

Christianity

by Soren Kierkegaard

---

True Christianity begins when one is so wretched that their only desire is to die and find comfort in God.

Scripture: Romans 12:2

Topics: "True Conversion", "Divine Intervention"

Description

Soren Kierkegaard emphasizes the paradoxical nature of Christianity, highlighting the journey of true conversion where one must go beyond mere external labels of being a Christian to a deep inner transformation. He challenges the notion that one can best become a Christian without the trappings of organized religion, suggesting that true Christianity starts when one reaches a point of utter brokenness and desperation. Kierkegaard suggests that it is in our lowest moments, when all worldly comforts fail us, that we can truly encounter the essence of Christianity and the need for divine intervention.

Transcript

When Christianity entered into the world, people were not Christians, and the difficulty was to become a Christian. Nowadays the difficulty in becoming a Christian is that one must cease to become a Christian. One best becomes a Christian without "Christianity." Not until a person has become so wretched that his only wish, his only consolation, is to die--not until then does Christianity truly begin.
