive. If, in order to clear yourself from the charge of entertaining such sentiments, you answer that the apostles were to be commended for dissimulation in these instances, their purpose being to avoid giving offense to the many weak Jewish believers who did not yet understand that these things were to be rejected, but that now, when the doctrine of Christ's grace has been firmly established throughout so many nations, and when, by the reading of the Law and the Prophets throughout all the churches of Christ, it is well known that these are not read for our observance, but for our instruction, any man who should propose to feign compliance with these rites would be regarded as a madman. What objection can there be to my affirming that the Apostle Paul, and other sound and faithful Christians, were bound sincerely to declare the worth of these old observances by occasionally honouring them, lest it should be thought that these institutions, originally full of prophetic significance, and cherished sacredly by their most pious forefathers, were to be abhorred by their posterity as profane inventions of the devil? For now, when the faith had come, which, previously foreshadowed by these ceremonies, was revealed after the death and resurrection of the Lord, they became, so far as their office was concerned, defunct. But just as it is seemly that the bodies of the deceased be carried honourably to the grave by their kindred, so was it fitting that these rites should be removed in a manner worthy of their origin and history, and this not with pretence of respect, but as a religious duty, instead of being forsaken at once, or cast forth to be torn in pieces by the reproaches of their enemies, as by the teeth of dogs. To carry the illustration further, if now any Christian (though he may have been converted from Judaism) were proposing to imitate the apostles in the observance of these ceremonies, like one who disturbs the ashes of those who rest, he would be not piously performing his part in the obsequies, but impiously violating the sepulchre.

17. I acknowledge that in the statement contained in my letter, to the effect that the reason why Paul undertook (although he was an apostle of Christ) to perform certain rites, was that he might show that these ceremonies were not pernicious to those who desired to continue that which they had received by the Law from their fathers, I have not explicitly enough qualified the statement, by adding that this was the case only in that time in which the grace of faith was at first revealed; for at that time this was not pernicious. These observances were to be given up by all Christians step by step, as time advanced; not all at once, lest, if this were done, men should not perceive the difference between what God by Moses appointed to His ancient people, and the rites which the unclean spirit taught men to practise in the temples of heathen deities. I grant, therefore, that in this your censure is justifiable, and my omission deserved rebuke. Nevertheless, long before the time of my receiving your letter, when I wrote a treatise against Faustus the Manichæan, I did not omit to insert the qualifying clause which I have just stated, in a short exposition which I gave of the same passage, as you may see for yourself if you kindly condescend to read that treatise; or you may be satisfied in any other way that you please by the bearer of this letter, that I had long ago published this restriction of the general affirmation. And I now, as speaking in the sight of God, beseech you by the law of charity to believe me when I say with my whole heart, that it never was my opinion that in our time, Jews who become Christians were either required or at liberty to observe in any manner, or from any motive whatever, the ceremonies of the ancient dispensation; although I have always held, in regard to the Apostle Paul, the opinion which you call in question, from the time that I became acquainted with his writings. Nor can these two things appear incompatible to you; for you do not think it is the duty of any one in our day to feign compliance with these Jewish observances, although you believe that the apostles did this.

18. Accordingly, as you in opposing me affirm, and, to quote your own words, "though the world were to protest against it, boldly declare that the Jewish ceremonies are to Christians both hurtful and fatal, and that whoever observes them, whether he was originally Jew or Gentile, is on his way to the pit of perdition," I entirely endorse that statement, and add to it, "Whoever observes these ceremonies, whether he was originally Jew or Gentile, is on his way to the pit of perdition, not only if he is sincerely observing them, but also if he is observing them with dissimulation." What more do you ask? But as you draw a distinction between the dissimulation which you hold to have been practised by the apostles, and the rule of conduct befitting the present time, I do the same between the course which Paul, as I think, sincerely followed in all these examples then, and the matter of observing in our day these Jewish ceremonies, although it were done, as by him, without any dissimulation, since it was then to be approved, but is now to be abhorred. Thus, although we read that "the law and the prophets were until John," [Luke 16:16] and that "therefore the Jews sought the more to kill Him, because He not only had broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was His Father, making Himself equal with God," [John 5:18] and that "we have received grace for grace for the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ;" [John 1:16-17] and although it was promised by Jeremiah that God would make a new covenant with the house of Judah, not according to the covenant which He made with their fathers; [Jeremiah 31:31] nevertheless I do not think that the Circumcision of our Lord by His parents was an act of dissimulation. If any one object that He did not forbid this because He was but an infant, I go on to say that I do not think that it was with intention to deceive that He said to the leper, "Offer for your cleansing those things which Moses commanded for a testimony unto them," [Mark 1:44] — thereby adding His own precept to the authority of the law of Moses regarding that ceremonial usage. Nor was there dissimulation in His going up to the feast, [John 7:10] as there was also no desire to be seen of men; for He went up, not openly, but secretly.

19. But the words of the apostle himself may be quoted against me: "Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if you be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing." [Galatians 5:2] It follows from this that he deceived Timothy, and made Christ profit him nothing, for he circumcised Timothy. Do you answer that this circumcision did Timothy no harm, because it was done with an intention to deceive? I reply that the apostle has not made any such exception. He does not say, If you be circumcised without dissimulation, any more than, If you be circumcised with dissimulation. He says unreservedly, "If you be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing." As, therefore, you insist upon finding room for your interpretation, by proposing to supply the words, "unless it be done as an act of dissimulation," I make no unreasonable demand in asking you to permit me to understand the words, "if you be circumcised," to be in that passage addressed to those who demanded circumcision, for this reason, that they thought it impossible for them to be otherwise saved by Christ. Whoever was then circumcised because of such persuasion and desire, and with this design, Christ assuredly profited him nothing, as the apostle elsewhere expressly affirms, If righteousness come by the law, Christ is dead in vain. [Galatians 2:21] The same is affirmed in words which you have quoted: "Christ has become of no effect to you, whosoever of you is justified by the law; you are fallen from grace." [Galatians 5:4] His rebuke, therefore, was addressed to those who believed that they were to be justified by the law, — not to those who, knowing well the design with which the legal ceremonies were instituted as foreshadowing truth, and the time for which they were destined to be in force, observed them in order to honour Him who appointed them at first. Wherefore also he says elsewhere, "If you be led of the Spirit, you are not under the law," [Galatians 5:18] — a passage from which you infer, that evidently "he has not the Holy Spirit who submits to the Law, not, as our fathers affirmed the apostles to have done, feignedly under the promptings of a wise discretion, but"— as I suppose to have been the case — "sincerely."

20. It seems to me important to ascertain precisely what is that submission to the law which the apostle here condemns; for I do not think that he speaks here of circumcision merely, or of the sacrifices then offered by our fathers, but now not offered by Christians, and other observances of the same nature. I rather hold that he includes also that precept of the law, "You shall not covet," which we confess that Christians are unquestionably bound to obey, and which we find most fully proclaimed by the light which the Gospel has shed upon it. "The law," he says, "is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good;" and then adds, "Was, then, that which is good made death unto me? God forbid." "But sin, that it might appear sin, wrought death in me by that which is good; that sin, by the commandment, might become exceeding sinful." [Romans 7:13] As he says here, "that sin by the commandment might become exceeding sinful," so elsewhere, "The law entered that the offense might abound; but where sin abounded, grace did much more abound." [Romans 5:20] Again, in another place, after affirming, when speaking of the dispensation of grace, that grace alone justifies, he asks, "Wherefore then serves the law?" and answers immediately, "It was added because of transgressions, until the Seed should come to whom the promises were made." [Galatians 3:19] The persons, therefore, whose submission to the law the apostle here pronounces to be the cause of their own condemnation, are those whom the law brings in guilty, as not fulfilling its requirements, and who, not understanding the efficacy of free grace, rely with self-satisfied presumption on their own strength to enable them to keep the law of God; for "love is the fulfilling of the law." [Romans 13:10] Now "the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts," not by our own power, but "by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us." [Romans 5:5] The satisfactory discussion of this, however, would require too long a digression, if not a separate volume. If, then, that precept of the law, "You shall not covet," holds under it as guilty the man whose human weakness is not assisted by the grace of God, and instead of acquitting the sinner, condemns him as a transgressor, how much more was it impossible for those ordinances which were merely typical, circumcision and the rest, which were destined to be abolished when the revelation of grace became more widely known, to be the means of justifying any man! Nevertheless they were not on this ground to be immediately shunned with abhorrence, like the diabolical impieties of heathenism, from the first beginning of the revelation of the grace which had been by these shadows prefigured; but to be for a little while tolerated, especially among those who joined the Christian Church from that nation to whom these ordinances had been given. When, however, they had been, as it were, honourably buried, they were thenceforward to be finally abandoned by all Christians.

21. Now, as to the words which you use, "non dispensative, ut nostri voluere majores," — "not in a way justifiable by expediency, the ground on which our fathers were disposed to explain the conduct of the apostles," — pray what do these words mean? Surely nothing else than that which I call "officiosum mendacium," the liberty granted by expediency being equivalent to a call of duty to utter a falsehood with pious intention. I at least can see no other explanation, unless, of course, the mere addition of the words "permitted by expediency" be enough to make a lie cease to be a lie; and if this be absurd, why do you not openly say that a lie spoken in the way of duty is to be defended? Perhaps the name offends you, because the word "officium" is not common in ecclesiastical books; but this did not deter our Ambrose from its use, for he has chosen the title "De Officiis" for some of his books that are full of useful rules. Do you mean to say, that whoever utters a lie from a sense of duty is to be blamed, and whoever does the same on the ground of expediency is to be approved? I beseech you, consider that the man who thinks this may lie whenever he thinks fit, because this involves the whole important question whether to say what is false be at any time the duty of a good man, especially of a Christian man, to whom it has been said, "Let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay, lest ye fall into condemnation," [James 5:12;

Matthew 5:37] and who believes the Psalmist's word, "You will destroy all them that speak lies."

22. This, however, is, as I have said, another and a weighty question; I leave him who is of this opinion to judge for himself the circumstances in which he is at liberty to utter a lie: provided, however, that it be most assuredly believed and maintained that this way of lying is far removed from the authors who were employed to write holy writings, especially the canonical Scriptures; lest those who are the stewards of Christ, of whom it is said, "It is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful," [1 Corinthians 4:2] should seem to have proved their fidelity by learning as an important lesson to speak what is false when this is expedient for the truth's sake, although the word fidelity itself, in the Latin tongue, is said to signify originally a real correspondence between what is said and what is done. Now, where that which is spoken is actually done, there is assuredly no room for falsehood. Paul therefore, as a "faithful steward" doubtless is to be regarded as approving his fidelity in his writings; for he was a steward of truth, not of falsehood. Therefore he wrote the truth when he wrote that he had seen Peter walking not uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, and that he had withstood him to the face because he was compelling the Gentiles to live as the Jews did. And Peter himself received, with the holy and loving humility which became him, the rebuke which Paul, in the interests of truth, and with the boldness of love, administered. Therein Peter left to those that came after him an example, that, if at any time they deviated from the right path, they should not think it beneath them to accept correction from those who were their juniors — an example more rare, and requiring greater piety, than that which Paul's conduct on the same occasion left us, that those who are younger should have courage even to withstand their seniors if the defense of evangelical truth required it, yet in such a way as to preserve unbroken brotherly love. For while it is better for one to succeed in perfectly keeping the right path, it is a thing much more worthy of admiration and praise to receive admonition meekly, than to admonish a transgressor boldly. On that occasion, therefore, Paul was to be praised for upright courage, Peter was to be praised for holy humility; and so far as my judgment enables me to form an opinion, this ought rather to have been asserted in answer to the calumnies of Porphyry, than further occasion given to him for finding fault, by putting it in his power to bring against Christians this much more damaging accusation, that either in writing their letters or in complying with the ordinances of God they practised deceit.

23. You call upon me to bring forward the name of even one whose opinion I have followed in this matter, and at the same time you have quoted the names of many who have held before you the opinion which you defend. You also say that if I censure you for an error in this, you beg to be allowed to remain in error in company with such great men. I have not read their writings; but although they are only six or seven in all, you have yourself impugned the authority of four of them. For as to the Laodicean author, whose name you do not give, you say that he has lately forsaken the Church; Alexander you describe as a heretic of old standing; and as to Origen and Didymus, I read in some of your more recent works, censure passed on their opinions, and that in no measured terms, nor in regard to insignificant questions, although formerly you gave Origen marvellous praise. I suppose, therefore, that you would not even yourself be contented to be in error with these men; although the language which I refer to is equivalent to an assertion that in this matter they have not erred. For who is there that would consent to be knowingly mistaken, with whatever company he might share his errors? Three of the seven therefore alone remain, Eusebius of Emesa, Theodorus of Heraclea, and John, whom you afterwards mention, who formerly presided as pontiff over the Church of Constantinople.

24. However, if you inquire or recall to memory the opinion of our Ambrose, and also of our Cyprian, on the point in question, you will perhaps find that I also have not been without some whose footsteps I follow in that which I have maintained. At the same time, as I have said already, it is to the canonical Scriptures alone that I am bound to yield such implicit subjection as to follow their teaching, without admitting the slightest suspicion that in them any mistake or any statement intended to mislead could find a place. Wherefore, when I look round for a third name that I may oppose three on my side to your three, I might indeed easily find one, I believe, if my reading had been extensive; but one occurs to me whose name is as good as all these others, nay, of greater authority — I mean the Apostle Paul himself. To him I betake myself; to himself I appeal from the verdict of all those commentators on his writings who advance an opinion different from mine. I interrogate him, and demand from himself to know whether he wrote what was true, or under some plea of expediency wrote what he knew to be false, when he wrote that he saw Peter not walking uprightly, according to the truth of the gospel, and withstood him to his face because by that dissimulation he was compelling the Gentiles to live after the manner of the Jews. And I hear him in reply proclaiming with a solemn oath in an earlier part of the epistle, where he began this narration, "The things that I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not." [Galatians 1:20]

25. Let those who think otherwise, however great their names, excuse my differing from them. The testimony of so great an apostle using, in his own writings, an oath as a confirmation of their truth, is of more weight with me than the opinion of any man, however learned, who is discussing the writings of another. Nor am I afraid lest men should say that, in vindicating Paul from the charge of pretending to conform to the errors of Jewish prejudice, I affirm him to have actually so conformed. For as, on the one hand, he was not guilty of pretending conformity to error when, with the liberty of an apostle, such as was suitable to that period of transition, he did, by practising those ancient holy ordinances, when it was necessary to declare their original excellence as appointed not by the wiles of Satan to deceive men, but by the wisdom of God for the purpose of typically foretelling things to come; so, on the other hand, he was not guilty of real conformity to the errors of Judaism, seeing that he not only knew, but also preached constantly and vehemently, that those were in error who thought that these ceremonies were to be imposed upon the Gentile converts, or were necessary to the justification of any who believed.

26. Moreover, as to my saying that to the Jews he became as a Jew, and to the Gentiles as a Gentile, not with the subtlety of intentional deceit, but with the compassion of pitying love, it seems to me that you have not sufficiently considered my meaning in the words; or rather, perhaps, I have not succeeded in making it plain. For I did not mean by this that I supposed him to have practised in either case a feigned conformity; but I said it because his conformity was sincere, not less in the things in which he became to the Jews as a Jew, than in those in which he became to the Gentiles as a Gentile — a parallel which you yourself suggested, and by which I thankfully acknowledge that you have materially assisted my argument. For when I had in my letter asked you to explain how it could be supposed that Paul's becoming to the Jews as a Jew involved the supposition that he must have acted deceitfully in conforming to the Jewish observances, seeing that no such deceptive conformity to heathen customs was involved in his becoming as a Gentile to the Gentiles; your answer was, that his becoming to the Gentiles as a Gentile meant no more than his receiving the uncircumcised, and permitting the free use of those meats which were pronounced unclean by Jewish law. If, then, when I ask whether in this also he practised dissimulation, such an idea is repudiated as palpably most absurd and false: it is an obvious inference, that in his performing those things in which he became as a Jew to the Jews, he was using a wise liberty, not yielding to a degrading compulsion, nor doing what would be still more unworthy of him, viz. stooping from integrity to fraud out of a regard to expediency.

27. For to believers, and to those who know the truth, as the apostle testifies (unless here too, perhaps, he is deceiving his readers), "every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving." [1 Timothy 4:4] Therefore to Paul himself, not only as a man, but as a steward eminently faithful, not only as knowing, but also as a teacher of the truth, every creature of God which is used for food was not feignedly but truly good. If, then, to the Gentiles he became as a Gentile, by holding and teaching the truth concerning meats and circumcision although he feigned no conformity to the rites and ceremonies of the Gentiles, why say that it was impossible for him to become as a Jew to the Jews, unless he practised dissimulation in performing the rites of their religion? Why did he maintain the true faithfulness of a steward towards the wild olive branch that was engrafted, and yet hold up a strange veil of dissimulation, on the plea of expediency, before those who were the natural and original branches of the olive tree? Why was it that, in becoming as a Gentile to the Gentiles, his teaching and his conduct are in harmony with his real sentiments; but that, in becoming as a Jew to the Jews, he shuts up one thing in his heart, and declares something wholly different in his words, deeds, and writings? But far be it from us to entertain such thoughts of him. To both Jews and Gentiles he owed "charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned;" [1 Timothy 1:5] and therefore he became all things to all men, that he might gain all, [1 Corinthians 9:19-22] not with the subtlety of a deceiver, but with the love of one filled with compassion; that is to say, not by pretending himself to do all the evil things which other men did, but by using the utmost pains to minister with all compassion the remedies required by the evils under which other men laboured, as if their case had been his own.

28. When, therefore, he did not refuse to practise some of these Old Testament observances, he was not led by his compassion for Jews to feign this conformity, but unquestionably was acting sincerely; and by this course of action declaring his respect for those things which in the former dispensation had been for a time enjoined by God, he distinguished between them and the impious rites of heathenism. At that time, moreover, not with the subtlety of a deceiver, but with the love of one moved by compassion, he became to the Jews as a Jew, when, seeing them to be in error, which either made them unwilling to believe in Christ, or made them think that by these old sacrifices and ceremonial observances they could be cleansed from sin and made partakers of salvation, he desired so to deliver them from that error as if he saw not them, but himself, entangled in it; thus truly loving his neighbour as himself, and doing to others as he would have others do to him if he required their help — a duty to the statement of which our Lord added these words, "This is the law and the prophets." [Matthew 7:12]

29. This compassionate affection Paul recommends in the same Epistle to the Galatians, saying: "If a man be overtaken in a fault, you which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness; considering yourself, lest you also be tempted." [Galatians 6:2] See whether he has not said, "Make yourself as he is, that you may gain him." Not, indeed, that one should commit or pretend to have committed the same fault as the one who has been overtaken, but that in the fault of that other he should consider what might happen to himself, and so compassionately render assistance to that other, as he would wish that other to do to him if the case were his; that is, not with the subtlety of a deceiver, but with the love of one filled with compassion. Thus, whatever the error or fault in which Jew or Gentile or any man was found by Paul, to all men he became all things — not by feigning what was not true, but by feeling, because the case might have been his own, the compassion of one who put himself in the other's place — that he might gain all.

30. I beseech you to look, if you please, for a little into your own heart — I mean, into your own heart as it stands affected towards myself — and recall, or if you have it in writing beside you, read again, your own words in that letter (only too brief) which you sent to me by Cyprian our brother, now my colleague. Read with what sincere brotherly and loving earnestness you have added to a serious complaint of what I had done to you these words: "In this friendship is wounded, and the laws of brotherly union are set at nought. Let not the world see us quarrelling like children, and giving material for angry contention between those who may become our respective supporters or adversaries." These words I perceive to be spoken by you from the heart, and from a heart kindly seeking to give me good advice. Then you add, what would have been obvious to me even without your stating it: "I write what I have now written, because I desire to cherish towards you pure and Christian love, and not to hide in my heart anything which does not agree with the utterance of my lips." O pious man, beloved by me, as God who sees my soul is witness, with a true heart I believe your statement; and just as I do not question the sincerity of the profession which you have thus made in a letter to me, so do I by all means believe the Apostle Paul when he makes the very same profession in his letter, addressed not to any one individual, but to Jews and Greeks, and all those Gentiles who were his children in the gospel, for whose spiritual birth he travailed, and after them to so many thousands of believers in Christ, for whose sake that letter has been preserved. I believe, I say, that he did not "hide in his heart anything which did not agree with the utterance of his lips."

31. You have indeed yourself done towards me this very thing — becoming to me as I am — "not with the subtlety of deception, but with the love of compassion," when you thought that it behooved you to take as much pains to prevent me from being left in a mistake, in which you believed me to be, as you would have wished another to take for your deliverance if the case had been your own. Wherefore, gratefully acknowledging this evidence of your goodwill towards me, I also claim that you also be not displeased with me, if, when anything in your treatises disquieted me, I acquainted you with my distress, desiring the same course to be followed by all towards me as I have followed towards you, that whatever they think worthy of censure in my writings, they would neither flatter me with deceitful commendation nor blame me before others for that of which they are silent towards myself; thereby, as it seems to me, more seriously "wounding friendship and setting at nought the laws of brotherly union." For I would hesitate to give the name of Christian to those friendships in which the common proverb, "Flattery makes friends, and truth makes enemies," is of more authority than the scriptural proverb, "Faithful are the wounds of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful." [Proverbs 27:6]

32. Wherefore let us rather do our utmost to set before our beloved friends, who most cordially wish us well in our labours, such an example that they may know that it is possible for the most intimate friends to differ so much in opinion, that the views of the one may be contradicted by the other without any diminution of their mutual affection, and without hatred being kindled by that truth which is due to genuine friendship, whether the contradiction be in itself in accordance with truth, or at least, whatever its intrinsic value is, be spoken from a sincere heart by one who is resolved not "to hide in his heart anything which does not agree with the utterance of his lips." Let therefore our brethren, your friends, of whom you bear testimony that they are vessels of Christ, believe me when I say that it was wholly against my will that my letter came into the hands of many others before it reached your own, and that my heart is filled with no small sorrow for this mistake. How it happened would take long to tell, and this is now, if I am not mistaken, unnecessary; since, if my word is to be taken at all in regard to this, it suffices for me to say that it was not done by me with the sinister intention which is supposed by some, and that it was not by my wish, or arrangement, or consent, or design that this has taken place. If they do not believe this, which I affirm in the sight of God, I can do no more to satisfy them. Far be it, however, from me to believe that they made this suggestion to your Holiness with the malicious desire to kindle enmity between you and me, from which may God in His mercy defend us! Doubtless, without any intention of doing me wrong, they readily suspected me, as a man, to be capable of failings common to human nature. For it is right for me to believe this concerning them, if they be vessels of Christ appointed not to dishonour, but to honour, and made meet by God for every good work in His great house. [2 Timothy 2:20-21] If, however, this my solemn protestation come to their knowledge, and they still persist in the same opinion of my conduct, you will yourself see that in this they will do wrong.

33. As to my having written that I had never sent to Rome a book against you, I wrote this because, in the first place, I did not regard the name "book" as applicable to my letter, and therefore was under the impression that you had heard of something else entirely different from it; in the second place, I had not sent the letter in question to Rome, but to you; and in the third place, I did not consider it to be against you, because I knew that I had been prompted by the sincerity of friendship, which should give liberty for the exchange of suggestions and corrections between us. Leaving out of sight for a little while your friends of whom I have spoken, I implore yourself, by the grace whereby we have been redeemed, not to suppose that I have been guilty of artful flattery in anything which I have said in my letters concerning the good gifts which have been by the Lord's goodness bestowed on you. If, however, I have in anything wronged you, forgive me. As to that incident in the life of some forgotten bard, which, with perhaps more pedantry than good taste, I quoted from classic literature, I beg you not to carry the application of it to yourself further than my words warranted for I immediately added: "I do not say this in order that you may recover the faculty of spiritual sight — far be it from me to say that you have lost it! — but that, having eyes both clear and quick in discernment, you may turn them to this matter." I thought a reference to that incident suitable exclusively in connection with the παλινοδία, in which we ought all to imitate Stesichorus if we have written anything which it becomes our duty to correct in a writing of later date, and not at all in connection with the blindness of Stesichorus, which I neither ascribed to your mind, nor feared as likely to befall you. And again, I beseech you to correct boldly whatever you see needful to censure in my writings. For although, so far as the titles of honour which prevail in the Church are concerned, a bishop's rank is above that of a presbyter, nevertheless in many things Augustine is inferior to Jerome; albeit correction is not to be refused nor despised, even when it comes from one who in all respects may be an inferior.

34. As to your translation, you have now convinced me of the benefits to be secured by your proposal to translate the Scriptures from the original Hebrew, in order that you may bring to light those things which have been either omitted or perverted by the Jews. But I beg you to be so good as state by what Jews this has been done, whether by those who before the Lord's advent translated the Old Testament— and if so, by what one or more of them — or by the Jews of later times, who may be supposed to have mutilated or corrupted the Greek manuscripts, in order to prevent themselves from being unable to answer the evidence given by these concerning the Christian faith. I cannot find any reason which should have prompted the earlier Jewish translators to such unfaithfulness. I beg of you, moreover, to send us your translation of the Septuagint, which I did not know that you had published. I am also longing to read that book of yours which you named De optimo genere interpretandi, and to know from it how to adjust the balance between the product of the translator's acquaintance with the original language, and the conjectures of those who are able commentators on the Scripture, who, notwithstanding their common loyalty to the one true faith, must often bring forward various opinions on account of the obscurity of many passages; although this difference of interpretation by no means involves departure from the unity of the faith; just as one commentator may himself give, in harmony with the faith which he holds, two different interpretations of the same passage, because the obscurity of the passage makes both equally admissible.

35. I desire, moreover, your translation of the Septuagint, in order that we may be delivered, so far as is possible, from the consequences of the notable incompetency of those who, whether qualified or not, have attempted a Latin translation; and in order that those who think that I look with jealousy on your useful labours, may at length, if it be possible, perceive that my only reason for objecting to the public reading of your translation from the Hebrew in our churches was, lest, bringing forward anything which was, as it were, new and opposed to the authority of the Septuagint version, we should trouble by serious cause of offense the flocks of Christ, whose ears and hearts have become accustomed to listen to that version to which the seal of approbation was given by the apostles themselves. Wherefore, as to that shrub in the book of Jonah, if in the Hebrew it is neither "gourd" nor "ivy," but something else which stands erect, supported by its own stem without other props, I would prefer to call it "gourd" in all our Latin versions; for I do not think that the Seventy would have rendered it thus at random, had they not known that the plant was something like a gourd.

36. I think I have now given a sufficient answer (perhaps more than sufficient) to your three letters; of which I received two by Cyprian, and one by Firmus. In replying, send whatever you think likely to be of use in instructing me and others. And I shall take more care, as the Lord may help me, that any letter which I may write to you shall reach yourself before it falls into the hand of any other, by whom its contents may be published abroad; for I confess that I would not like any letter of yours to me to meet with the fate of which you justly complain as having befallen my letter to you. Let us, however, resolve to maintain between ourselves the liberty as well as the love of friends; so that in the letters which we exchange, neither of us shall be restrained from frankly stating to the other whatever seems to him open to correction, provided always that this be done in the spirit which does not, as inconsistent with brotherly love, displease God. If, however, you do not think that this can be done between us without endangering that brotherly love, let us not do it: for the love which I should like to see maintained between us is assuredly the greater love which would make this mutual freedom possible; but the smaller measure of it is better than none at all.

Letters - letter_117

Letter 117. To a Mother and Daughter Living in Gaul. A monk of Gaul had during a visit to Bethlehem asked Jerome for advice under the following circumstances. His mother was a church-widow and his sister a religious virgin but the two could not agree. They were accordingly living apart but neither by herself. For each had taken into her house a monk ostensibly to act as steward but really to be a paramour. At the request of his visitor Jerome now writes to both mother and daughter urging them to dismiss their companions; or at any rate to live together: and pointing out the grave scandal that must otherwise be caused. From the treatise against Vigilantius (§3) we learn that ill-natured critics maintained that the persons and circumstances described in the letter were alike fictitious and that Jerome in writing it was but exercising his ingenuity on a congenial theme. The date is a.d. 405.

Introduction.

1. A certain brother from Gaul has told me that his virgin-sister and widowed mother, though living in the same city, have separate abodes and have taken to themselves clerical protectors either as guests or stewards; and that by thus associating with strangers they have caused more scandal than by living apart. When I groaned and expressed what I felt more by silence than words; "I beseech you," said he, "rebuke them in a letter and recall them to mutual harmony; make them once more mother and daughter." To whom I replied, "a nice task this that you lay upon me, for me a stranger to reconcile two women whom you, a son and brother, have failed to influence. You speak as though I occupied the chair of a bishop instead of being shut up? a monastic cell where, far removed from the world's turmoil, I lament the sins of the past and try to avoid the temptations of the present. Moreover, it is surely inconsistent, while one buries oneself out of sight, to allow one's tongue free course through the world." "You are too fearful," he replied; "where is that old hardihood of yours which made you 'scour the world with copious salt,' as Horace says of Lucilius?" [Hor. Sat. I. 10:3, 4] "It is this," I rejoined, "that makes me shy and forbids me to open my lips. For through accusing crime I have been myself made out a criminal. Men have disputed and denied my assertions until, as the proverb goes, I hardly know whether I have ears or feeling left. The very walls have resounded with curses levelled at me, and 'I was the song of drunkards.'¹ Under the compulsion of an unhappy experience I have learned to be silent, thinking it better to set a watch before my mouth and to keep the door of my lips than to incline my heart to any evil thing, [Ps. 141:3, Ps. 141:4] or, while censuring the faults of others, myself to fall into that of detraction." In answer to this he said: "Speaking the truth is not detraction. Nor will you lecture the world by administering a particular rebuke; for there are few persons, if any, open to this special charge. I beg of you, therefore, as I have put myself to the trouble of this long journey, that you will not suffer me to have come for nothing. The Lord knows that, after the sight of the holy places, my principal object in coming has been to heal by a letter from you the division between my sister and my mother." "Well," I replied, "I will do as you wish, for after all the letters will be to persons beyond the sea and words written with reference to definite persons can seldom offend other people. But I must ask you to keep what I say secret. You will take my advice with you to encourage you by the way; if it is listened to, I will rejoice as much as you; while if, as I rather think, it is rejected, I shall have wasted my words and you will have made a long journey for nothing." The Letter.

2. In the first place my sister and my daughter, I wish you to know that I am not writing to you because I suspect anything evil of you. On the contrary I implore you to live in harmony, so as to give no ground for any such suspicions. Moreover had I supposed you fast bound in sin-far be this from you-I should never have written, for I should have known that my words would be addressed to deaf ears. Again, if I write to you somewhat sharply, I beg of you to ascribe this not to any harshness on my part but to the nature of the ailment which I attempt to treat. Caution and the knife are the only remedies when mortification has once set in; poison is the only antidote known for poison; great pain can only be relieved by inflicting greater pain. Lastly I must say this that even if your own consciences acquit you of misdoing, yet the very rumour of such brings disgrace upon you. Mother and daughter are names of affection; they imply natural ties and reciprocal duties; they form the closest of human relations after that which binds the soul to God. If you love each other, your conduct calls for no praise: but if you hate each other, you have committed a crime. The Lord Jesus was subject to His parents. [Luke 2:51] He revered that mother of whom He was Himself the parent; He respected the foster-father whom He had Himself fostered; for He remembered that He had been carried in the womb of the one and in the arms of the other. Wherefore also when He hung upon the cross He commended to His disciple [John. 19:26, John. 19:27] the mother whom He had never before His passion parted from Himself.

3. Well, I shall say no more to the mother, for perhaps age, weakness, and loneliness make sufficient excuses for her; but to you the daughter I say: "Is a mother's house too small for you whose womb was not too small? When you have lived with her for ten months in the one, can you not bear to live with her for one day in the other? or are you unable to meet her gaze? Can it be that one who has borne you and reared you, who has brought you up and knows you, is dreaded by you as a witness of your homelife? If you are a true virgin, why do you fear her careful guardianship; and, if you have fallen, why do you not openly marry? Wedlock is like a plank offered to a shipwrecked man and by its means you may remedy what previously you have done amiss. I do not mean that you are not to repent of your sin or that you are to continue in evil courses; but, when a tie of the kind has been formed, I despair of breaking it altogether. However, a return to your mother will make it easier for you to bewail the virginity which you have lost through leaving her. Or if you are still unspotted and have not lost your chastity, be careful of it for you may lose it. Why must you live in a house where you must daily struggle for life and death? Can any one sleep soundly with a viper near him? No; for, though it may not attack him it is sure to frighten him. It is better to be where there is no danger, than to be in danger and to escape. In the one case we have a calm; in the other careful steering is necessary. In the one case we are filled with joy; in the other we do but avoid sorrow.

4. But you will perhaps reply: "my mother is not well-behaved, she desires the things of the world, she loves riches, she disregards fasting, she stains her eyes with antimony, she likes to walk abroad in gay attire, she hinders me from the monastic vow, and so I cannot live with her." But first of all, even though she is as you say, you will have the greater reward for refusing to forsake her with all her faults. She has carried you in her womb, she has reared you; with gentle affection she has borne with the troublesome ways of your childhood. She has washed your linen, she has tended you when sick, and the sickness of maternity was not only borne for you but caused by

you. She has brought you up to womanhood, she has taught you to love Christ. You ought not to be displeased with the behaviour of a mother who has consecrated you as a virgin to the service of your spouse. Still if you cannot put up with her dainty ways and feel obliged to shun them, and if your mother really is, as people so often say, a woman of the world, you have others, virgins like yourself, the holy company of chastity. Why, when you forsake your mother, do you choose for companion a man who perhaps has left behind him a sister and mother of his own? You tell me that she is hard to get on with and that he is easy; that she is quarrelsome and that he is amiable. I will ask you one question: Did you go straight from your home to the man, or did you fall in with him afterwards? If you went straight to him, the reason why you left your mother is plain. If you fell in with him afterwards, you shew by your choice what you missed under your mother's roof.² The pain that I inflict is severe and I feel the knife as much as you. "He that walketh uprightly walketh surely." [Prov. 10:9] Only that my conscience would smite me, I should keep silence and be slow to blame others where I am not guiltless myself. Having a beam in my own eye I should be reluctant to see the mote in my neighbour's. But as it is I live far away among Christian brothers; my life with them is honourable as eyewitnesses of it can testify; I rarely see, or am seen by, others. It is most shameless, therefore, in you to refuse to copy me in respect of self-restraint, when you profess to take me as your model. If you say: "my conscience is enough for me too. God is my judge who is witness of my life. I care not what men may say;" let me urge upon you the apostle's words: "provide things honest" not only in the sight of God but also "in the sight of all men." [Rom. 12:17] If any one carps at you for being a Christian and a virgin, mind it not; you have left your mother it may be said to live in a monastery among virgins, but censure on this score is your glory. When men blame a maid of God not for self-indulgence but only for insensibility to affection, what they condemn as callous disregard of a parent is really a lively devotion towards God. For you prefer to your mother Him whom you are bidden to prefer to your own soul. [Luke 14:26] And if the day ever comes that she also shall so prefer Him, she will find in you not a daughter only but a sister as well.

5. "What then?" you will say, "is it a crime to have a man of religion in the house with me?" You seize me by the collar and drag me into court either to sanction what I disapprove or else to incur the dislike of many. A man of religion never separates a daughter from her mother. He welcomes both and respects both. A daughter may be as religious as she pleases; still a mother who is a widow is a guaranty for her chastity. If this person whoever he is is of the same age with yourself, he should honour your mother as though she were his own; and, if he is older, he should love you as a daughter and subject you to a mother's discipline. It is not good either for your reputation or for his that he should like you more than your mother; for his affection might appear to be less for you than for your youth. This is what I should say if a monk were not your brother and if you had no relatives able to protect you. But what excuse has a stranger for thrusting himself in where there are both a mother and a brother, the one a widow and the other a monk? It is good for you to feel that you are a daughter and a sister. However, if you cannot manage both, and if your mother is too hard a morsel to swallow, your brother at any rate should satisfy you. Or, if he is too harsh, she that bore you may prove more gentle. Why do you turn pale? Why do you get excited? Why do you blush, and with trembling lips betray the restlessness of your mind? One thing only can surpass a woman's love for her mother and brother; and that is her passion for her husband.

6. I am told, moreover, that you frequent suburban villas and their pleasant gardens in the company of relatives and intimate friends. I have no doubt that it is some female cousin or connexion who for her own satisfaction carries you about with her as a novel kind of attendant. Far be it from me to suspect that you would desire men's society; even though they should be those of your own family. But pray, maiden, answer me this; do you appear alone in your kinsfolk's society? or do you bring your favourite with you? Shameless as you may be, you will hardly venture to flaunt him in the eyes of the world. If you ever do so, your whole circle will cry out about both you and him; every one's finger will be pointed at you; and your cousins who in your presence to please you call him a monk and a man of religion, will laugh at you behind your back for having such an unnatural husband. If on the other hand you go out alone-which I rather suppose to be the case-you will find yourself clothed in sober garb among slave youths, women married or soon to be so, wanton girls, and dandies with long hair and tight-fitting vests.³ Some bearded fop will offer you his hand he will hold you up if you feel tired, and the pressure of his fingers will either be a temptation to you, or will shew that you are a temptation to him. Again when you sit down to table with married men and women, you will have to see kisses in which you have no part, and dishes partaken of which are not for you. Moreover it cannot but do you harm to see other women attired in silk dresses and gold brocades. At table also whether you like it or not, you will be forced to eat flesh and that of different kinds. To make you drink wine they will praise it as a creature of God. To induce you to take baths they will speak of dirt with disgust; and, when on second thoughts you do as you are bid, they will with one voice salute you as spotless and open, a thorough lady. Meantime some singer will give to the company a selection of softly flowing airs; and as he will not venture to look at other men's wives, he will constantly fix his eyes on you who have no protector. He will speak by nods and convey by his tone what he is afraid to put into words. Amid inducements to sensuality so marked as these, even iron wills are apt to be overcome with desire; an appetite which is the more imperious in virgins because they suppose. that sweetest of which they have no experience. Heathen legends tell us that sailors actually ran their ships on the rocks that they might listen to the songs of the Sirens; and that the lyre of Orpheus had power to draw to itself trees and animals and to soften flints. In the banquet-hall chastity is hard to keep. A shining skin shews a sin-stained soul.

7. As a schoolboy I have read of one-and have seen his effigy true to the life in the streets-who continued to cherish an unlawful passion even when his flesh scarcely clung to his bones, and whose malady remained uncured until death cured it. What then will become of you a young girl physically sound, dainty, stout, and ruddy, if you allow yourself free range among flesh-dishes, wines, and baths, not to mention married men and bachelors? Even if when solicited you refuse to consent, you will take the fact of your being asked as evidence that you are considered handsome. A sensual mind pursues dishonourable objects with greater zest than honourable ones; and when a thing is forbidden hankers after it with greater pleasure. Your very dress, cheap and sombre as it is, is an index of your secret feelings. For it has no creases and trails along the ground to make you appear taller than you are. Your vest is purposely ripped asunder to shew what is beneath and while hiding what is repulsive, to reveal what is fair. As you walk, the very creaking of your black and shiny shoes attracts the notice of the young men. You wear stays to keep your breasts in place, and a heaving girdle closely confines your chest. Your hair covers either your forehead or your ears. Sometimes too you let your shawl drop so as to lay bare your white shoulders; and, as if unwilling that they should be seen, you quickly conceal what you have purposely disclosed. And when in public you for modesty's sake cover your face, like a practised harlot you only shew what is likely to please.

8. You will exclaim "How do you know what I am like, or how, when you are so far away, can you see what I am doing?" Your own brother's tears and sobs have told me, his frequent and scarcely endurable bursts of grief. Would that he had lied or that his words had been words of apprehension only and not of accusation. But, believe me, liars do not shed tears. He is indignant that you prefer to himself a young man, not it is true clothed in silk or wearing his hair long but muscular and dainty in the midst of his squalor; and that this fellow holds the purse-strings, looks after the weaving, allots the servants their tasks, rules the household, and buys from the market all that is needed. He is at once steward and master, and, as he anticipates the slaves in their duties,⁴ he is carped at by all the domestics. Everything that their mistress has not given them they declare that he has stolen from them. Servants as a class are full of complaints; and no matter what you give them, it is always too little. For they do not consider how much you have but only how much you give; and they make up for their chagrin in the only way they can, that is, by grumbling. One calls him a parasite, another an impostor, another a money-seeker, another by some novel appellation that hits his fancy. They noise it abroad that he is constantly at your bed-side, that when you are sick he runs to fetch nurses, that he holds basins, airs sheets, and folds bandages for you. The world is only too ready to believe scandal, and stories invented at home soon get afloat abroad. Nor need you be surprised if your servantmen and servantmaids get up such tales about you, when even your mother and your brother complain of your conduct.

9. Do, therefore, what I advise you and entreat you to do: if possible, be reconciled with your mother; or, if this may not be, at least come to terms with your brother. Or if you are filled with an implacable hatred of relationships usually so dear, separate at all events from the man, whom you are said to prefer to your own flesh and blood, and, if even this is impossible for you, (for, if you could leave him, you would certainly return to your own) pay more regard to appearances in harbouring him as your companion. Live in a separate building and take your meals apart; for if you remain under one roof with him slanderers will say that you share with him your bed. You may thus easily get help from him when you feel you need it, and yet to a considerable degree escape public discredit. Yet you must take care not to contract the stain of which Jeremiah tells us that no nitre or fuller's soap can wash it out. [Jer. 2:22] When you wish him to come to see you, always have witnesses present; either friends, or freedmen, or slaves. A good conscience is afraid of no man's eyes. Let him come in unembarrassed and go out at his ease. Let his silent looks, his unspoken words and his whole carriage, though at times they may imply embarrassment, yet indicate peace of mind. Pray, open your ears and listen to the outcry of the whole city. You have already both of you lost your own names and are known each by that of the other. You are spoken of as his, and he is said to be yours. Your mother and your brother have heard this and are ready to take you in between them. They implore you to consent to this arrangement, so that the scandal of your intimacy with this man which is confined to yourself may give place to a glory common to all. You can live with your mother and he with your brother. You can more boldly shew your regard for one who is your brother's comrade; and your mother will more properly esteem one who is the friend of her son and not of her daughter. But if you frown and refuse to accept my advice, this letter will openly expostulate with you. 'Why,' it will say, 'do you beset another man's servant? Why do you make Christ's minister your slave? Look at the people and scan each face as it comes under your view. When he reads in the church all eyes are fixed upon you; and you, using the licence of a wife, glory in your shame. Secret infamy no longer contents you; you call boldness freedom; "you have a whore's forehead and refuse to be ashamed." [From Jer. 3:3]

10. Once more you exclaim that I am over-suspicious, a thinker of evil, too ready to follow rumours. What? I suspicious? I ill-natured? I, who as I said in the beginning have taken up my pen because I have no suspicions? Or is it you that are careless, loose, disdainful? You who at the age of twenty-five have netted in your embrace a youth whose beard has scarcely grown? An excellent instructor he must be, able no doubt by his severe looks both to warn and frighten you! No age is safe from lust, yet gray hairs are some security for decent conduct. A day will surely come (for time glides by imperceptibly) when your handsome young favourite will find a wealthier or more youthful mistress. For women soon age and particularly if they live with men. You will be sorry for your decision and regret your obstinacy in a day when your means and reputation shall be alike gone, and when this unhappy intimacy shall be happily broken off. But perhaps you feel sure of your ground and see no reason to fear a breach where affection has had so long a time to develop and grow.

11. To you also, her mother, I must say a word. Your years put you beyond the reach of scandal; do not take advantage of this to indulge in sin. It is more fitting that your daughter should learn from you how to part from a companion than that you should learn from her how to give up a paramour. You have a son, a daughter, and a son-in-law, or at least one who is your daughter's partner.⁵ Why then should you seek other society than theirs, or wish to kindle anew expiring flames? It would be more becoming in you to screen your daughter's fault than to make it an excuse for your own misdoing. Your son is a monk, and, if he were to live with you, he would strengthen you in your religious profession and in your vow of widowhood. Why should you take in a complete stranger, especially in a house not large enough to hold a son and a daughter? You are old enough to have grand-children. Invite the pair home then. Your daughter went away by herself; let her return with this man. I say 'man' and not 'husband' that none may cavil. The word describes his sex and not his relation to her. Or if she blushes to accept your offer or finds the house in which she was born too narrow for her, then move both of you to her abode. However limited may be its accommodation, it can take in a mother and a brother better than a stranger. In fact, if she lives in the same house and occupies the same room with a man, she cannot long preserve her chastity. It is different when two women and two men live together. If the third person concerned -he, I mean, who fosters your old age-will not make one of the party and causes only dissension and confusion, the pair of you⁶ can do without him. But if the three of you remain together, then your brother and son⁷ will offer him a sister and a mother. Others may speak of the two strangers as step-father and son-in-law; but your son must speak of them as his foster-father and his brother.

Note.

12. Working quickly I have completed this letter in a single night anxious alike to gratify a friend and to try my hand on a rhetorical theme. Then early in the morning he has knocked at my door on the point of starting. I wish also to shew my detractors that like them I too can say the first thing that comes into my head. I have, therefore, introduced few quotations from the scriptures and have not, as in most of my books, interwoven its flowers in my discourse. The letter has been, in fact, dictated off-hand and poured forth by lamp-light so fast that my tongue has outstripped my secretaries' pens and that my volubility has baffled the expedients of shorthand. I have said this much that those who make no allowances for want of ability may make some for want of time.

1: Ps. lxxix 12 2: Viz. men's society 3: Lineatos juvenes. The linea appears to have been a close-fitting jerkin 4: To ingratiate himself with their mistress. Cf. 108 5: Contubernalis 6: Viz. the mother and daughter 7: Viz. the monk who was son of the widow and brother of the virgin

Letters - letter_118

Letter 118. To Julian.

Jerome writes to Julian, a wealthy nobleman apparently of Dalmatia (§5), to console him for the loss of his wife and two daughters all of whom had recently died. He reminds Julian of the trials of Job and recommends him to imitate the patience of the patriarch. He also urges him to follow the example set by Pammachius and Paulinus, that is, to give up his riches and to become a monk for the sake of Christ. The date of the letter is 406 a.d.

I. At the very instant of his departure Ausonius, a son to me as he is a brother to you, gave me a late glimpse of himself but quickly hurried away again, saying good-morning and good-bye together. Yet he thought that he would return empty-handed unless he could bring you some trifle from me however hastily written. Clothed in scarlet as befitted his rank, he had already strapped on his sword-belt¹ and sent down a requisition to have a stage-horse saddled. Still he made me send for my secretary and dictate a letter to him. This I did with such rapidity that his nimble hand could hardly keep pace with my words or manage to put down my hurried sentences. Thus hasty dictation has taken the place of careful writing; and, if I break my long silence, it is but to offer you an expression of good will. This is an impromptu letter without logical order or charm of style. You must look on me for once as a friend only; you will find, I assure you, nothing of the orator here. Bear in mind that it has been dashed off on the spur of the moment and given as a provision for the way to one in a hurry to depart.

Holy scripture says: "a tale out of season is as musick in mourning." [Ecclus. 22:6] Accordingly I have disdained the graces of rhetoric and those charms of eloquence which boys find so captivating, and have fallen back on the serious tone of the sacred writings. For in these are to be found true medicines for wounds and sure remedies for sorrow. In these a mother receives back her only son even on the bier. [Luke 7:11-15] In these a crowd of mourners hears the words: "the maid is not dead but sleepeth." [Matt. 9:24] In these one that is four days dead comes forth bound at the call of the Lord. [John. 11:39, John. 11:43, John. 11:44]

2. I hear that in a short space of time you have suffered. several bereavements, that you have buried in quick succession two young unmarried daughters, and that Faustina, most chaste and loyal of wives, your sister in the fervour of her faith and your one comfort in the loss of your children, has suddenly fallen asleep and been taken from you. You have been like a shipwrecked man, who has no sooner reached the shore than he falls into the hands of brigands, or in the eloquent language of the prophet like one "who did flee from a lion, and a bear met him; or went into the house, and leaned his hand on the wall, and a serpent bit him." [Amos 5:19] Pecuniary losses have followed your bereavements; the entire province has been overrun by a barbarian enemy, and in the general devastation your private property has been destroyed, your flocks and herds have been driven off, and your poor slaves either made prisoners or else slain. To crown all, your only daughter, made all the more dear to you by the loss of the others, has for her husband a young nobleman who, to say nothing worse of him, has given you more occasion for sorrow than for rejoicing. Such is the list of the trials that have been laid upon you; such is the conflict waged by the old enemy against Julian a raw recruit to Christ's standard. If you look only to yourself your troubles are indeed great but if you look to the strong Warrior, [Cf. Rev. 19:11-16] they are but child's play and the conflict is only the semblance of one. After untold trials a wicked wife was still left to the blessed Job, the devil hoping that he might learn from her to blaspheme God. You on the other hand have been deprived of an excellent one that you might learn to go without consolation in the hour of misfortune. Yet it is far harder to put up with a wife whom you dislike than it is to mourn for one whom you dearly love. Moreover when Job's children died they found a common tomb beneath the ruins of his house, and all he could do to shew his parental affection was to rend his garments to fall upon the ground and to worship, saying: "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away: it has been as the Lord pleased: blessed be the name of the Lord." [Job 1:20, 21, LXX] But you, to put the matter briefly, have been allowed to perform the obsequies of your dear ones; and those obsequies have been attended by many respectful kinsmen and comforting friends. Again Job lost all his wealth at once; and, as, one after another, the messengers of woe unfolded new calamities, he flinched as little as the sage of whom Horace writes: [Horace, C. III. 3:7, 8] - "Shatter the world to atoms if you will. Fearless will be the man on whom it falls." But with you the case is different. The greater part of your substance has been left to you, and your trials have not been greater than you can bear. For you have not yet attained to such perfection that the devil has to marshal all his forces against you.

3. Long ago this wealthy proprietor and still wealthier father was made by a sudden stroke destitute and bereaved. But as, in spite of all that befel him, he had not sinned before God or spoken foolishly, the Lord-exulting in the victory of his servant and regarding Job's patience as His own triumph-said to the devil: "Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity?" [Job 2:3] He finely adds the last clause because it is difficult for innocence to refrain from murmuring when it is overborne by misfortune; and to avoid making a shipwreck of faith when it sees that its sufferings are unjustly inflicted. The devil answered the Lord and said: "Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face." [Job 2:4, Job 2:5] See how crafty the adversary is, and how hardened in sin his evil days have made him! He knows the difference between things external and internal. He knows that even the philosophers of the world call the former "■ δι■φορα" that is indifferent, and that the perfection of virtue does not consist in losing or disdaining them. It is the latter, those that are internal and objects of preference,² the loss of which inevitably causes chagrin. Wherefore he boldly contradicts what God has said and declares that Job deserves no praise at all; since he has yielded up no part of himself but only what is outside himself, since he has given for his own skin the skins of his children, and since he has but laid down his purse to secure the health of his body. From this your sagacity may perceive that your trials have so far only reached the point at which you give hide for hide, skin for skin, and are ready to give all that you have for your life. The Lord has not yet stretched forth His hand upon you, or touched your flesh, or broken your bones. Yet it is when such afflictions as these are laid upon you that it is Bard not to groan and not to 'bless' God to His face, that is to curse Him. The word 'bless' is used in the same way in the books of Kings where it is said of Naboth that he 'blessed' God and the king and was therefore stoned by the people. [1 K. 21:10, Vulg.] But the Lord knew His champion and felt sure that this great hero would even in this last and severest conflict prove unconquerable. Therefore He said: "Behold he is in thine hand; but save his life." [Job 2:6] The holy man's flesh is placed at the devil's disposal, but his vital powers are withheld. For if the devil had smitten that on which sensation and mental judgment depend, the guilt arising from a misuse of these faculties I would have lain at the door not of him who committed the sin but of him who had overthrown the balance of his mind.

4. Others may praise you if they will, and celebrate your victories over the devil. They may eulogize you for the smiling face with which you bore the loss of your daughters, or for the resolution with which, forty days after they fell asleep, you exchanged your mourning for a white robe to attend the dedication of a martyr's bones; unconcerned for a bereavement which was the concern of the whole city, and anxious only to share in a martyr's triumph. Nay, say they, when you bore your wife to burial, it was not as one dead but as one setting forth on a journey. But I shall not deceive you with flattering words or take the ground froth under your feet with slippery praises. Rather will I say what it is good for you to hear: "My son, if thou come to serve the Lord, prepare thy soul for temptation," [Ecclus. 2:1] and "when thou shalt have done all those things which are commanded thee, say, I am an unprofitable servant; I have done that which was my duty to do." [Luke 17:10 (adapted)] Say to God: "the children that thou hast taken from me were Thine own gift. The hand-maiden that Thou hast taken to Thyself Thou also didst lend to me for a season to be my solace. I am not aggrieved that Thou hast taken her back, but thankful rather that Thou hast previously given her to me."

Once upon a time a rich young man boasted that he had fulfilled all the requirements of the law, but the Lord said to him (as we read in the gospel): "One thing thou lackest: if thou wilt be perfect, go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor; and come and follow me." [Mark 10:21] He who declared that he had done all things gave way at the first onset to the power of riches. Wherefore they who are rich find it hard to enter the kingdom of heaven, a kingdom which desires for its citizens souls that soar aloft free from all ties and hindrances. "Go thy way," the Lord says, "and sell" not a part of thy substance but "all that thou hast, and give to the poor;" not to thy friends or kinsfolk or relatives, not to thy wife or to thy children. I will even go farther and say: keep back nothing for yourself because you fear to be some day poor, lest by so doing you share the condemnation of Ananias and Sapphira; [Acts 5:1-10] but give everything to the poor and make to yourself friends of the mammon of unrighteousness that they may receive you into everlasting habitations. [Luke 16:9] Obey the Master's injunction "follow me," [Matt. 9:9] and take the Lord of the world for your possession; that you may be able to sing with the prophet, "The Lord is my portion," [Ps. 16:5] and like a true Levite [Nu. 18:20-24] may possess no earthly inheritance. I cannot but advise you thus if you wish to be perfect, if you desire to attain the pinnacle of the apostles' glory, if you wish to take up your cross and to follow Christ. When once you have put your hand to the plough you must not look back; [Luke 9:62] when once you stand on the housetop you must think no more of your clothes within; to escape your Egyptian mistress [Gen. 39:12] you must abandon the cloak that belongs to this world. Even Elijah, in his quick translation to heaven could not take his mantle with him, but left in the world the garments of the world. [2 K. 2:11, 2 K. 2:13] Such conduct, you will object, is for him who would emulate the apostles, for the man who aspires to be perfect. But why should not you aspire to be perfect? Why should not you who hold a foremost place in the world hold a foremost place also in Christ's household? Is it because you have been married? Peter was married too, but when he forsook his ship and his nets he forsook his wife also. [But see 1 Cor. 9:5] The Lord who wills that all men shall be saved and prefers the repentance of a sinner to his death [1 Tim. 2:4; 2 Pet. 3:9] has, in His almighty providence, removed from you this excuse. Your wife can no longer draw you earthwards, but you can follow her as she draws you heavenwards. Provide good things for your children who have gone home before you to the Lord. Do not let their portions go to swell their sister's fortune, but use them to ransom your own soul and to give sustenance to the needy. These are the necklaces your daughters expect from you; these are the jewels they wish to see sparkle on their foreheads. The money which they would have wasted in buying silks may well be considered saved when it provides cheap clothing for the poor. They ask you for their portions. Now that they are united to their spouse they are loth to appear poor and undistinguished: they desire to have the ornaments that befit their rank.

5. Nor may you excuse yourself on the score of your noble station and the responsibilities of wealth. Look at Pammachius and at Paulinus that presbyter of glowing faith both of whom have offered to the Lord not only their riches but themselves. In spite of the devil and his shuffling they have by no means given skin for skin, but have consecrated their own flesh and bones, yea and their very souls unto the Lord. Surely these may lead you to higher things both by their example and by their preaching, that is, by their deeds and words. You are of noble birth, so are they: but in Christ they are made nobler still. You are rich and held in repute, so once were they: but now instead of being rich and held in repute they are poor and obscure, yet, because it is for Christ's sake, they are really richer and more famous than ever. You too, it is true, shew yourself beneficent, you are said to minister to the wants of the saints, to entertain monks, and to present large sums of money to churches. This however is only the a b c of your soldiership. You despise money; the world's philosophers have done the same. One of these³ -to say nothing of the rest- cast the price of many possessions into the sea, saying as he did so "To the bottom with you, ye provokers of evil lusts. I shall drown you in the sea that you may never drown me in sin." If then a philosopher-a creature of vanity whom popular applause can buy and sell-laid down all his burthen at once, how can you think that you have reached virtue's crowning height when you have yielded up but a portion of yours? It is you yourself that the Lord wishes for, "a living sacrifice ...acceptable unto God." [Rom. 12:1] Yourself, I say, and not what you have. And therefore, as he trained Israel by subjecting it to many plagues and afflictions, so does He now admonish you by sending you trials of different kinds. "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth." [Heb. 12:6] The poor widow did but cast two mites into the treasury; yet because she cast in all that she had it is said of her that she surpassed all the rich in offering gifts to God. [Mark 12:43, Mark 12:44] Such gifts are valued not by their weight but by the good-will with which they are made. You may have spent your substance upon numbers of people, and a portion of your fellows may have reason to rejoice in your bounty; yet those who have received nothing at your hands are still more numerous. Neither the wealth of Darius nor the riches of Croesus would suffice to satisfy the wants of the world's poor. But if you once give yourself to the Lord and resolve to follow the Saviour in the perfection of apostolic virtue, then you will come to see what your place has hitherto been, and how you have lagged in the rear of Christ's army. Hardly had you begun to mourn for your dead daughters when the fear of Christ dried the tears of paternal affection upon your cheeks. It was a great triumph of faith, true. But how much greater was that won by Abraham who was content to slay his only son, of whom he had been told that he was to inherit the world, yet did not cease to hope that after death Isaac would live again. [Cf. Heb. 11:17-19] Jephthah too offered up his virgin daughter, and for this is placed by the apostle in the roll of the saints. [Judg. 11:34-40; Heb. 11:32] I would not therefore have you offer to the Lord only what a thief may steal from you or an enemy fall upon, or a proscription confiscate, what is liable to fluctuations in value now going up and now down, what belongs to a succession of masters who follow each other as fast as in the sea wave follows wave, and-to say everything in a word-what, whether you like it or not, you must leave behind you when you die. Rather offer to God that which no enemy can carry off and no tyrant take from you, which will go down with you into the grave, nay on to the kingdom of heaven and the enchantments of paradise. You already build monasteries and support in the various islands of Dalmatia a large number of holy men. But you would do better still if you were to live among these holy men usa holy man yourself. "Be ye holy, saith the Lord, for I am holy." [Lev. 19:2; 1 Pet. 1:16] The apostles boasted that they had left all things and had followed the Saviour." [Luke 18:28] We do not read that they left anything except their ship and their nets; yet they were crowned with the approval of Him who was to be their judge. Why? Because in offering up themselves they had indeed left all that they had.

6. I say all this not in disparagement of your good works or because I wish to under rate your generosity in almsgiving, but because I do not wish you to be a monk among men of the world and a man of the world among monks. I shall require every sacrifice of you for I hear that your mind is devoted to the service of God. If some friend, or follower, or kinsman tries to combat this counsel of mine and to recall you to the pleasures of a handsome table, be sure that he is thinking less of your soul than of his own belly, and remember that death in a moment terminates both elegant entertainments and all other pleasures provided by wealth. Within the short space of twenty days you have lost two daughters, the one eight years old and the other six; and do you suppose that one so old as you are yourself can live much longer? David tells you how long a time you can look for: "the days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow." [Ps. 90:10] Happy is he and to be held worthy of the highest bliss whom old age shall find a servant of Christ and whom the last day shall discover fighting for the Saviour's cause. "He shall not be ashamed when he speaketh with his enemies in the gate." [Ps. 127:5] On his entrance into paradise it shall be said to him: "thou in thy lifetime receivedst evil things but nowhere thou art comforted." [Luke 16:25 (adapted)] The Lord will not avenge the same sin twice. Lazarus, formerly poor and full of ulcers, whose sores the dogs licked and who barely managed to live, poor wretch, on the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table, is now welcomed into Abraham's bosom and has the joy of finding a father in the great patriarch. It is difficult nay impossible for a man to enjoy both the good things of the present and those of the future, to satisfy his belly here and his mind yonder, to pass from the pleasures of this life to the pleasures of that, to be first in both worlds, and to be held in honour both on earth and in heaven.

7. And if in your secret thoughts you are troubled because I who give you this advice am not myself what I desire you to be, and because you have seen some after beginning well fall midway on their journey; I shall briefly plead in reply that the words which I speak are not mine but those of the Lord and Saviour, and that I urge upon you not the standard which is possible to myself but the ideal which every true servant of Christ must wish for and realize. Athletes as a rule are stronger than their backers; yet the weaker presses the stronger to put forth all his efforts Look not upon

Judas denying his Lord but upon Paul confessing Him. Jacob's father was a man of great wealth; yet, when Jacob went to Mesopotamia, he went alone and destitute leaning upon his staff. When he felt weary he had to lie down by the wayside and, delicately nurtured as he had been by his mother Rebekah, was forced to content himself with a stone for a pillow. Yet it was then⁴ that he saw the ladder set up from earth to heaven, and the angels ascending and descending on it, and the Lord above it holding out a helping hand to such as fall and encouraging the climbers to fresh efforts by the vision of Himself. Therefore is the spot called Bethel or the house of God; for there day by day there is ascending and descending. When they are careless, even holy men lose their footing; and sinners, if they wash away their stains with tears regain their place. I say this not that those coming down may frighten you but that those going up may stimulate you. For evil can never supply a model and even in worldly affairs incentives to virtue come always from the brighter side. But I have forgotten my purpose and the limits set to my letter. I should have liked to say a great deal more. Indeed all that I can say is inadequate alike to satisfy the seriousness of the subject and the claims of your rank. But here is our Ausonius beginning to be impatient for the sheets, hurrying the secretaries, and in his impatience at the neighing of his horse, accusing my poor wits of slowness. Remember me, then, and prosper in Christ. And one thing more; follow the example set you at home by the holy Vera,⁵ who like a true follower of Christ does not fear to endure the hardships of pilgrimage. Find in a woman your 'leader in this high emprise.'⁶ 1: Cf. Letter LX 2: He alludes to the progmenae of the Stoics 3: Crates the Theban 4: Gen. 28:12, Gen. 28:13. Cp. Letters CVIII. and CXXIII 5: Of this lady nothing is known 6: Words of Virg. A. 1. 364, relating to Dido

Letters - letter_119

Letter 119. To Minervius and Alexander.

Minervius and Alexander two monks of Toulouse had written to Jerome asking him to explain for them a large number of passages in scripture. Jerome in his reply postpones most of these to a future time but deals with two in detail viz. (I) "we shall not all sleep but we shall all be changed," 1 Cor. 15:51; and (1) "we shall be caught up in the clouds," 1 Th. 4:17. With regard to (1) Jerome prefers the reading "we shall all sleep but we shall not all be changed," and with regard to (2) he looks upon the language as metaphorical and interprets it to mean that believers will be 'assumed' into the company of the apostles and prophets. The date of the letter is 406 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

1. At the very moment of the departure of our holy brother Sisinnius, who had brought me your writings, I am compelled to dictate these words, whatever they may be, and I cannot conceal your prudence, but I beg you not to report this statement for glory, but rather for the sake of full friendship, as I am speaking to you as if speaking to myself. Many questions from your province have been brought to me by many holy brothers and sisters, which I thought to answer within a large space of time until the day of the Epiphany. And while dictating to many by the secret watch of night, and having finished the others, I reserved myself for yours, as if it were most difficult. Suddenly he came, saying that he was about to leave immediately. And when I asked him to delay his journey, he began to insist on the hunger of Libya to me, the needs of the Egyptian monasteries, the Nile's low water levels, the hunger of many, and that he was almost offended at the Lord, wanting to keep him longer. And so under the cover of the warp and weft, and threads, which I had prepared for your tunic, I sent them to you whole, so that whatever is missing in me, may be woven by your eloquence. You are wise and educated, and with your flow of words, like Appius said, you have migrated to Christ's eloquence. I do not need much work from you; they tell the story of a certain philosopher who had endured a rustic in persuading. 'I had hardly said half,' said he, 'when he understood me.' And so, being limited by time, I have presented to you the opinions of those who have left commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, and have interpreted many things word for word; so that I may free myself from questioning, and you may receive the authority of the ancient authors who, in reading and approving, may acquiesce not to my will, but to your judgment.

2. You ask in what sense it was said, and how it should be read in the first letter of the Apostle Paul to the Corinthians: "We shall all indeed rise again, but we shall not all be changed" (1 Corinthians 15:5). Or according to some examples: "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all indeed be changed," for both are found in Greek manuscripts. Concerning this, Theodore Heracleotes, who was from the city once called Perinthus, spoke in the Apostle's little commentaries: "We shall all indeed not sleep, but we shall all be changed." For Enoch and Elijah, having overcome the necessity of death, were translated from earthly conversation to heavenly kingdoms as they were in their bodies. Thus, also, the holy ones who are to be found in their bodies on the day of consummation and judgment, together with the other saints who are to rise again from the dead, shall be caught up in the clouds to meet Christ in the air, and shall not die; and they shall ever be with the Lord, the bitter necessity of death overcome. Hence the Apostle says: "In fact, we will not all sleep, but all will be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet." For there will be such a quick resurrection of the dead, that living people who are present at the time of the consummation in their own bodies, will not be able to anticipate the dead who rise again from the underworld. For Paul, plainly interpreting the matter, says: "For the trumpet will sound, and the dead will rise incorruptible, and we will be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality" (1 Corinthians 15:52), that it may be able to remain permanently in either punishment or in the kingdom of heaven.

3. Bishop Diodorus of Tarsus, passing over this chapter, briefly noted in the following: in that which is written, 'And the dead shall rise incorruptible. And we shall be changed.' 'If,' he says, 'the dead shall rise incorruptible, it is beyond doubt that they too shall have been changed for the better: what was the need to say, 'And we shall be changed'? Did he wish to imply that incorruption is common to all, but change is peculiar to the just? since they follow not only incorruption and immortality, but also glory.

4. Apollinarius, though in different words, asserts the same as Theodore: that some will not die, but will be taken from this present life into the future, so that with changed and glorified bodies, they may be with Christ. This we now believe regarding Enoch and Elijah.

5. Didymus walks the opposite way, not in steps, but in words, departing from the opinion of Origen. Behold, I speak a mystery to you: We shall all indeed sleep, but we will not all be changed. He spoke thus: "If the resurrection needed no interpreter, nor were it obscure in concept, Paul would not have said after much he spoke of resurrection, 'Behold, I speak a mystery to you: We shall all indeed sleep,' that is, die, 'but we will not all be changed,' except the holy alone." I know that in some codices it is written: Not everyone will sleep, but everyone will be changed. But it must be considered whether that which is premised, everyone will be changed, can be reconciled with what follows: The dead will rise incorruptible, and we will be changed. For if everyone will be changed, and this is common to all, it was pointless to say, and we will be changed. Therefore, it should be read as follows: All indeed will sleep, but not all will be changed. For if in Adam all die, and in death there is sleep; therefore, we will all sleep or die. But sleep, according to the idiom of the Scriptures, refers to those who have died in the hope of future resurrection. Everyone who sleeps will certainly wake up, unless sudden death has overtaken him and death has been associated with sleep. And when all have slept according to the law of nature, only the saints will be changed for the better both in body and soul, so that the resurrection of all may be incorruptible; but the glory and transformation will belong exclusively to the saints. And what follows in Greek, 'in an atom, in a twinkling, or in a flicker of an eye' (for both are read) and our interpreters have translated it, 'in a moment and in a sudden,' or, in the movement of the eye: Didymus explained it in the same way: 'Together with the resurrection of everyone, they will be snatched up to meet Christ: but those whom death has dissolved, which the present speech indicates.' For when He speaks of the resurrection of all, at a certain moment in time, in the twinkling of an eye or in a moment, He excludes all the fables of the first and second resurrection, so that some will be believed to be resurrected first, and others last. But an atom is a point in time that cannot be cut or divided. Hence Epicurus built the world and shaped everything from his atoms. And the movement of the eye or of the things which is called ■ορ■ by the Greeks runs so quickly that it almost eludes the senses of the beholder. But because in most manuscripts instead of "rop■," that is, "blow" or "movement," "ripe" is read, we must understand that just as a light feather, or a piece of straw, or a thin dry leaf is carried away by the wind and transported from the ground to the air, so at the blink of an eye and at God's command, all the bodies of the dead will be moved, prepared for the coming of the judge. And he who joins together and says: On the last trumpet: for the trumpet will sound, and the dead will rise incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For this corruptible must put on incorruption; and this mortal must put on immortality, has a twofold understanding; so that the sound of the trumpet or voice may indicate its greatness, according to what is written: As the trumpet exalts your voice (Isaiah 58); or the open resurrection of all, according to what we read in the Gospel: But when you give alms, do not sound the trumpet before you (Matthew 6:2), that is, do your charity secretly, so as not to appear to boast of another's misery. But we ask why he wrote that the dead will rise at the last trumpet. When the last trumpet is sounded, certainly others have gone before. In the Apocalypse of John, seven angels are described with trumpets, and each one sounding, namely the first, second and third, fourth, fifth and sixth, is indicated what was done through each (Apocalypse 8 and 9). But in the last, that is the seventh, with a clear blast of the trumpet sounding, the dead are raised: their bodies, which before were corruptible, receiving incorruption. Therefore, after the last trumpet, the Apostle explains what follows: For the trumpet will sound, and the dead will rise incorruptible, and we will be changed. When he says "us," "another himself," and "those with him," he means those who are alive, besides the dead. To understand this, there are some who say that the dead, who will rise incorruptible, are the bodies of the dead, those who are said to be changed, however, should have their souls received when converted into greater glory, and arrive at a perfect man, at the measure of the fullness of Christ's age. Others, on the other hand, assert that the dead should be understood as sinners who will rise without corruption so that they can endure eternal punishment: those who are changed, however, should be understood as saints who are transferred from virtue to virtue and from glory to glory. Wherefore also he introduced incorruption of the dead: For it behoveth this corruptible to put on incorruption. But when this mortal hath put on immortality, then shall come to pass the saying that is written: Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting? Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.

6. Acacius of Caesarea, previously called the tower of Strato, after Eusebius, the bishop of Pamphili, in the fourth book of miscellaneous questions, discussed more broadly a question proposed to him, in which, accepting both (views) which seem to be incompatible, after the beginning which we omitted, he spoke thus: 'Let us first speak of what is found more in many codices: Behold I tell you a mystery: we shall indeed all sleep, but we shall not all be changed.' He said "mystery" so as to draw the attention of the listeners, and then to speak more fully about the resurrection. But this sleep, which is common to all, signifies death; wherefore he rightly puts it that we shall all sleep, that is, die; as he said before, "As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Therefore, since we all shall die, hear the sacraments which I speak. All indeed shall die, but not all shall be changed. For the trumpet shall sound, no doubt the seventh angel; and the dead shall rise again incorruptible. But if the dead shall rise again incorruptible, how shall they not be changed, when incorruption itself is a change? But by this change, whereby Paul and the saints shall be changed, glorification is understood. But corruption is common to all, because in it sinners will be more miserable, so that they may be eternal in torments, and not dissolved by a mortal and corruptible body. In the same epistle, we read the Holy diversity of the resurrection, not in the nature of bodies, but in the variety of glory: while others rise again to everlasting punishment, others to everlasting glory. For there is one kind of flesh of birds, another of fish, another of land animals, and celestial bodies differ from terrestrial ones. "Thus, he says, there will also be the resurrection of the dead. The Church agrees with this opinion so that we all may die a common death, and not all be changed into glory, according to what Daniel writes: Many of those who are asleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some shall live forever, others shall be an everlasting horror and disgrace." (1 Corinthians 15:39-42 and Daniel 12:2) For those who rise again to shame and everlasting confusion, do not rise again to eternal glory, into which Paul and those with him will be transformed. Therefore, as these things stand, and have been thus understood by us, only those who rise again in glory are to undergo a change; but it is to be said that sinners and unbelievers, who are called dead, and rise again incorruptible, have no change, but rather everlasting punishment.

7. Let us move to the second reading, which is reported in most manuscripts. Not all of us indeed shall sleep, but all shall be changed. Hence some have said that many alive persons will be found in bodies, and if not all sleep, not all will die; but if not all die, not all will rise. For he is properly said to rise again who first fell by dying. Hence Paul also wishes to write in the first letter to the Thessalonians: We who live, who remain, will not be taken up before those who have fallen asleep: because the Lord himself will descend from heaven at the command, and with the voice of the Archangel and with the trumpet of God: and the dead in Christ will rise first; then we who live, who are left, will be taken up together with them into the clouds to meet Christ in the air: and so we will always be with the Lord. [1 Thess. 4:14 and following] And from these words they attempt to prove that the Apostle Paul, and those who were writing the Epistle with him, thought that they were not going to die, but would be found on the day of consummation in the body. And if this is true, Paul erred, and was deceived by human estimation, to think that he would be found in the body; which the outcome of things proved to be false. And the Thessalonians themselves had understood this, not knowing the mysteries of mystical speech, and were fluctuating with various conjectures, saying: if Paul is to be found in the body, the judgment day is near. Therefore he corrects them, writing a second Epistle: We beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of our gathering together unto him, that you be not soon moved from your mind, nor be terrified, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter, as sent from us, as if the day of the Lord were at hand. Let no man deceive you by any means: for unless there come a revolt first, and the man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition, who opposeth and is lifted up above all that is called God, or that is worshipped, so that he sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself as if he were God. Remember you not, that when I was yet with you, I told you these things? (2 Thess. 2:1 et seq.). With these words, he does this in order to recall them from their mistakes, that they do not think the day of judgment is approaching, and what he wrote: We who live, who remain, will not precede those who have fallen asleep at the coming of the Lord, to understand it in a different way than he himself intended who wrote it. For it cannot be that he who wrote to Timothy: For I am already on the point of being sacrificed; the time of my departure has come (2 Tim. 4:6), should think that he was to be immortal in the flesh and never to die; and that he was to be instantly transferred from life on earth to the heavenly kingdom: especially since, writing to the Romans, he said the same thing, Who will deliver me from this body of death? (Rom. 7. 24). And to the Corinthians, while we are at home in the body, we are away from the Lord, for we walk by faith, not by sight. We are of good courage, and we would rather be away from the body and at home with the Lord (2 Cor. 5. 6-8). He who said these things certainly knew that he was to die. It is better, therefore, to spiritually understand what is written, to accept sleep in the present place, not death, through which the soul is separated from the body; but sin after faith and offense against God, and sleep after baptism, about which even to the Corinthians he was speaking: And therefore among you many are weak and sickly, and many sleep (1 Cor. 11:30). And in another place: So also they that sleep in Christ, shall die (Ibid. 15:1): who, though they are dead, are not about to perish by eternal death, since they are not contained in mortal sin, but in light and minor sin. The one who also desired to avoid sin, spoke: Lest I should sleep in death (Ps. 12. 4). For the sleep of sin is what leads to death, and there is another kind of sleep of transgressions, which is not bound by death. Therefore, whoever lives a life that says, "I am the life" (John. 14. 6) (for our life is hidden with Christ in God (Colossians. 3. 3)) and has never been separated from it, nor sinned up to death, is said to be among the living, and will always be living; of whom also the Savior testifies in the Gospel of John's mystical discourse: "He who believes in me shall not die. And every one who lives and believes in me shall not die for all eternity" (John. 11. 25. 26). Hence, the Apostle, following in the footsteps of his Lord, taught the disciples what he learned from his master. Therefore, we shall all not sleep. For he who keeps his heart under all care, and watches over Christ's commandments and remembers His words, saying, "Watch, for you know not the hour when the thief will come" (Matthew. 24. 42), and in another place, "Do not give sleep to your eyes, nor slumber to your eyelids" (Proverbs. 6. 4) so that you may become safe: like a deer freed from its bonds, and like a bird from its snare, such a one shall not sleep. So when certain persons who always live in Christ do not sleep and keep watch, it follows that not all sleep, and conversely all are changed; not by the change of glory, which properly belongs to the Saints, but by that change whereby this corruptible is made incorruptible; so that he may receive eternal rewards or punishments. And even if one sleeps in Christ and falls asleep through negligence, he should hear what is written. Shall he not awaken who sleeps? (Psalms 40:9) But he who does not sleep, but watches and always lives in Christ, will pass from life to life, or will be taken up in the clouds, so that he may always be with the Lord. Lazarus was one of these sleeping ones, of whom the Lord said, 'Lazarus, our friend, sleeps.' And while he was sleeping, he spoke of Martha, "He who believes in me, even if he is dead, shall live. And whoever lives and believes in me shall not die forever" (John 11: 25-26). For whoever trusts in Christ with their whole heart, even if they fall as a man in sin, lives forever by their faith. Otherwise, this common death is owed equally to believers and non-believers; and all will rise together, some to eternal confusion, others to eternal life by their belief. And so it can be said that whoever believes in Christ shall not die; and even if they die, they shall live forever. However, it is clear, except for Enoch and Elijah, that this has not happened according to physical death. (Genesis 5; and 4 Kings 2) But those who always live in Christ by the greatness of faith, neither sleep nor die: but they will be imitators of the Apostolic life, who lived without any fault in the law of justice; and passing over to the faith of the Lord, and believing in Him, who is called life and resurrection, they never sleep nor are they dead. For the soul that sins, it shall die (Ezek. 18, 4), therefore just as the soul that sins is dead, while the body is alive: and on the same day on which it sinned, it sleeps in death; Ecclesiastes says: He who sins, dies from that time; so the soul that keeps Christ's commandments, even if the body has died, will live forever.

This, however, must be understood, which is more agreeable to the truth, to read thus: All indeed shall sleep, but not all shall be changed; especially since it follows, The dead shall rise again incorruptible, and we shall be changed. For if all are to be changed, according to the other reading, how afterwards is it said, as if something special and private, and properly belonging to the apostles, And we shall be changed? But when he says we, he includes also the saints.

8. You ask how that which is written in the first Epistle to the Thessalonians should be understood: For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them who are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: Then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. However, it must be said what seems to others, namely to Theodore, Apollinarius, and Diodorus, who follow one opinion: of whom Diodorus wrote this. "Paul the Apostle calls them remaining and living; not that it is intended to be understood that he and others will be found in the body at the time of the resurrection, but he said of what is, the just; of whom I am also counted. For they themselves will run to meet Christ, and not sinners. But by the figure of speech, we accept living saints, who have not died because of sin but all whom Christ finds coming in the body. And what follows: We should not refer 'we shall not precede those who have fallen asleep' to the sinners at all. For sinners will not be caught up with the just to meet Christ, but those whom death dissolves." But why do I seek such things, and make false accusations against the Apostles' words, when he himself clearly writes: who will remain at the coming of the Lord? And who the remaining ones are, we learn from the words of the Savior: As in the days of Noah they led wives and husbands, and they married; and suddenly the flood came, and took them all away: so it will be at the coming of the Son of Man (Matt. 24; and Luke 17). With these words it is approved, that at the end of the world many will be alive and still found in their bodies. Following this: At the command and voice of the Archangel, the dead shall rise first. And once again the Savior speaks of this in the Gospel: But at midnight there was a cry, 'Look, the bridegroom! Come out to meet him!' (Matt. 25:6); for he will certainly catch those who are living in their bodies when two are in one bed: one will be taken and the other will be left behind: and two women grinding together, one will be taken and the other will be left behind (Luke 17). From these words it is shown that at midnight, when all is calm, the end of the world will come.

9. Origen in the third volume of the "Explanations of the Epistles of Paul to the Thessalonians," after discussing various matters with skillful and varied reasoning, introduced the following words: "Concerning which there is no doubt that Acacius has also spread much of it. What then do Paul and Silas and Timothy write to the Thessalonians in the Word of God: 'We who are alive, who remain, will not precede those who have fallen asleep in the coming of the Lord?' Who are these living ones who say such things! Certainly Paul is not an apostle from men, neither through men." (Galatians 1) And not only he, but whoever is like Paul in knowledge and conduct can say: We who live; whose body is dead because of sin; but the spirit lives because of righteousness: and whose members have been mortified upon the earth; so that the flesh does not lust against the spirit. For if flesh still desires, it lives; and because it lives, it desires; and its members are not mortified upon the earth. But if they are mortified, it does not lust against the spirit, which through mortification has lost such a desire. Therefore, just as those who have lost present life and have been translated to better things, live more, taking off the body of death and all encouragements of evils, so those who carry about the dying of Jesus in their body do not at all live according to the flesh, but according to the spirit. They live in him who is life and Christ lives in them, about whom it is written: The word of God is living and efficacious, and more piercing than any two-edged sword; and reaching unto the division of the soul and the spirit, of the joints also and the marrow, and is a discerner of thoughts and intents of the heart (Heb. 4. 12). For they live in whom the power of God lives, all human frailty being laid aside; and in whom wisdom lives, which is hidden in God; and in whom righteousness lives and operates. For Christ was made for us not only righteousness from God, but also wisdom, and anything that is virtue. And if indeed in this place they would separate themselves from those who are sleeping and dead in Christ, who are writing this letter, it seems ((alternatively seems)) to be a superfluous annotation, and a testimony taken from one place would not be valid. But now, in the same sense, because of the same spirit, he speaks in the first Corinthians, "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet." For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall rise incorruptible, and we shall be changed. This saying is indeed written in this place: In a trumpet of God, it will descend from heaven; compare it to what is said to the Corinthians: In the last trumpet, for the trumpet shall sound. But to them, what is read to the Thessalonians: And the dead in Christ shall rise first. This what is written to the Corinthians: And the dead shall rise incorruptible. Now what follows is, Then we who are alive, who remain, answers it: And we shall be changed, both of which can be understood thus. We who live, we who remain until the coming of the Lord, and we who will be changed and are not among those who are called dead, but we live: therefore, we await the presence of the Lord not in death, but in life, because we are from the Israelite race, and the elect are from us, of whom the Lord once spoke. I have left for myself seven thousand men who have not bent the knee to Baal (3 Kings 19:18). In John's Gospel, too, a double order of the living and the dead is described. Everyone who believes in me, even though he dies, shall live. And everyone who lives and believes in me shall never die." (John 11:25-26) If we understand "living" in this way, as we have already said, let us believe that those who have died and are asleep in Christ, but who wish to live in Christ, have died because of sin. But if the remains and the chosen according to grace are called "living," who neither believe thus, nor are born of Israelite nobility, then they will be called asleep and dead in Christ.

10. There are those who have spoken of this place in this way. They are called "alive," who have never died to sin, but those who have sinned, and died in that sin, are named dead, but they have turned to repentance, they cleanse their past offenses, they are called dead because they have sinned, but in Christ they are dead, because they are fully converted to God. Furthermore, those who are alive and have the testimony of faith and have not yet received the promise of God, God has thought something better for them and are not without those who are righteous, that they may be crowned in it, they have the beatitude of enjoying a good conscience while living, and are left in the advent of the Lord and Savior. But because God is merciful, and offers salvation even to those who sleep, who died in Christ, they will not be prevented, nor alone will they be carried away in the clouds: but according to the example of the Gospel parable (Matthew 20), the workers of the eleventh hour will receive the same reward as those of the first hour who were sent into the vineyard. Nor should this seem unjust to anyone, that unequal labor should receive the same reward. For there is a great difference between those who have been healed after wounds, and those who have never seen the terror of death. Concerning them, I think it has been said: What man is there that lives and shall not see death? He shall deliver his soul from the hand of death (Ps. 88.45). Nor is it, as some think, that he is accepted for nothing: but almost as if to say, who do you think, according to what is written: Who is wise, and understands these things? (Hosea 14.10). And in another place: Lord, who shall dwell in your tabernacle? (Ps. 14.1). And again: Who has known the mind of the Lord? (Rom. 11. 31) Therefore, there will be few remaining from the believers who will see the coming of the Lord, according to what God's Word is, not in the lowliness of flesh, but in the glory of triumph. And it must be considered how he first called those sleeping: then those dead in Christ, whom they could not precede while alive. For whoever does not keep what is written: Do not give sleep to your eyes, nor slumber to your eyelids; so that you may be safe, like a roebuck from the bonds, and like a bird from the snare (Prov. 6. 4), he will sleep and will be numb with guilty sleep, and when he has slept, he will pass into death. For just as he who is awake moves, so he who sleeps lies motionless, and he is numb with the likeness of death. But it will be taught to us by the first Epistle to the Corinthians that death follows sleep, in which it is written thus: And now Christ is risen from the dead, the first fruits of them that sleep. For by a man came death, and by a man the resurrection of the dead. And after a little: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall rise again incorruptible, and we shall be changed. Therefore, when these things are said about sleep and death and we read in the Apostle that it is said, Rise thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall enlighten thee, let us swear to the Lord, and let us make a vow to the God of Jacob, each one saying in his heart: If I shall go up into my bed, if I shall give sleep to my eyes, or slumber to my eyelids, until I find a place for the Lord: doubtless, he hath prepared in his soul a tabernacle for the God of Jacob; that God may rest eternally in him. He proceeds: For the Lord himself commandeth it, and so on. For he who was sent from the Father will descend, not by diversity of power, but by judgment of dispensation; the Word of God, and wisdom, and truth, and justice, will descend to those who are on the lower parts. And although they are dead to whom he deigns to descend, yet they are not alienated from him. For they are called dead in Christ. But they who live have this privilege, that they are chosen out of many. Yet both bands, both of the dead who are in Christ, and of the living, shall be caught up together in clouds to meet Christ in the air, so that they wait not until he shall come upon the earth, but may enjoy His Presence and His companionship in the heights. And what great mercy of Christ, that He should not only stoop to be made flesh for our salvation, but that He should descend even to the dead, and in His very death should give the pledge of life! For water and blood issued from His side. (John 19). Therefore, the divine word came down with the voice of the Archangel going before and preparing the way for Him in those who can bear His presence. For us to understand this, let us come to know the mysteries of His first coming. It is written of John, who was His precursor, that he said in the wilderness: "I am the voice of one crying out in the wilderness, and so on." What did the voice cry out in the wilderness? "Prepare the way of the Lord, make straight His paths" (Matt. 3:3; Luke 3:4; Mark 1:3; John 1:23). For what reward or payment? "Every valley shall be filled, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall become straight and the rough ways plain; and all flesh shall see the salvation of God" (Isaiah 40:3-4). But this [was done] because the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us. And we saw his glory, the glory as it were of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth. And now there shall be no more voice of a prophet in the wilderness: for the angel himself shall prepare the way before the Lord. Not in the humility of carne [i. e. flesh] is he come, but speaking truth, the Word of God, who is with the Father. And then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the country about Jordan: And were baptized by him in the Jordan, confessing their sins. But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees coming to his baptism, he said to them: Ye brood of vipers, who hath shewed you to flee from the wrath to come? (Matt. 3. 7) Now, in the voice of the Archangel going before the Lord descending from heaven, and in the most clear trumpet, each one of the believers is summoned, either to battle, or to the priestly office we read in the Book of Numbers (ch. 10, v.3), of the holy trumpets which sounded at the door. But if the voice of an angel and the trumpet of an archangel is great, how much greater will be the trumpet of God, which prepares the ways of the first asleep and dead in Christ; then of those who live and remain and await the coming of the word of God? Perhaps the simple blast of a trumpet is necessary for those who sleep and are dead in Christ, but the voice of an archangel and the trumpet of God, are reserved for those who live and are in the presence of God. Let us see what can be understood, and that which follows: Together with them we shall be taken. With this word, I think I have shown a sudden transition to better things so as to say that he wanted to be carried away, so that the speed of the passing, exceeded the sense of the one thinking. Which he signified in another place with the same property of the word: 'I know a man in Christ who fourteen years ago was caught up to the third heaven—whether in the body or out of the body I do not know, God knows. And I know that this man was caught up into paradise—whether in the body or out of the body I do not know, God knows—and he heard things that cannot be told, which man cannot utter.' (2 Cor. 12. 2, et seqq.) For some others who were making progress and (so to speak) advancing to greater things, until they became in accordance with that which is written Great exceedingly: and we read that some have been assumed into heaven. But Paul, the chosen vessel, was caught up into the third heaven: and therefore he heard unspeakable words. However, it is more diligently to be contemplated how those who are caught up in the clouds are caught up to meet Christ. We know that the clouds are the prophets to whom God commanded that they should not rain rain upon Israel when they had filled up the measure of their fathers, and the Law and the Prophets were until John the Baptist (Matthew 11:13). And because God put the apostles first in the Church, second the prophets (Ephesians 4:11), not only the prophets but also the apostles are to be understood as clouds. Therefore, if anyone is drawn towards Christ, they ascend above the clouds of the Law and the Gospel, above the Prophets and the Apostles; and having taken the wings of a dove, with their teachings, they are raised to the heights. They meet, not below but in the air, and with a spiritual understanding of Scripture. And he who meets in spiritual matters, leaving behind earthly affairs, whether he sleeps or dies in Christ, or lives on, having been reserved for His presence, will always be with Him, and will enjoy the Word of God, wisdom, truth, and justice.

11. I have spoken these things with swift speech, presenting to your wisdom what the learned men thought of each place, and with which arguments they wished to approve their opinions, for my own small and insignificant authority is not so great that I, who am nothing and am only exposed to the bites of the envious, am equal to those who have gone before us in the Lord. Nor is it like the prejudiced opinion of the disciples of Pythagoras, but rather the reason of the teaching must be weighed. But if anyone of the opposing faction grumbles because I read the explanations of those whose teachings I do not accept, let him know that I am pleased to follow the advice of the Apostle: "Test everything, hold fast to what is good" (1 Thess. 5:21), and of the Savior himself who said: "Be proven money-changers, so that if anyone is a counterfeit coin, and does not have the likeness of Caesar, and is not stamped with the public image, let him be rejected." But he who prefers the face of Christ, shining with a clear light, let him be placed into the bag of our hearts. For if I wish to know dialect, or the dogmas of philosophers, and in order to return to our own knowledge of scripture; I ought not to question the simple men of the Church, whose merit lies elsewhere; and each person abounds in his own sense (especially as it is said that in a large house there are many vessels of different kinds (2 Tim. 2:20)); but those who have learned the skill from the craftsman and meditate on the Law of the Lord day and night. I myself, both in youth and in extreme old age, maintain that Origen and Eusebius of Caesarea were most learned men, but erred in the truth of dogmas. What we can say about Theodore, Acacius, and Apollinaris on the contrary, all left a memory of their studies in the explanations of the Scriptures. In the earth, gold is sought, and from the beds of rivers, shining sand is brought out: and one can find the sands of Pactolus richer in mud than in the stream. Why do my friends tear me to pieces, and, having turned against me, bark like foolish dogs? The whole of their zeal is, in fact, an eyebrow of knowledge, to criticize the work of others and to defend the treachery of the ancient fathers, so that they may lose their faith. It is my intention to read the ancients, proof every point, retain what is good, and not depart from the faith of the Catholic Church.

12. I, wanting to reply to other questions, and to dictate immediately either my own or someone else's, was admonished by Brother Sisinnio to write letters both to you and to the other holy brothers who are worthy of our love. I will therefore restrain my pace, and if life is a companion to me, I will reserve myself for the future task, so that I may obey you in sections and so that the fruit and old body may be able to bear a moderate load. But this I briefly remind at the end, that which is read in Latin codices: We shall all indeed rise again, but we shall not all be changed, is not contained in Greek volumes; but either, We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed; or, We shall not all sleep, we shall all be changed; of which we have explained the meaning above.

Letters - letter_120

Letter 120. To Hedibia. At the request of Hedibia, a lady of Gaul much interested in the study of scripture, Jerome deals with the following twelve questions. It will be noticed that several of them belong to the historical criticism of our own day.

- (1) How can anyone be perfect? and How ought a widow without children to live to God?
- (2) What is the meaning of Matt. xxvi. 29?
- (3) How are the discrepancies in the evangelical narratives to be accounted for? How can Matt. xxviii. 1 be reconciled with Mark xvi. 1, Mark xvi. 2 (4) How can Matt. xxviii. 9 (Saturday evening) be reconciled with John xx. 1-18 (Sunday morning)?
- (5) How can Matt. xxviii. 9 be reconciled with John xx. 17?
- (6) How was it that, if there was a guard of soldiers at the sepulchre, Peter and John were allowed to go in freely? (Matt. xxvii. 66: John xx. 1-8.)
- (7) How is the statement of Matthew and Mark that the apostles were ordered to go into Galilee to see Jesus there to be reconciled with that of Luke and John who make Him appear to them in Jerusalem?
- (8) What is the meaning of Matt. xxvii. 50, Matt. xxviii. 51?
- (9) How is the statement of John xx. 22 that Jesus breathed on his apostles the Holy Ghost to be reconciled with that of Luke (Luke xxiv. 49: Acts i. 4) that He would send it to them after His ascension?
- (10) What is the meaning of the passage, Rom. ix. 14-29?
- (11) What is the meaning of 2 Cor. ii. 16?
- (12) What is the meaning of 1 Th. v. 23? The date of the letter is 406 or 407 a.d. The below translation sourced from tertullian.org, with the following note:

English translation by James Snapp, Jr. via Google Translate

Having found, side-by-side at <http://remacle.org/bloodwolf/eglise/jerome/hedibia.htm> , the Latin text of Jerome's Epistle 120 — To Hedibia, I used the online Google Translate tool to render the French text into a mechanical sort of English. I then took my best guesses about what the text meant. In the Preface and in the first three questions, I consulted the English translation already made by Roger Pearse, and Burgon's rendering of part of the text, found on pages 53-54 of his 1871 The Last Twelve Verses of Mark.

What you read here should not be considered completely reliable as far as details are concerned, and here and there I suspect that I completely obscured the actual meaning of Jerome's statements. Nevertheless, this rough English text has some value because it is, as far as I know, currently the only complete English translation of Jerome's Epistle 120. Also, by comparing this material to James Kelhoffer's English translation of Ad Marinum, anyone can see that Jerome, as he dictated this letter, depended heavily and extensively upon Ad Marinum. For example, in the first paragraph of Jerome's reply to Question #4; he seeks to resolve a perceived discrepancy by asserting that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, and that an interpreter is responsible for changing a precise and harmonious Hebrew expression into a less appropriate term. This is exactly what Eusebius does in his reply to the second question of Marinus (cf. Kelhoffer, The Witness of Eusebius' ad Marinum, p. 88).

Gratitude is expressed to the creators of the Remacle website, Roger Pearse for announcing the existence of this material at the Remacle website, and to Stephen Carlson, who told Roger about the site.

Yours in Christ, James Snapp, Jr.

PREFACE Although I have never had the honor of seeing your face, I know very well the reputation that you have gained in the world by your ardent faith. So, from far-off Gaul you have written to me, coming to seek me in my solitary repose in the wilderness near Bethlehem, so that I may respond to some little questions on Holy Scripture. And you come on the recommendation of the man of God, my son Apodemius, as if there was not anyone in your province suitably knowledgeable about God's law who could instruct you to see the way through your doubts. But perhaps, instead of seeking to be instructed yourself, you seek me in order to test my ability, and after having consulted others on the difficulties that have caused you to hesitate, you still want to know what I think. Your ancestors Paterus and Delphidus — the first of whom taught rhetoric at Rome before I was born, and the second of whom, during my youth, was illustrious among all the Gauls due to the power of his prose and poetry — both now dead, may not validly chasten me for the liberty I take by instructing a member of their family. They excelled, I admit, in eloquence and in the literature of the humanities, but I daresay, without fear of stealing their glory, that they were less knowledgeable about God's law, in which no one can be instructed except by the Father of lights, who enlightens every man coming into this world, and who is found in the midst of the faithful who are gathered in his name. So I declare, without fear of being accused of vanity, that in this letter I will not use any pompous words, which belong to the human wisdom that God must destroy one day, but instead the language of faith, treating spiritually spiritual things. Thus the deep of the Old Testament calls to the deep of the gospel with the noise of the waterfall, that is, the prophets and the apostles, and the truth of the Lord shall rise up to the clouds, which He has forbidden to shed rain upon the unbelieving Jews, but rather to water the lands of the Gentiles, and to soften the torrent of thorns, and to sooth the waters of the Dead Sea. So pray that the true Elijah will invigorate the dead and sterile waters within me, and season the meats that I present to you with the salt of the apostles, to whom He said, "You are the salt of the earth." For nothing can be offered to God that is not seasoned with salt. Do not look here for the thunder of that worldly eloquence that Jesus Christ saw fall from heaven like lightning; instead cast your eyes upon this man acquainted with sorrow, who had neither beauty nor attraction, who understands infirmity. And believe that as I respond to your questions, I do not depend on my own training and ability, but on the promise of Him who said, "Open your mouth and I will fill it."

QUESTION #1

You ask me how a person can become perfect, and how a childless widow should manage her life.

Such a question was put to Jesus Christ by a doctor of the law: "Master," he said to him, "what is it that I do to gain eternal life?" The Lord replied, "Do you know the commandments?" "Which commandments?" replied the doctor. Jesus said, "Do not kill, you shall not commit adultery, you shall not steal, you shall not bear false witness, honor your father and your mother, and love your neighbor as yourself." This doctor answered him, "I kept all these commandments since my youth." Jesus Christ said, "You still lack one thing: if you want to be perfect, go, sell what you have and give to the poor; then come and follow me."

So, madam, in response to the question you pose, I will employ the words of Jesus: if you want to be perfect, carry your cross, follow the Savior, emulating Saint Peter, who said, "You see, Lord, that we have left everything to follow you." Go, sell everything you have, give to the poor and follow the Savior.

Christ does not say, "Give it to your children, your brothers, your parents," for by this standard, even if you had such, the Lord must have first preference: "Give it to the poor," or rather, to Christ, whom you assist in the person of the poor. He, being rich, became poor due to love of us — He who said in the thirty-ninth Psalm, "As for me, I was poor and needy, and the Lord took care of me." And, at the beginning of the following psalm, "Blessed is he who is attentive to the needs of the poor and the needy."

Indeed attentiveness is needed to discern the poor from the many people who live in their sins as much as in squalor and poverty; what is meant is those of the sort of whom the apostle Paul spoke when he says, "They only asked us not to forget the poor." It was for the relief of these poor people that Paul and Barnabas carefully collected alms on the first day of the week in the congregations of the Gentile converts to the faith, and they disciplined themselves, not sending others, to bring it to those who had been stripped of their property for Jesus Christ — those who suffered persecution, and who told their father and their mother, their wives and their children, "We do not know you." These are the authentic poor, who have performed the will of the heavenly Father, and of the Savior who said, "These are my mother and my brothers: those who carry out the will of My Father." In saying this, I do not mean that to prevent alms-giving to Jews, to Gentiles, and to all other poor people of any nation whatsoever. But we must always prefer the Christian to the unbeliever, and among the Christians themselves, we must make a great distinction between a poor man whose life is pure and innocent and one whose life is corrupt and disorderly. For this reason the Apostle Paul, who in many places in his epistles urges the faithful to exercise charity toward the poor, recommends that they do so primarily to fellow believers — to one with whom we are united in the same religion, and who is not separated from the brotherhood by disruptive and corruptive immorality. Inasmuch as Saint Paul commands us to give food to our enemies when they are hungry, and to give them something to drink when thirsty, and thereby to pour coals of fire upon their head, how much more ought we to do so for those who are not our enemies, and who profess a holy Christian life?

It is necessary to take in a beneficial way, and not in a bad sense, what is said by the apostle: "Thereby you pour coals of fire on his head." He meant that in doing good to our enemies, we overcome their malice and hatred with our expressions of goodness, and thus we will soften their adamancy; we banish the bitterness and fury to make room for friendship and affection. Thus we pour upon their heads those coals about which it is written, "A mighty hand launches sharp arrows with devouring coals." For, just as the seraph of whom Isaiah speaks purified the prophet's lips with a fiery coal which he had taken from the altar, we shall purify the sins of our enemies, overcoming evil with good, blessing those who curse us, and imitating our Father in heaven, who "makes his sun rise on the good and the evil, and sends rain on the just and the sinners."

Since you have no little children, "use the wealth from swindling to make more friends for yourself, that you may be received in the eternal dwelling-places." It is not for no reason that the Gospel refers to the earthly riches of wealth as unjust, because they have no source other than the injustice of men, and one cannot gain unless someone else loses. So I consider the axiom to be true, that those with much property are either swindlers, or the heirs of swindlers. This doctor of the law, being told by Jesus Christ that to be perfect we should renounce all the wealth we possess, could not resolve to do so, because he was rich. Then the Savior, turning to His disciples, said, "How difficult it is for the rich to enter the kingdom of heaven!" He does not say it is impossible, but it is difficult, although the example that He gives shows an absolute impossibility: "It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." But this is impossible rather than difficult, for it will never be possible for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle; therefore a rich man can never enter the kingdom of heaven. But the camel is a terribly hunchbacked animal, and it usually carries heavy burdens. And when we wander off the path that Jesus Christ blazed, and follow bad paths that lead to sin, we are loaded with the burden of riches or the weight of our sins, and it is impossible for us to enter the kingdom of God. But if we unload this oppressive weight, and put on the wings of a dove, then we will fly away ourselves; we will find rest, and we will say, "When you can sleep in the middle of the campfires, you will become like the dove, whose wings are silver, and whose back is as bright as gold." With our back, which was deformed by the heavy burden that was crushing us, covered with this bright gold, representing the spiritual sense of the divine Scriptures, and with these "silver wings," which signify the literal sense, we will be able to enter into the kingdom of God. The apostles, saying that they had abandoned all their possessions, boldly sought from Jesus Christ a proper reward for this virtue, and the Lord replied, "Whoever, for My name, shall abandon his house, or his brothers, or his sisters, or his father or mother, or wife, or children, will receive a hundredfold and will inherit eternal life." What blessedness to have Jesus Christ himself as your debtor, and to receive much in return for little things — the eternal in exchange for the temporary, and durable and strong goods in exchange for our fragile and perishable wealth.

So, if a widow has children, especially if her family is upper-class, she must not leave them in poverty. Let her love them equally, and have regard for her soul, treating it like one of her own children. She must apportion the property together with them, and not abandon everything to them; rather, she must make Christ a fellow-heir. You could perhaps say that this is difficult, and revolting, and that such treatment of children opposes your tender instincts. But you will hear the Lord reply: "The one who is able to perform such a thing, let him do so," "If you want to be perfect, go, sell all that you possess," etc. In saying, "If you want to be perfect," He does not make this burden a requirement, but allows freedom to pursue either course regarding children. Do you want to be perfect and raise yourself to the highest level of virtue? Imitate the apostles, sell everything you have, give to the poor, and follow the Lord. Separated from all creatures and stripped of everything that you own in the world, follow Him bare, with only a cross. Or, are you content not to be perfect, and to remain in the second-highest level of virtue? Then abandon everything you have, and give it to your children and parents. No one will rebuke you, if you follow this lesser way, provided that you also agree that it is fair that you defer to one whose way tends toward perfection.

You will want to tell me that such sublime virtue is for the men and apostles, but it is impossible for a refined woman, who needs a thousand things to maintain her way of life. Hear therefore what the apostle Paul says: "I do not mean that others are helped and that you are overburdened, but that, to relieve inequality, your abundance compensates for their poverty, so that your poverty is also relieved by their abundance." That is why the Lord says in the Gospel, "Whoever has two coats, let him give to him who has none."

Now, if we lived among the ice of Scythia and the snow of the Alps, where not only two and three coats, but even the animal-skins are scarcely sufficient protection from the harsh cold climate, would we be obliged to strip ourselves to clothe others? We must understand "coat" to mean all that is necessary to clothe us and provide what is naturally required, since we are born naked. And by "the provisions of a single day" is meant, whatever is necessary to feed ourselves. In this sense we fathom the commandment in the Gospel, "Do not worry about tomorrow," that is, about the future, and the apostle's statement, "While we have food and covering, we must be content."

If you have more than you need, give to the poor, and know that you are thus paying a debt. Ananias and Sapphira deserved to be condemned by the apostle Saint Peter, because they had quietly set aside part of their property. Is it a crime, you might ask, not to donate everything one has? No, but the apostle punished them with the death penalty because they had lied to the Holy Spirit, for while reserving for themselves what they needed to live, they pretended to surrender completely all earthly things — thus seeking, in vain, only the approval and esteem of men. Notwithstanding that we are free to give or not to give, he who renounces all his goods in order to be perfect must expect that one day in the future his poverty will be rewarded with property.

Regarding the life that a widow must lead, the apostle sets the rules in a few words, when he says, "The widow who lives in luxury is dead, although she seems alive." I have dealt with this matter thoroughly in the two books that I have dedicated to Furia and Salvina.

QUESTION #2 How shall we understand what the Savior said in Saint Matthew: "And I tell you that henceforth I will not drink of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink with you again in the kingdom of My Father"? This passage has caused some authors to invent a certain fable, claiming that Christ will reign in the flesh for a thousand years, and will drink the wine which He has not drunk from that time until the end of the world. But as for us, we believe about the bread, which the Lord broke and gave to His disciples, is nothing but the body of our Lord and Savior, as He Himself said to them, "Take, eat, this is my body." And the cup is the one about which He said, "Drink of this, all of you, for this is My blood of the new covenant, which is shed for many." This is the cup of which we read in the prophet, "I take the cup of salvation," and elsewhere, "How admirable is your cup which overwhelms me!" So, inasmuch as "the bread which came down from heaven" is the body of the Lord, and if the wine He gave to His disciples is his blood, "the blood of the new covenant, which was poured out for many for the remission of sins," let us reject the Jewish fables, and assemble with the Lord in this great upper room, furnished and prepared, in which He kept the Passover with His apostles, and there, receiving from His hand the cup of the new covenant, and celebrating Easter with Him, let us become intoxicated with that wine of sobriety. For the kingdom of God is not drink and food, but justice, and joy, and peace in the Holy Spirit.

It was not Moses, but our Lord Jesus Christ, who gave us the true bread — He who is both the diner and the dinner, the eater and that which is to be eaten. It is His blood we drink, and we cannot drink it without Him. Every day in His sacrifices, we press the grapes of the true vine, and of the vine of Sorek, which means "Chosen," and we drink in this wine of the kingdom of the Father, not according to the letter, but in the newness of the spirit, singing a new song which no one can sing except in the kingdom of the church, which is the kingdom of the Father. The patriarch Jacob desired to eat this bread, saying, "If the Lord God is with me, and gives me bread to eat and clothes to wear," and so forth. "For when we are baptized into Jesus Christ, we are protected by Christ. We eat the bread of angels, and we heard the Lord telling us, "My food is to do the will of my Father who sent Me, and to accomplish His work." Let us therefore also do the will of the Father who sent us, and carry out His work, and Christ will drink His blood in the kingdom of the church with us.

QUESTION #3

Why do the evangelists speak differently about the resurrection of our Lord, and how He appeared to His apostles?

Here you first ask why Matthew says that our Lord rose "on the evening of the Sabbath, when the first day of the following week was just beginning to shine," and Saint Mark, on the contrary, said that He arose in the morning, "Jesus arising on the first day of the week in the morning appeared to Mary Magdalene, from whom He had expelled seven demons. And she, departing, told those who were His companions, as they mourned and wept. And these, hearing that He was alive, and that she had seen Him, did not believe in Him." This problem has a twofold solution. Either we do not accept the testimony of Mark, because this final portion is not contained in most of the Gospels that bear his name — almost all the Greek codices lacking it — or else must affirm that Matthew and Mark have both told the truth, that our Lord rose on the evening of the Sabbath, and that He was seen by Mary Magdalene in the morning of the first day of the following week. So this is how this passage of Saint Mark should be read: "Jesus arising," place a little pause here, then add, "on the first day of the week in the morning appeared to Mary Magdalene," so that, being raised, according to Saint Matthew, in the evening of the last day of the week, He appeared to Mary Magdalene, according to Saint Mark, "the morning of the first day of the week," which is how John also represents the events, stating that He was seen on the morning of the next day.

[Hort, Notes, p. 32, describing the parallel to Question #4 in Eusebius' Ad Marinum: "Strangely enough, the answer given by Eusebius to the next question, relating to a supposed contradiction between Mt xxviii 1 and Jo xx 1, is, taken by itself, inconsistent with his former answer: it implicitly excludes that interpretation of οψε σαββατου in Mt which had been there assumed as a standard for correcting the construction of Mc xvi 9. This second answer, evidently founded on the Epistle of Dionysius of Alexandria to Basilides, is however in effect, though not in form, a third alternative to the first difficulty. It thus merely affords an additional demonstration of the indecision often displayed by Eusebius, especially in presence of a conflict of traditional authorities."]

QUESTION #4 How can what Saint Matthew says — that Mary Magdalene saw Jesus Christ "on the evening of the last day of the week" — agree with what John said, that "the morning of the first day of the week," she wept at the tomb? By "the first day of the week" is meant Sunday, because the Jews concluded the week on the Sabbath, and pagans marked the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth days of the week with the names of idols and planets. So the apostle Paul instructs the believers in Corinth to collect, on "the first day of the week," the alms they designated for the relief of the poor. So do not imagine that Saint Matthew and Saint John do not agree together: they supply different names for only one hour, which is midnight and the singing of the rooster. For Saint Matthew said that our Lord appeared to Mary Magdalene "on the evening of the last day of the week," that is, when it was already late and the night was not only underway, but even far advanced, almost gone. And he adds, in further explanation, that the first day of the week was already approaching. As for John, he does not only say, "The first day of the week, Mary Magdalene came early in the morning to the tomb," but adds, "When it was still unclear." So they both agree about the time, which is the rooster-song and midnight; one of which marked the beginning and the other marked the end. It seems to me that the text of Saint Matthew, who wrote his Gospel in Hebrew, is, "When it was already late," and not "evening," which the interpreter, who was not aware of the true meaning of this word, translated as "evening" instead of saying, "When it was already late." In the ordinary use of the Latin language, the word means "elgonza," late [sero], and we can use it when, for example, we say to someone, "You came too late," meaning that a prearranged meeting-time has passed long ago.

Now we meet the objection, "How can Mary Magdalene, after seeing the risen Lord, come again to the tomb, as the Gospel says, weeping?" We must answer, according to a keen sense of perception, that in accordance with all the gifts that Christ had given, she ran several times to his tomb, either alone or in the company of other women, and that sometimes she gazed adoringly at what she saw, and sometimes she wept as she waited.

Some believe, however, that there were two Mary Magdalenes, both natives of the village of Magdelon, and the one who met the risen Christ, according to Saint Matthew, is different from the one which, according to Saint John, appeared so forlorn. What is certain is that the Gospel makes mention of four women called Mary: the first is the mother of our Lord, and the second is Mary, wife of Cleophas and aunt of Jesus Christ, being His mother's sister, and the third is Mary, mother of James and Joses, and the fourth is Mary Magdalene. Some, however, confused the mother of James and Joses with the aunt of Jesus Christ.

Others, to get rid of this difficulty, say that the true reading speaks of Saint Mary, and that he did not include the name of Magdalene, but the scribes have added it inappropriately. As for me, it seems to me that we can meet this challenge in a simpler and less embarrassing way, by saying that these holy women, unable to bear the absence of Jesus Christ, were in transit all night, and went to observe His grave not only once and twice, but constantly, especially as their sleep was disturbed and interrupted by the earthquake, by the sound of splitting stones, by the eclipse of the sun, by all sorts of confusion and inconvenience, and especially by the desire they had to see the Savior.

QUESTION #5

How can we reconcile what Saint Matthew says, that on the evening of the last day of the week, Mary Magdalene, along with another Mary, bowed at the feet of the Savior, and what we read in John, that Jesus said, "Do not touch me, for I am not yet ascended to my Father?"

Mary Magdalene, with the other one, had already seen the risen Christ Jesus, and had fallen prostrate at His feet, but the concern that she felt due to the absence of the Savior did not permit her to remain quiet in her house. She returned to the tomb during the night and, seeing that the stone had been removed which was previously used to close the tomb, she ran to tell Peter and the other disciple whom Jesus dearly loved that they had taken the Lord's body, and she did not know where he was laid. The woman was simultaneously subject to her piety and her error: her piety, as she sought with such eagerness to seek after the King, and her error, as she said that they had removed the Lord.

Saint Peter and Saint John then went into the tomb, and having seen on one side the body-wrappings, and the other on the shroud that had enveloped the head of the Savior, they were convinced of the resurrection of their divine master, whose body was no longer in the tomb. But Mary stood outside, near the tomb weeping, and bending down to look inside, she saw two angels dressed in white, seated in the place where the body of Jesus had been, one at the head and one at the feet, so that she might observe that it was impossible that men had been capable of removing a body that angels had been guarding, and thus she should have been overjoyed to see these famous and powerful protectors.

These angels, when she saw them, said, "Woman, why do you weep?", as Jesus Christ had once said to his mother, "Woman, what is common between you and me? My time is not yet come." They address her as "Woman," and in saying, "Why do you weep?" they point out the uselessness of her tears. But the Magdalene was so beside herself, not knowing what to believe, and full of awe at the wonders she saw — wrapped in a cloud, as it were, which was so thick that without realizing that she was speaking to angels, she replied, "I weep because they have taken away my Lord, and I do not know where they laid him." O Mary, if you are convinced he is the Lord, and your Lord in particular, how can you believe they have removed Him? You do not know, you say, where they have gone? How can you ignore what you gaze at, this very moment? She sees angels without realizing it, caught up in fear and amazement, and occupied only by the desire to see the Lord; she turns her head and casts her eyes all around.

Finally, having looked behind her, she saw Jesus standing, without realizing, however, that it was Him. Not that Jesus Christ, as some claim — Manes and other heretics — had changed his figure so as to appear when he wanted in different forms, but rather, the Magdalene, surprised and amazed at all the wonders, thought she was seeing a gardener, such was her anxiety and eagerness. Jesus therefore said to her, as the angels had said, "Woman, why do you weep?" And He added, "Who are you looking for?" Mary replied, "Lord, if you have removed Him, tell me where you put Him and I will take Him thence." It is an expression of a truly humble faith when she calls to the Savior, "Lord," an address which would require a gardener to respond with respect and honesty. But notice, please, the extent of her error and her blindness: she imagines that the gardener was able to remove only the body of Jesus Christ, which was guarded by a company of soldiers, whose tomb was under the protection of angels, and forgetting her inherent weakness, she is persuaded that, alone and frightened as she is, she nevertheless has enough strength to transport the body of a man of full age, and who, never mind the rest, had been embalmed with a hundred pounds of myrrh. Jesus having called by name, so that she knew at least the voice of Him whose face she did not perceive, the woman, still occupied her mistake, said not "Lord," but "Rabboni," that is to say, "Teacher." What reversal of mind! What a way of thinking! She bestows upon a gardener the title of "Lord," and calls Jesus Christ as "Teacher."

After she had sought among the dead for a man full of life, and she and the other one had run away, without her weakness, her wandering imagination guided her to seek for the dead body of Him whom she had seen alive, whose feet she had fallen before, worshiping Him. So the Lord said to her, "Do not touch me, because I am not yet ascended to my Father." That is, since you are seeking a dead man, you do not deserve to touch my life. If you believe that I am not yet ascended to my Father, and that men came stealthily to remove my body, you are unworthy to touch me." Jesus told her this, not to cool her zeal or to prevent the confirmation which she sought, but to show her that this fragile and mortal body which He had occupied was surrounded by all the glory and all the radiance of divinity, and that she would not have wished to see the Lord in a tangible and material body, if her faith had been better cultivated, and if she had learned that He would now be with His Father. Indeed, the faith of the apostles seems much more lively and more vibrant, because, unlike the Magdalene, without having seen the angels or the Savior, they merely found the contents of the tomb where His body had been, and they immediately thought that he was truly resurrected.

Some believe that Mary Magdalene, as reported by Saint John, first came to the tomb and saw that the stone which had closed its entrance had been removed, and then, after going back to tell Saint Peter and Saint John, she remained alone, and they see this as a lack of faith, which justly attracted the Lord's rebuke. After they had returned to their homes, she returned again to the tomb with the other Mary, with whom she met the angel who told her that Jesus had risen. Then she left the place of His burial, and bowed at His feet in adoration, as it says, "You will be given salvation." "They came to the Savior," says the Gospel, "and held His feet and worshiped Him." At this time their faith became so strong and so ardent that they were considered worthy to go to the apostles and tell them this happy and pleasant news: Jesus said first, "Do not be afraid," and then, "God tell my brethren that they are to go into Galilee, where they will see Me."

QUESTION #6

How could Saint Peter and Saint John have so easily entered the tomb, which was guarded by a company of soldiers, without any of these guards attempting to defend against their entry?

Here is the reason that Saint Matthew gives us: "The Sabbath being past," he says, "and the first day of the next week just beginning to shine, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary came to see the tomb. And suddenly there was a great earthquake, and an angel of the Lord descended from heaven and came to turn the stone which closed the tomb, and sat on it. His face was shining like lightning and his clothing was white as snow, and the guards were so seized with fear that they turned dead-like.

Consider these soldiers, consumed by a fear so great that they seemed dead: we ought to believe that they left the tomb, or that they were so stunned and mortified that they did not dare to object. I do not say their non-objection was against men, but to the women who wanted to enter. For this very large stone that had been removed from the tomb's entrance to the tomb, and the earthquake that seemed to threaten the universe with a general upheaval, and the angel who had descended from heaven, and whose face was so bright that it did not resemble the artificial torches that men are accustomed to turn to their uses, but was like a flash of light that spreads its brightness everywhere — with all these frightening objects, they could easily see through the night, and their souls had been thrown into fear and dread. Thus Saint Peter and Saint John came easily and without hindrance into the tomb. In fact Mary Magdalene, who had learned the news of the Savior's resurrection, had already noticed that His body was removed from the tomb, and that the stone which had closed the entrance was removed. Moreover we must not imagine that the angel descended from heaven expressly to remove the stone and open the tomb for Jesus Christ, but the Lord had arisen when He wanted to, without any man knowing, and this heavenly spirit came to teach the faithful what had happened, and to show the evidence, the stone was overthrown; the body of Jesus was no longer in the tomb, and this could be easily discovered through the bright light coming out of his face, removing all the horror of the darkness of the night.

QUESTION #7

How should we understand what we read in Saint Matthew and Saint Mark, that the women who went to the tomb were ordered to tell the apostles that they had to go to Galilee, and there they saw the Lord, along with what is said by Saint Luke and Saint John, that He was seen in Jerusalem?

There are many differences in the ways in which the Savior appeared to the eleven apostles. When, out of fear of the Jews' forcefulness, they remained in hiding, He entered the place where they were, the doors being closed, and "He showed them the wounds of his hands and his side" to convince them that it was not a spirit as they imagined, and besides, He showed Himself alive to them when He saw fit, as Luke said, "by overwhelming evidence that He was alive, being seen for forty days, and speaking of the kingdom of God," and, "Eating with them, He ordered them not to leave Jerusalem, but to wait for the promise of the Father." For in this way, by appearing and conversing with His disciples and eating the same normal food that they ate, He was consoling His apostles and dispelling their fear, anticipating that He would shortly disappear suddenly from before their eyes. That is why the Apostle Paul says that Jesus Christ appeared at the same time to more than five hundred of His followers. We also read in John that as the apostles were fishing, He appeared on the shore and ate "a piece of roasted fish and a honeycomb," so that He was seen by them to have truly risen in a physical form. And can we not see that He did something similar in Jerusalem?

[Latin text of the last two sentences: "And in Joanne legimus, quod piscantibus apostolis, in steterit littorea and assi partem pisces, favumque comederit resurrectionis indicia quae vera sunt. In Jerusalem autem nihil horum fecisse narratur."]

QUESTION #8

How should we account for these words of Saint Matthew: "Jesus, crying out with a loud voice, yielded up His spirit, and at the same time the veil of the temple was torn in two from top to bottom, the earth shook, the rocks were split, the graves were opened, and many bodies of saints who were in the sleep of death revived, and exiting out of their tombs after His resurrection, they came to the holy city, and were seen by many people"?

I have already explained this passage in my comments on Saint Matthew. It should be noted first that God is the only one who can stop and start living a physical life as He pleases. For this reason the centurion, when he saw that Jesus, after saying, "Father, I commend my soul into Your hands," had immediately given up the spirit, was touched by this great miracle, and he said, "This man was really the son of God." This phrase, "The veil of the temple was torn in two," verifies what was told to Joseph, that the angels guarding the temple said, "Go out of here." The Gospel that Saint Matthew wrote in Hebrew does not say that the veil was torn, but that the top of the portal, which was of prodigious size, was completely reversed. "The earth shook," because it could not support the weight attached to its God on the cross. "The stones split," to see how far was the hardness of the Jews who refused to recognize the Son of God they saw with their eyes. "The tombs were opened," to signify that we must be resurrected one day. "And many bodies of saints out of their tombs, came to the holy city, and were seen by several people." By this "holy city" Jerusalem is meant, and it must not be confused with all the other cities where people adored idols, because in that city alone the people had a temple dedicated the Lord, and where true religion was professed, in which God alone is worshipped. These saints, who "came out of their tombs," did not appear indiscriminately to everyone, but only to numerous people who were committed to Jesus Christ. Now to explain this place in a spiritual sense: "Jesus Christ died, with a loud cry, and at the same time the veil of the temple was torn in two from top to bottom." This was so that all nations could see uncovered all the mysteries of the law, before they were hidden. The veil is torn "in two," to tell us that everything is bound up in the Old and New Testaments. It is torn "from the top down," to make manifest what has happened since the beginning of the world and the creation of man, and the sacred history we reported, and all that will be until the consummation of the world. But we must consider whether it is the first veil, on the outside, or the veil inside, that was torn at the death of the Savior.² To me, it seems to me that whoever was within the temple at the entrance of the tabernacle, is at what is called the outer veil, because "now we can see and do things very imperfectly, but when we are in a perfect state," then the outer veil tears, and all the mysteries of the house of God, which are now hidden, will be revealed to us. And we will know what is signified by these two cherubim, the oracle, and the golden vase that contained the manna. "We now see as though in a mirror, darkly." Indeed, the veil there, which hid from us the stories of Scripture, is torn, and we can enter the courtyard of the tabernacle of the Lord. But all the secrets and mysteries of the heavenly Jerusalem are always veiled, and we cannot enter there. The earth shook at the death of the Savior, and we saw the fulfillment of what the prophet Haggai: "A little time and I will shake heaven and earth, and all desired nations will come," so that "many come from east and west and take their place in the kingdom of heaven with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." "The stones split," that is, that the death of Jesus Christ for the Gentiles pierced and broke the hardness of their hearts. For these "stones" can still hear the prophets, which as well as the apostles carried this name in relation to Jesus Christ, who is the true "stone." These stones are "split," so that the saints may unlock, release, and discover all the prophecies that had been obscured from them by the thick veil of the law. These "tombs" are like those about which Jesus spoke in the Gospel, "You are like whitewashed tombs on the outside, but inside are full of dead bones." "These graves," I said, "opened," so that those who had died earlier in their infidelity, "leaving their tombs," and being given a new life with Christ, arise and enter into the heavenly Jerusalem, to be citizens of heaven rather than of earth, and thus the man who died in an earthly manner is raised in a heavenly manner.

Moreover, to return to the literal meaning of this passage, we must not be surprised that after the death of the Savior, Jerusalem is called "the holy city," since, until its complete collapse, the apostles are shown to have had no apprehension about entering the temple, and even observe the ceremonies of the law for fear of scandalizing those of Jews who had embraced the faith of Jesus Christ. We even see that the Savior loved this city so much that the misfortunes which threatened it elicited tears from His eyes; when He was crucified, He said to His Father, "Forgive them, Father, because they do not know what they do." His prayer was answered, for shortly after His death the Jews believed in Him by thousands, and God gave to this unfortunate city forty-two years to do penance. But finally its citizens, having failed to benefit, and still persisting in their wickedness — Vespasian and Titus together formed an anti-type of what is mentioned in our Scriptures, when they came out of the woods and killed and mauled these "children," because of their blasphemous insults to the real Elisha when ascending to the house of God (for that is what "Bethel" means in Hebrew).³

Since that time, Jerusalem has been called "the holy city," but having lost the holiness implied by the name she bore before, it has been called in a spiritual sense "Egypt" and "Sodom," and in its place we have built a new city, "a river delighted by the abundance of its waters," and the center of which releases a spring that has purified the bitterness of the waters of all the earth, so that the unfortunate Jews, stripped of their former glories, are reduced to whining on the ruins of their temple, while Christians have the pleasure of seeing new churches being built every day, and they say to the people of Zion, "The place where I am is too narrow." In this we see the fulfillment of the prophecy of the prophet Isaiah: "His grave will be glorious."

QUESTION #9

How is it that Saint John reports that the Savior gave that Holy Spirit to His apostles by blowing on them, which according to Luke, He promised to send to them after His ascension?

One can easily solve this problem if one considers, as Saint Paul says, that the Holy Spirit gives us many kinds of grace. "There are a variety of spiritual gifts," says the apostle in his first epistle to the faithful of Corinth, "but they have the same Spirit. There are diversities of ministries, but there is a single Lord. There are diversities of supernatural works, but there is only one God who works all in all. But the gifts which testify to the Holy Spirit are given out to everyone for the profit of the Church. One receives from the Holy Spirit the gift of speaking with exalted wisdom; another, by the same Spirit, is given the gift of speaking with knowledge; another receives faith by the same Spirit; another, through the same Spirit, has the gift of healing disease, and another the gift of working miracles, another the gift of prophecy, another the discernment of spirits, and another the gift of speaking different languages, another the interpretation of languages. Yet it is one and the same Spirit at work in all these things, distributing these gifts to each individual as He pleases." For this reason the Lord, as reported in Luke's Gospel, said to His apostles after His resurrection, "I will send you the promised gift from My Father, but continue living in the city until you are protected by the power from on high." And in Acts of the Apostles, according to the same evangelist, "He ordered them not to leave Jerusalem, but to 'Wait until the promise of the Father, which,' He said, 'you have heard of from My mouth. For John baptized in water, but in a few days you will be baptized in the Holy Spirit.'" Saint John also reported in the end of his Gospel, about the day when Jesus Christ rose, that is, on Sunday, He entered into the place where the apostles were, the doors being closed, and that they have it said to them for the second time, "Peace be with you." He said, "As my Father sent me, so I send you also." "After which He breathed on them and said, 'Receive the Holy Spirit; the sins of those whom you forgive are forgiven, and they are retained of those whose you retain.'" On the first day, therefore, when the Savior was resurrected, the apostles received the grace of the Holy Spirit to forgive sins, to baptize, to make men into children of God, and to share with the faithful the spirit of adoption, even as Jesus Christ himself had said, "The sins are forgiven to those whom you forgive, and the sins of those whose sins you retain, they shall be retained." But on the day of Pentecost, the Savior promised more excellent gifts excellent, so that they would be baptized in the Holy Spirit and bear the power from above to preach the gospel to all nations, as we read at the sixty-seventh Psalm: "The Lord will give his heralds the floor of his glory so they will proclaim with great power." Thus they would then receive the gift of healing diseases, performing miracles, and speaking different languages, for they were destined to preach the gospel to many nations, and in this way the people could listen to what each of the apostles was proclaiming about the truth of the gospel. Hence the Apostle Paul, who brought the Gospel in this vast tract of country which is from Jerusalem to Illyricum, and who was to go through Rome to go to Spain, thanked God because he had received the gift of tongues more than all the other apostles, because in order to preach the gospel to many nations, he should also speak multiple languages.

However, it was on the tenth day after His ascension, as Luke relates, that the Savior fulfilled the promise He made to His apostles to send them the Holy Spirit. "When the days of Pentecost were accomplished," says the sacred historian, "the disciples were all together in one place, and we suddenly heard a loud noise like a violent and impetuous wind that came from heaven, and it filled the whole house where they were sitting. At the same time they saw what looked like divided tongues of fire, standing on each one. Immediately they were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and they began to speak different languages, as the Holy Spirit put words in their mouths." And then we saw the fulfillment of what was spoken by the prophet Joel: "In the end-times," says the Lord, "I will pour out My Spirit upon all flesh: your son and your daughters shall prophesy; your old men shall dream dreams, and your young men shall see visions." This word, "I will pour out," involves an abundance of graces, and goes back to what the Lord had promised His apostles: that in a few days they would be baptized in the Holy Spirit. Indeed this baptism was so abundant that it filled all the house where the disciples were sitting, and He provided the fire of the Holy Spirit in their hearts, in accordance with His designs, and sent them the gift of tongues, and their lips were purified to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ in all its purity, as a seraph had purified those of Isaiah, who complained of having unclean and dirty lips.

We read in the prophet about the shouts of two seraphim who were around the throne of God, and about the posts of the temple door being shaken, "and the whole house was filled with smoke," that is, with the error of darkness and ignorance. But at the beginning of the gospel, and therefore the birth of Christianity, the Holy Spirit fills the whole Church, to purify its fervor and by His grace to purge away all the sins of the faithful by fire, even by the Holy Spirit that Jesus Christ had promised to His apostles, by whose lips His name has been carried and shared throughout the world.

Although John said that the Savior gave the Holy Spirit to His apostles on the first day of his resurrection, and Saint Luke said that He was sent to them fifty days later, we should not imagine that these two evangelists are at odds: they only desired to make distinctions between degrees of the grace that Jesus Christ communicated to His apostles, who, having first received the power to forgive sins, then received the power to perform miracles, and all other gifts detailed by Saint Paul, of which we spoke about above — but particularly to speak various languages, which was even more necessary than others so that, in the ministry which they were expected to announce the gospel of Jesus Christ to all nations of the earth, they would not need to use an interpreter. Because of this the Lycaonians, after hearing Saint Paul and Saint Barnabas speak their language, considered them gods bearing a human form. With regard to this virtue from on high that Jesus Christ had promised to bestow upon His disciples, this is nothing more than the grace of the Holy Spirit, who, having taken possession of the hearts of the apostles, inspired both their strength and courage; they feared neither the courts, nor judges, nor the purple of kings. That is what the Savior had promised before his passion, saying, "When you are delivered into the hands of men, do not worry about how or what you shall say, because what you need to say will be given at that very time, for it is not you who speak, but the Spirit of Your Father who speaks in you." For me, I am not afraid to say that since the apostles had believed in Jesus Christ, they always had the Holy Spirit, for without this the gift they could never have done all the miracles they did; but those deeds were the expressions and results of this gift. That is why Jesus Christ said aloud in the temple, "'If anyone thirsts, let him come to me and drink, and if someone believes in me, rivers of living water will come out of his heart,' as Scripture says. He meant by this the Spirit, whom those who believed in Him were yet to receive," and the evangelist adds in the same place, "For the Holy Spirit had not yet been given, because Jesus was not yet glorified." This is not to say there was no Holy Spirit, for the Savior Himself said, "If I cast out demons by speaking through the Holy Spirit," but what is meant is that this Holy Spirit who was in the Son of God had not yet entirely filled the hearts of the apostles. For from their hearts there came the fear with which they were seized at the Passion of the Savior, and on account of this was that renunciation with an oath against knowing Him at all. But after being baptized in the Holy Spirit, they were filled with grace that was prevalent in their hearts; they boldly tell the rulers of the Jews, "We must obey God rather than men." So they can resurrect the dead, triumph in the midst of turmoil, spread their blood for Jesus Christ, and be crowned via their own torments. So the apostles had the Holy Spirit; yet spiritual graces were not flowing from their heart, because the Lord was not yet glorified. And what is the glory that He expected? He explains himself in the Gospel, when He says, "My Father, glorify me with the glory I had with you before the world was." The glory of the Savior is the cross where He triumphed; there He was crucified as a man, and is glorified as God. Do you want proof of His glory? Observe that there the sun disappears, the moon changes to blood, the earth is shaken by an extraordinary earthquake; the graves are opened, the dead walk; the rocks split. This glory of Jesus Christ is what was foretold through the mouth of the prophet-king when he says, "Arise, my glory; awaken, my lute and my harp," and the glory, that is, the holy humanity, replied: "I will adjourn the morning," to thus verify the title of the twenty-first Psalm, which reads, "For the relief of the morning." When I say this, I do not separate Jesus Christ into two different people, one divine and one human, as the new heretics falsely accuse us. There is in Jesus Christ one and the same person, who is both Son of God and Son of Man, but in all that has been said about the divine Savior, there are some who recorded His divine glory, and others who did not guard their own salvation. It is to us that it was written: "He did not believe it was for Him a theft be equal to God, but He has nevertheless humbled Himself, and taking up the form and nature of a servant, He became obedient, to the point of death, even the death of the cross," and to us it is said that "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us."

Therefore the Lord told his disciples, "I am departing, and I will send you another Comforter." Luke also records that this assuring promise was given by Jesus Christ to the apostles. I am surprised that Montanus and the two crazy women⁴ accompanying his sect and his errors, who are only failed prophets, argue that this promise of the Savior was not fulfilled until them, long after it was given, because it was to the apostles that the Savior said, "I will send you the promised gift of my Father. But live in the city until you are clothed with the power from on high." It was upon the apostles, not Montanus, Prisca, and Maxilla, that Jesus Christ has breathed, thus giving them the Holy Spirit. To the apostles it is said, "The sins of those whom you forgive are forgiven, and they will be retained of those whose you retain." It is the apostles that He ordered not to leave Jerusalem but to wait for the promise of His Father, a promise that Luke allows us to see being fulfilled, when he said, "They were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and they began to speak different languages, as the Holy Spirit put their words in their mouths," because The Holy Spirit "blows where He wills." When Jesus Christ promised His apostles that He would send to send them "another Comforter," it was already satisfying to know that He was himself the consolation of his apostles, and to know the apostle Paul's concept of God the Father, when he calls Him the "God of mercy and all comfort." But if the Father is "Comforter," if the Son is "Comforter," if the Holy Spirit is "Comforter," and if we baptize the faithful in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, who are only one God, it follows that, having the same name of God, even "Consolation," they also have a similar nature.

Besides, the prophets received the Holy Spirit as well as the apostles. This is why David said, "Do not remove me from your Holy Spirit." We also read in Scripture that Daniel was animated by the Spirit of God, and that it was through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit that David said, "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit on my right hand, until I make your enemies a footstool." Only by the illumination of the Holy Spirit could the prophets have predicted things to come. "By the word of the Lord," said the Psalmist, "the heavens were consolidated, and by the breath of His mouth all their virtue was founded." All the substance possessed by the Father and the Son is also the substance of the Holy Spirit. When He is sent, it is the Father and Son who send Him. The Scripture calls Him in a thousand places "the Spirit of God the Father" and "the Spirit of Jesus Christ." Hence, as was reported in the Acts of the Apostles, that those who had received the baptism of John, and who believed in God the Father and Jesus Christ, but who did not even know there was a Holy Spirit, were baptized again, and we can say that this was the occasion when they truly baptized, because without the Holy Spirit the Trinity cannot exist. We read again in the same place, where Saint Peter said to Ananias and Sapphira, who had lied to the Holy Spirit, that it was to God and not to men that they had lied.

QUESTION #10 How do we understand what the Apostle Paul says to the Romans, from the place, "What shall we say then? Is there unrighteousness with God? God forbid that we have this thought!" To the place, "If the Lord of hosts had not left us a seed, we would have become like Sodom and Gomorrah"? The entire epistle to the Romans needs careful explanation, because it is full of obscure difficulties that cannot be understood without the help of the Holy Spirit who has Himself guided the mouth of the apostle. But the most difficult and most embarrassing passage is the one you have asked about. Some, to maintain whole the righteousness of God, claim that if Jacob was selected and Esau was rejected when they were still in the Rebecca's womb, this could only be for reasons that have preceded their birth. Similarly He also chose Jeremiah and John the Baptist from the wombs of their mothers, and the Apostle Paul was chosen before he was born, to preach the Gospel. For me, I can only agree with what is received by all the faithful, and what I teach, I can teach publicly without fear in the church, without fear of falling into the illusions and dreams of Pythagoras, Plato, and those disciples who wished to mold the opinions of the pagans into the dogmas of religion, saying that souls are fallen from heaven, and that their individual merits have been expressed together in their bodies so as to compensate for their past sins. I think it is much better to forthrightly admit our ignorance, and to categorize this passage of Saint Paul among the deep mysteries which we cannot fathom. This admission is preferable to the option, taken under the pretext of justifying the conduct of God, of embracing the heresy of Basilides and Manès, teaching monstrous opinions asserted by a certain Egyptian, and the chimerical visions with which he has misled the Spaniards.[5] Therefore I shall explain this passage the best I can, and objectively follow Saint Paul's footprints as far as I can, objectively. This apostle, having taken even the Holy Spirit as a witness to the sincere pain which penetrated his heart, first lamented about the blindness of his brothers and his parents according to the flesh, that is, the Israelites who had failed and rejected the Son of God, to whom belonged the adoption, his glory, his covenant, his law, his worship, and his promises, and which Jesus Christ Himself received, coming forth in the flesh, being born of Mary. And the pressure of the pain he feels is so strong that he desired for himself to become anathema, and to be separated from Christ, that is, to die alone, if it would in any way prevent Israel from perishing. Here the objecting reader could not fail to tell him, "What is this? Are all the Israelites lost? Have not you yourself recognized Jesus Christ as the Son of God? Have not the other apostles and an infinite number of Jewish people also recognized this?" And here is his response to this objection. The Scripture depicts two different concepts of Israel, expressed under the figure of two children, one of which is in the flesh and the other in the spirit and promise. Abraham had two children, Ishmael and Isaac. The one who was born there according to the flesh did not share the legacy of his father, but the one who was born of Sarah, as promised, is the child called by God, according to what Scripture says: "This is Isaac, which will be called your son." That is, those that are "children in the flesh" are not therefore God's children, but those are the "children of promise" who are considered to be children of Abraham. This truth seems to apply not only to Ishmael and Isaac, but also to the two children who were within Rebecca, Esau and Jacob: of whom God chose one, and rejected the other. Saint Paul claims to see than in the elder members of these pairs of brothers, Ishmael and Esau, is the representation of the reprobation of the Jewish people, and that in the younger of the pairs, Isaac and Jacob, we see a representation of the favorable choice that God has made, and those Jews who have believed in Jesus Christ. But in order to make his meaning clear, he used the example of two twin brothers, Esau and Jacob, of which it is written, "The older will be subject to the younger," and taking what was said by the prophet Malachi, "Jacob have I loved, and Esau I hated," he adapted it to counter the objection, and having addressed it in this way, he refuted it.

If it is true, says the apostle, that Jacob received election and Esau disapproval, "not yet being born, nor having done good nor evil," and the reception of the kindness or the wrath of God is not an effect of their own merits, but it depends on the will of the One who chose one and rejected the other, "What shall we say then? Is it that God is unfair?" According to what He Himself said to Moses, "I will have upon whom I bestow mercy, and I will pity whoever it pleases Me to pity." If we believe that God does whatever He wants, and chooses one and rejects the other without any regard to their merit and their works, "it is not of those who desire, or of those running, but of God who shows mercy," as indeed appears to be the true sense of these words that the same God says, in Scripture, to Pharaoh: "For I have prepared you to display My power in you, and to make My name famous throughout the world." But if this is so, and if God, as He pleases, shows mercy to Israel and hardens Pharaoh, is it not therefore wrong when, pointing out errors, He blames us for not doing well, or for doing evil? For without regard either to our good or our evil deeds, He can, when He pleases, choose one and condemn others, especially the man was too weak to oppose His will. But this is what the apostle Paul responds to this argument, though it was intrinsically very strong and, being supported on the authority of Scripture, seemed almost invincible: "O man, who are you to challenge with God?" That is, since you do not agree with God, you rise up against Him, and consult the holy Scriptures to find authoritative evidence to condemn His conduct. But by acting on this sinful desire to accuse God, it is manifest that you have free will, and that you can do whatever you want, and it is in your power to keep silent or to talk when you please. If you are convinced that God has acted in the same way as a potter who makes a vase of clay, and you can not resist his will, reflect that a vase of clay does not tell the one who made it, "Why did you make me this way?" because the potter has the power to make the same lump or mass of clay, into a clay vase for to honorable use, and another for uses vile and shameful." But God made all men of the same nature and in the same condition: He gave them, via their training, the freedom to do what they please, and to freely take their stand for good or evil, and this freedom is so full and so complete that they are displaying their impiety by challenging their Creator and examining the reasons for His conduct.

"Who can complain," continues the apostle, "if God, desiring to show His wrath and to make known His power, tolerated with extreme patience vessels of wrath destined for destruction, in order to make known the riches of His glory on the vessels of mercy He has destined for His glory — on those whom He called, even us, not of Jews only but also of the Gentiles? As He Himself said through the mouth of the prophet Hosea, 'I will call them My people who were not My people, "My beloved" one I had not loved, and the time shall come in the same place where I had once said, "You are not My people," they shall be called children of the living God,"' and so on. Inasmuch as the patience of God, says Saint Paul, served only to harden the heart of Pharaoh, and since the Lord delayed so long to punish the Israelites, you thus have a sound justification to conclude that His toleration of those impious people was not infinite; He tolerated their impiety, and in His extreme patience did not condemn those who were so condemnable, so that even those who were lost He might make use of to display His anointed kindness and His mercies.

Consider that the sun's heat is always the same, but it produces different effects depending on the nature of different subjects upon which it acts: some are softened, others besides these are firmed up, being tightened; the wax is melted and the mud is hardened, although the heat never changes its nature. The same is true of God, for by His goodness and mercy He hardens vases of wrath, that is, those who are lost among the people of Israel, but concerning vessels of mercy, He has called us to His glory, that is, us, whom He called not only of Jews but also from the Gentiles. He does not save without reason and without equitable discernment; His reasons for acting this way consist of what has happened; some have rejected the Son of God and others were willing to receive Him.

However, by "these vessels of mercy" is meant not only the Gentiles but also those of Jews who wanted to believe in Jesus Christ, and being joined together with them, they are to be one faithful people, which shows that God does not choose nationalities, but according to the wills of men. And this was the essence of the performance of what the prophet Hosea said: "I will call them My people who were not My people," namely, the Gentiles, "and those to whom I once said, 'You are not My people,' will now be called the children of the living God." And we apprehend that this prediction does not apply exclusively to the Gentiles, for Saint Paul also called "vessels of election and mercy" those Jews who believed in Jesus Christ, because, "When it comes to Israel," says the apostle, "Isaiah cries out, 'Although the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, there will be a small remnant saved,'" that is, although all the children of Israel do not believe in Jesus Christ, there are yet a few, very few, who believe in Him, "For God in His justice will make an end and cut off His people," having saved by the incarnation and humiliation of Jesus Christ those who wanted to believe in Him. That is why the prophet Isaiah says in another place: "If the Lord of hosts had not preserved a few of our race, we would have become like Sodom and Gomorrah."

Saint Paul, continuing in this passage of Scripture which describes what the prophets have predicted about the dual vocation of the Gentiles and Jews, goes on to say that Gentiles, who did not pursue righteousness, have nevertheless embraced it, because they believed in Jesus Christ without the vanity of their works, while, contrary to this, most Israelites were lost because they "stumbled at that stumbling-stone," and, "Not knowing the righteousness that comes from God, and seeking to establish their own justice, they have not submitted to the righteousness of God," that is, Jesus Christ, who has been given to us by God to be our righteousness.

I have read the comments of a certain author who was claiming that he was rather embarrassed by Saint Paul's response, because this issue was not explained, where, after having proposed the objection, "What shall we say then? Is there injustice in God?", and after having said, "It does not depend on any who desire or upon those running, but of God who shows mercy," and "God will have mercy upon him whom He favors, and He hardens whom he pleases," and again, "Who can resist his will?", "Here," says the author, is what the apostle says: "O man, who are only earth and ash, how dare you question God? Do you want to rebel against that which you did, you who are also a fragile clay vase? Can a vase of earth say to those who made it, 'Why did you do me this way?' Does not the potter have the power to make of one part of the same mass of clay a vessel intended for honorable use, and another for uses vile and shameful?" Therefore remain in eternal silence; acknowledge your own weakness, and put an end to asking God to account for His actions, because by dealing mercifully with one and in severity with others, He did what He wanted to do.

QUESTION #11 What is the meaning of these words of the Apostle Paul, in his second epistle to the faithful of Corinth: "We are to the one, the smell of death that causes them to die, and to the other, the smell of life, which leads to life. And who is capable of these things"? The full passage from which these words are taken should be cited here, so that by considering their context, and their relationship with what precedes and what follows, we can better understand what is the true meaning. "Being come to Troas," says the Apostle, "to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, although the Lord had given me great opportunities to successfully fulfill my ministry, I had no peace of mind, because I had not found my brother Titus, but having taken leave of them, I went into Macedonia. But I thank God that we always triumph in Christ, who through us spreads everywhere the aroma of the knowledge of His name. For we are before God the aroma of Jesus Christ, among those who are being saved, or to those who are lost: to some, the smell of death that causes them to die, and to the other, the smells of life that gives life. And who is capable of such things? For we are not as many which corrupt the word of God, but we preach with complete sincerity, as from God, in God's presence, and in the name of Jesus Christ."

Saint Paul instructed the faithful of Corinth about everything he did and everything he has suffered, and how he always gave thanks to God in any situation he found himself in, leading them by his ample resolve to contend for the interests of faith. "I came," he says, "to Troas," which previously was called Troy, "to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ in Asia, but although the Lord had given me great openings to fulfill my ministry successfully," — that is, although many people were believing in miracles and wonders that God works by my administration, and had believed in Jesus Christ, and I had every reason to hope to see the faith of these people rise and increase by the grace of the Lord, nevertheless "I had no rest in my spirit," that is, I could not enjoy the consolation that I hoped to find, because I did not meet my brother Titus, as I was expecting, having heard that he was there, or that he himself had promised to go and rendezvous there. But what great consolation and rest of mind could Saint Paul receive from the presence of Titus, and why did his absence force him to depart from the inhabitants of Troas to go into Macedonia? I have noted on occasion that the apostle Paul was very wise, having been educated "at the feet of Gamaliel," who, according to the Acts of the Apostles, said in the council of the Jews, "Why not keep away from these people? For if what they preach is the work of God, you cannot destroy it, and if it is the work of man, it will fall by itself." Now, Saint Paul had a perfect knowledge of the holy Scriptures, he was naturally eloquent, and he possessed the gift of speaking in tongues, as he prides himself in the Lord, saying, "I praise my God that I speak through the gift of tongues more than all of you." Nevertheless he could not speak Greek in a manner worthy of the majesty and grandeur of our mysteries. Therefore Titus served as an interpreter, as Saint Mark used to serve Saint Peter, with whom he wrote his Gospel. Also we see that the two epistles attributed to Saint Peter have different styles and turn phrases differently, by which it is discerned that it was sometimes necessary for him to use different interpreters.

Saint Paul, therefore, sorry that he had not met at Troas the one by whose mouth he was to preach the gospel, took the party to go to Macedonia, the place from which a Macedonian had appeared during the night, inviting him to go, saying, "Go to Macedonia and help us successfully." He also hoped to find Titus, and indeed he had planned to visit the brethren or face the persecution of unbelievers, for that is what he means by these words: "But I thank God that we always triumph in Christ, who spreads by us everywhere the odor of the knowledge of His name." "We always triumph," that is, "He triumphs in us," or, "He triumphs by us," as the apostle says in another place, "God made us a spectacle to the world, to angels and men." This is why he says the following: "Coming from Macedonia, we had no relief for our bodies, but we were constantly suffering, with conflicts on the outside and fears within. But God, who consoles the humble and the afflicted, consoled us by the arrival of Titus, and not only by his arrival, but by the consolation that he himself received from you."

Having thus taken leave of the inhabitants of Troy or Troas, he went to Macedonia in the hope of finding Titus, and to use him in the functions of his ministry, but it is easy to discern that they did not meet there, and that Titus arrived there only after Saint Paul had suffered many punishments and persecution. And because he suffered so much before the arrival of Titus, he gives thanks to God in the name of Jesus Christ that he preached to the nations, because He desired to use him for the triumph of His Son.

Indeed, the martyrs' endurance of torments, the blood that is spilt for the name of Jesus Christ, the joy that they display in the midst of the cruelest tortures — all this is a triumph for God. When the martyrs' strength and consistency are seen, as they undergo the horror and cruelty of the most horrific torment, and express all their joy in light of the fact that they are suffering under torment, the smell of the knowledge of God is spreading among the Gentiles, who feel persuaded by the testimony of their own conscience that if the gospel was not true, no one would desire to shed his blood for his defense. For it is not in the midst of the delights and pleasures of the world — including the concern to amass wealth — or in the midst of a soft and undisturbed life, that we confess the name of Jesus Christ; it is in prisons, in wounds, in persecutions, in nakedness, in hunger and thirst. That is the triumph of God and the victory of the apostles. But one might post this objection to Saint Paul: How, with all that he had done, can there still be those who did not believe in Jesus Christ? The apostle, according to his custom, prevents disputes about this matter. It is true that we are, to God, the aroma of the name of Jesus Christ, and the gospel that we preach, like a pleasant scent, is spreading on all sides. But God has allowed men to use their free will so that, doing good voluntarily and not by necessity, He may reward the faithful and punish the unbelieving. Therefore sometimes the smell that we spread, though intrinsically good, provides either life or death, depending on the good or bad dispositions of those who receive or reject the gospel. Thus those who believe in Jesus Christ, He saves, and those who do not believe in Him will not ever come into contact with Him. Moreover it is not surprising that the preaching of the apostle Paul produced such diverse effects among the people, since the gospel says about Jesus Christ Himself, "This child shall be for the fall and resurrection of many in Israel, and shall be spoken against by men."

Every location, whether clean or dirty, receives direct sunlight, and this star, without concern for the purity of its light, shines indiscriminately upon flowers and manure alike. The same is true of the aroma of Jesus Christ: it is not likely to change or to cease to be what it is; however, it becomes for the faithful a principle of life, and for the unbelievers a principle of death. This is not referring to the death of this physical body, which is common with the animals, but to spiritual death, about which it is written: "The soul who sins, it will die." And when the faithful, who benefit from the aroma of Jesus Christ, hear this, they must not think of this physical breath that animates us, and which is the force behind all our actions and movements, but instead think of the life referred to by the prophet-king when he says, "I firmly believe that I shall behold the Lord in the land of the living," (because God is the God of the living and not dead) and about which Saint Paul said, "Our life is hidden with God in Jesus Christ, but when Christ, who is our life, appears, then we will be partakers with Him in glory." The apostle instructs the Corinthians not to let it bother them — for it is not our main concern — that some receive the truth that we preach and others reject it; the many die a real death, and a few experience the life of which it is said, "I am the life."

For if we did not announce the gospel, the unbelievers would still die, and none would have the life of the faithful. It is not easy to find a man worthy to proclaim the wonders of Jesus Christ; yet, the minister's glory does not emanate from the minister, but from what he preaches. When Saint Paul said he does not conduct himself like so many who peddle the word of God, it shows that there are many who imagine that their godliness serves as a way to get gain; these individuals have a shameful agenda in everything they do; they are those "who devour widows' houses." But the one who preaches the gospel "with full sincerity, as from God," and in the presence of Him who sent him, not preaching this Jesus Christ and that Jesus Christ, will exercise his ministry in order to overcome through Jesus Christ, and to obtain his glory. It should be noted that here we bring this chapter in the Apostle to a close, mentioning the mystery of the Holy Trinity and saying, "We preach the gospel from God, in the Holy Spirit, in the presence of God the Father, and in the name of Jesus Christ."

We said that Saint Paul went to Macedonia from Troas; here is the evidence from the Acts of the Apostles: "Having passed by Mysia, they went down to Troas, where during the night Paul had this vision: a man of Macedonia appeared to him and told him this request: 'Go to Macedonia and succeed in helping us.' As soon as he had this vision, we sought to go to Macedonia, persuaded that God had indeed called us to preach the gospel."

QUESTION #12

How should we understand these words of the apostle Paul in his first epistle to the Thessalonians: "May the God of peace Himself sanctify you in all ways, so that everything that is in you, the spirit, the soul and body, may be kept spotless for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ"?

Although this question is very famous, it must be explained in few words. Saint Paul said a little earlier: "Do not quench the spirit." If we understand the true meaning of these words, we understand together the nature of the spirit that we must keep unsullied with the soul and body for the day of the Lord's coming. For who would imagine that the Holy Spirit may be extinguished like a flame, which when extinguished ceases to be what it was? Who could imagine that someone would destroy the Holy Spirit — who in the old law, speaking by the mouth of Isaiah, Jeremiah and other prophets, "Here is what the Lord says," and who said, in the new, by the prophet Agabus, "These things says the Holy Spirit."

"There are many kinds of spiritual gifts, but there is only one Spirit; there are numerous kinds of ministries, but there is only one Lord; there are several kinds of supernatural acts, but there is only one God who works all in all. But the gifts which make the Holy Spirit manifest are distributed to everyone for the good of the Church: one receives the gift of speaking wisdom by the Holy Spirit, while another received, through the same Spirit, a gift of speaking with knowledge; another, by the same Spirit, receives faith; another, the gift of working miracles; another received, through the same Spirit, the gift of healing disease; another the gift of prophecy; another the discernment of spirits. Yet one and the same Spirit is producing all these things, distributing gifts to these people as He pleases." In regard to this Spirit, David, when he realized his isolation, said to God, "Do not remove from me Your Holy Spirit." When God withdraws the Spirit, He does not diminish His substance, but extinguishes Him for the souls that deprive themselves of His light. For me, I believe that by these words, "Do not quench the spirit," the apostle means the same thing by these, "Keep yourselves in the fervor of the spirit" because the Spirit is never extinguished, except in a soul whose fervor has slowed to a stop by indulgence in crime, or in a love, once warm, which has grown cold and languid.

Now to this phrase, "May the God of peace sanctify you in all ways," or "in all things," or, if we flex the Greek text, "give you a full and perfect holiness;" He is called "God of peace," because we were reconciled to him through Jesus Christ, "who is our peace, who has made the two peoples one," and, as the apostle said in another place, is "the peace of God which surpasses all comprehension, that keeps the hearts and minds of the saints." But he who was sanctified and is perfect in all things, "keeps his spirit, his soul, and his body without blemish for the day of the coming of the Lord," and uses his bodily members for the purposes for which they exist: his hands to work, his feet to walk, his eyes to see, his ears to hear, his teeth to eat, his stomach to digest meat, his bowels to order to avoid what is naturally leftover. Thus it is when all members of one's body are whole and perfect. But is it credible that Paul, in making this blessing-vow to heaven, expects Jesus Christ, on judgment day, to find the faithful individual's body entirely intact? Does not death reduce everything to dust? Or if there are still a few, as some authors claim, that are still alive and kicking, do they not invariably have some defect? Consider especially the bodies of martyrs, even those whose eyes, or nose, or hands have been torn or cut off, for the sake of Christ. Therefore what the apostle meant by a "whole body" is, as I have said elsewhere, that which remains attached to the head, verily, the leader from whom all parts of the body are united and bound together, according to the effective increase of the body of Jesus Christ. But this body is none other than the Church, and anyone who has a close union with the head of this body must also assist in the maintenance of all other members in the whole body, as far as human frailty can afford. And to do that, they must maintain the integrity of the soul, so as to say, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, who heals all your infirmities," and it is written, "He sent his word and He healed." We also maintain the integrity of the mind when we live according to spiritual things; we live by the Spirit, and thus we follow with docility the guidance and impressions from the Spirit, so that we may mortify by the mind the works of the flesh, and so that we produce the fruits of the Spirit, by which I mean love, joy, peace, and so forth.

Here is another explanation that we can give to the words of the Apostle Paul. As Solomon set forth a proverb by describing things in three ways, so our teachings and applications, conducted thoughtfully and carefully, may be set forth to expound the truth for those who question us. We can describe the three ways by which the instructions and regulations of Scripture are set forth in our hearts. First there is the literal and historical sense. Second, there is the moral sense. And, finally, it may be taken in the spiritual sense. In the literal sense, we are dealing simply with the facts of the story as we follow a sequence of events being narrated. In the moral sense, we leave the literal meaning and consider larger and nobler ideas that are expressed for the regulation of our morals, and for our edification, though grounded in physical matters pertaining to the Jewish people. In the spiritual sense our objective is something even more sublime; we abandon all the earthly things, and simply look for what is said about the heavenly things, and the joy that is prepared for us; looking at all the good things in life is like a shadow in comparison to the adamant happiness that is ours in that day. Jesus Christ, by His peace, will sanctify and perfect those who are happy in this situation, that is, those whose sole occupation is to take care to preserve the integrity of their body, their soul and their spirit, and to acquire a perfect knowledge of truth, and the triple-knowledge of which Solomon speaks.

Many, focusing simply on the letter, understand as pertaining to the resurrection what the Apostle Paul says, that we must keep our mind, our soul, and our body spotless for the day of the coming of the Lord. Some of them have claimed that this passage proves that man is composed of three kinds of substances: a spirit, which is the principle of their feelings and their thoughts, a soul, which is the source of his life, and of a body, which serves as an instrument for all external actions. There are others who claim that man is composed of a core and a body, and that the "spirit" that we add is not a substance but a principle which, according the different effects it produces, is sometimes called spirit, or feeling, or thought, because there is no man in so many different substances that give them different names. And when they encounter the passage of Scripture, "Spirits and souls of the righteous, bless the Lord," they reject it by saying that these words are not found in the Hebrew text. For me, as I said earlier, I think that the "spirit" which remains blameless with soul and body, must not be interpreted by us to mean the Holy Spirit, whose substance is imperishable, but rather His gifts and graces, which lights are capable of being extinguished in us, if we make a poor, rather than good, use of them.

Letters - letter_121

Letter 121. To Algasia.

Jerome writes to a lady of Gaul named Algasia to answer eleven questions which she had submitted to him. They were as follows:- (1) How is Luke 7:18, Luke 7:19, to be reconciled with John 1:36?

(2) What is the meaning of Matt. 12:20?

(3) And of Matt. 16:24?

(4) And of Matt. 24:19, Matt. 24:20?

(5) And of Luke 9:53?

(6) What is the meaning of the parable of the unjust steward?

(7) What is the meaning of Rom. 5:7?

(8) And of Rom. 7:8?

(9) And of Rom. 9:3?

(10) And of Col. 2:18?

(11) And of 2 Th. 2:3? The date of the letter is 406 a.d. The below translation made by ChatGPT 3.5 from this Latin text.

Preface

My son Apodemius, who marked the interpretation of his name coming a long way to us by navigation, and sought for Bethlehem from the shores of the Ocean and the farthest boundaries of Gaul, and after passing through Rome, so that finding in it the heavenly bread, he might be satisfied and break forth in the Lord and say: " My heart hath uttered a good word ; I speak of my works for the King " (Ps. 44:1), has brought me great questions in a small scroll, which he said were given by you, and which he instructed me to communicate to him. While reading these I understood that the interest of the Queen of Sheba in you had been fulfilled, who came from the ends of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon (1 Kings 10:4; Matt. 12:42). Not indeed I, Solomon, who is preferred to all men for wisdom before and after himself; but you are to be called the Queen of Sheba—in whose mortal body sin does not reign—and who, turned towards the Lord with your whole mind, will hear from Him: "Turn, turn, O Shulamite" (Song of Solomon 6:12), for "Sheba" in our language means "conversion." And at the same time, I perceived that your questions proposed concerning the Gospel alone and the Apostle indicate that you either do not read enough of the Old Testament, or do not understand it sufficiently, which is covered with such great obscurities and types of future events that it needs interpretation for everything; and the eastern gate, from which true light rises and through which the High Priest enters and goes out, is always closed (Ezekiel 43:1-2 and 44:1), and is only opened for Christ (Revelation 5), who has the key of David, who opens, and no man shuts; and shuts, and no man opens, so that with Him opening, you may enter into His chamber, and say, "The king has brought me to his chambers" (Song of Solomon 1:4). Furthermore, I am quite amazed, why having left the nearby extremely pure source, you search for the flows of our stream so far away, and having abandoned the waters of Siloam, which move silently (Isaiah 8), you desire the waters of Sihor, which are made filthy by the vices of this troubled world. Here you have Alethius, a holy priest, who, as they say, with a living voice and wise and eloquent speech, can answer what you ask, unless perhaps you desire foreign merchandise, and for the variety of tastes, the delicacies of our seasonings also delight you. Some are pleased with sweet things, some are pleased with bitter things, the sour restore the stomachs of the latter, the salty ones sustain the former. I have seen nausea and dizziness often cured with the remedy called "βίηρ", and according to Hippocrates, opposing cures are remedies for opposing things. Therefore, having cured our bitterness with that honeyed nectar, put the wood of the cross into Mara, and restrain the aged phlegm with youthful austerity, so that you may sing joyfully: "How sweet are your words to my taste, sweeter than honey to my mouth!" (Psalm 119:103).

Chapter 1

Why does John send his disciples to the Lord to ask him: Are you the one who is coming, or should we expect another? (Matthew 11:3 and Luke 7:20) When he had previously said about the same person: Behold the Lamb of God, behold him who takes away the sins of the world. (John 1:29) We have spoken more fully on this question in the Commentaries of Matthew. Therefore, it is clear that you do not have these books yourself, since you ask such questions. However, we must briefly summarize so as not to seem completely silent. John sent his disciples while he was in prison, seeking to learn from them, and about to be beheaded, to teach them to follow the one whom he acknowledged as the master of all through his questioning. For he could not be unaware of him whom he had shown to those who were unaware, and of whom he had said, "He who has a bride is the bridegroom" (John 3:29); and "I am not worthy to bear his sandals" (Matthew 3:11); and "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 1:27). And he heard the Father thundering out: This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased (Ibid. 3:30). But what he says: Art Thou He that shall come, or look we for another? (Matth. 3: 17). This utterance too may have this meaning: I know that Thou art He Who hast come to take away the sins of the world; but because I am to descend into hell, I ask this also of Thee, whether Thou too wilt descend thither, or is it impious to believe this of the Son of God, and wilt Thou send another thither? This, however, I wish to know, that I who have proclaimed Thee among men on earth, may also in hell proclaim Thee, if Thou art perchance coming. For Thou it is Who hast come to loose the captives, and to set free them that were bound. The Lord, understanding the purport of his inquiry, answered rather through works than by word, and bade John be told that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead rise again, and (what is greater than these) the poor have the Gospel preached to them (Matth. 11; Luc. 7). The poor, however, are distinguished either by humility or by riches so that no difference in salvation exists between the poor man and the rich man, but all are called equally. And it is inferred: "Blessed is he who is not scandalized in me" (Matthew 11:6), he who strikes not John but his disciples who had first come to him, saying: "Why do we and the Pharisees fast often, but your disciples do not fast?" (Mark 18; and Luke 5:33). And to John:

"Master, you bear witness concerning him near Jordan. Behold, his disciples baptize, and many come to him" (John 3:26). With these words, he indicates jealousy about the size of the signs which comes from biting envy why should the one who was baptized by John dare to baptize? and a much larger crowd gathers to him than had previously come to John. And lest the people, unknowingly, think that John is being blackened because of what was said, he delivers a speech in his praise and begins to speak to the surrounding crowds about John: What did you go out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken by the wind? But what did you go out into the wilderness to see? A man clothed in soft clothing (Matthew 11:7-8; Luke 7:24-25)? and so on. The sense of this statement is as follows: Did you come out into the wilderness to see a man, like a reed shaken by the wind, being bent in various directions? Let him doubt now about whom he had previously praised, and concerning whom he had previously said, Behold the Lamb of God, let him now ask whether he is the one himself, or whether another one will come or is coming. And because every false preaching seeks profit and strives for human glory, so that gains may be born through glory: he affirms, wearing clothing made of camel's hair, that no one can yield to flattery; and he who feeds on locusts and wild honey (Matt. 3: 4), does not seek riches or other earthly pleasures, avoids the rigid and austere life of the palace, which those who are clothed with purple and fine linen and silk and soft feathers seek. And he says that he is not only a prophet who is accustomed to predicting the future, but he is more than a prophet, because the one whom they had said would come, he has shown has come, saying: Behold the Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world (John 1:29) : especially since he has attained the privilege of the prophetic summit of John; that he who had said, I ought to be baptized by you (Matthew 3:14), himself has baptized him: not by the presumption of being greater, but by the obedience of the disciple and the fear of the servant. And although he affirms that among those born of women, no one greater has arisen than John (Matthew 11:11), he mentions himself, who was born of a virgin, as being greater: or he precedes all men on earth before every angel in heaven, who is least. For we progress into angels; and not angels into us, just as some snoring heavily dream. Nor is this enough in the praises of John, unless he who preached the baptism of repentance, is first reported to have said: Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand (Matthew 3:1) . From the days of his preaching, the kingdom of heaven suffers violence (Ibid. 11.12); such as that man is born. He desires to be an angel; and an earthly animal seeks a heavenly abode. For the Law and the Prophets prophesied up to John (Ibid. 13): not that John is the end of the Prophets and the Law, but he who was preached by the testimony of John. But according to the mystery which is written in Malachy (chapter 4, verse 5), John is Elijah who is coming (Matthew 11:14): not that the same soul (as the heretics suspect) was in Elijah and in John, but that he had the same grace of the Holy Spirit, girded with a belt like Elijah, living in the desert like Elijah, suffering persecution from Herodias as he endured from Jezebel: just as Elijah was the precursor of the second coming, so John welcomed the Lord Savior who was coming in the flesh, not only in the wilderness but even in his mother's womb, and announced it with the joy of his body.

Chapter 2

What does it mean that it is written in Matthew: 'A bruised reed shall he not break, and smoking flax shall he not quench' (Matthew 12:20). For the explanation of this passage, the whole testimony that Matthew takes from the Prophet Isaiah must be set forth, even the words of Isaiah (Isaiah 42): according to the Septuagint interpreters and the Hebrew itself, to which Theodotus, Aquila, and Symmachus agree. Thus of the four Evangelists, only Matthew relates: "And Jesus knowing it, retired from thence: and many followed him, and he healed them all. And he charged them that they should not make him known. That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by Isaias the prophet, saying: Behold my servant whom I have chosen, my beloved in whom my soul hath been well pleased. I will put my spirit upon him, and he shall shew judgment to the Gentiles." (Chapter 12, verses 15-18) He will not strive, nor cry out, nor will anyone hear his voice in the streets. A bruised reed he will not break, and smoking flax he will not extinguish, until he brings forth judgment unto victory. And in his name the Gentiles will hope" (Matthew 12:15 and following). For which in Isaiah, according to the Septuagint interpreters, it is thus written: "Jacob my servant, I will uplift him. My chosen one, my soul has received him. I have given my spirit upon him, he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. He shall not cry, nor have respect to person, neither shall his voice be heard abroad. The bruised reed he shall not break: and smoking flax he shall not extinguish: but he shall bring forth judgment unto truth. He shall shine, and shall not be broken, until he set judgment in the earth: and the countries shall wait for his law." However, we translate it from Hebrew like this, "Behold my servant, I will uphold him; my chosen, my soul has delighted in him. I have given my spirit upon him: he shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. "He will not cry out, nor raise his voice, nor make it heard in the street. A bruised reed he will not break, and a smoldering wick he will not snuff out. In truth he will bring forth justice. He will not grow faint or be discouraged till he has established justice on the earth; and the islands will put their hope in his law." This shows that the Gospel writer Matthew, not bound by authority of the old interpretation, dismissed the Hebrew truth and brought forth to the nations, educated in the Law of the Lord, the things he had read in Hebrew as if he were a Hebrew among Hebrews. For if it is to be taken thus, as the Seventy Interpreters have given it: Jacob is my servant, I will receive him; Israel is my chosen, my soul has received him, how do we understand that it has been fulfilled in Jesus, what has been written concerning Jacob and Israel? We read that Blessed Matthew did this not only in this testimony, but also in another place: Out of Egypt I called my son (Hosea 11:2): for which the Seventy translated: Out of Egypt I called his sons. Certainly, if we do not follow the Hebrew truth, it is evident that it does not pertain to the Lord and Savior. For it follows: but they sacrificed to Baalim. And that which is less in the assumed testimony in the Gospel: it shall shine and not be shaken, until he shall place judgment upon the earth, seems to have happened by the error of the first writer who, reading the higher sentence to be finished in the word judgment, thought that the final word of the lower sentence was judgment, and he omitted a few words which were in the middle, that is, between judgment and judgment. And again, that which is read among the Hebrews: And in his law shall the islands hope, Matthew, interpreting the sense rather than the words, put for law and islands, a name and nations. And not only in the present place, but wherever the testimonies of the Evangelists and Apostles from the old Instrument have been brought forth, it should be observed more diligently: not that they followed words, but the sense: and where they differ from the Hebrew in the Septuagint, they expressed the Hebrew sense in their own words. Therefore, the Child of the almighty God, according to the dispensation of assumed flesh, which is sent to us, is called the Savior. To whom and in another place the Father says: It is great for you to be called my child, to gather the tribes of Jacob (Isai. 49.3). This is the vineyard of Sorec, which is interpreted as chosen. This is the beloved son, in whom the soul of God is pleased; not because God has a soul, but because every affection of God is shown in the soul. And it is not surprising if the soul is named in God, when all the members of the human body, according to the laws of tropology, and various intelligences, are said to have it. He also placed his spirit upon him: the Spirit of Wisdom and Understanding, the Spirit of Counsel and Strength, the Spirit of Knowledge and Piety, and the Spirit of the Fear of the Lord (Isaiah 11): He who descends upon him in the form of a dove, about whom John the Baptist narrates having heard from God the Father: "The One upon whom you see the Holy Spirit descending and remaining upon, He is" (John 1:33). And He will announce judgment to the Gentiles; concerning whom it is also written in the Psalms: "Give the king your justice, O God, and your righteousness to the son of a king" (Psalm 71:1). He Himself speaks about it in the Gospel: "For the Father judges no one, but has given all judgment to the Son" (John 5:22). He will not contend: like a lamb led to the slaughter: He will not argue in the hearing. Nor will he cry out, in accordance with what the Apostle Paul writes: Let all clamor, and anger, and bitterness be taken away from you (Ephesians 4:31). He will not cry out: because Israel did not do justice, but cry out. Nor will anyone hear his voice in the streets or outdoors. For all the glory of the daughter of the king is within (Psalm 44:14): And, Narrow, and cramped is the way that leads to life (Matthew 7:14). Therefore his voice is not heard in the streets, where wisdom confidently acts, not entering a broad and spacious way, but accusing and condemning. And so he spoke to those who were outside, not in his own voice, but in parables: 'The reed, he said, shaken does not break; or, as the Septuagint translated, the broken reed not to be crushed. The broken reed that was once vocal, and sang in praise of the Lord, is called Israel, who, because he stumbled on a corner stone and fell on it, was broken in it; therefore it is said of him: Rebuke, O Lord, the beasts of the reed (Ps. 67. 31): and in the volume of Jesus he is called the torrent of the cane, that is, of the reed; who has turbid waters, which Israel chose, despising the purest streams of the Jordan: and turning his mind back to Egypt, and desiring the marshy and swampy region, and pumpkins, and onions, and garlic, and cucumbers, and the pots of Egyptian flesh, is rightly called a broken reed by Isaiah: he who wants to lean on which, his hand will be pierced. For whoever, after the advent of the Lord and Savior and leaving behind the spirit of interpreting the Gospel, rests in the death of Jewish literature, all the works of that person are harmed. Even smoking linen will not extinguish a people gathered from the nations who, with the ardor of natural law extinguished, are wrapped in the bitter smoke, which is hurtful to the eyes, and enveloped in the darkness of errors. He who not only did not restrain and reduce to ashes, but on the contrary, from a small spark, and almost dying, raised the greatest fire; so that the whole world burned with the fire of the Lord and Savior, whom he came to send upon the earth, and in all desires to burn (Luke 12:49). According to the tropology, what we see in this place, we have briefly noted in the Commentaries of Matthew. But he who has not broken the bruised reed, and has not extinguished the smoking flax, has also brought judgment unto victory (Isai. 42:3), whose judgments are true, justified in themselves (Psalm 18), so that he may be justified in his words and may overcome in judgment (Psalm 50), and so that the light of his preaching may shine in the world, not be crushed by anyone, and may overcome all snares, until he establishes judgment on earth and that which is written may be fulfilled: 'Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven' (Matthew 6:10). And, in his name shall the Gentiles hope (Isaiah 11:10); or the islands shall hope in his law (Ibid. 42:4). For just as the islands are struck by the blast and rush of winds and frequently buffeted by storms, but they are not overturned, as an example of the Gospel house built on a sturdy foundation of rock (Matthew 7; and Luke 6), so the Churches, which hope in the law and in the name of the Lord and Savior, speak through Isaiah: I am a strong city, a city that cannot be taken (Isaiah 27:3, LXX).

Chapter 3

Whose sense what is written in the Gospel of Matthew: If anyone wants to come after me, let him deny himself (Matt. 16:24). What is self-denial? or how does one who follows the Savior deny himself? On this matter I have spoken briefly in the third book of his commentary on Matthew: He who lays down the old man with his works denies himself, saying: And yet I live, but not me, but Christ lives in me (Galatians 2:20) and takes up his cross and is crucified to the world. But who has crucified the world, follows the crucified Lord. "To whom we can now add: after he showed the disciples that it was necessary for him to go to Jerusalem, and suffer many things from the priests and scribes, and the chief priests, and to be killed; Peter, taking him aside, began to rebuke him, saying: Lord, may this never happen to you. But he turned and said to Peter: Get behind me, Satan, you are a stumbling block to me; for you are not setting your mind on the things of God, but on the things of men." (Matthew 16:21-23) For, indeed, being terrified by human fear, he was afraid of the passion of the Lord. And just as, hearing he must suffer and be killed, he was afraid, so hearing, also, that he must rise again on the third day, he ought to have rejoiced, and the sadness of the passion mitigated by the glory of the resurrection. So, when this thought had seized him through fear, he spoke to all the disciples, or, according to Mark, he called the crowd with his disciples, or according to Luke, he spoke to all: "If anyone wishes to come after me, let him deny himself; and let him take up his cross, and follow me." The meaning of this exhortation is: Confession is not delicate and secure in God. Whoever believes in me should shed his own blood. Whoever shall have lost his life in this world, shall save it in the next. Believing in Christ every day, one takes up their cross and denies themselves. Whoever was impure, turns towards chastity, temperance denying luxury. Whoever was fearful and timid, assumes the strength of courage, not knowing who they were. If the unjust follow justice, they deny injustice. If foolish, confessing Christ as God's power and wisdom, they deny foolishness (1 Corinthians 1). Knowing this, we deny ourselves what we were before not only in times of persecution and the necessity of martyrdom, but in every conversation, action, thought, and speech; and we confess that we are reborn in Christ. For this reason, the Lord was crucified so that we, who believe in him and have died to sin, are crucified with him, and we say what the Apostle Paul taught: I am crucified with Christ. (Galatians 2:19). And: But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world (Galatians 6:14). And he that is crucified with Christ, shall spoil principalities and powers; and he shall triumph over them in himself. Wherefore, in the Gospel according to Matthew, Simon of Cyrene bore the cross after him, as a type of those who were to believe in him, and to be crucified with him; which cross, according to the others, he bore himself at first.

Chapter 4

What is meant by the fact that it is written in the same Matthew, Woe to those who are pregnant and those who nurse in those days. And: Pray that your flight may not be in winter or on the Sabbath (Matthew 24:19-20). This is clearly dependent on the earlier statements. For when the Gospel of Christ has been preached to all nations and the end has come, and they see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the Prophet, standing in the holy place (Mark 13): then those who are in Judea are commanded to flee to the mountains; and those who are on the housetop, not to come down and take anything from their house; and those who are in the field, not to turn back and take their cloak. We have spoken more fully on these matters in the Commentaries of the same Matthew. And at once it is joined: Woe to the pregnant and nursing women in those days. In which days? when the abomination of desolation stands in the holy place. Indeed, it is not doubtful that this is preached according to the letter concerning the advent of Antichrist: when the magnitude of persecution compels them to flee, and heavy wombs, and nursing infants impede flight. Although some want it to mean the siege and battle against the Jews, and especially Jerusalem, by Titus and Vespasian. Winter and Sabbaths are also interpreted thus so as not to compel flight at that time when the severity of the cold in the fields and in desert places does not allow refugees to hide: and the observance of the Sabbath either makes deserters if they flee, or exposes them to the swords of the enemy if they keep Sabbath rest and commandments. But let us, hearing the Lord and Savior, flee to the mountains with those who are in Judea; let us also raise our eyes to the mountains, of which it is written: "I lift up my eyes to the hills, from whence cometh my help" (Psalm 120:1). And in another place: "His foundation is in the holy mountains" (Psalm 87:1). And, "The mountains are around him and the Lord is around his people" (Psalm 124). And, "A city set on a hill cannot be hidden" (Matthew 5:14). Let us also, taking off the skin of letters, and going up the mountain with bare feet with Moses, say: "I will go over and see this great sight" (Exodus 3:3); so that we may understand the pregnant souls, which conceived the beginnings of faith from the seed of doctrine and the Word of God, and say with Isaiah, "By your fear, O Lord, we have conceived, and have been in pain, and have brought forth the spirit of your salvation, which you have placed upon the earth" (Isaiah 26:14). For just as seeds are gradually formed in the womb, and a person is not considered or thought to be formed until the confused elements receive their shapes and members, so a sense concept conceived by reason, unless it breaks forth into works, is still retained in the womb; and it quickly perishes as an abortion, when it has seen the abomination of desolation standing in the Church (Dan. 9. 27, Mat. 24. 15, Mark. 13. 14) and Satan being transformed into an angel of light (2 Cor. 11.14). Of such fetuses Paul speaks when he says: "My little children, of whom I travail in birth until Christ be formed in you" (Galatians 4. 10). So I consider that women are akin to the mystical understanding, about whom the same Apostle writes: The woman was seduced and became a transgressor. But she will be saved by childbearing, if they remain in faith and love and sanctity with prudence (1 Tim. 2:14-15). For if she ever gives birth to anything related to divine teaching, it is necessary for what is born to grow; and to receive first the milk of infancy, until they reach solid food, and mature age in the fullness of Christ (1 Cor. 3:2; Eph. 4:13). For every one that is fed with milk, is unskillful in the word of justice: for he is a little child. Therefore, those souls which have not yet brought forth, or which, having brought forth, have not yet suckled them, seeing a heretical discourse standing in the Church, are presently scandalized and destroyed; they can't endure in times of trials and persecutions, especially if they have had leisure to perform good works and have not walked in the way that is Christ's (John 14:6). The Apostle said of this abomination of heretical and perverse doctrine that the man of iniquity and the adversary raises himself up against everything called God and religion, so that he dares to stand in the Temple of God, and show himself as if he were God (2 Thess. 2:4); whose coming is according to the working of Satan; and he destroys what is conceived by abortion; and what is born cannot reach childhood and perfect age. Therefore we must pray to the Lord, lest in the beginning of faith and growing age there arise a winter, of which it is written: Winter has passed, the rain is over and gone (Song of Solomon 2.11); lest we become sluggish in idleness, but with shipwreck imminent, let us awaken the sleeping Lord and say: Master, save us, we perish (Matthew 8.25).

Chapter 5

What is the meaning of what is written in the Gospel according to Luke: "And they did not receive him: because his face was going to Jerusalem" (Luke 9:53). Hastening, the Lord went to Jerusalem to fulfill the days of his assumption and to celebrate the Passover, about which he had said: "With desire I have desired to eat this Pasch with you, before I suffer" (Ibid. 22:15), and drink the cup, of which he said: "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" (John 18:11). He confirmed all his doctrine on the gallows, according to what is written: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all things to myself." (Ibid. 12:32). He set his face steadfastly to go to Jerusalem. For it is necessary to have steadfastness and strength for one who is hurrying spontaneously toward passion. Hence to Ezekiel, to whom God had said: Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of scorpions, and art not afraid of them: I have made thy face strong against their face (Ezekiel 2:6 and 3:9); so that if perchance the hammer of the whole earth had risen up against him, he would be like a most enduring anvil and crush the hammer, of which it is written: "How is the hammer of the whole earth broken and shattered!" (Jeremiah 50:23) And he sent messengers, that is, Angels, before his sight (Luke 9:52). For it was fitting that the Angels should minister to the Son of God. Whether he calls the Apostles Angels, because even John, the precursor of the Lord, was called an Angel (Malachi 3:1; Matthew 11:10). And when they entered a village of the Samaritans, to make ready for him, they did not receive him, because his face was going toward Jerusalem. The Samaritans and Jews are at odds with each other in enmity, and while all nations hate them, they are raging against each other with their own fury, while both contend for possession of the Law, and they persecute one another so much that after the Jews returned from Babylon, the Samaritans always obstructed the building of the Temple. And when even they wanted to build the Temple with them, the Jews replied: It is not lawful for us and you to build the Lord's house (1 Esdr. 4). Finally, for a great injury, the Pharisees reproached the Lord: Do you not have a demon, and are you not a Samaritan? (John 8.48). And in the parable of Jerusalem descending to Jericho, the Samaritan is placed as a sign and a miracle that he did good (Luke 10): and it is written to the Samaritan woman at the well: For Samaritans do not count themselves among the Jews (John 4.9). Therefore, the Samaritans seeing the Lord go towards Jerusalem, that is, to his enemies, as they had heard from his disciples who had come to prepare lodging, recognized him to be a Jew: and, as a Jew and a stranger, and one going to his enemies, they did not want to receive him. Although, with other understanding being submitted to us, it was the will of the Lord not to be received by the Samaritans, because he hastened to go to Jerusalem, where he was to suffer and shed his blood, so that, occupied with Samaritan hospitality and the teaching of that nation, he might not delay the day of suffering to which he had come. Hence he says in another place: "I was not sent except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matthew 15:24). And he commanded the Apostles: "Do not enter the city of Samaria" (Ibid. 10:5), wishing to remove all occasion of Jewish persecution, so that they might not afterwards say, "We have crucified him," because he had joined himself to our enemies and adversaries. Therefore his face was set towards Jerusalem. And accordingly, by another interpretation, the Samaritans did not receive him: for he was hastening to enter Jerusalem. But that they did not receive him, was of the Lord's will. Finally, the Apostles, versed in the Law, in which they knew only justice- an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth- seek to avenge the injury, and to imitate Elijah, at whose word two captains of fifty soldiers were consumed by fire: and they say to the Lord: Wilt thou, we say, that fire should come down from heaven, and consume them? (Luke 9:51). Beautifully, they say, Wilt thou, we say: for even Elijah had said: If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven upon thee (2 Kings 1:10). Therefore, for the effectiveness of the speech of the Apostles, it is the will of the Lord. For if He had not commanded it, the Apostles would speak in vain, asking that fire descend upon them, and in other ways. If fire descended from heaven to the injury of Elijah's servants, and consumed the Jews and not the Samaritans, how much more should the flame rage against the impious Samaritans, to the contempt of the Son of God? The Lord, who had come not to judge but to save, not in power but in humility, not in the glory of the Father but in the lowliness of man, rebukes them because they have not remembered His doctrine and the goodness of the Gospel, in which He said: 'If anyone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also' (Matt. 5:39) and 'Love your enemies' (Luke 6:35).

Chapter 6

You proposed a little question about the Gospel of Luke (Chapter 16, verse 1 and following): Who is the steward of iniquity who is praised by the voice of the Lord? When I wanted to know the reason for this and from which source it came, I examined the volume of the Gospel, and I found among other things that, as the tax collectors and sinners approached the Saviour to hear him, the Pharisees and scribes murmured, saying, "Why does this one receive sinners and eat with them?" (Luke 15:2). He spoke to them the parable of one hundred sheep, and one that was lost, which was found and carried back on the shoulders of the shepherd. And when it was proposed, he immediately said: "I tell you, there will be more joy in heaven over one sinner repenting than over ninety-nine righteous people who have no need for repentance." He also proposed another parable about ten drachmas lost and found, and he completed it with a similar ending. So I tell you, there will be joy in the presence of the Angels of God over one sinner repenting. He also proposed a third parable about a man who had two sons, and who divided his wealth between them. And when the younger son had lost his faculties and began to eat the pods that the pigs ate, he returned to his father, who accepted him. The envious elder brother, too, was rebuked by his father's voice, and he should have rejoiced because his brother was dead and had come back to life; he was lost, and he has been found. He spoke three parables against the Pharisees and Scribes who did not want to receive the repentance of sinners and the salvation of Publicans. He said also, he said to his disciples (Ibid. 16:1), without doubt, that he used a parable, just as before to the Scribes and Pharisees: by which parable he would exhort the disciples to mercy and would say in other words: Forgive and you shall be forgiven (Luke 6:7), so that you may ask boldly in the Lord's Prayer, Forgive us our debts as we also forgive our debtors (Matthew 6:12). Therefore, what is the parable that urges the disciples towards mercy? There was a certain rich man who had a steward (Luke 16:1), or a manager, for this is what οἰκονομος means. The steward is properly the governor of the estate, from which he is also called a steward. The οἰκονομος, however, is a dispenser of both money and fruits and all that the master possesses. Therefore, the most beautiful book of Xenophon's Oeconomica is not about the management of the estate but the management of the entire household (interpreted by Cicero). Therefore, this steward was accused before his master because he was squandering his master's property. When he was called, [the master] said: "What is this I hear about you? Give an account of your management, for you can no longer be steward." What did he say to himself? "What shall I do, since my master is taking the stewardship away from me? I am not strong enough to dig; I am ashamed to beg." I know what I will do, so that when I am removed from management, people may receive me into their houses."

He called each one of his master's debtors to him and said to the first, "How much do you owe my master?" He said, "A hundred measures of oil. He said to him: take your bill, and sitting down quickly, write fifty. Then he said to another: And how much do you owe? Who answered: A hundred quarters of wheat. He said to him: take your bill, and write eighty. And the lord commended the unjust steward, forasmuch as he had done wisely: for the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. And I say to you: make unto you friends of the mammon of iniquity; that when you shall fail, they may receive you into everlasting dwellings. He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in that which is greater: and he that is unjust in that which is little, is unjust also in that which is greater. If then you have not been faithful in the unjust mammon, who will trust you with that which is the true? And if you have not been faithful in that which is another's; who will give you that which is your own? No servant can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or he will hold to the one, and despise the other. You cannot serve God and mammon. Now all these things were heard by the Pharisees, who were greedy, and they ridiculed him. I have put the entire text of this parable so that we do not seek understanding from elsewhere and strive to find certain persons in the parable, but we should interpret it as a parable, that is, a comparison, which is called "parable" because it is "thrown beside" or compared, and is like the shadow of the pre-existent truth. Therefore, if the steward of unjust mammon is praised by the voice of the Lord because he has prepared justice for himself from an unjust matter, and the Lord, having suffered losses, praises the prudence of the steward, when he has acted fraudulently towards the Lord but wisely for himself, how much more will Christ, who cannot suffer any loss and is inclined to mercy, praise his disciples if they are merciful towards those who will believe ((or have believed)) in them? Finally, after the parable, he said: And I tell you, make friends for yourselves with unjust mammon. Mammon, however, in the language of the Syriacs, not the Hebrews, means wealth, because it has been collected unjustly. If, therefore, well-dispensed iniquity turns into justice: how much more will divine speech, in which there is no iniquity, and which is entrusted to the apostles, if it is well-dispensed, raise its dispensers to heaven? Therefore it follows: "He who is faithful in the least, that is, in earthly things, will also be faithful in many, that is, in spiritual things. But whoever is unjust in small things, so as not to give to his brothers for their use what has been created by God for all, he will also be unjust in dividing spiritual wealth, so that he may divide the doctrine of the Lord not for necessity, but for persons." But if, he says, you do not manage well the perishable riches of the flesh, who will trust you with the true and eternal riches of the doctrine of God? And if you have been unfaithful in what belongs to someone else (but everything that belongs to this age is someone else's), who will give you what is yours? That is why he criticizes avarice and says that those who love money cannot love God. Therefore, even the Apostles, if they wish to love God, must hold money in contempt. So the scribes and Pharisees, who were greedy, understanding that the parable was directed at themselves, mocked Him, preferring the carnal things, which are certain and present, to the spiritual and future things, which are uncertain. Theophilus, the seventh Bishop of the Church of Antioch after the Apostle Peter, who compiled the sayings of the four Evangelists into one work, has spoken about this parable in his Commentaries. 'The rich man who had a steward, or manager, is Almighty God, who is richer than anything else. His steward is Paul, who learned the sacred Scriptures at the feet of Gamaliel (Acts. 22. 3), and had received the Law of God to be dispensed.' When he had begun to persecute the believers in Christ, to bind them, to kill them, and to plunder all the substance of his Lord, he was rebuked by the Lord: Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me? It is hard for you to kick against the pricks. (Acts 9:4-5). And he thought to himself: What should I do? Since I, who was a teacher and a steward, must become a disciple and a worker. I cannot dig. For I see that all the commandments of the Law, which were on the earth, are destroyed; and that the Law and the Prophets were fulfilled up to John the Baptist. I am ashamed to beg, that I, who was a teacher of the Jews, should be compelled to beg for instruction from a gentile and from the disciple Ananias. Therefore, I will do what I think is useful to me: so that after I am dismissed from my position, Christians will receive me into their homes. And those who formerly practiced the law, but had now believed in Christ, began to teach that the law was abolished, and that the prophets had foretold these things. And they taught that what had been done by those who kept the law, was worthy of nothing but contempt (Philippians 3:8). Then he called two of his debtors. The first owed him one hundred measures of oil, that is, those who had been gathered from the Gentiles and were in great need of God's mercy; and he made them write fifty in the document instead of one hundred, which was a special number for those who repented, and based on the Jubilee, and that parable in the Gospel in which one is forgiven five hundred denarii, and another fifty. However, he called the people of the Jews who were nourished on the wheat of God's commandments, and who owed him a hundred denarii, and he forced them to make eighty out of a hundred, that is, to believe in the resurrection of the Lord, which is contained in the number of the eighth day, and is completed in eight decades, so that he might pass from the Sabbath of the Law to the first Sabbath. For this reason, it is preached by the Lord that he did well, and that he was changed from the severity of the Law to the mercy of the Gospel for his salvation. And if you ask why he is called the steward of iniquity in the Law, which is from God, he was an unjust steward who indeed offered well, but did not divide well, believing in the Father, but persecuting the Son; having almighty God, but denying the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the Apostle Paul was wiser in transgressing the Law than the once children of light who, engaged in the observation of the Law, lost Christ who is the true light of God the Father. You can read what Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, thought about this place in his comments. I could not find an explanation of this parable in Origen and Didymus, and I am uncertain whether it has been abolished by the antiquity of the times or whether they did not write it themselves. To me, it seems according to my previous interpretation, that we ought to make friends for ourselves from the unjust mammon, not just any poor person, but those who can receive us into their homes and eternal dwellings, so that when we offer them small things, we may receive great things from them, and giving them what belongs to others, we may receive what belongs to us, and sow in blessing, so that we may reap blessings. For he who sows sparingly will also reap sparingly.

Chapter 7

In what sense should we take what we read in the Epistle to the Romans: for scarcely for a righteous man will one die; for peradventure for the good man some would even dare to die. (Rom. 5:7) For two heretics, because they do not understand this testimony, being in different errors indeed, but with equal impiety, blaspheme. For Marcion, who makes God the righteous, the Creator of the Law, and of the Prophets; but the good [God] of the Gospel and of the Apostle, and would make Him the Christ, introduces two gods - the one righteous, the other good. And he asserts that for the righteous [God] none, or few, suffered death. However, for Christ's sake, countless martyrs have existed. Moreover, Arius refers to Christ as just, of whom it was said: Give the king thy judgment, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son (Psalm 72:1); And in the Gospel he himself says of himself: For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son (John 5:22); And, I judge as I hear (ibid. 30). But goodness belongs to God the Father, of whom the Son himself confesses: Why callest thou me good? there is none good but one, that is, God: but if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments (Luke 18:19). And since up to this point his blasphemies were able to find crooked paths, he stumbles and falls in the following [paths]. For who dares to die for the Father, and scarcely does anyone die for the Son, when on account of the name of Christ so much blood of martyrs has been shed? Therefore, whoever simply expounds this passage can say that in the old Law, in which there is justice, scarcely a few people were found who shed their own blood. But in the new Testament, in which there is goodness and mercy, innumerable martyrs have existed. But from that which he established, it is possible that someone may even dare to die, and with a measured step balanced the sentence, it should be understood that some who dare to die for the Gospel can be found not to be received in this way; but the meaning of this place should be handled from the higher and lower parts. For Paul said he boasted in tribulations: because tribulation works patience; and patience, probation; and probation, hope; and hope is not confounded (Rom. 5.4-5), which has a certain promise from him because the love of God is poured forth in our hearts, through the Holy Spirit who is given to us (Ibid.): according to what God had said through the Prophet: I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh (Joel 1.28); he marvels at the goodness of Christ, that he wanted to die for the ungodly, weak, and sinners, and to die at an opportune time, about which he says: In a time accepted I have heard thee, and in the day of salvation have I helped thee (Isaias 49.8). And again: Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation (2 Cor. 6:2). When everyone had sinned, they became useless together, there was no one who did good, not even one (Psalm 13.1). Therefore, his incredible goodness and unheard-of mercy, to die for the ungodly, for it is scarcely that someone would die for the just or the good, and he poured out his own blood, with fear of death terrifying all. For it can sometimes be found that someone dares to die for a just and good cause. But the love of God, which he has for us, is most proven by this, that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us, and his life was taken from the earth. And he was led to death for the iniquities of the people; he carried our sins, and his soul was handed over to death, and he was reckoned with the wicked (Isaiah 53); so that he might make us, the ungodly, infirm, and sinners, pious, robust, and just. Some interpret it thus. If he died for us who are impious and sinners, how much more confidently should we not hesitate to lay down our lives for a just and good Christ? Moreover, we do not think that what is just and good is something different or signifies any particular person; but rather a thing which is absolutely just and good, for the sake of which some may find difficulty but at times it can be found, to shed their own blood.

Chapter 8

What does the Apostle mean when he writes to the Romans: "For sin, seizing the opportunity through the commandment, deceived me and through it killed me" (Romans 7:11)? Let us examine the whole passage and, with the help of Christ, try to understand its meaning. We do not wish to impose upon you our interpretation, but only to explain briefly what seems to us to be the true sense of the words. So what shall we say? Is the Law sin? Certainly not! Yet, I would not have known sin except through the Law. For I would not have known covetousness unless the Law had said, "You shall not covet." But sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence. For without the law sin was dead. For I was alive without the law once:

but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. And the commandment, which was ordained to life, I found to be unto death. For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me. Wherefore the law is holy, and the commandment holy, and just, and good. Was then that which is good made death unto me? God forbid. But in order for sin to appear sin, it worked death to me through what is good, so that sin by the commandment might become utterly sinful. For we know that the Law is spiritual, but I am of flesh, sold into bondage to sin. For what I am doing, I do not understand; for I am not practicing what I would like to do, but I am doing the very thing I hate. But if I do the very thing I do not want to do, I agree with the Law, confessing that the Law is good. So now, no longer am I the one doing it, but sin which dwells in me. For I know that nothing good dwells in me, that is, in my flesh; for the willing is present in me, but the doing of the good is not. For the good that I want, I do not do, but I practice the very evil that I do not want. But if I do what I do not want, it is no longer I who do it, but sin that dwells in me. So I find the law, that when I want to do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God according to the inward man. But I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin, which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! Who will deliver me from this body of death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord! How can medicine not be a cause of death, if it reveals deadly poisons, although evil people abuse them for death, either by killing themselves or lying in wait for their enemies: thus the Law was given, to show the poisons of sins; and to hold back the man who abuses his freedom, who before was thoughtless and stumbled dangerously, with the reins of the law, and to teach him to walk by rules so that we may serve in the newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, that is, we live by the command which we previously called in the manner of brute animals; Let's eat and drink, for tomorrow we die (1 Cor. 15:32). But if, under the influence of the Law (which teaches us what we ought to do and prohibits what we ought not to do), we are carried away by our fault and incontinence against legal precepts, it seems that the Law causes sin: since while prohibiting desire, it is known to kindle it in a certain manner. The secular opinion among the Greeks is: Whatever is allowed is desired less. Therefore, on the contrary, whatever is not allowed receives the fuel of desire. Hence, Tullius also denies having written about the punishments of the parricides in Athens by Solon, so that he may not seem to prohibit so much as to admonish. Therefore, the law, disregarded by lawbreakers and those trampling on its precepts, seems to be the occasion for offenses: by forbidding what they do not wish to be done, it binds them with the chains of commandments; whereas, prior to sinning without law, they were not held guilty. We have said these things, understanding the Law which was given through Moses. But because it is written in the subsequent writings: the Law of God and the law of the flesh and members, which fights against the Law of our mind and leads us captive in the Law of sin, and that four laws, contending against each other, are known to be written in one place, I consider it not irrelevant if I inquire how many kinds of law are remembered in the Holy Scriptures. It is said that the Law, which was given through Moses, is cursed according to what is written to the Galatians: For all who are of the works of the Law are under a curse. For it is written: "Cursed is everyone who does not abide by all things written in the book of the Law, to perform them" (Gal. 3:10). And again in the same epistle: The Law was established for transgressions, until the offspring should come to whom the promise was made, having been arranged through angels by the hand of a mediator (Galatians 3:19). And again: Therefore the Law was our tutor to lead us to Christ, so that we may be justified by faith. But now that faith has come, we are no longer under a tutor. For you are all sons of God through faith which is in Christ Jesus (Galatians 3:24, etc.). Also, the history which does not contain orders, but reports what has been done, is called the Law by the Apostle. "Tell me," he said, "you who want to be under the Law, have you not read the Law? For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by a slave woman and the other by a free woman. But the son of the slave was born according to the flesh, but the son of the free woman was born by promise (Ibid. 4:22-23). And the Psalms are also called Law: May the word written in their Law be fulfilled: They hated me without reason (Ps. 68:5). Isaiah's prophecy, the Apostle calls the Law: In the Law it is written: "With other tongues and other lips I will speak to this people; and they will not even hear me, saith the Lord." (Isai. 21). This is the same passage which I find written in Hebrew in the book of Isaiah; and the Law also is styled the mystical intelligence of the Scriptures: "For we know that the Law is spiritual." (Rom. 7. 14). Besides all this, the Apostle tells us that the natural law is written on our hearts: For when the Gentiles that have not the Law do by nature the things that are of the Law, they are a Law to themselves, who show the work of the Law written in their hearts, their conscience bearing witness to them. (Rom. 2. 14 et 15). This law which is written in the heart contains all nations: and there is no human who does not know this law. Therefore, the just judgment of God is upon the human race; "What you do not want to happen to yourself, do not do to others." For who is unaware that murder, adultery, theft, and every form of desire are evil, because he would not want them to be done to himself? For if he were unaware that they were evil, he would not be pained by them being inflicted upon himself. Through this natural law, Cain also knew his sin, saying: "My punishment is greater than I can bear." Adam and Eve also knew their sin, and therefore they hid under the tree of life. Pharaoh before the law was given through Moses, confessed his sins, and said: The Lord is just, but I and my people are wicked. This law is unknown in childhood, ignored in infancy, and sinning without command, one is not held by the law of sin. He curses his father and mother, and beats his parents, and because he has not yet received the law of wisdom, sin is dead within him. But when the command comes, that is, the time when one seeks good and avoids evil, then sin begins to revive, and he dies, guilty of sin. And so it happens, that the time of understanding, in which we know the commandments of God, that we might attain to life, works death in us: if we act more negligently, and occasion seduces and supplants us with wisdom, and leads us to death. Not that understanding is sin (for the Law of Understanding is holy and just and good), but through understanding of sins and virtues, sin is born in me, which before I understood, I did not know it was sin. And thus it has become, that what was given to me for good, is changed through my fault into evil; and that I may use a new word to explain my meaning: sin, which before I had understanding, was without sin, by the transgression of the commandment, becomes more sinful to me. Before, let us ask what this desire is, of which the Law says: Thou shalt not covet. Some think that the command in the Decalogue "You shall not covet your neighbor's goods" (Deut. 5:21) means. But we consider all disturbances of the soul, by which we grieve and rejoice, fear and desire, to be covetousness. And this Apostle, vessel of election, whose body was the temple of the Holy Spirit, and who said, "Do you seek proof of the Christ who speaks in me?" (1 Cor. 13:3)? And in another place: "Christ redeemed us" (Gal. 3:13). And again: "But I now live, not I, but Christ lives in me" (Ibid. 2:20), he speaks not of himself but of Him who wills to do penance after sins, and, under his own person, describes the frailty of the human condition, which perpetuates the wars between two men, who are internal and external, and fighting with each other. The inner man agrees with both written and natural law, that it is good, and holy, and just, and spiritual. The outer [man], I say, is carnal, sold under sin. For I do not

