by A.B. Simpson

Scripture: Romans 8:35

Topics: "God's Love", "Overcoming Trials"

Description

A.B. Simpson emphasizes that nothing can separate us from the love of Christ, asserting that despite trials and adversities, we are more than conquerors through Him who loves us. He illustrates how our difficulties can transform into opportunities for faith and prayer, ultimately leading to triumph rather than defeat. Simpson reassures that our security lies not in our own love but in God's everlasting love, which remains constant even when everything else changes. He compares God's love to a mother's strong arms that protect and support, highlighting the assurance we have in Christ's unwavering presence.

Transcript

Who shall separate us from-the love of Christ? After all the possible obstacles and enemies have been mentioned, one by one, the triumphant answer comes: In all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us (v. 37). Our trials will be turned to helps; our enemies will be taken prisoners and made to fight our battles. Like the weights that keep the tall pendulum clock going, so our very difficulties will prove incentives to faith and prayer and occasions for God's becoming more real to us. We shall acquire from our troubles not only deliverance but triumph, and in all these things we shall be even more than conquerors through Him who loved us.

Our security depends not upon our unchanging love but on the love of God in Christ Jesus toward us.

It is not the clinging arms of the baby that keep it from falling, but the strong arms of the loving mother. God loves us with an everlasting love, and although all else may change He will never leave us, never forsake us.
